Central Illinois Amish congregations stood with Stuckey, and as a result were out of fellowship with the main body of Amish. Stuckey, however, did not organize his following into a conference until 1899, shortly before his death, when the Central Illinois Conference was established.

He published Eine Begebenheit die sich in der Mennoniten-Gemeinde in Deutschland und in der Schweiz von 1693 bis 1700 zugetragen hat (Elkhart, 1883), dealing with the Amish schism.†

W.B.W., H.S.B.

W. B. Weaver, History of the Central Conference Mennonite Church (Danvers, 1926); Harry Yoder, "Joseph Stuckey and the Central Conference," Menn. Life VI (April 1951) 16-19.

Stucki, Peter, an Anabaptist martyr of Wimmis in the Emmental, Swiss canton of Bern, who was executed at Bern on April 16, 1538.

Mart. Mir. E 1129; Adolf Fluri, Beiträge zur Geschichte der bernischen Täufer (Bern, 1912) 14; ML IV.

Stucky, Jacob (1824-93), pioneer, educator, minister, and elder of the Volhynian Swiss Mennonites in Poland and in America, was born in Volhynia, Russian Poland, on Oct. 25, 1824, the eighth child of Christian and Katharina Müdelheim Stucky. He married Anna Waltner in 1849; eight of their children grew to maturity. His wife died shortly before the trek to America and on May 2, 1879, he married Barbara Kaufmann Voran. His descendants total over 1,335, of whom more than 1,200 are living in the United States and Canada.

Stucky was baptized in 1840 and elected into the ministry on May 29, 1851, and ordained as elder on Sept. 29, 1862. During that year his congregation moved from Edwardsdorf eastward some 160 miles to Kotozufka and Neumannovka, in Russian Poland, where they were permitted to own land on condition that they clear it and build their homes in true pioneering. The Swiss Mennonites established the churches of Zahorez, Horodyszcze, Waldheim, and Kotozufka in Volhynia. Kotozufka, the largest, was known as the Stucky Church. When they were barely established the policies of Russification and militarization dictated another move for conscience' sake. With the assistance of Jacob Goering, Stucky led his entire congregation (except two bachelors) of 73 families from Poland to America. They left their homes on Aug. 6, 1874, and arrived at Peabody, Kan., in approximately one month. They later settled in the region around Moundridge, Kan.

The congregation organized under the name Hoffnungsfeld (GCM). Here Stucky served faithfully until his death. He had a warm personality and was held in high esteem by the Swiss Mennonites of the settlement. He served various kinds of Mennonite groups from Western Kansas to South Dakota. During the first six years in Kansas he baptized 142 persons, 60 of these in his home church, 56 at the Emmanuel Church, then known as the "Cantongemeinde," 20 at Pawnee Rock, and at Hartford in Lyons County, Kan.

Elder Stucky was also concerned with bringing about orderly church life among many groups of Mennonites in Kansas, and played a part in the organization of the Kansas Conference. He promoted the cause of relief and Christian charity, especially regarding widows and orphans. He was also interested in Christian education, and pleaded in the press for a living wage for the instructor so that he could devote his full time to the cause. In 1877 he was elected to a "Committee of Seven" at Alexanderwohl to plan for a "Fortbildungsschule." He served on Kansas (now Western District) Conference committees. He was a member of the Christian Education Committee from 1877 to his death. In 1887 he was one of the thirty-three who signed the Bethel College Corporation Charter. He died at Moundridge on April 25, 1893, and was buried in the Hopefield cemetery. H.J.S.

Jacob M. and Anna J. Goering, The Rev. Jacob Stucky Family Record 1824-1953 (North Newton, 1954); I. G. Neufeld, "Jacob Stucky—Pioneer of Two Continents," Menn. Life IV (January 1949) 46 f.

Studen, Barbeli zur, an Anabaptist martyr, of Sumiswald in Emmental, Swiss canton of Bern, who was executed in Bern in 1537.

Adolf Fluri, Beiträge zur Geschichte der bernischen Täufer (Bern, 1912) 14; Mart. Mir. E 1129; ML IV.

Student Exchange. Beginning in 1946 the Council of Mennonite and Affiliated Colleges in the United States sponsored an international student exchange whereby each Mennonite and Brethren in Christ college provided substantial financial aid to a limited number of select foreign students for a year's study on its campus (in a few cases extended to two years). At first limited to Europe and to Mennonites, this program was later extended to include all countries and all religious backgrounds, although the main emphasis continued to be on Mennonite students. The MCC offices in various countries assisted in the selection of candidates and arrangements for travel. In many of the cases of German students the United States State Department provided substantial travel funds.

In the first ten years (1946-56) a total of 183 students were brought from seven European countries to the United States (Germany 96—began only in 1948—Holland 51, France 16, Italy 10, Waldensians, Switzerland 5, Belgium 3, Greece 2), an average of 18 per year. These were distributed among the American colleges as follows: Goshen 50, Bethel 28, Bluffton 22, Tabor 20, Eastern Mennonite 14, Messiah 14, Freeman 13, Hesston 8, Mennonite Biblical Seminary 4, Upland 3, unspecified 7. The purpose of the program was to enrich the service of these young people to their own churches and communities at home. Most of the 183 remained in their homelands, but 34 later emigrated to the United States or in a few cases (5) to Canada.

A smaller number of Mennonite exchange students were brought from South America to colleges in the United States and Canada, particularly from Paraguay, and a few from Brazil and Argentina. A few Mennonites were also brought from the Mennonite mission fields in India and Japan, and from the National Mennonite Churches in Java. Non-Mennonite students were also brought from Greece, Jordan, Lebanon, South Viet-Nam, Formosa, Hong Kong, Korea, Japan, Jamaica, and Mexico. H.S.B.

Stuhm Lowlands (Stuhmsche Niederung), a district in West Prussia, with the villages and hamlets of Schulwiess, Zwanzigerweide, Montauerweide, Reh-hof, Schweinsgrube, Rudnerweide, Gross-Schardau, and Klein-Schardau. In 1744 these villages were predominantly Mennonite. These Mennonites, belonging to the Frisian (in Dutch Naamlijst called Waterlander) branch, formed a single congregation, at first called Stuhmsche Niederung, later mostly Tragheimerweide (q.v.) or Zwanzigerweide (q.v.).
vdZ.

Stumpf, Simon, an ardent follower of Zwingli, who shared Conrad Grebel's (q.v.) ideas, a native of Bödighheim, Franconia, came into contact with Zwingli (q.v.) at Basel (Simon Stumpf's letter to Zwingli, Basel, July 2, 1519), was given the pastorate at Höngg near Zürich in 1522, was a member of the scholarly circle in Zwingli's home, and an enthusiastic proponent of church reforms. He was a signatory of the petition for the annulment of celibacy of the clergy and soon afterward married. He preached against tithes and interest, and demanded from the pulpit that "idols" in the church be done away with. The result was an outbreak of iconoclasm. At the religious colloquy held at Zürich on Oct. 27, 1523, he objected to leaving the abolition of the Mass to the council, saying that the decision had already been made by the Spirit of God. He became one of Grebel's co-workers and with him demanded that Zwingli establish an apostolic church, but was soon deprived of his parish at Höngg on Nov. 3, 1523, and banished from the canton of Zürich (Dec. 23, 1523). On Nov. 19, 1523, he wrote a penitent letter to Zwingli saying, "I cannot dig ditches and have nothing to dig even if I were able. I have sinned against heaven and against you and am no longer worthy of being called a son, either of God or of men, whom I have offended by my ignorance and stupidity. What is left for me to do? Perhaps: Go and hang yourself? God forbid! Dear Zwingli, graciously pardon Simon, who has seriously erred, so that he might love the more. Lead the stray sheep back to the right way, as you do others every day. Think of the one bowed down. He acknowledges his sickness and is looking for the physician. Consider me as one of your minor day laborers. Do not forget that we are members of Christ, the head. I am, to be sure, an untimely birth, but Christ still lives, who was able to call Lazarus forth from the grave . . . May He keep your hand and heal me." In April 1527 he was again imprisoned in Zürich, and released with the threat of death if he ever returned. He probably returned to the Catholic Church in Ulm.
NEFF.

Emil Egli, Aktensammlung (Zürich, 1879) No. 414 (Nov. 3, 1523); 446 (Nov. 14); 463 (Nov. 23); 1167 (Feb. 25, 1527); 326 b supplement; John H. Yoder, "The Turning Point in the Zwinglian Reformation," MQR XXXII (1958) 128-40; Egli and Finsler, Zwingli's Briefwechsel (Leipzig, 1911); TA Zürich, 121 f.; Wirz, Helvetische Geschichte (1819) 222 ff.; Zwingliana IV, No. 11, p. 321; ML IV.

Stumptown Mennonite Church (MC), located near Monterey, 8 miles northeast of Lancaster, Pa., in Upper Leacock Township, a member of the Lancaster Conference, was an outgrowth of the enlarging Mellinger congregation to the northeast. The members used a schoolhouse on the present meetinghouse site until 1846, when a worship center was built. This was enlarged in 1882 and replaced in 1916 by a 48 x 80 ft. brick structure. It was here during the summer of 1868 that John B. Landis and John Stauffer and their wives conducted a small Sunday school before the movement had conference approval. It was a part of the Mellinger-Stumptown circuit until a recent decade. Elmer G. Martin is bishop, Lloyd M. Eby and John G. Oberholtzer ministers. This was the home congregation of Preacher Sanford B. Landis (1868-1926). The membership in 1957 was 310. I.D.L.

Stundism, a religious movement caused by the pietistic revival of the 19th century among the German and Russian population of the Ukraine which resulted in the establishment of a number of Protestant churches in Russia, particularly the Baptists (q.v.) and the Evangelical Christians. Stundism can be traced directly to leaders of Pietism who transplanted the practice of private devotional meetings and Bible study from Germany and England to the German settlements in Russia and adherents of the Russian Orthodox Church. The word "Stundism" comes from the German "Stunde," meaning "hour (for worship and fellowship)."

Pietistic influences reached Russian circles in the early 19th century through Jung-Stilling (q.v.), Juliane von Krüdener, Alexander I. A. Bengel, and later through numerous individuals who traveled extensively in Russia in the interest of proclaiming the Gospel or who were living in German communities. The Presbyterian John Melville did evangelistic work in Russia after 1823. Through his work Kasha Yagob, who became an effective evangelist, was won for the Gospel. Johann Bonekemper transplanted the method of meeting for an "hour" (Stunde) of Bible study, a practice of the Württemberg Pietists, to Russia. These devotional and Bible study meetings conducted in the German settlements were the means of the conversion of Ivan Onyshchenko and Michael Ratushny, from Osnova near the German villages of Rohrbach and Worms of the Odessa area, where Bonekemper conducted pietistic Bible studies. Thus the revival and the method of Bible study were transplanted to the Russian population and "Stundism" originated. Similarly the activities of Eduard Wüst (q.v.) c1845 near Berdyansk affected German settlements including the Mennonites, and from them this practice and movement was transplanted to the Russian population.

A. V. Karev strongly emphasizes the significance of the Mennonites, particularly the Mennonite Brethren, in the origin of the Baptist movement in Russia. Gerhard Wieler (q.v.), an M.B. preacher of Liebenau, Molotschna settlement, won some followers (Stundists) in the neighboring village of Ostrikov. During the winter of 1863-64 Wieler began to baptize Russian believers by immersion, thus introducing this mode of baptism and the shift among the Russian believers from Stundism to a Baptist organization. In 1869 Abraham Unger (q.v.), also an M.B. preacher, baptized some Russians in Old Danzig (Ukraine), among whom was Ephrim Cimbal, who in turn baptized Michael Ratushny and Alexander Kapustyana. These three became the chief promoters of Stundism and the Baptist movement among the Russian population of the Ukraine. In 1869 J. G. Oncken, a German Baptist, organized the first Baptist church of the Ukraine in Old and New Danzig. The contact between the Mennonite Brethren and the Russian Baptists remained intimate. In 1884 Johann Wieler called the meeting of the Baptists at which a union of Russian Baptists was organized, and served as its chairman until 1886, when he left for Rumania.

Another source of the evangelical movement in Russia was Lord Radstock, an Englishman who started a tract mission in St. Petersburg in 1875, primarily among the aristocracy. Outstanding leaders among them were Pashkov and Korff. Although this movement in Northern Russia originally had little to do with the Mennonites, later contacts were established through such men as Jakob Kroeker. The Mennonite publishing enterprise "Raduga" (q.v.) (Rainbow), Halbstadt, South Russia, had a branch in St. Petersburg which distributed Russian Bibles and religious literature. After the Revolution in 1917, Jakob Kroeker established a mission organization in Wernigerode a. H., Germany, "Licht im Osten" (Light in the East), through which thousands of Russian Bibles and other devotional literature were distributed in Soviet Russia and other Slavic countries. In the Bible school of this organization, many young men and women were trained for evangelistic work among the Slavs. Some actually went to Russia. This work was born during World War I when thousands of Russian prisoners of war were reached with the Gospel through evangelism in the prisoner of war camps in Germany. The returning Protestant Christians who had been thus reached strengthened the evangelical movement in Russia. Licht im Osten, operated to some extent by Mennonites, played a very significant role in the promotion of this work until the Iron Curtain closed the contact with the West.

Thus Stundism was the forerunner of the present-day Evangelical-Baptist churches in the Russian area. Under the influence of the Baptist movement through the work of J. G. Oncken and others, Stundism accepted baptism by immersion as the sole form, and by doing so the movement became Baptist and Evangelical Christian, with the exception of some minor Pentecostal groups and the Adventists. Since 1943 they have all been united in the All-Union Council of Evangelical Christian Baptists with headquarters in Moscow. Sectarian groups, such as the Molokans, etc., also played a significant role in the spread of the movement. Jakov Zhidkov, chairman of the All-Union, is of Molokan background. C.K.

Waldemar Gutsche, Westliche Quellen des russischen Stundismus (Kassel, 1956); Christophilos, Ein Blatt aus der Geschichte des Stundismus in Russland (Berlin, 1904); Johannes Warns, Russland und das Evangelium. Bilder aus der evangelischen Bewegung des sogenannten Stundismus (Kassel); Cornelius Krahn, "Russian Baptists and Mennonites," Menn. Life XI (July 1956) 99;

A. V. Karev, "The Russian Evangelical-Baptist Movement" (Russian), Bratsky Vestnik (Moscow, 1957) No. 3, 5-51; George J. Eisenach, Pietism and the Russian Germans in the United States (Berne, 1948); J. G. Kargel, Zwischen den Enden der Erde (Wernigerode, 1928); Maria Kroecker, Ein reiches Leben (Wüstenrot, 1949); Menn. Bl., 1892, 21; Gbl., 1898, 68 ff.; 1899, 51; HRE XVI, 442; RGV V, 863; ML IV.

Stupman(n), Wilhelm, also called Mottencop (Mottencoup), a glazier, was one of the first Anabaptists in and around Aachen (q.v.), Germany. According to a letter of Aug. 16 (not July 16, as stated in ME I, 1), 1533, by Duke John III of Jülich to the Catholic bishop of Liège, Stupman, who had been banished from Aachen, had founded at Aachen, Maastricht, and Liège "special sects," which they (i.e., the Anabaptists) called congregations; they called themselves "christliche broeder." About the activity of Stupman, who apparently was very influential, further information is lacking. vdZ.

W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik . . . I (The Hague, 1937) 74 f.

Sturgeon Creek Hutterite Bruderhof of the Schmiedelut (q.v.) branch, located four miles north of Headingly, Man., was founded in 1938 by eleven families with 75 souls who left the Blumengard Bruderhof with their preacher Samuel Kleinsasser, who was chosen a minister in 1933 and ordained in 1942. In 1954, when Sturgeon Creek had a population of 158 with 60 baptized members, a group of 13 families with 73 persons with the minister Jakob Kleinsasser (chosen in 1946 and ordained in 1954) left to found the Crystal Spring Bruderhof, 6 miles southeast of St. Agatha, Man. In 1958 the Sturgeon Creek Bruderhof had 32 baptized members and a population of 98, with Samuel Kleinsasser and Elias Mandel (chosen in 1955) as preachers. D.D., S.K.

Sturm, Hans, an Anabaptist martyr, a cloth shearer of Steyr (q.v.) in Upper Austria, where he escaped prison and death by flight, whereas his wife recanted and his sister was drowned as a martyr in Freistadt. Before long he was arrested for speaking against the prince, but was released after six months. With a copy of a tract on baptism and communion by Wetel of Eibenschitz (q.v.) he wandered through Bohemia to Saxony. In Buchholz he met the brother-in-law of Wolf Kratzber, who had heard that his sister in Zwickau was under sentence of exile as an Anabaptist. Sturm went on to Zwickau and was kindly received by Wolf Kratzber and his wife. As a precaution they did not keep him overnight. When he was looking for work it was discovered that he was an Anabaptist and he was imprisoned in a dungeon of the city hall.

On Jan. 26, 1529, Sturm was examined on the rack. His confession revealed that he repudiated infant baptism, for infants could not believe; he had never baptized anyone, for he was too unlearned; the sacrament of the altar he considered mere bread and wine; he rejected community of goods and regarded marriage as sinful. Two additional examinations revealed nothing further. The authorities then inquired of John Frederick (q.v.), Duke of Saxony (his father, the elector, was at the diet of Speyer), what should be done with the prisoner. John replied that the matter should be decided by the court (Schöffenstuhl) at Leipzig. The prisoner was then questioned the fourth time. He defended his faith readily and with a remarkable knowledge of the Bible. This time he said that marriage was instituted by God. He vigorously rejected the suspicion of connections with the revolting peasants and said that the state should be obeyed in all matters of the body and property.

On March 15 came the verdict of Leipzig that Sturm was to be burned at the stake. The Zwickau council, however, sent the verdict to the duke, who then ordered that Sturm be brought to Wittenberg for indoctrination. If he then recanted, he would be released; if not, the Wittenberg theologians and jurists should decide what should be done with him.

Under heavy guard Hans Sturm was taken to Wittenberg on April 5. Luther decided that he "was driven by the raging of Satan" and did not look for success in converting him. All of their efforts were in vain; Sturm clung to his convictions. He was therefore condemned by the Wittenberg theologians and jurists to everlasting prison as a "blasphemer and seditionist," and upon the order of the duke was put into the tower at Schweinitz, southeast of Wittenberg, where he remained until his death, c1536. NEFF.

Martin Luther's letter to Nikolaus Hausmann of April 8, 1529; idem, Tischreden. No. 2032, Erlangen edition; P. Wappler, Inquisition und Ketzerprozesse in Zwickau zur Reformationszeit (Leipzig, 1903) 21-39 ff.; idem, Die Stellung Kursachsens . . . (Münster, 1910) 22; ML IV.

Stuttgart (Ark.) Amish Mennonites: see Arkansas and Arkansas County.

Stuttgart (Germany) Mennonite Church, a member of the Verband (q.v.), was organized in 1933 as an independent congregation; formerly it was a part of the Heilbronn (q.v.) congregation. It meets on the first Sunday of each month for worship, and on the third Sunday of each month for a youth Bible class, in rented quarters in Bad Cannstatt at Kreuznacherstrasse 43. The membership in 1958 was 111, with the following ministers: elders, Hermann Funck of Schorndorf and Horst Quiring of Korntal, with Ernst Quapp and Otto Hörr, both of Mühlhausen, as ministers. H.S.B.

Stutzman (Stutsman), a Mennonite family name of Swiss origin. A Swiss Mennonite, Christian Stutzman with his family, arrived in America from Holland in 1711. John Jacob Stutzman arrived in Philadelphia in 1727. His grandson Christian Stutzman married Barbara Hochstedler. The book listing the descendants of this couple contains over 15,000 entries, of whom more than a thousand carry the name Stutzman. Obituaries in the Herald of Truth and Gospel Herald show the family to be most numerous in Ohio, followed by Nebraska and Indiana. Death notices were carried in these periodicals from at least twelve other states and provinces. Jacob and Paul Stutzman were among the early ministers at Walnut Creek, Ohio, over a century ago. Daniel Stutzman, of Millersburg, Ohio, was the author of the 265-page book, Der schmale Verleugnungsweg, Eine kurze Christliche Vermahnung an meine Kinder (1917?). In 1937 at least 22 representatives of the Stutzman family were serving in the Mennonite ministry, 11 of whom were in the Old Order Amish Mennonite Church. Among the better-known ministers (MC) was Milo D. Stutzman of Kingman, Alberta. M.G.

Harvey Hostetler, Descendants of Barbara Hochstedler and Christian Stutzman (Scottsdale, 1938); Daniel Kauffman, Mennonite Cyclopedic Dictionary.

Stuurman, a Dutch family name. There have been three Mennonite ministers by this name. Jan Stuurman was a lay preacher of the Wormerveer Waterlander congregation 1764-68 and of the Frisian congregation at Burg on the island of Texel 1768-76. He seems to have been very conservative and intolerant; about 1776 with a few adherents he separated from the main body of the Burg congregation to found a new congregation, which also had a meetinghouse of its own, but lasted for only a few years. Claes Stuurman, who may have been a son of the former, was a lay preacher at Barsingerhorn-Kolhorn from 1784 until his death in 1827. Hendrik Gerrits Stuurman (1750- Jan. 18, 1790) studied at the Zonist (q.v.) Mennonite seminary at Amsterdam and served the Aalsmeer-Uithoorn congregation 1784-90. Until recent times members of this family were found in a number of North Holland Mennonite churches.

Another Stuurman family, apparently not related to the former, is found at Blokzijl, Dutch province of Overijssel. As far as is known its ancestor was Jan Ariaens (c1580-c1650), a Mennonite who settled at Blokzijl, probably from Giethoorn. In the 17th century his descendants assumed the family name of Stuurman. The early generations, all living at Blokzijl, were helmsmen (hence the name Stuurman), skippers, brewers, and farmers. Since the early 19th century they have spread over the Netherlands; they have been in various occupations and professions—merchants, bakers, physicians, and lawyers.

In Blokzijl (q.v.) most of the Stuurmans have been members of the more liberal Noorderkaai church. In the 18th century Arie (Adriaen Hendriks) Stuurman (c1686-1763) of Blokzijl, who was a deacon of the Mennonite church 1723-59, as well as a few other members of this family, leaned toward the Hernhutters (Moravian Brethren, q.v.), who organized meetings of the group at Blokzijl.

vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 1636; DB 1873, 146-50; 1885, 77; Dutch Naamlijst; F. J. Stuurman, Het Geslacht Stuurman van Blokzijl (Zeist, 1948).

Stuyvenberg, Jan Willem van (Amsterdam, Dec. 18, 1868-Baarn, May 30, 1950), a Dutch Mennonite pastor, studied at Amsterdam University and the Mennonite seminary and served at Oost- and West-Grafdijk 1895-97, Blokzijl 1897-1903, Westzaan-Zuid 1903-21, and Amsterdam 1921-36. Van Stuyvenberg was a warm friend of missions; for many years he was on the executive board of the Dutch Mennonite Mission Association, also serving as its secretary. (DJ 1951, 14.)

vdZ.

Styria (Steiermark), a province of Austria, capital Graz, in the 16th and 17th centuries administratively closely allied to Carinthia (q.v.) as "Inner Austria." Although Lutheranism was eagerly embraced in Styria by both nobility and burghers from its very beginning, Anabaptism never had a strong development there, perhaps in part because of the lack of significant leaders. In the days of the Governor Siegmund of Dietrichstein (q.v.), 1515-29, an ardent Lutheran, Protestantism spread quickly across the country in spite of the passionate efforts of King Ferdinand I (q.v.) to stem the tide. Not much is known about the origins of Anabaptism in Styria. The preacher Hans Has (Haas) of Windisch-Grätz, who was beheaded in 1527, can hardly be called an Anabaptist even though his fine "Sendbrief an die Auserwählten" (comfort in persecution) is found in the Kunstabuch (q.v.) of the Marpeck group. It was about this time, 1527-29, that Anabaptism was strongest everywhere. Single Anabaptists are reported in many places such as Rottenmann, Leoben, Bruck an der Mur, Hartberg, and Graz. Although the Lutherans were quite defiant toward the Hapsburg government of Vienna in their own affairs, they eagerly co-operated in the suppression of the Anabaptist "heresy," and Dietrichstein was particularly conspicuous in this regard. The most tragic event was the martyrdom of nine Anabaptist brethren and three sisters in the city of Bruck an der Mur in 1528. The Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (25-27) contains a well-known hymn commemorating this sad event; the hymn is anonymous, but it appears fairly certain that it was composed by Hans Gurtzham (q.v.), of whom the Lieder brings another almost identical hymn (136 f.) (See also Wackernagel, Kirchenlied III, 467 f.) Soon the Anabaptists began the exodus to Moravia, "the promised land."

The next governor of Styria (after 1530), Hans Ungnad von Sonneck, also a Lutheran, stands out as a very lenient and tolerant ruler. To be sure, he had to obey an order by King Ferdinand and tear down the house of Kaspar Maler of Graz, an Anabaptist who had previously arranged meetings in his house but had now gone to Moravia. But Ungnad could boast of having shed no blood; he is reported to have said that he did not want to have anything to do with the Anabaptists, for they were God-fearing, simple people. There was, however, another mass execution in Graz in 1534, the martyrdom of the important Daniel Kropf (q.v.), with two other brothers and four sisters. But it seems that it was not Ungnad but his assistant, the Vicedomus Michael Meixner, who passed that sentence. It is quite probable that the events of Münster (q.v.) had an unfavorable influence even in Styria. Although records continue to mention Anabaptists here and there, it is quite obvious that no real church life developed at any place; there were rather single individuals, in most cases on their way to Moravia. All in all, the Hutterite Chronicle records (up to 1542) 25 executions for Styria—7 in Graz, 12 in Bruck, one in Unzmarkt, and 5 in Grichsbach.

Toward the end of the 16th century the Hutterite physicians and barber-surgeons were highly appreciated by the nobility (see Physicians, Hutterite). Thus, for instance, Elizabeth of Zägl in Friedau "lent" her Anabaptist doctor to her cousin Siegmund of Eibiswald for a fortnight (1590). And as late as 1613 the Abbot Johann of Admont received official permission from the provincial government to call a famous Anabaptist physician of Nikolsburg (see Goller) and he issued a passport for his safe conduct. Otherwise, however, Styria played only a marginal role in the history of Anabaptism.

G.M.E., R.F.

Zieglschmid, Chronik; Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914) 25-27; Wackernagel, Kirchenlied III, 467; Grete Mecenseffy, Geschichte des Protestantismus in Oesterreich (Graz, 1956); Loserth, "Wiedertäufer in Steiermark," Mitt. des Hist. Vereins für Steiermark XLII (1894) 118-45; idem, Zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in Steiermark, ibid., L (1903); idem, "Zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in der Steiermark" (third installment), in Ztscht des Hist. Vereins für Steiermark X (1912) 267-71; idem, "Anabaptists in Styria in 1528," in MQR VII (1933) 133-41; many more studies by this same author; Paul Dedic, "Reformation und Gegenreformation in Bruck an der Mur," Jahrbuch der Ges. für die Protest. in Oesterreich LXIII-IV (1942-43) 15-23; idem, "Mährische Wiedertäufer in der Steiermark," Ztscht des Deutschen Vereins für die Gesch. von Mähren und Schlesien, 1938, 22-27.

Suburban Mennonite Mission: see Cottage City.

Successio Anabaptistica, Dat is Babel der Weder-dopers, is the title of a book published by V. P. in Cologne, 1603; there was a second unaltered edition at Cologne, 1612. This book is very rare; of the first edition only three copies are extant, and four of the second. There was a copy of the second edition in the Danzig Mennonite library; the Amsterdam Mennonite library has a copy of both editions. A reprint with introduction was published by Samuel Cramer in Bibliotheca Reformatoria Neerlandica VII (The Hague, 1910). Besides the Beginnel en voortganck der geschillen (q.v.) written some years later, this book is the only account of 16th-century Dutch Anabaptist history by a contemporary author who deals especially with various schisms among the Dutch Mennonites; it contains much information about church leaders found in no other source; therefore the book, since it is on the whole very reliable, is a valuable source, though it was written by an opponent of the Mennonites. The author was probably Simon Walraven, who married a granddaughter of Joost Buyck (q.v.), burgomaster of Amsterdam, and was later a Roman Catholic priest at Kevendonk near Goch, Germany.

The motive for writing and publishing this book was a publication by the Mennonite author Jacob Pietersz van der Meulen (q.v.), who wrote Successio Apostolica, Dat is Naecominghe ofte Naetredinghe der Apostelen (Alkmaar, 1600) which attacked the Catholic Church, explaining that a true spiritual apostolic succession is found not among the Catholics but among the Mennonites. Then Walraven tried to show that among the Mennonites there was no apostolic succession but merely a "Babel of confusion." vbZ.

BRN VII, 1-87, 565; K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 305 f.

Successio Apostolica: see Apostolic Succession.

Suderman, a Dutch Mennonite family, apparently not related to the West Prussian Suderman(n) family, was found at Rotterdam, Holland, in the 17th and 18th centuries. Of these Rotterdam Sudermans, all merchants, some were Old Flemish, e.g., Elyas Suderman, who was a deacon of the Old Flemish congregation from 1662, while others belonged to the Waterlander and later to the United Rotterdam Mennonite Church. Willem Suderman (d.1706) was a preacher of the Waterlanders 1675-1700 and of the united church 1700-1. In 1677-84, for some unknown reason, he did not serve. It may have been because of Socinian (q.v.) opinions. He was also an ardent Collegiant (q.v.). In 1688 he was secretary of the Zuidholland (q.v.) Sociëteit. Jan Suderman, a deacon of the united congregation from 1710, who may have been a son of preacher Willem Suderman, was in 1711 a representative of the Rotterdam congregation in the Dutch Committee for Foreign Needs. In 1718 he opposed the resolution of the church board to call pastor Daniel van Heyst (q.v.). Concerning this matter Jan Suderman and Aelbert van Meurs (q.v.) published Protest gedaen tegen de maniere van't beroepen van . . . n D. v.H. (Rotterdam, 1718). Suderman also published De Godlievende Ziel, vertoont in Zinnebeelden (Amsterdam, 1724, repr. at Utrecht, 1749). vbZ.

K. Vos, Geschiedenis der Doopsges. gemeente te Rotterdam (Rotterdam, 1907, repr.) 27, 28, 44, 47; DB 1908, 103.

Sudermann (Suderman, Zudermann, Suterma, Soermann), a common name among Mennonites of Danzig in West Prussia, Russia, and some parts of America. The name appeared in Danzig as early as 1671 and was found in Elbing, Heubuden, and Königsberg. The noted author Hermann Sudermann was of Mennonite background, his father having been baptized a Mennonite in Elbing. From this area the name was transplanted to Russia. B. H. Unruh lists 12 different bearers of the name (426). Outstanding in Russia were Leonhard Sudermann (q.v.), elder of the Berdyansk Mennonite Church, and in America elder of the Emmaus Mennonite Church, Franz Sudermann, a businessman of Halbstadt, Jakob J. Sudermann, owner of the Apanlee estate, one of the most successful and prosperous Mennonite farmers and cofounder and president of the Halbstadt Kommerzschule. Who's Who Among the Mennonites (1943) lists John P. Suderman, former missionary (GCM) to the Hopi Indians, Herman E. Suderman, founder and president of the Midland National Bank, Newton, Kan., John M. Suderman, minister (GCM) and conference worker, Newton, David H. Suderman, professor of music at Bethel College, and Jacob Sudermann, Elkhart, Ind., formerly professor at Goshen College, now on the staff of Indiana University, South Bend branch.

C.K., vbZ.

Bruno Meyer, Die Sudermanns von Dortmund, ein hansisches Kaufmannsgeschlecht (Marburg, 1930); Chr. Sepp, Kerkhistorische Studien (1885) 238-77; Reimer, Familiennamen, 119; Dutch Naamlijst; Unruh, Hintergründe.

Sudermann, Daniel (1550-1631), a Schwenckfelder (q.v.), was born at Liège, France, Feb. 24, 1550, died at Strasbourg, Alsace, in 1631. He was a painter and engraver by profession, as well as a successful poet. One of his 435 hymns, "Elend nit schad, wer tugend hat," is found in Wackernagel, Kirchenlied V, No. 827. Many of his hymns are found in Protestant hymnals. Christian Sepp (q.v.) published a thorough study of Sudermann in his Kerk-historische Studien (1885) 238-77. (ML IV.)

Sudermann, Hermann (1857-1928), a noted German author, was born at Wadziken in East Prussia, Germany, Sept. 30, 1857. His father was a member of the Elbing-Ellerwald Mennonite congregation, but was expelled when he married a Lutheran. Hermann Sudermann's Frau Sorge (1887) pictures his unhappy youth in his poverty-stricken home. At an advanced age he wrote Das Bilderbuch meiner Jugend (Stuttgart and Berlin, 1922), in which he recalls the unforgettable impressions of the Mennonite services he attended with his aunt, life on the "Hof" of a wealthy Mennonite uncle, picturing the Prussian Mennonites as competent, honest, but gloomy, and the loan of a considerable sum of money by a distant relative in Russia for Hermann's education.

E.H.B.

Elizabeth Bender, "The Mennonites in German Literature" (M.A. thesis, Minnesota, 1943); ML IV.

Sudermann, Jan, a Mennonite preacher in Amsterdam, published the book, De Kerkenraad en Gemeente der Doopsgezinden te Amsterdam . . . verdedigt tegen den E. Adriaan van Almar (Amsterdam, 1719). (Menn. Bl., 1890, 100; DB 1908, 103, where he is called a deacon in Rotterdam.)

Sudermann, Leonhard (1821-1900), was the elder of the Berdyansk Mennonite Church (q.v.), Russia, one of the chief promoters of the Mennonite migration to America, and elder of the Emmaus Mennonite Church (q.v.), Whitewater, Kan. He was born at Goldschaar-Heubuden, near Marienburg, West Prussia, on April 21, 1821, the youngest of twelve children, and was baptized in 1838. In 1841, after his father had died, he and his mother migrated to Russia where eight of the children had already gone. On Oct. 23, 1842, he married Marie Sudermann and settled in Berdyansk in 1843. In 1860 he was elected minister and in 1865 elder of the Berdyansk Mennonite Church.

Cornelius Jansen (q.v.), a member of Sudermann's congregation, was his close friend. Both men became great promoters of the migration of the Mennonites to America when they found out that certain privileges, particularly those pertaining to military service, were to be withdrawn. Sudermann was one of the delegates sent to St. Petersburg to learn how the new military law would affect the Mennonites. He was sent a second and a third time in 1871. In 1873 he was delegated to go to America with eleven others to investigate settlement possibilities for Mennonites from Russia and Prussia. Eine Deputationsreise is Sudermann's detailed report about this journey. After his return to Russia he reported his findings and helped people with their emigration.

In 1876 Sudermann immigrated to America, spending the first six months in Summerfield, Ill.

In 1877 he settled in Butler County, Kan., where some Prussian Mennonites had just organized the Emmaus Mennonite Church. He served this congregation as elder to the end of his life. He was also active in Conference work. He died on Jan. 27, 1900.

Sudermann kept records of all his trips to America and St. Petersburg and kept a diary. This material as well as his letters show that he was a very conscientious and diligent worker. (Most of the materials are found in the BeCL.)† C.K.

Ed. Claassen, "Etwas aus dem Leben und Wirken unseres teuren heimgegangenen Aeltesten Leonhard Sudermann," Christlicher Bundesbote, Feb. 15, 1900, p 6; H. P. Krehbiel, History of the General Conference of the Mennonites of North America (Canton, 1898) 444; Emmaus Mennonite Church, Record Book No. 1; Leonhard Sudermann, Eine Deputationsreise von Russland nach Amerika vor vierundzwanzig Jahren (Elkhart, 1897); Leonhard Sudermann, "Bericht über unsere Reise . . .," Herold der Wahrheit, Oct. 15, Nov. 1, and Nov. 15, 1898.

Sugar Creek Mennonite Church (MC), located 1½ miles southeast of Wayland, Iowa, a member of the Iowa-Nebraska Conference, had its beginning in 1843, when Amish Mennonite settlers arrived in the area. When Joseph Goldsmith (q.v.), an Amish bishop who had been living in Lee County (q.v.), Iowa, moved into the community in 1855, regular church services were instituted, although he may have organized the congregation two years previously. For a period of years there were two places of worship, but in 1862 the northern part of the settlement established a separate congregation, the Eicher Emmanuel Mennonite Church (q.v.). The Sugar Creek bishops were influential in the A.M. meeting (Dienerversammlung) and later in the Western District A.M. Conference. Joseph Schlegel (q.v.) served as bishop of the church 1868-79, followed by Sebastian Gerig (q.v.) 1879-1924, Simon Gingerich 1916-57, and Vernon Gerig 1953-. In 1950 a second meetinghouse for the congregation was dedicated, known as Bethel Mennonite Church (q.v.). In 1957 the combined membership was 611, of which number 434 were in the Sugar Creek congregation. Vernon Gerig, upon the retirement of Simon Gingerich in 1957, became the leader of the church. He was assisted by Willard Liechty, minister since 1935.

M.G.

Sugarcreek, Ohio, is a village of 889 population (1950) in western Tuscarawas County, near the Holmes County line. The Old Order Amish settlement of Holmes County extends several miles eastward past Sugarcreek. The village is the home of The Budget (q.v.), published here since 1890. The Sugarcreek First Mennonite (GCM) Church (q.v.) is located in the village. (See map of Holmes County.)

M.G.

Sugarcreek First Mennonite Church (GCM) of Sugarcreek, Tuscarawas Co., Ohio, was organized as a congregation in the Middle District Conference in 1926 with 84 charter members under the leadership of Lester Hostetler. The group had withdrawn from the Walnut Creek (MC) congregation of the Ohio and Eastern A.M. Conference. The first meetinghouse here was erected in 1894 as a community church, services being conducted by the United Brethren and Reformed churches. Later the Church of the Brethren also met here. Additions were built in 1912 and 1928. In 1914 both the United Brethren and the Reformed congregations withdrew to meetinghouses of their own; the Church of the Brethren and the Mennonites used it for services each Sunday until 1956, when the Mennonites purchased the Brethren interest in the building and are now erecting a new church. The membership in 1957 was 250, with Harold D. Thiesen as pastor. WM.H.S.

Suhner, Rudolf, a young Mennonite, was arrested c1643 and imprisoned in the Oethenbach tower at Zürich, Switzerland. After some time he recanted and was released, but soon deplored his apostasy. As a result of this "backsliding" he was arrested again and died in prison. (Mart. Mir. D 821, E 1120). vdZ.

Sumatra, one of the larger islands of Indonesia, former Dutch East Indies. In 1871 the Dutch Mennonite Mission (q.v.) Association opened a station at Pakantan among the Battak tribe, where Heinrich Dirks (q.v.) was active 1871-80. For lack of Mennonite missionaries his successor was not a Mennonite, but Tillmann Ernst Irlle. In 1888, however, a young Mennonite missionary, Gerhard Nikkel (q.v.), entered the work here and served until 1901. Other missionaries in this area were Nicolai Wiebe 1890-1900, Johann Thiessen 1901-9, David Dirks 1905-18, Peter Löwen 1912-14, Peter Nachtigal 1912-d.28. After Nachtigal's death the Sumatra mission field was vacant until 1931, when it was transferred to the Rheinische (Rhine) Mission (non-Mennonite). Later converts in this territory joined the Battak inland church. See also Batta, Hutagodang, Mandailing, Muara-Sipongi, Pakantan, and Penjaboengen.

However there is still a Mennonite Church in Sumatra. In 1952 Zacharias Djz Sahata, a Mennonite preacher appointed by Peter Nachtigal before 1928, living at Poetjoek Pimpinan Perkoempoelan Kristen Penjaboengen (Mandailing) Tapanoeli, Sumatra, wrote to the widow of Peter Nachtigal (living at Lautenbach, near Heilbronn, Germany, d.1958), giving a thorough report of the experiences of the Sumatra Mennonites during and since World War II. He reported small groups or congregations still in existence with a total of 161 souls as follows: Dolok Siantar—13 families (60 persons); Kota-Nopan—2 families (10 persons); Muara-Sipongi—2 families (10 persons); Pakantan—5 families (21 persons). These congregations have not joined the Battak Church but have remained independent as a Mennonite group and are organized as a conference with the name Perkoempoelan Mennonite Protestan Indonesia (Association of Mennonite Protestants in Indonesia). The property of the former Dutch Mission has been destroyed except for small remnants of the building. The five centers of mission work in the Mandailing area were Pakantan, Penjaboengen, Muara-Sipongi, Kota-Nopan, and Bonan-Dolok. There are still churches in these five places. H.S.B.

Uit Verleden en Heden van de Doopsgezinde Zending (n.p., 1947); Jaarverslagen (annual records) of the Dutch Mission Association.

Sumiswald, one of the most beautiful villages (pop. 6,000) of the Emmental, Swiss canton of Bern. Soon after the beginning of the Reformation it became an important center of Anabaptism and added a significant chapter to the story of the martyrdom of the Mennonites of Bern. In 1529 Moritz Kessler (q.v.), of Sumiswald, was a martyr in Bern, and in 1537 and 1538 three women of Sumiswald met the same fate. The last Bernese martyr, Hans Haslibacher (q.v.), also came from this region. Melchior Aeberli, of Sumiswald, was tortured in Bern in 1569; on the rack he declared that Anabaptist teachings were not sectarian but Scriptural; his uncle Lorentz Aeberli (q.v., executed July 3, 1539) had testified to this doctrine with his blood. Even on the rack he refused to betray any of his brethren. Sumiswald remained an Anabaptist center into the 17th century. S.G.

S. Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931); ML IV.

Summa der Heiligen Schrift, a booklet published at Leipzig in 1520, and in new editions by Eduard Böhmer in 1877 and by Karl Benrath (q.v.) in 1880. The author is unknown. Since the booklet maintains that it would be better if no one were baptized until maturity and that war is contrary to the Gospel, it can be assumed that it originated in circles akin to the Anabaptists. (ML IV.)

Summer Bible School, sometimes called Vacation Bible School, an auxiliary teaching agency of the Sunday school, operated for 2-4 weeks in the early part of the summer vacation period largely for children of grade-school age, but often including at least the first two years of the high-school age and kindergarten, that is, the age range of 5-16 years. Except for scattered single schools of mixed character the first true summer Bible school was conducted in New York City in 1898, while the first fully organized summer religious day school in which the graded children's school was the main feature was held at Ripon, Wis., in 1908. The Presbyterian Church was the first to promote the vacation Bible school on a church-wide basis through its Board of Home Missions in 1910. In 1911 the Daily Vacation Bible School Association was established to promote such schools in the U.S.A. In 1915 the Northern Baptist Convention became the second denomination to promote the DVBS on a nationwide basis, soon followed by many other Protestant denominations. In 1912 A. L. Lathem, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church at Chester, Pa., in protest against the nonreligious recreation and manual work features of the Daily Vacation Bible School, started an all-Bible school which he named Summer Bible School. His pattern was followed increasingly by the more conservative evangelical groups.

Mennonite Church (MC). The first strictly Mennonite summer Bible school was started in 1923 by Dean Noah Oyer of Hesston College, Hesston, Kan., although Edwin Weaver had conducted a community vacation Bible school in 1922 at Wakarusa, Ind. In 1924 the Prairie Street Mennonite Church at Elkhart started its school. By 1926 there were four such schools in the Mennonite Church, including one at Portland, Ore., and one at Scottdale, Pa., the latter promoted by C. F. Yake, who soon became the outstanding promoter of the cause in the church, and the writer or editor of the earliest summer Bible school manuals. By 1933 there were 40 schools in the Mennonite Church. The Mennonite school, though using the Lathem name, was somewhat different in type from it.

"In the Mennonite summer Bible school there is no shopwork and no unrelated handwork. There is, instead, a properly proportioned amount of activity features, including pupil's workbooks and projects to make the instruction an educative process involving some problem solving, and providing opportunity for informal educational procedures. Integrated memorization of Scripture, missionary emphasis, evangelism, sacred music, and worship, in addition to the transmissive teaching of the Bible, are all essential features of the Mennonite summer Bible school and are designed to bring the child into intimate personal relationship with Jesus, and help him learn to know Jesus as Saviour and Lord."

The need for curriculum materials was sensed from the very beginning. Outlines of courses used by various schools were published in the Christian Monitor in the early years of the movement. However, to provide a standardized guide, the General Sunday School Committee appointed a summer Bible school subcommittee which prepared a manual of summer Bible school courses, published by the Mennonite Publishing House at Scottdale in 1928. The committee was composed of Noah Oyer chairman, C. F. Yake editor, and Paul Erb. The manual contained instructions for organizing and conducting a summer Bible school, and provided ten three-week outlines from Kindergarten I and II to Grade VIII. It was designated Departmental Graded All-Bible Course, providing ten years' work.

To meet a growing demand, a committee was authorized in 1931 to prepare teachers' manuals, which were published in 1934. This course was designated A Departmental Graded Summer Bible School Course. It provided lesson materials for summer Bible schools of three weeks' duration for two preschool ages and eight grades. With the publication of teachers' manuals and promotional work done through the Secretary of Summer Bible Schools of the Mennonite Commission for Christian Education, interest in summer Bible school increased, so that by 1938 there were 150 schools.

The first Mennonite summer Bible school conference was held at the Masontown Mennonite Church, May 18-19, 1933, promoted chiefly by the Southwestern Pennsylvania District Conference; nevertheless it was also general because of church-wide attendance. A general Mennonite Summer Bible School Conference followed, held at the Napanee Mennonite Church, Ind., May 24-25, 1934. A second one was held at the Metamora Mennonite Church, Ill., June 13-14, 1935; a third at Martinsburg, Pa., May 7-8, 1936; and a fourth at Elida, Ohio, June 10-11, 1937. From these conferences church-wide interest was created; district conferences, institutes, and workshops have been conducted ever since. Many of the district conferences have summer Bible school secretaries, and those conferences which do not, have this office included in the Sunday-school secretaryship for the promotion of summer Bible schools.

An entirely new course, called the Herald Summer Bible School Series, was then prepared with graded materials for thirteen years of Bible school: one nursery, two kindergarten courses, courses for eight grades, and a course each for grades nine and ten. Approximately a dozen writers and artists and an editor were employed to produce these materials which have, since their publication in 1947, become widely used throughout the evangelical Protestant churches of America. Writers were Katherine Royer, Mary Royer, Ida Bontrager, Elizabeth Shwalter, Clarence Fretz, and Russell Krabill; the editor was C. F. Yake. The materials are Bible-centered and experience-related. A teacher's manual with a pupil's workbook and supplemental teaching materials are all integral parts of the materials for each course. The work was all done under the Curriculum Committee of the Mennonite Commission for Christian Education, led by Paul Mininger, chairman. The use of these materials has had a most beneficial effect upon the Mennonite Church (MC).

Since the publication of these new materials, summer Bible schools have increased steadily. In 1940 there were 214 schools with 2,086 teachers and an enrollment of 26,635; in 1945, 300 schools with 2,519 teachers and an enrollment of 28,977; in 1954, 722 schools with 7,703 teachers and an enrollment of 84,157. This was the high point, the next three years showing a slight decline.

More than two thirds of the editions of these Scottdale materials are sold to churches other than Mennonite, and more than twice as many pupils from non-Mennonite homes as from Mennonite homes are reached yearly. This does not include the outreach in foreign lands. At the present time a corps of workers is busy in Basel, Switzerland, translating the courses and preparing materials in German and French, and promoting summer Bible camps throughout Europe. This is carried on through the Agape-Verlag created in 1955 as a European agency of the Scottdale publishing house, with co-operation and support from the Mennonite Central Committee. Most of the courses have been translated into Spanish at Scottdale, and are now being sold in Puerto Rico and Latin-American countries, and wherever else Spanish materials are needed.

One of the most interesting aspects of the summer Bible school movement is the missionary education given to the children. Each year the summer Bible school children contribute for missions and relief work more than one third of the total cost of operating all summer Bible schools. In 1954 this was more than $27,000.

Summer Bible schools are enthusiastically promoted in all districts of the Mennonite Church (MC). Lancaster Conference has the largest number of summer Bible schools, many of which are rural and city mission schools. Franconia Conference is next in number. The church has recognized the summer Bible school as a great potential missionary agency for reaching children, establishing new Sunday schools, and founding new churches. This is a major reason for the rapid growth of this movement. Summer Bible schools have become a major feature of the Christian education program in most congregations in almost all branches of the Mennonite brotherhood. For instance, in the G.C.M. Church about 90 per cent of the congregations have it. None of the branches except the M.C. group have produced printed materials for use in their schools; most of them use the publications of the Mennonite Publishing House at Scottsdale. C.F.Y.

C. F. Yake, The Summer Bible School an Agency for Christian Education, Superintendent's Manual (Scottsdale, 1951).

Summer (Sommer), Heinrich (also called Müller), an Anabaptist martyr, was taken prisoner in Zurzach in the Swiss canton of Aargau (q.v.) with Jakob Mändl (q.v.) and drowned at Baden (Switzerland) on Oct. 9, 1582. He was probably identical with Heinrich Müller of Meisterschwanden (Heiz, 79). Several songs were written in memory of their death. NEFF, S.G.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 275, 281; Mart. Mir. D 741, E 1057; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 234 f., 408-10; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 525, 527 ff.; J. Heiz, Täufer im Aargau (Aarau, 1902); Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottsdale, 1914) 752; Wolkan, Lieder, 234; ML IV.

Summerauer (Sumerawer), Leonhard (Lienhart), a Hutterite martyr, of the Salzburg area of Austria, was arrested "about eight days before St. Martin's Day" in 1584. While he was in a boat traveling to Tittmoning (q.v.), the drunken sailors caused a wreck by colliding with a bridge. He escaped by a ladder put down by spectators. But the sailors cried out that their bad luck was due to the presence of an Anabaptist in the boat, and he was arrested. During his imprisonment of half a year he was severely tortured five times, but remained steadfast. In reply to the demand that he desist from his erroneous faith he said he had twenty years previously desisted from unrighteous living. The Catholic clergy made repeated sincere efforts to convert him; on the very scaffold he was offered freedom if he would recant only two articles of his faith. But he resisted all these attempts, and was beheaded at Burghausen, Bavaria, Germany, on July 5, 1585. His death is the theme of the song "Himmlischer Gott und Herre, lass dich erbarmen schier." NEFF, E.H.B.

Mart. Mir. D 74, E 1060; Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottsdale, 1914) 763; Wolkan, Lieder, 235; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 539-41; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 418 f.; ML IV.

Summerdale Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, now extinct, located near Summerdale, Baldwin Co., Ala., was organized in 1934. In 1944 Norman Eicher was ordained as minister and Otto Harms as deacon. The services were conducted in the community hall. The group, composed of settlers from other states, later dissolved, and most of the members formed the Walnut Hill (Fla.) congregation; the most common post-office address is Atmore, Ala. P.G.H.

Summerfield First Mennonite Church (GCM), at Summerfield, Saint Clair Co., Ill., a member of the Middle District Conference, was founded by immigrants who came from the Palatinate, Germany, about the middle of the 19th century. The first regular church service of the group was held at the home of John Kraemer, 4 miles southeast of Summerfield, on Nov. 30, 1856. A church building at the southern outskirts of Summerfield was dedicated on Jan. 23, 1859. Daniel Hege of Lee County, Iowa, became the first pastor of the church. More than a dozen families came with him into the community. The church aligned itself at once with the General Conference Mennonite movement, and in 1863 the third session of the conference was held at Summerfield, in which it was decided to establish the first Mennonite school at Wadsworth, Ohio. In 1910 the congregation bought the abandoned Methodist church in Summerfield, and with some changes and renovations has used it as the place of worship ever since. The membership in 1957 was 92, with Ernest W. Neufeld serving as pastor. E.B.

Summers Amish Mennonite Church, more generally known as Canton Amish Mennonite Church, now extinct, located about 5 miles southwest of the then limits of Canton, Ohio, near the present village of Richville, was established in 1810-20 by Amish settlers from Pennsylvania. Later settlers were Alsatian Amish Mennonites. An early minister was George Yutzy (q.v.). A later minister was Henry Summers, the father of Preacher John Sommers (ord. 1888 at Beech). Other ministers were Daniel Graber, and bishops Christian Klopfenstein and Zehr. After the death of Henry Summers in the late 1870's, ministerial help for the remaining members was supplied by the Oak Grove Mennonite Church at Smithville and the Beech church at Louisville. As late as 1900 the Eastern A.M. Conference appointed someone to serve the congregation. J. S. Gerig and John Sommers served in this way. The members began to move away or to join other M.C. congregations as well as other denominations.

This congregation probably never had a meeting-house, but used the Mt. Eaton Church of the Brethren for funerals. This Amish congregation had no connection with the Rowland Mennonite Church (q.v.), although the two have sometimes been confused. L.V.C.

Sumner County (Kansas) Old Order Amish settlement dates back to 1916. A congregation of 21 members was located in the west-central part of the county, near Conway Springs and Argonia. The first settlers came from Indiana and included the families of John H. Troyer (minister), Enos Miller (deacon), Amos Miller, and Ben Miller. The congregation met for worship for the first time on Jan. 30, 1916. The first resident bishop was Yost Lehman; he was succeeded by John H. Troyer and Dave D. Nissley. Leander S. Keim of Haven, Kan., was the bishop in charge in 1955. R.Tr.

Sun Valley Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Church, located in Los Angeles, Cal., was organized in 1942. Meetings were at first held in a store building. In 1944 the first church building was erected, enlarged in 1948 and 1955; it now has a seating capacity of 200. In 1958 the membership was 55, with David J. Dirks as pastor. D.J.D.

Sunbury Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church, Sunbury, Pa., in the Allentown District, had 180 members in 1957, with E. W. Bean as its pastor. M.G.

Sundarganj (Dhamtari, India) Mennonite Church (MC). After their arrival in India the first missionaries of this group, Bishop J. A. Ressler and Dr. and Mrs. Page, chose Sundarganj, at the edge of Dhamtari, as the site for their work, and in the autumn of 1899 they struck their tents under mango trees in a lovely grove. Soon the famine of 1899-1900 was upon them. Famine subjects began to pour into Dhamtari and surrounding villages and the missionaries were requested to open a famine relief center. The government officials arranged with the missionaries to give people work on the mission premises where the construction of buildings had been started, the government furnishing the funds and the mission furnishing the material. Thus the first evangelistic opportunity was with the thousands of famine sufferers among whom were nearly a thousand orphans. During 1901-2 Jacob and Mrs. Burkhard and Mahlon C. and Mrs. Lapp arrived, and the work could be organized into orphanage work, medical work, industrial and rehabilitation work, and evangelism through education and special Bible teaching. A number of families who remained in or near Dhamtari after the famine relief became Christian converts and were baptized and received into church fellowship, and many orphans were under special instruction for baptism. This resulted in a very rapid growth of the Christian membership.

Sundarganj became the headquarters of the American Mennonite (MC) Mission. At this station were located the treasurer, the Christian Academy, a large staff of missionaries and Christian teachers, and evangelistic workers.

Shantipur Leper Homes, Rudri, and Balodgahan stations were the natural outgrowth of the work established at Sundarganj. From the lepers fed in separate kitchens near Sundarganj a leper asylum was established near Dhamtari which afterward developed into the Shantipur Leper Homes (q.v.). The shifting of the orphan girls to a home separate from the boys gave rise to the mission station of Rudri (q.v.). To meet the need for Christian community expansion, especially on the land, the village of Balodgahan was bought in 1906. In 1957 the membership was 589, with D. A. Sonwani and J. H. Flisher serving as ministers in charge. G.J.L.

Sunday School. One of the most characteristic and influential institutions of modern American Christianity is the Sunday school. Like many other good things imported from Europe, it was greatly improved and thoroughly Americanized in the course of its 150 years of history on this continent. First established by Robert Raikes in Gloucester, England, in 1780, it reached Virginia as early as 1786 and passed rapidly from there to the leading cities of the eastern seaboard, including Philadelphia in 1790, and Boston and New York in 1791. In 1811 it reached Canada. By 1815 it had become a powerful, popular movement, and by 1824 a national organization, called the American Sunday School Union, had been organized to promote Sunday schools on a nation-wide scale. In 1830 this organization undertook a great missionary campaign "within two years to establish a Sunday school in every destitute place where it is practicable throughout the valley of the Mississippi," and in 1839 it resolved to establish a Sunday school "in every place in the West."

The first Sunday schools, however, were radically different from the modern Sunday school both in purpose and method. The Sunday school was conceived by Robert Raikes as a school for helping poor factory children of the lower classes to learn something of morals and religion, and to keep them off the street. The first Sunday schools were definitely promoted as private schools with paid teachers to deal with one of the most flagrant evils arising from the newly introduced factory system, the degradation of childhood. Not until 1812, in Philadelphia, was a Sunday school established on a voluntary basis with unpaid teachers with the definite purpose of teaching all children the Bible and leading them into an active religious experience. And not until after 1830 was the idea widespread that children of all classes should have Sunday-school privileges. Not until 1844 did any American denominational body officially and fully recognize the Sunday school as a church agency.

Since, therefore, the early Sunday schools were of private origin and promoted by persons interested in what might be called today "social service among the poor," and since the instruction of the youth of the church was generally carried on by catechetical methods within the ecclesiastical boundaries, there was much opposition to the attempt to make the Sunday school a universal Christian institution. For a generation or more it was promoted by private individuals and private organizations often against the opposition of official church leaders. In some sections of the country widespread bitterness and antagonism were created by the aggressive enterprise of Sunday-school leaders. For instance, in 1830 a Baptist Association in Illinois passed a resolution which is typical of many, saying: "We as an Association do not hesitate to say that we declare an unfellowship with Foreign and Domestic Mission and Bible Societies, Sunday Schools, and Quack Societies, and all other Missionary Institutions." In fact, a large share of the Baptists of the Middle West at that time adopted an anti-mission and anti-Sunday-school position which had an unfortunate effect upon the progress of that denomination in later years.

Along with the Sunday school, other aggressive evangelical methods were used in building up the Christian religion among the masses. The first quarter of the 19th century in America witnessed the organization of several foreign missionary societies, as well as Bible societies, tract societies, temperance societies, anti-Masonic societies, and numerous other organizations. The first foreign mission board, the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, was established in 1815; the American Bible Society in 1816; the American Sunday School Union in 1824; the American Tract Society in 1825. By 1830 the Bible Society, the Sunday School Union, and the Tract Society were co-operating in a tremendous campaign to Christianize America, and were doing it outside the regular denominational organizations. By 1850 the denominations began to form their own organizations to promote Sunday schools, home missions, and similar enterprises, and by this time great achievements were obtained in establishing the Christian church and Christian morals in the great newly occupied frontier territory. In the forefront of the work were the numerous hard-working, self-sacrificing missionaries of the American Sunday School Union, and the colporteurs of the American Bible Society and the American Tract Society. These men and organizations conquered the frontier for Christ quite as much as did the organized denominational agencies. This tremendous forward movement of evangelical Christianity in America was the result largely of the Great Revival of 1800, which was the most far-reaching in its results of all the revivals which have come to the Christian churches of America.

No doubt the most influential of all these institutions was the Sunday school. It adapted itself to the growing needs of the country, improved its methods, and enlarged its services. Beginning as a school for children from 6 to 12 of the poor classes, it soon sought to provide for all children, and ultimately for all Christians, direct systematic Bible study. In 1825 for the first time, through the American Sunday School Union, uniform lessons and question books were provided. Lesson helps of the modern type were introduced in 1866. In 1872 the modern international series of uniform Sunday-school lessons was set up. Along the way teacher-training courses, Sunday-school institutes, and Sunday-school conventions of various kinds were established to promote enthusiasm and to improve the work. By the fifth national convention of 1872, the American Sunday school had become a thoroughly established, powerful, national institution, recognized by practically all of the churches, and destined to play an increasingly important role in the spiritual history of America and of the world. It was in America, where religious instruction in the public schools is not only practically unknown but forbidden, and where tradition requires complete separation of church and state, that the Sunday school has been able to unfold its true genius and exercise its full power, in contrast to Europe where the state church provides religious instruction in the public schools, and where the Sunday school has never flourished to such a great extent.

It is on this background of American Sunday-school history that the history of the Sunday school among the Mennonites of North America must be understood. The history and development of the Sunday school in the various Mennonite bodies has never been thoroughly studied, except for the Mennonite Church (MC). The following bodies in North America have never accepted the Sunday school: Old Order Amish, Old Order Mennonite, Reformed Mennonite, Stauffer Mennonite, Old Colony Mennonite, and Sommerfeld Mennonite. The schism of the Wisler (Old Order) Mennonites (q.v.) in Indiana in 1871 was occasioned partly by the introduction of the Sunday school. No other schism is directly attributable to the Sunday-school problem.

The Mennonite Church (MC). Probably the first Mennonite Sunday school in North America was established in Waterloo County, Ont., in 1840 in the Wanner and Bechtel (now Hagey) Mennonite meetinghouses. The second Sunday school seems to have been the one held in 1841 by the Kitchener (q.v.; then Berlin), Ont., congregation. The third Sunday school apparently was the one established by Bishop Nicholas Johnson in 1842 at Masontown (q.v.) in southwestern Pennsylvania. Another early Sunday school was established by Bishop Jacob Gross and Dilman Moyer in 1848 at Moyers (q.v.) church near Vineland, Ont. In eastern Pennsylvania in 1847 or earlier, apparently before the G.C.M. schism which he led, John H. Oberholtzer (q.v.) introduced a Sunday school into the Swamp (q.v.) congregation, near Quakertown, Pa., under the name "Meetings for Instruction of Children," in German "Kinderlehre." The meetings were held on alternate Sunday afternoons and were fairly well attended for a number of years, although a formal Sunday school at West Swamp was not established until 1858. Sunday school was conducted among the Amish of Mifflin County, Pa., before 1850. Most of these Sunday schools were later discontinued.

The first permanent Mennonite (MC) Sunday school in America was started by the South Union congregation near West Liberty, Ohio, by David Plank in May 1863. The record book of this Sunday school contains this statement for May 31, 1863 (translated): "J. C. Kanagy and D. Plank, ministers of the Church of God in this vicinity, have decided with the council of the church to organize a Sunday school in the name of God, for we believe quite confidently that as the fathers and mothers give us their support, much good will arise out of it." In a few years Sunday schools were established in widely scattered sections of the church and gradually became accepted as a part of the ministry of the church to its young people.

The growth of the Sunday school, however, was slow and not without serious opposition. Some of the reasons for opposing it were that it was patterned after that of other churches, was "worldly" and fostered pride, placed teaching responsibility into the hands of the laity, and was unsupported by the Bible. It is an interesting fact that through the Amish churches, which were generally not yet bound together by district conferences, the Sunday-school movement spread among the Mennonites.

In 1863, J. N. Brubacher, then a layman, started a Sunday school in the Pike Schoolhouse in Rapho Twp., Lancaster Co., Pa., having received his inspiration from an Episcopal Sunday school in Philadelphia which he had attended. Upon the ordination of Brubacher as minister in 1865, this Sunday school was discontinued. In 1866 the Washington, Ill., congregation organized a Sunday school. In 1869 the Virginia Conference permitted Sunday schools. The Ohio Conference approved Sunday schools in 1867; Indiana Conference in 1868; and Lancaster Conference in 1871.

In the Lancaster Conference the first permanent Sunday school was organized at Willow Street in 1871, and those at New Providence, Strasburg, Slate Hill, and Churchtown in 1872. Hershey's started one in 1874, Landisville in 1878, and Kraybill's in 1879.

The first permanent Sunday school in the Franconia Conference was started in 1878 at Towamencin, near Lansdale, Pa. However, the majority of the Franconia Conference congregations did not start Sunday schools until after 1880, and many of them not until after 1890, a few even waiting until after 1900.

During the decade 1865-75 Sunday schools were started in every state where there were Mennonite or Amish congregations, and most Mennonite conferences took action approving Sunday schools. In that decade at least 35 permanent Sunday schools were established. By 1875 the victory had been won in substance, and by 1890 in the west it was the exceptional congregation that did not have it. In 1880 J. F. Funk published Sunday-school "question books" authorized by the Lancaster Conference. The victory was sealed in 1890 with the establishment of an English and a German quarterly, published at Elkhart and edited by J. S. Coffman; a General Sunday School Conference was held near Goshen, Ind., in 1892.

Since then the development of Sunday schools in the Mennonite Church has been substantial and progressive. For this no person deserves more credit than I. W. Royer, of Orrville, Ohio, who for many years was Sunday School Secretary of the General Sunday School Committee, which was organized in 1915 to promote Sunday schools, and was displaced in 1937 by the Mennonite Commission for Christian Education. Also through the agency of the summer Bible school many Sunday schools have been begun in rural and city mission stations. In 1932 the Sunday schools had increased to 414 with an enrollment of 62,010; in 1937, 584 schools with 74,654; in 1957, 715 schools with 102,172.

In the Mennonite Church the promotional responsibility for the Sunday school lies with the Commission for Christian Education through its field secretary, and the divisional secretary for Sunday schools. This agency, combined with the extensive graded curriculum materials available through the Herald Uniform Sunday School Series, makes growth in numbers as well as in quality more readily possible.

Sunday-school literature (q.v.) as it was developed first at Elkhart by the Mennonite Publishing Company and then at Scottdale by the Mennonite Publishing House, including both the pupil and teacher quarterlies, the Sunday-school papers of several levels (Beams of Light, Words of Cheer, and Youth's Christian Companion), and the teacher-training materials, has been the most widely read literature in the church and has constituted the backbone of the publication work of the church. Teachers' meetings, formerly held weekly (either on a weekday evening or Sunday morning before Sunday school), now not so common, have been strong influences for spiritual growth and unity. Teacher-training classes have been prominent in many congregations. Sunday-school conferences (q.v.) beginning in 1892 and held annually in most conference districts ever since, although now usually called Christian Workers' Conferences, have been very stimulating to spiritual life and vision. Mission Sunday schools have been the most effective means of church extension in the second quarter of the 20th century and after.

In the long perspective of a century of Sunday-school history, the church of today can better appreciate what the Sunday school has meant for the spiritual life and progress of the Mennonite Church. Without doubt it has been one of the major factors in the revival and forward movement of the last two generations. Amos Herr, one of the most able ministers of the Lancaster Conference in the 19th century, felt in 1880 that it was "the only salvation of the church." While this may be a slight overstatement, yet it is probably true that the Sunday school saved the church from great disaster by the new life, new spirit, new activity, and new vision which it put into the church. Many of the congregations that rejected the Sunday school either have died out or have gradually declined.

Wherein lay the great significance of the Sunday school for the church? A careful study suggests nine major contributions of the Sunday school. This summary is not to imply that the Sunday school was the only source of these improvements, but rather that the Sunday school was in general the initial and most important single factor. (1) The Sunday school was an important factor in holding the young people for the church. (2) It has greatly increased Bible knowledge. (3) It elevated the level of spiritual life. (4) It raised the level of moral life in the church, especially through the teaching of temperance. (5) It provided activity and expression and thus contributed to new life in the church. (6) It created lay leadership. (7) It was largely responsible for the missionary movement. (8) It was a factor in the great awakening of the Mennonite Church which occurred in 1890-1910. (9) It helped to give the Mennonite Church a new vision.

Wherever the North American Mennonites have gone in mission work, at home or abroad, they have taken the Sunday school with them with some adaptations.

Among European Mennonites, the Sunday school was widely accepted during the first quarter of the 20th century as a means of Christian education for children under catechetical age, that is, up to 14 years. It has not, however, taken the American form of a Bible study program for the entire church membership divided into classes before (or after) the regular Sunday morning worship. According to Paul Schowalter the first European Sunday schools were apparently the two introduced in the Palatinate, Germany—in the Deutschshof congregation in 1861, established following the closing of the private elementary school there, and in the Friedelsheim congregation in 1884, begun by the wife of the pastor, Ellenberger, who had learned about the Sunday school at Männedorf in Switzerland. In Ludwigshafen it was introduced c1918 by the wife of the pastor, Emil Händiges, who came from the Baptists. At present (1958) practically all of the Palatine Mennonite congregations have Sunday schools, many of them introduced in imitation of the children's services in the state church congregations between World Wars I and II. The work of the American Mennonite Pax boys has also stimulated Sunday schools (e.g., Enkenbach). Most of the larger congregations in the Badischer Verband (q.v.) now also have Sunday schools. In Switzerland the Sunday school was introduced at least by 1910 in a number of places, such as Moron and Les Bulles. In West Prussia the Sunday school came in largely between World Wars I and II. (See West Prussia and Russia.) H.S.B.

Harold S. Bender, Mennonite Sunday School Centennial 1840-1940 (Scottsdale, 1940) 12-23; Paul M. Lederach, The History of Religious Education in the Mennonite Church (doctoral dissertation at Southwestern Baptist Theol. Sem. 1949); John Umble, Ohio Mennonite Sunday Schools (Coshen, 1941); idem, "Early Sunday Schools at West Liberty, Ohio," MQR IV (1930) 6-50; idem, "Early Mennonite Sunday Schools of Northwestern Ohio," MQR V (1931) 100-11, 179-97, 260-71; idem, "Early Mennonite Sunday School Lesson Helps," MQR XII (1935) 98-113; Milo Kauffman, "The Rise and Development of Sunday Schools in the Mennonite Church in Indiana" (thesis for the M.A. in R.E., McCormick Theol. Sem. in Chicago, 1931).

General Conference Mennonite Church. The Sunday school came early into the Eastern District Conference of the G.C.M. Church, the oldest component of the conference. Following are the dates of the beginning of the Sunday school in the ten oldest congregations: West Swamp-1858, East Swamp-1859, Flatland-1859, Deep Run-1859, Upper Milford-1860, Germantown-1863, Eden-1867, Philadelphia-1868, Hereford-1870, Springfield-1877. The first Sunday School Convention was held at Philadelphia in 1876; it has been held every year since. (Historical Booklet and Program of the Diamond Jubilee Sunday School Convention of the Eastern District Conference of the Mennonite Church, Philadelphia, 1949.)

Prussia and Russia. Among the Mennonites of Prussia and Russia the practice of gathering children for Sunday school to teach them the basic contents of the Bible and the Christian truth is of comparatively recent origin. The Mennonites of the Dutch-Prussian-Russian tradition did this in their parochial elementary schools in Prussia as well as in Russia and during the catechetical instruction before baptism. With the pietistic revival of the 18th and 19th centuries the practice of gathering the children in a Sunday school was introduced. P. M. Friesen (Brüderschaft, 1911) makes barely any reference to this practice. This would indicate that the Sunday school had gained little prominence among the Mennonites of Prussia and Russia by the time of World War I. Wherever it was introduced it was primarily in the hands of some young people who felt the need, particularly after the Revolution, of instructing the children in Bible. Unser Blatt (1925-28), published for the Mennonites of Russia, hardly mentions such activity. Nevertheless, since religious instruction had been removed from the curriculum of the school, attempts were made in many settlements to provide this instruction in Sunday school, which was conducted primarily on Sunday afternoons. However, this instruction had to cease completely around 1926-27 when group or public instruction of young people in religion was forbidden.

The Sunday school gradually gained a foothold in the first half of the 20th century among the Mennonites of Prussia and became an accepted practice until the Mennonite churches of that area were dissolved in connection with World War II. However, in all cases these Sunday schools were primarily dependent on the instruction and the abilities of a few individuals without much choice in materials or any preparation for this purpose. Only among those who went to Canada and South America after World War I did this program fully develop. With few exceptions the Sunday school was originally for children of elementary school age and not for adults. In Canada adults are now also attending Sunday school. C.K.

Netherlands. After Sunday schools for children had been in use in England for more than a century and in a few Dutch towns by individual members of the Reformed Church since 1883, about 1895 Sunday-school work (for children only) was started in some Dutch Mennonite congregations (in Amsterdam as early as 1887). Gradually more and more congregations established Sunday schools for the children (ages about 6 to 12 or 13) of their members and others interested. Now nearly all Dutch Mennonite congregations have Sunday schools. In most churches they are operated according to the West Hill system (used in English Sunday schools since 1903); i.e., the children sit together in small groups on little chairs or benches, divided according to age; the subject matter of teaching and manipulation are adapted to the mental and intellectual grasp of the little ones; an individual approach to each child is aimed at; besides this, the activity of the children is stimulated by reproducing and expressing what has been taught by drawing or modeling in papier-mâché or clay. Thus the school-class system is completely abandoned; the meetings are changed into children's religious services. Boys and girls of about 14-17 assist the leaders in these West Hill Sunday schools, to which the children are now admitted in their fourth year.

The high point of the Sunday school is the Christmas holiday, on the occasion of which often a play expressing the meaning of the coming of Jesus Christ is presented by the children. vvZ.

Sunday School Banner is a weekly magazine, published by the Bethel Publishing Company (q.v.) of the M.B.C. Church since 1911. J. A. Huffman, founder of the firm, was editor of the paper until sometime after 1945. He was succeeded by the present editor, Woodrow I. Goodman. The magazine has varied in size and in number of pages. N.P.S.

Sunday School Committee, General, of the Mennonite Church (MC) was created in 1915 by the Mennonite General Conference to supervise, coordinate, and strengthen the Sunday-school work of the church. It was discontinued in 1937 when its work was taken over by the newly created Commission for Christian Education and Young People's Work (q.v.). In addition to its general promotional work the committee was given general charge of the editorial work on the Sunday-school literature of the church and for this purpose chose (subject to General Conference approval) a General Sunday School Editor and an Associate Sunday School Editor. It therefore of necessity worked in close relationship with the Mennonite Publication Board. In this connection it also served as the general planning agency and curriculum builder for the Sunday-school literature. For its promotional work it had a General Sunday School Secretary. The committee had six regular members elected for a six-year term, but in addition gradually developed a series of seven subcommittees with co-opted members. I. W. Royer served as General Sunday School Secretary throughout the life of the committee. J. A. Ressler served as General Sunday School Editor from the beginning until his death in 1936. Influential chairmen were Vernon Smucker and Noah Oyer.

H.S.B.

Sunday School Literature. In the time before Mennonite Sunday-school literature was available, American Mennonite Sunday schools used the literature in both German and English of the American Sunday School Union (founded in 1817, 1824), the American Tract Society (founded in 1875), and of denominational and interdenominational publishing houses. The David C. Cook publishing house has supplied much literature to Mennonite Sunday schools in various branches. Since in early years the Sunday school served in some Mennonite (MC) and Amish Mennonite congregations as a place to teach the children the German language, John F. Funk published Benjamin Eby's A B C Buchstabier und Lesebuch (first published in 1836 in Berlin, Ont., for use in the community day schools) in repeated editions (1869, 1871, 1882, 1896, 1909) for use in Sunday schools.

Funk began the publication of materials for Sunday-school work in May 1873 as a 4-page supplement to the Herald of Truth called the Herald Series of Sunday School Lessons, but due to opposition ceased publication at the end of the season. In 1880 the Lancaster Mennonite Conference authorized the preparation of Sunday-school Question Books, modeled after the American Sunday School Union books. A committee composed of ministers Amos Herr and Jacob N. Brubacher of the Lancaster Conference and Funk, assisted by the Lancaster bishops Isaac Eby and Benjamin Herr, produced the manuscript for the primary and intermediate booklets in 1880, and publication proceeded at once by Funk at Elkhart, followed by the Infant Lesson Book and in early 1881 by the fourth in the series, the adult or Bible Class Question Book. German editions of all four appeared in 1881-82. J. H. Oberholtzer published at Milford Square, Pa., in 1859, Das Unparteiische Biblische Fragenbuch. Zum Gebrauch in Sonntagschulen und Familien für Kinder-Unterricht.

The publication of Sunday-school quarterlies

(quarterly lesson help booklets giving the text of the International Series of Sunday-school lessons with editorial helps and commentary by Mennonite writers) was begun by Funk in 1890, with J. S. Coffman as editor, with a German edition also beginning the same year. It was an adult quarterly. Funk never published a primary or a teachers' quarterly. When Funk sold out his periodicals to the Mennonite Publishing House in 1908, the quarterly ceased publication, and was replaced by a new title with the same function.

Funk also published Sunday-school "papers," as they were called, weekly 4-page periodicals largely distributed to the children in the Sunday schools without charge, paid for out of the Sunday-school treasury as were the quarterlies. In 1878 he took over the Words of Cheer started by H. A. Mumaw in 1876 as a children's Sunday-school paper. In 1881 he took over the analogous German paper Der Christliche Jugendfreund, designed for a slightly older age group, started by S. D. Guengerich of Johnson County, Iowa, in 1878. In 1887 he started a small 4-page weekly tract paper designed largely for Sunday schools, called Welcome Tidings (1887-97), also a German edition, Angenehme Stunden (1887-93). Neither of these prospered, and both were absorbed into other publications.

Beginning in 1906 the Sunday-school material of Mennonites (MC) consisted of picture rolls and cards and a primary lesson quarterly published by the Gospel Witness Publishing Company at Scottsdale, which in 1908 was merged into the Mennonite Publishing House. In 1907 the Advanced Quarterly and an Advanced Teachers' Quarterly were added. These, based on the international uniform lesson outlines, were published continuously until 1924. The editor of all three for the first years was D. H. Bender. In 1925-36 the uniform lesson materials were increased from three quarterlies to five by the addition of the Junior-Intermediate Quarterly and the Junior Teachers' Quarterly. The Primary Quarterly was revised and improved and the picture rolls and cards continued.

In 1937-50 the lesson materials were increased to seven quarterlies, and new picture rolls and cards adopted. The Primary Quarterly was again revised and Primary Worksheets, the Primary Teachers' Quarterly, and the Junior Pupil's Quarterly were started. The Junior-Intermediate Quarterly was changed to the Intermediate Pupil's Quarterly, and the Junior-Intermediate Teachers' Quarterly was added.

In 1951 the Sunday-school materials were designated as "the Herald Uniform Sunday School Series," and at present comprise the following: Herald Teacher, helps for teachers of adults, youths, and intermediates, published monthly; Herald Bible Studies; Herald Youth Bible Studies; Herald Intermediate Bible Studies; Herald Junior Bible Studies and Junior Teacher; Herald Primary Bible Studies with worksheets and Primary Teacher.

The Herald Graded Sunday School Series is in preparation. In this series Kindergarten I has been in use since 1951; Nursery was introduced in 1957, and Kindergarten II in 1958. Group graded courses from primary through intermediate are being developed in co-operation with the General Conference Mennonites.

Weekly Sunday-school papers used to supplement the lesson materials are Words of Cheer (q.v.) since 1876, Beams of Light (q.v.) since 1906, and Youth's Christian Companion (q.v.) since 1920.

H.S.B., C.F.Y.

The General Conference Mennonite Church started its Sunday-school quarterlies in 1887 with the German Sonntagschul-Lektionen für Jung und Alt which has been in continuous publication to 1958, S. F. Sprunger editor to 1920, followed by C. H. A. van der Smitten. The English Sunday School Bible Lesson Quarterly, N. C. Hirschy editor, appeared for only 6 years, 1900-06. In 1937 four new English quarterlies were established, the Mennonite Adult Quarterly, the Mennonite Young People's Quarterly, the Mennonite Junior Quarterly, and the Mennonite Junior Teacher, which were replaced by a new series in the fall of 1958, entitled Adult Bible Study Guide, Youth Bible Study Guide, Junior Bible Study Guide, and Junior Bible Study Guide Teacher's Manual. At the same time the old German quarterly was renamed Bibel Studien für Erwachsene. All these use the International Uniform Lessons, and all are published by the Board of Education and Publication, Newton, Kan. The Board also publishes its own imprint edition of the Scottsdale Herald Teacher. It is publishing jointly with the Herald Press (MC) at Scottdale a new graded series of Sunday-school lessons for various ages of children. It has its own imprint editions of the Herald Press, Nursery, Home and Church Series, Bible Lessons for Kindergarten Children. Year II, and Herald Intermediate Bible Studies. Two G.C.M. Sunday-school papers are published, the German Kinderbote (since 1886), first edited by David Goerz, and the English Junior Messenger (since 1939). These are both 4-page papers. The Kinderbote was at first a monthly, but is now bimonthly. The Messenger is weekly.

The only other Mennonite group publishing its own Sunday-school quarterlies is the Mennonite Brethren, which has had the German Lektionsheft since 1904 and the English Adult Quarterly since 1958. Graded Sunday School Lessons were briefly issued in English (1940-47, senior, intermediate, and primary in one quarterly), and in 1939 for the German, as Ganze Bibel Gradierte Lektionen. The Teachers Manual for Sunday School Lessons was published 1949-57 (separate quarterlies for primary and junior departments). All these were or are published by the Mennonite Brethren Publishing House at Hillsboro, Kan., and serve both the United States and Canada. On the lower level the United States churches have been using the Scripture Press (Wheaton, Ill.) materials, and the Canadian churches have either translated these into German or produced some of their own.

The smaller Mennonite groups use either the Herald Press materials—e.g., C.G.C., and E.M. (Kleine Gemeinde), the former using the G.C.M. German quarterly since Scottdale dropped the German number—or material from such publishers as the Union Gospel Press (Cleveland, Ohio), Gospel Light Press (California), and the Scripture Press. The Mennonite Brethren in Christ (now UMC) have been publishing their own rather complete Bethel Series since 1910.

An important development in Mennonite Sunday-school literature is the project for joint publication by the Herald Press (MC) and the G.C.M. Board of Education and Publication of a comprehensive graded lesson series. The Canadian M.B. Conference also plans to use this series.

H.S.B., W.CL.

H. S. Bender, Mennonite Sunday School Centennial (Scottdale, 1940); idem, Two Centuries; J. S. Umble, "Early Mennonite Sunday School Lesson Helps," MQR XII (1938) 98-113.

Sunny Slope is about 25 miles east of Didsbury, Alberta, on the railway line from Edmonton to Calgary. In 1901-8 a few Mennonites (GCM) settled here. In 1904 Peter Kliever was elected as minister. A few years later he went as missionary to the Indians in Montana, where he worked many years. A group of Church of God in Christ Mennonites settled here. Since 1940 the Church of New Jerusalem (Swedenborg) has had a small church in Sunny Slope, to which a few families of Mennonite origin belong. Peter Peters of Edmonton serves the latter group as minister.

J.G.R.

Sunnyside Conservative Mennonite Church (CM), located a half mile east of Kalona, Iowa, is the third and newest (1957) meetinghouse for the Conservative Mennonite congregation of this area, the other two being Upper Deer Creek (q.v.) and Fairview (q.v.). In 1959 the membership was 156, with Morris Swartzendruber and Albert Miller as ministers.

M.G.

Sunnyside Hutterite Bruderhof, located near Warner, Alberta, was founded in 1932. Their preachers are Jakob Hofer, chosen in 1931, and Andreas Wurz, chosen in 1936. In 1956 the colony had a population of 160, with 64 baptized members.

D.D.

Sunnyside Hutterite Bruderhof, located 5 miles south of Newton Siding, Man., was founded in 1939 by five families from the Milltown Bruderhof and their preacher Joseph Kleinsasser. In 1954 the Bruderhof numbered 93 souls with 37 baptized members.

D.D.

Sunnyside Mennonite Church (MC), located 3 miles northeast of Conneaut Lake and 8 miles west of Meadville, Pa., is one of three congregations (with Britton Run, 1931 and Beaverdam, 1940) formed in northwestern Pennsylvania by families moving in from the Middle West, particularly Iowa and Nebraska, in 1925-40 in search of good farming opportunities. The majority of the first families at Sunnyside came in 1937 from Manson, Iowa. Forty-four prospective members, who had been worshipping at the Mennonite mission in Meadville, asked the Ohio and Eastern A.M. Conference for organization, which was effected in October 1937. The meetinghouse was built by stages 1938-44. J. W. Oswald, of Nebraska, served as pastor 1940-47. In 1957 the membership was 95, with Harvey Schrock serving as pastor. H.S.B.

Delmer Oswald, "The Planting and Growth of a Community in Northwestern Pennsylvania," Menn. Community VI (July 1952) 6-12.

Sunnyside Mennonite Church (MC), in a former suburb of Lancaster, Pa., began as a mission, initiated by David S. High. The first services were held in an abandoned dance hall with 71 from the community present. Through evangelistic sermons and home visitation the work grew until by 1957 the membership was 50, with David S. High, Witmer J. Barge, and Joseph C. Miller, Jr., as ministers. I.D.L.

Sunnyside Mennonite Church (MC), located in Dunlap, Ind., between Elkhart and Goshen, a member of the Indiana-Michigan Conference, began in 1946 as a mission of the Goshen College YPCA under the leadership of Paul Mininger (sponsor of the YPCA) and Richard Showalter. A church building was completed in 1948 with the help of the General Mission Board. There were 38 members in 1958, with C. Richard Miller as pastor. C.A.R.

Sunnyslope Mennonite Church (MC), located 10 miles north of Phoenix, Ariz., a member of the South Pacific Conference, began on Feb. 20, 1944, when a meeting was called in the home of Harold A. Brooks. In February 1946 an organization was made, with Joe H. Yoder as pastor. He was succeeded in 1948 by Melvin L. Ruth, who was ordained bishop in 1950. The first meetinghouse was built on a donated lot on N. 7th Place in 1946. In 1949 a new church built of pumice block was erected beside it. The older building was then used as a Christian day school and Sunday school. This small group holds a weekly service at a rescue mission in Phoenix. In 1957 the membership was 136, with Melvin L. Ruth as pastor.

In the spring of 1952 the Sunnyslope congregation assumed responsibility of two mission Sunday schools among the colored migrants in the Buckeye community—some 45 miles southwest of Sunnyslope. Later the Sunday schools were combined and a church was erected at Hodge Camp No. 29, 2 miles north of Buckeye. In 1955 John William Boyer, a deacon at Sunnyslope since 1950, was ordained to be pastor at Buckeye. Colored people comprise the largest part of attendants, but Spanish and Cocopah Indians are usually also present. Attendance sometimes reaches 90. M.L.R.

Sunset Home for the Aged, Geneva, Neb., sponsored by the Mennonite (MC) Board of Missions and Charities, was established in 1951. It has a capacity of twelve guests. Chester Helmick was superintendent in 1958. M.G.

Sunshine Mission Home (MB), Buhler, Kan., a home for the aged founded in 1945 and operated by the Buhler Mennonite Brethren Church. It had twenty-one guests in 1958; the superintendent and matron were Mr. and Mrs. John K. Siemens. M.G.

Surhuisterveen, a town in the Dutch province of Friesland, mostly rural with some small but growing industry, is the seat of a Mennonite congregation, mention of which is made as early as 1647, but which had obviously been founded some decades before.

The old name of this town is Zuiderhuisterveen. From the origin until the end of the 18th century it was a peat colony. Its first inhabitants, who are said to have been Mennonites, came about 1600 or shortly after to dig the peat, which was shipped out as fuel. About 1700 a number of Menonites from Oldehove and Niehove in the adjacent province of Groningen moved to Surhuisterveen, whose population then largely was Mennonite.

Concerning the history of the Mennonite church of Surhuisterveen there is not much information. Whether there was a High German congregation here as early as 1613, as is mentioned in an old document, is doubtful. About that time there was at least a Waterlander congregation, which in 1695 joined the Sociëteit of Friesland and sent the deacon Gauke Gabes as a delegate to the Waterlander conference meeting at Amsterdam in 1647. Until about 1840 the local Surhuisterveen churchyard had the tombstone of Gabbe Paulus, d. Nov. 13, 1643, aged 72, who had been a preacher of the Mennonite congregation. He may have been one of its first ministers. For more than two centuries the congregation was served by lay preachers. Among these mention should be made of Foecke Floris (q.v.), who served in the 1680's, and who was imprisoned in 1687 on the charge of teaching Socinian (q.v.) doctrines, and banished from the province of Friesland in 1688; Jan Thomas (q.v.), who served here faithfully in 1722-44, likewise of liberal views. The last untrained preachers of Surhuisterveen were Eilert Wynalda 1752-1801, A. A. Venema c 1778, Jan Yde Wynalda 1782-1801, and Ynse Ypes Reens 1802-25. The first pastor of this congregation who was educated at the Amsterdam Theological Seminary was Arnoldus de Jong 1826-27, followed by F. E. Wieling 1828-57, A. Broos 1858-64, D. Pekelharing 1864-1908, F. W. W. Braak 1909-17, J. Yntema 1918-22, J. H. van Riemsdijk 1922-29, A. F. L. van Dijk 1932-33, Miss C. Soutendijk 1934-39, R. J. Faber 1940-46, Miss H. A. Leyns 1946-48, Miss W. C. Jolles 1949-53, A. Zwartendijk 1953-57, and J. P. Knipscheer since 1957.

The earliest membership figures date from 1695; the congregation then numbered about 40 baptized members. In 1723 there were 130, in 1828 47, in 1838 68, in 1900 79, and in 1957 131. In 1838, when the Kollum-Buitenpost (q.v.) congregation dissolved, the few remaining members joined the Surhuisterveen congregation.

The first meetinghouse was evidently built at a very early time, for in 1685 it was dilapidated and was replaced by another; the present church with adjoining parsonage is the third; it was built in 1859, remodeled in 1877. Surhuisterveen was one of the last Dutch congregations to obtain an organ, singing having been led by precentors. An organ was installed in 1910 and dedicated on July 10 of that year. The congregation has a ladies' circle, a Sunday school for children, and a youth group. Blaupot ten Cate's statement that in 1711 some Amish Mennonite refugees from Switzerland (see Swiss Mennonites) settled at Surhuisterveen is an error.

At Westerveen in the neighborhood of Surhuisterveen a number of Tunkers (see Brethren Church) led by Alexander Mack (q.v.), having moved from Schwarzenau, Germany, lived in 1720-29; they then emigrated to Germantown, Pa. They apparently had no contacts with the Mennonites of Surhuisterveen. vbZ.

Blaupot t. C., Friesland; J. Huizinga, Stamboek . . . van Samuel Peter en Barbara Fry (Groningen, 1890) p. LXXX; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 2265; DB 1861, 142; 1878, 131; 1887, 50 ff.; 1896, 150, 165, 171; 1910, 190.

Suspenders (Amish). Various kinds of suspenders and practices related to their wearing have developed among some of the Amish groups. This is true in Mifflin County, Pa., more than in any other region. The following information applies here. The "Old Schoolers" (Nebraska group) maintain a taboo on all suspenders. Trousers are held by a laced-up crotch at the rear of the broadfall trousers. The Byler (next most conservative) group shared this practice but in recent years adopted the practice of the Renno Amish who permit the use of one homemade elastic black suspender, fastened by a single button in front and one in the rear. The Zook group (now belonging to the "Beachy" Amish) permit the use of two suspenders, including plain bought suspenders, which are crossed in the back. Groups permitting one suspender make an exception for boys below school age who may have a wide single suspender split in the middle to allow the head to come through. The Swartzen-druber Amish, the most conservative group in Ohio, wear two suspenders that form a "Y" in the back. These forms have given rise to nicknames among the groups: "One Suspender Amish" or sometimes "Swentzli" and "Two Suspender Amish." The various practices provide an excellent example of the slowness of cultural change. They have served as maintenance mechanisms to insure solidarity and consciousness of difference from all other Amish. J.A.H.

Surplice Fees (German, Stolgebühren) are the fees which had to be paid to the clergy of the state church for the official services rendered. In Prussia the Mennonites were obliged to pay them for weddings and funerals, without having claimed the services of the clergy. After tedious negotiations and all sorts of legal arrangements (edict of July 30, 1789, Mennonite Law of June 12, 1874, and the decision of the imperial court of Oct. 8, 1885) a permanent release from these payments was secured in relatively recent times.

Menn. Bl., 1887, 4 and 11; W. Mannhardt Die Wehrfreiheit der Altpreussischen Mennoniten (Marienburg, 1863) 139, 155, and 190; ML IV.

Susquehanna Mennonite Church (MC), located a mile west of the Susquehanna River in Snyder County, Pa., worshiped in the Brubaker Schoolhouse until 1890, when the present frame building was furnished. This is a part of the Donald Lauver Bishop District, with Alvin S. Shafer as pastor. The membership in 1957 was 80. I.D.L.

Susteren, a village in the Dutch province of Limburg, in the 16th century belonging to the duchy of Jülich (q.v.), was a center of Anabaptist activity about 1550. It was then called "The principal point of the (new) religious revival." There is, however, only scarce information about this revival. Fifteen persons were baptized at Susteren by Elder Lemken (q.v.), but soon after this all traces of Anabaptists in this area are lost. vbZ.

Rembert, Wiedertäufer, 69, 355, 356; W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik . . . I (The Hague, 1937) 73 f., 302, 317.

Suter (Sutter, Suttor, Suder), a Mennonite family name, meaning shoemaker, originating in Kolliken, canton of Aargau, Switzerland. Persons by the name of Suter were known to have been members of the Waldenses in the canton of Bern many years before the beginning of the Anabaptist movement there. In 1538 Jacob Suter is mentioned as having been persecuted for his Anabaptist faith. Members of this family moved to Mennonite communities in Germany and to Florimont and Audincourt, France. Others came to America, settling chiefly in Rockingham County, Va., and Putnam County, Ohio, where a number of them have become leaders in the Mennonite Church (MC). Christian Suter (1791-1874), the second bishop of the Putnam County, Ohio, Swiss Mennonite congregation, helped to organize a Swiss Mennonite congregation in Madison Twp., Polk Co., Iowa, in 1858. Emanuel Suter (1833-1902), an active layman (MC) in Rockingham County, wrote extensively for Mennonite periodicals and served as secretary of the Virginia Conference for about 15 years. His grandson J. Early Suter and the latter's son Daniel B. Suter are ministers in the Virginia Conference, and Daniel is a teacher at Eastern Mennonite College.

An Amish branch of the family can be traced to Bavaria where Sutters owned the large estate near Ingolstadt known as Hellmannsberg during much of the 19th century. At least one Sutter family lived in Dittenfeld near Neuburg about 10 miles west of Ingolstadt. In 1848 a Christian Sutter from this location immigrated to near Morton, Ill., followed by his father John Sutter, an Amish preacher; eight other children, including sons John, Jacob, and Andrew, followed him. From this family apparently all of the numerous Sutters now living in Central Illinois (chiefly at Hopedale), Milford, Neb., and communities in Iowa, Michigan, and at least 9 other states descend. In 1924 this family established a reunion, which in 1945 listed over 1,000 living descendants. (N. P. Springer, "A Brief History of the John and Barbara Sutter Family," manuscript in GCL.) D.L.G., H.S.B.

Sutttere, de (de Sutter, de Zutter, Zutters, de Sitter, de Zitter): see Sitter, de.

Sutton (Neb.) Mennonite Brethren Church, now extinct, had its beginning about 1878 and during the 1890's was a flourishing congregation. At that time it built a meetinghouse and Heinrich Schneider became its leader. After that it decreased in membership and dissolved in 1924. J.H.L.

Suvorovka, a Mennonite settlement in Russia: see Suvorovka.

Suzanna and Calleen Claes, Anabaptist martyrs: see Cathalijne and Suzanne Claes.

Svistunovo Mennonite Church was located in the Slavgorod Mennonite settlement (q.v.) in Siberia, and served the villages of Dolinovka and Tchernyevka. Worship services were held in the schools.

C.K.

Gerhard Fast, In den Steppen Sibiriens (Rosthern, 1957) 72.

Swabian League. On Feb. 14, 1488, the great Swabian League which had been proposed by Emperor Frederick III was constituted at Esslingen for the purpose of preserving the peace against anarchy in Swabia. It embraced the knightly league of St. George and 22 imperial cities, Archduke Sigismund of Austria, and Count Eberhard V of Württemberg. To these were added the Margraves of Brandenburg-Ansbach, Baden, Hessen, and the electors of Mainz and Trier. The first association was to last until 1496 but it was renewed in 1500, 1512, and 1522 until 1533.

The league received an exemplary constitution with a federal council of two sections, a federal court, and a federal army of 12,000 footmen and 1,200 horsemen. Its most significant deeds were the expulsion of Duke Ulrich of Württemberg in 1519, whose land the league sold to Emperor Charles V in 1520, and the cruel subjugation of the rebel peasants in 1525 by Georg Truchsess of Waldburg, the league captain. The league was entirely a tool of Austrian politics and of the Catholic Church; it fought against the spread of the Reformation. For this purpose the council appointed the provost Berthold Aichelin (q.v.), who moved about with his horsemen and hanged every adherent of the new faith without benefit of trial "to a dry branch," and thus killed about 1,200 including 40 Protestant preachers. In addition the league had a troop under Diepold von Stein wander through Upper Swabia and oppress Memmingen. They were particularly intent upon catching Anabaptists. Some member princes and cities had joined the Reformation. Therefore the league could no longer be renewed in 1533, especially since now it was opposed by the Smalkaldic League. Austria would have liked to have a replacement for this adaptable tool but none was found.

In many places protests were raised against this procedure; the council of Nürnberg did so, not out of love for the Anabaptists, but because as it said, "The pretense is to hunt the wolves, but they catch the sheep; in this way they will also persecute the confessors and preachers of the Word." The council therefore favored milder measures.

On March 7, 1528, the Swabian League issued an order limiting church fairs and weddings on account of the Anabaptists, "since Anabaptism is breaking in and increasing more and more." They thought the Anabaptists made propaganda at such gatherings.

The chronicles of the Hutterian Brethren report about these bloody deeds by Aichelin (not to be confused with Joseph Lauscher, called Aichelin or Aicheln, who was Land- und Bannrichter of the territory of Lienz in Tirol, and also had much to do with the Anabaptists), "About this time (1528) King Ferdinand sent a wild provost by the name of Aichelin to Swabia and into the land of Württemberg, who then shed much innocent blood, also burned the Mantelhof, nor far from Aalen, with men, youths, women, and maidens, about twenty persons."

The two Anabaptist preachers Griesinger (q.v.) and Lochmayer (q.v.) were among Aichelin's victims. "But God at last instilled fear into him through the steadfastness of His servants, so that he swore that he would not execute another brother. He was later stabbed in Württemberg and died a shameful death."

On Feb. 2, 1534, the Swabian League came to an end. Its dissolution was urged by Philip of Hesse and Bernhard von Besserer, mayor of Ulm. A number of historians have tried to justify this bloody procedure in the framework of the "dark background of the great social revolution" (Peasants' Revolt). Certainly the decree of the league in an Anabaptist mandate of March 7, 1528, explains "that it can easily be comprehended by every honoring Christian ... how Anabaptism ... leads to new revolutions and uprisings" if it is not countered with "painful and serious punishment." But this fear was quite unfounded. It has been proved that not a single Anabaptist leader took part in the Peasants' War. Even in Thuringia the Anabaptist movement proved itself to be entirely peaceful.

G.Bos., W.W.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; K. Klüpfel, Urkunden zur Geschichte des Schwäbischen Bundes II (Stuttgart, 1853); Fr. Thudichum, Die deutsche Reformation II (Leipzig, 1909); Wiswedel, Bilder II; G. Bossert, "Aichelin," in Blätter für Württemberg. Kirchengeschichte VII, 25 ff., 35 ff.; H. Hermelink, Geschichte der Evangelischen Kirche in Württemberg von der Reformation bis zur Gegenwart (Stuttgart and Tübingen, 1949) 17 ff., 56; I. Rauscher, "Aichelin," in Württemberg. Reformationsgeschichte III; G. A. Will, Beiträge zur Geschichte des Anabaptismus in Deutschland (1773) 224-27; K. Klüpfel, "Der Schwäbische Bund," in Hist. Taschenbuch, 1853; Zieglschmid, Chronik; ML IV.

Swaen Rutgers (Zwaan, Zwaantje, the wife of a certain Rutger, who was living at Emden, East Friesland, Germany, about 1555. Both Rutger and his wife were members of the Mennonite congregation of which Leenaert (q.v.) Bouwens was the elder. In 1556 or shortly before, Bouwens banned Rutger for some unknown reason and ordered Swaen to avoid her husband, which she refused to do. Bouwens thereupon threatened also to cut her off from the church, and some time later actually did so. Before Swaen was banned, Menno Simons tried to intervene. He had been informed of the conflict and had been requested to give his opinion on marital avoidance; in response Menno wrote a letter to Emden, dated Nov. 13, 1556, urging moderation and peace. Leenaert Bouwens, however, refused to yield, in spite of the wishes of a large part of the congregation and Menno's kindly advice, and banned Swaen Rutgers, Dirk Philips (q.v.), after Menno the most influential elder of the Mennonites, also championed marital avoidance. Menno Simons received letters not only from Emden, but also from Franeker (q.v.) in Friesland, where Jorjaen Heyns and Hendrik Naeldeman opposed marital avoidance.

Thus it became necessary for the elders to discuss the question. A meeting for this purpose was held at Harlingen, Friesland, in the spring of 1557. Here Menno was won over to the strict practice of Lee-naert Bouwens and Dirk Philips. This issue in the Dutch brotherhood caused the withdrawal of the moderate Waterlanders (q.v.) and also the separation of the High Germans (q.v.), who were not willing to follow Menno on this point.

Karel Vos's opinion that Swaen Rutgers lived at Franeker is an error, since old writings state explicitly that she lived in Emden. vDZ.

BRN VII, 54, 58 f., with Menno's letter to the Emden congregation, 449 f.; J. H. Ottius, Annales Anabaptistici (Basel, 1672) 118 f.; DB 1876, 22; 1894, 35, 40, 43, note 3, 57; Karel Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1912) 132 f.; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 317 ff.

Swaene Hermansdochter, an Anabaptist martyr, the widow of Jan Moervinck (Morveldinck? q.v.), b. near Coevorden, Dutch province of Drente, was drowned on July 21, 1544, at Utrecht, because she "was an adherent of reprobate sects." She apparently belonged to the revolutionary wing of Dutch Anabaptism, one of its last followers and victims. (Mellink, Wederdopers, 240, 410). vDZ.

Swaerdemaker: see Zwaardemaker.

Swalwell (Alberta) M.B. Church: see Linden E.M.B. Church.

Swalwell (Alberta) Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church: see Linden.

Swamp Mennonite (MC) Church, located in Milford Twp., Bucks Co., Pa., a member of the Franconia Conference, dates back to the early 18th century. Bishop Falentine ("Velte") Clemmer immigrated from Europe to the Swamp area in 1717. The first meetinghouse was built about 1735, a mile west of the present West Swamp Church (GCM). It was torn down and rebuilt on the site of the present West Swamp Church (q.v.) in 1790. The East Swamp (GCM) meetinghouse (q.v.) was built in 1771, and was later destroyed by fire and rebuilt; the present church was erected in 1850. In the Franconia Conference division of 1847 John H. Oberholtzer and the majority of the Milford Township ministers withdrew from the conference and claimed both meetinghouses. Those who were left, although without a minister, immediately built the Swamp meetinghouse for the group adhering to the Franconia Conference. Soon Jacob Beidler (1809-74) was ordained. In 1863 Abraham Young was ordained to assist him, but was later silenced. Later ministers were John A. Beidler (1840-1912) and the 1958 ministers, John G. Gehman (1875-), ordained in 1919, and Abram D. Yoder (1893-), ordained in 1935. The membership in 1958 was 75. John H. Oberholtzer (q.v.) was ordained preacher at Swamp in 1842. J.C.W.

J. C. Wenger, History of the Mennonites of the Franconia Conference (Telford, 1937) 125-28.

Swamp Mennonite Mission, Lancaster Co., Pa.: see Blainsport.

Swamp Union Meetinghouse: see Blainsport Mennonite Mission.

Swart, a common Dutch family name. A Mennonite Swart family has lived on the Dutch island of Terschelling since the 17th century, many of whose members have served the Terschelling (q.v.) congregation as deacons, the last being A. G. Swart and Tjebbe Swart, the latter serving until 1953.

Rindert Swart (Haarlem, 1890-Hindeloopen, 1929) was educated at the Amsterdam University and the Mennonite Seminary and served the congregations of Hindeloopen-Koudum in 1916-19. (Genealogie van de familie Swart, Terschelling, n.p., n.d.) vDZ.

Swarte, de, the name of a number of Mennonites in Flanders, Belgium; the martyr books enumerate seven martyrs by this name, and besides them two or three of their wives. Most of them belonged to one family. The information concerning these martyrs is hazy and incomplete. Neither van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror nor Froissard's L'Eglise sous la croix (Paris, 1857) is complete. Ed Coussemaker, in Les Troubles Religieuses du XVIIe Siècle dans la Flandre Maritime 1560-70 (Brugge, 1876, 4 vols.), names fourteen persons named de Swarte or de Zwarte and some of their wives, viz., Adreaen, Andries, Christiaen, Cornelis, Etienne (Steven), François, François-Anthonis, Gautier (Wouter), Jan, Jacob, Martijn, Mat(t)hieu, Nicolas, and Hans. Of these, the following martyrs are mentioned in this ENCYCLOPEDIA: Christiaen, Claes (i.e., Nicolas), Frans (François), Hans, Jacob, Jan, and Mahieu (Matthieu). vDZ.

Swartz (Schwartz), Mennonite family found in North America. They descend from the Swiss Schwartz family. Felix Schwartz, of Regensdorf, canton of Zürich, was an Anabaptist in 1527 and Adelheyd Schwartz c1530. Mennonites by this name were found in the 17th century in the Emmental (q.v.), Switzerland, and in the early 18th century in Alsace (q.v.).

In America most Swartz families are descendants of Abraham Schwartz (Swartz), bishop of the Deep Run Mennonite (MC) congregation in Bucks County, Pa., ordained preacher in 1738 and bishop in 1756. Swartz arrived at Philadelphia on the Friendship on Oct. 16, 1727. In 1778 he and Bishop Andrew Ziegler of Skippack deposed Bishop Christian Funk for his favorable attitude toward the American Colonies who were in rebellion against England. Early in the 19th century his grandson Christian Swartz moved to Waterloo County, Ont., and became the head of a large family there. Other descendants of the Deep Run pioneer found their way to Virginia and Ohio and points farther west. One of the best-known members of the family was Freeman H. Swartz, General Conference Mennonite pastor at Schwenksville, Pa., 1921-d.57. The Schwartz families among the Amish of Adams County, Ind., are of a different lineage. In the Mennonite Church (MC) in 1958 there were 5 ministers named Swartz, and 9 Schwartzes in the Old Order Amish group, 3 of whom were bishops, practically all in northern Indiana. J.C.W.

Swartzendruber (Swartzentruber, Swartzendrover, Swartzendruver, Swartzentruber, Swartzendruber, Schwarzentruuber, Schwarzentruver, Schwarztrauber, Schwarzentraub), a Mennonite family name. It is of Swiss origin and may mean "seller of black grapes." In the early 1700's a family Bible used the spelling Schwarzentraub. This is the earliest occurrence of the name now known. The Swartzendrubers belonged to the Amish (q.v.) branch of the Mennonites. Among the Swiss Brethren leaving Switzerland for the Netherlands in 1711 there was a Hans Swartzentrub, of Trub(?), who, however, left the ship at Mannheim. A Christian Schwartztrauben is mentioned in the Dutch Naamlijst of 1767-1802 as a preacher of the Weissenheim am Berg congregation (Amish) in the duchy of Leiningen, Germany. Bantz Schwarztrauben was from 1775 a preacher of the Amish church of Waldeck (q.v.). A Christian Schwarztrauben, by marriage related to the Gingerich family, lived at Mengerlinghausen near Kassel and had taken over the "Galgemühle" from Simon Roth, also Amish.

According to a family tradition the first American Swartzendrubers were immigrants from Waldeck. The first-known immigrations occurred soon after 1800, when settlements were made near Somerset and Berlin, Pa., and in Ontario. Soon, however, migrations to points farther west resulted in comparatively few residents remaining in Pennsylvania; today Ontario, Maryland, Delaware, Ohio, Indiana, and Iowa find the name most prominent. Among the outstanding personalities bearing this name in the past are Jacob J. Swartzendruber of Waldeck (Germany), Pennsylvania, and Iowa, Jacob Frederick and Joseph Swartzendruber of Iowa, and Solomon Swartzendruber of Michigan. In 1958 there were seven Mennonite (MC) bishops bearing the name Swartzendruber: A. Lloyd Swartzendruber, John Y. and Morris E. Swartzendruber of Kalona, Iowa, Elmer G. Swartzendruber of Wellman, Iowa, Alva R. Swartzendruber of Hydro, Okla., Amos Swartzentruber of Buenos Aires, Argentina, and Emanuel Swartzendruber of Pigeon, Mich., besides ten preachers. There were also nine Old Order Amish ministers in Ohio, Delaware, Indiana, and Iowa bearing the name. A very conservative group of the Old Order Amish near Dalton, Wayne Co., Ohio, is called the Swartzen-truber Amish (q.v.). No outstanding genealogies of the family have been published, although currently one is in process. A booklet, Documents Relating to Bishop Jacob Schwarzendruber (1800-1868), has been printed. E.G.S., vdZ.

Peter Swartzendruber and Wilmina Eash Genealogy (Westmoreland, N.Y., 1956; Dutch Naamlijst; Müller, Berner Täufer, 307.

Swartzendruber, Jacob Frederick (1851-1924), an outstanding Amish leader and editor, was born Oct. 17, 1851, in Johnson Co., Iowa, the son of Frederick Swartzendruber, who had immigrated from Waldeck, Germany. He was married to Elizabeth Bender on Dec. 31, 1871, in Somerset County, Pa. He became a Christian in his youth, uniting with the Amish Mennonite Church. He was ordained to the ministry in March 1878 and served the Lower Deer Creek (also known as the Timber) Church near Kalona, Iowa. He was ordained bishop in the same church Dec. 4, 1887, serving until 1915, when the Lower Deer Creek Church united with the Western Amish Mennonite Conference; then he transferred his membership to the Old Order Amish congregation near Sharon Center in Johnson County. He served one of the districts in this community until his death. He lived for a short time in Lyons County, Kan., and in Oregon, but most of his life was spent in the community of his birth. He served as editor of the Herold der Wahrheit for two years and as editor of the Junior Department of this paper until his death. Swartzendruber was an ardent sponsor of social purity and zealous Christian living. Many of his sermons were on separation and a positive expression of the Christian life.

His wide knowledge of Scripture together with his alert mind and wealth of information concerning his day made him quite influential throughout the church. In his possession were many writings of historical value, especially those of his grandfather Jacob Swartzendruber. Among these is a complete schedule of church services, telling where the service was held, who conducted the devotional service, who delivered the sermon, the date and also other important church business, such as discipline administered to members, approaching marriages announced, etc. Most of the above papers are in the Mennonite Church Archives in the Goshen College Library at Goshen, Ind. Jacob Frederick Swartzendruber died Jan. 17, 1924, and was buried in the Lower Deer Creek Cemetery near Kalona. A.L.S.

Swartzendruber, Jacob J. (1800-68), the first Old Order Amish Mennonite bishop in Johnson County, Iowa, was born in Waldeck, Germany, in 1800, where he married Barbara Oesch, the widow of Peter Güngerich. He was ordained minister in 1826, emigrated to America in 1833, and lived in Somerset County, Pa., and Garrett County, Md. In 1851 he moved to Iowa and was there ordained bishop two years later. He died June 5, 1868. His son Joseph J. was ordained bishop in 1869 and among Jacob's descendants there have been no less than eight bishops and five ministers who served in Mennonite churches. His Christian ideals and high standards were important in molding the policies of the Amish churches in Iowa. E.G.S.

Harold S. Bender and John Umble, "Documents Relating to Bishop Jacob Schwarzendruber," 3 articles in MQR XX (July 1946) 222-39; Melvin Gingerich, Mennonites in Iowa (Iowa City, 1939).

Swartzendruber, Solomon J. (1856-1932), an Amish Mennonite leader and bishop, was born in Allegany (now Garrett) County, Md., on March 27, 1856, the fifth of the eleven children of Joseph J. and Barbara Brenneman Swartzendruber. When he was about six weeks old his parents moved to Johnson County, Iowa, where his father had purchased a tract of land as one of the first three Mennonite landowners in that community. He united with the Amish Mennonite Church early in life. On Jan. 13, 1881, he was married to Katie Swartzendruber and to them seven children were born. In 1884 they moved to Inman, Kan., where he was ordained to the ministry in 1886 or 1887. Several years later he was ordained bishop. In 1893 he with his family moved to Wright County, Iowa, and helped to organize a church there. In 1902 they moved to Earlham, Madison Co., Iowa. In 1904 they moved to Bay Port, Mich., arriving there on Feb. 18, where he organized and became the first bishop of the Pigeon Conservative (Amish) Mennonite Church which became a large congregation. He was elected moderator of the C.A.M. Conference in 1912, 1914, and 1916. He was assistant moderator in 1913. Three times, in 1914-16, he preached the conference sermon. In 1925-30 he served on its executive committee. In 1919 he moved to Pigeon, Mich., and here he died March 1, 1932. E.G.S.

History of the Amish Mennonite Conference (Conservative) 1910-1924 (Scottsdale, 1925); this report, however, is in error in stating the first conference was held in 1911; Combined Annual Reports of the Amish Mennonite Conference (Conservative), 1925-1937 (1938).

Sweedlin Valley in Pendleton County, W. Va., is a narrow valley formed by the Sweedlin Mountain and the Shenandoah Mountain. In the center of the South Fork (branch of the Potomac) Valley the Sweedlin Mountain arises at a point three miles north of Oak Flat and extends north for a distance of eight miles. The South Fork Branch flows west of the Mountain; the valley lying east of the Mountain is known as Sweedlin Valley. During the 1880's ministers of the Northern District of the Virginia Conference had not only entered the Brock's Gap country but had extended their witness as far west as the top of the Shenandoah Mountain. It was here that individuals living in Sweedlin Valley learned to know about the Mennonites and invited them to preach for them. Today the Pleasant Grove Mennonite Church is located in the heart of this valley. In 1958 Lloyd Hartzler was pastor, with 55 members.

Wine Spring Schoolhouse, Peru, Pendleton County, W. Va., located in South Fork country several miles north of Sweedlin Valley, has been a preaching place since about 1920 as an extension of the work from the Sweedlin Valley. H.A.B.

Sweet Home Mennonite Church (MC), located near Sweet Home in Linn County, Ore., on U.S. 20, was organized July 14, 1940, with 43 members under the care of the Pacific Coast Mennonite Conference, and N. A. Lind was given charge as pastor and bishop. The first meetinghouse was dedicated Dec. 14, 1940. Archie Kauffman, a minister, located in the community in 1941, and is the present (1958) pastor, assisted by Willard Stutzman (ordained 1948). In 1952 Wilbert Lind was ordained and with his family sailed for Somalia, Africa, as missionaries under the Eastern Mennonite Board.

Since 1942 the congregation has maintained a mission Sunday school some 13 miles up the Cascade Mts., near Cascadia, where a church was built in 1946. Present attendance is almost equal to that of the home church. The membership in 1958 was 125, with N. M. Birky as bishop. N.A.L.

Sweet or Bitter Christ, a well-coined phrase set into circulation by Thomas Müntzer (q.v.), which caught the imagination of his contemporaries. The idea of the phrase is that divine grace must not be looked at as something to be gained cheaply (Bonhöffer's term) but as precious and costly. In other words, the doctrine of justification by faith alone is not to be interpreted in such a way that man receives this gift without any further personal obligation on his part. "No one is able to believe in Christ," said Müntzer, "unless he tries beforehand to become like Him" (Brandt, 130). In all his writings Müntzer speaks exclusively of the "crucified Christ" and never of the "glorified" one. Such an outlook is usually described as the theology of the cross, for which Müntzer is an outstanding representative if not the originator. It is to be distinguished from the traditional Anabaptist position which might preferably be called "Märtyrtheologie" (see Martyrdom, Theology of), in which the idea of a suffering church is central. Nevertheless, the phrase "sweet and bitter Christ" was accepted also by the Anabaptists and became widely used in their polemics against the state churches.

The best references for the use of the idea are to be found in Müntzer's tract of 1524, Vom gedachten Glauben (Brandt, 126 ff.). Item 10 of this tract reads: "Sheep are being poisoned by evil pastures but are fed by salt. To preach to a carnal world a sweet Christ is the greatest poison which has been given to Christ's lambs. For by accepting such a gift, man no longer desires to become like Christ (christförmig)" (Brandt, 129). And Item 11 (ibid.): "Whoever does not want to accept the bitter Christ will eat himself to death with honey. For whoever does not die with Christ cannot rise with Him either." Obviously behind these words lies an entire theology not completely in agreement with the sola fide idea of the official churches.

In the 16th century this idea was accepted primarily by the Anabaptists, and many examples are found in the sources. Thus, for instance, says Hans Schlaffer (q.v.), "Everyone wants to have but the sweetest from Christ, but wants to reject the suffering" (Wiswedel, II, 197). Ludwig Haetzer's stanza is likewise well known: "Yes, says the world, there is no need that I should suffer with Christ; since Christ suffered death for me, I may just sin on this account. . . . O brethren mine, it is a sham, the devil has contrived it" (see MQR 1954, 35 n). Still clearer is the word of Hans Haffner (q.v.) in his tract Concerning a true soldier of Christ (c1535): "The world accepts Christ as a gift but does not know Him as a suffering Christ" (MQR 1931, 92). Pilgram Marpeck's polemic against Schwenckfeld is likewise oriented at least in part to this point. "The crown of thorns precedes the halo of glory," comments Loserth in this connection (Loserth, 160). Elsewhere Marpeck speaks of the lowliness of Christ in contrast to the glorified Redeemer as taught by his opponent.

In our own times Dietrich Bonhöffer knows the same conflict, which he now calls the difference between "cheap grace" and "costly grace." It certainly strikes a central point of theology with practical consequences in life.

R.F.

Thomas Müntzer, sein Leben und seine Schriften, ed. Otto H. Brandt (Jena, 1933); D. Bonhöffer, Cost of Discipleship (German 1937, Engl. New York, 1952); Wiswedel, Bilder II; Pilgram Marpeck, Verantwortung . . . ed. Loserth (Vienna, 1929).

Swichtenheuvel (van Swigtenheuvel), a Mennonite family formerly living at Amsterdam and Utrecht. Jan Jansz Swichtenheuvel, of Amsterdam, published Oprechte Editie, ofte Uytgift van het Geschrift van Doctor Galenus Abrahamsz ende David Spruyt . . . (Haarlem, 1658), the preface of which, written perhaps by Swichtenheuvel himself, shows him to have been an opponent of Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.), leaning toward the views of the "Ouderen" (Conservatives, later called Zonists).

In Utrecht some members of the Swichtenheuvel family were deacons of the Mennonite congregation: Gillis van Swichtenheuvel 1716-18, Cornelis van Swichtenheuvel four times—1735-37, 1741-44, 1748-50, and 1754-55. Suzanna Swichtenheuvel, who married Jan de Heger, was about 1740 one of the first deaconesses of the Utrecht congregation.

VDZ.

H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamsz (Haarlem, 1954) 61, 62, 64; C. B. Hylkema, Reformateurs I (Haarlem, 1900) 16, 117, 131; H. B. Berghuys, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinde gemeente te Utrecht (n.p., n.d.-1926) 47, 50, 52.

Swift Current (Sask.), city and Mennonite settlement. The city (pop. 10,000) is located in southwest Saskatchewan, 105 miles west of Moose Jaw in a wheat district. Sommerfeld (q.v.) and Old Colony (q.v.) Mennonites settled south of Swift Current starting in 1900, mostly from the West Reserve in Manitoba, but also from the overflow of the Rosethorn settlement. The Old Colony Mennonites settled in villages near the railroad stations of Dunhelm, Wymark, and Blumenhof. In 1914 the following fifteen villages were still in existence: Rosenhof, Rosenfeld, Reinfeld, Rosenbach, Rosenort, Neuendorf, Blumenhof, Schönfeld, Chortitz, Reinland, Schanzenfeld, Blumenort, Schönwiese, Springfield, and Gnadenhal. In 1911 the total Mennonite population of the Herbert (q.v.) and Swift Current area was 4,590. About 1500 of the Old Colony and Sommerfeld Mennonites emigrated to Mexico and Paraguay after World War I. In 1931 the Swift Current Mennonite settlement had a population of 1500. By that time Mennonites from Russia had joined this settlement. In 1950 it was estimated that 3,000 Sommerfelders lived in the settlement.

The Emmaus Mennonite (GCM) Church (q.v.) has seven church buildings in this general area, the largest of which is in the city of Swift Current. Other places of worship included Wymark, McMahon, and Reinland. V. E. Nickel is the elder of the church. The total membership in 1956 was 368. There is also an Old Colony Mennonite Church in the Swift Current area. The Mennonite Brethren have a congregation of about 100 in Swift Current, led by F. J. Peters. The Swift Current Bible Institute (q.v.) has been functioning since 1936. C.K.

Heinz Lehmann, Das Deutschum in Westkanada (Berlin, 1939) 170; Jahrbuch der Konferenz der Mennoniten in Canada, 1956.

Swift Current Bible Institute, located at 510 Cheadle Street east, Swift Current, Sask., was founded in 1936 by N. Banmann through and under the direction of Bishop David Toews for the General Conference of Mennonites of Canada. In 1955 the plant consisted of three buildings—a residence for the principal, a building used for administration, classrooms, girls' dormitory, and kitchen and dining room, and a building for teachers' residence and men's dormitory. The term of the Institute is about 5½ months; the course consists of the regular Evangelical Teacher Training Association subjects and Mennonite history, missions, catechism, etc. There are no educational requirements for admission. It is governed by an executive committee of six members and a board of directors of fourteen members. In 1957 the principal was Werner Zacharias; the staff consisted of three full-time teachers, and the enrollment was 34.

W.Z.

Swift Current (Sask.) Mennonite Brethren Church, organized in 1933 with a membership of 26, belongs to the Herbert District Conference. In 1941, with voluntary contribution of work and money by its members, a church was built. The congregation has sent out many workers to home and foreign mission fields. The leader of the congregation 1933-41 was G. A. Warkentin. His successor was Frank J. Peters. The membership in 1957 was 97, with E. J. Lautermilch as pastor.

J.I.R.

Swift Current Mennonite Church (Old Colony), located adjacent to the Reinland Mennonite Church, Cuauhtemoc, Chihuahua, Mexico, consists of Old Colony Mennonites who settled here, coming from Swift Current, Sask. The total membership in 1953 was 3,590. (See Old Colony Mennonites.) C.K.

Swift Current Mennonite Settlement near Cuauhtemoc, Chihuahua, Mexico, was established in 1926 by approximately 1,000 Old Colony Mennonites from Swift Current, Sask. The settlement consists of some sixteen villages and is located northwest of the larger Manitoba Mennonite settlement (q.v.). The land was purchased in the name of two settlers from each village. The settlement has its own civic administration (Oberschulze, q.v.) and is an independent ecclesiastical unit with its own elder (Jacob Peters). In 1953 the population was 2,694. C.K.

Swinderen, Hans van: see Schwindern, Hans von.

Swiss Brethren, the oldest and most influential body of German-speaking Anabaptists. The Anabaptist movement had its origin in Zollikon, now a suburb of Zürich, Switzerland, in January 1525 and spread from there in a short time into the surrounding German-speaking area of Switzerland (St. Gall, Appenzell, Aargau, Grisons, Bern, Basel). It spread rapidly beyond the Swiss borders into Tirol, South Germany, and Alsace, and shortly into Middle Germany, down the Rhine as far as Cologne, into Hesse, Thuringia, and Saxony. It is therefore not surprising that the group came to be known as Swiss Brethren, indicating their geographical origin, although the movement was quite indigenous and not a Swiss mission with resident Swiss leaders living in foreign countries.

However, the name soon came to be a designation for a type of Anabaptists differing from other types, first of all distinguished from the Hutterites with their communal living. The Hutterite Chronicle first uses the name in connection with events dated in 1543, where a certain Hans Klöpffer is stated to have "formerly been a minister of the Swiss Brethren." In Moravia a sharp distinction was made between Hutterites and Swiss Brethren, where the former were by far the larger group in number, but the latter nevertheless maintained themselves until at least 1618. The contest between the two groups was sharp also in other places. In Hesse (and elsewhere) Hutterite missionaries did not hesitate to "raid" the Swiss Brethren congregations to secure converts for "the Church of God" in Moravia, as a document of 1587 (TA Hessen, 494) indicates. Hans Kuchenbecker, called a "Swiss Brethren minister" as late as 1587 (TA Hessen, 562), in 1578 insisted in a court hearing (TA Hessen, 393) that his group "was not in agreement with those in Bohemia; he and his people were Swiss Brethren." Kuchenbecker submitted an outstanding confession to the court in 1578 which the editor of the TA Hessen (404-40) published under the caption, "Confession of the Swiss Brethren." The Hutterite Chronicle consistently refers to Thomas von Imbroich (q.v., executed in 1558) as a "Schweitzerbruder." The first known official use of the name "Swiss Brethren" is found in a decree of the government of Württemberg, issued at Stuttgart in 1559 (published in TA Württemberg, 194): "1559. Ducal decree concerning Schwenckfelders and Anabaptists, also other Sects. Item, what kind of a sect and brotherhood [the one is which is] called Swiss Brethren." The published record of the Frankenthal disputation (Heidelberg, 1571) speaks of three major groups among the Anabaptists, "the Hutterites," "the Mennonites," and "you," where "you" quite clearly means the Swiss Brethren who were apparently the leading group and therefore not in need of a label. The first documentary use of the name by the group itself is found in the title of its hymnal, the Ausbund (1564-83, 1602, and later), "Some Christian Songs as they were written and sung in the Castle Prison at Passau by the Swiss Brethren." The name "Swiss Brethren" is not a geographical designation, as is clear from the above instances of use. The Swiss Brethren in prison were Philippites en route from Moravia to South Germany. None of them had ever been in Switzerland. The name does, however, connote that this group was later counted as belonging to the Swiss Brethren.

The above usage seems to show that there were only three continuing groups of Anabaptists in the 16th century, the Mennonites of Holland and North

Germany, the Hutterites of Moravia and Slovakia, and the Swiss Brethren of Switzerland and South and Middle Germany. Recently several scholars who have studied Marpeck and his work (Jan Kiwiet, William Klassen, Heinold Fast, and Torsten Bergsten) have concluded that there was a fourth major group, the Marpeck brotherhood, led by Marpeck (q.v.) and Scharnschlager (q.v.), in South Germany which differed somewhat from the Swiss Brethren, though its views were substantially the same, and which owed its origin more to Hans Hut than to the Zürich Swiss Brethren group. They lay much weight on the evidence found in the recently discovered Kunstabuch of 1561 (see Rothenfelder and Marpeck). Here the most striking evidence is supplied by the compiler and copyist, Maler or Rothenfelder, who not only heads two letters of 1541 and 1543 "Pilgrim Marpeck to the Swiss Brethren," but in a marginal note says, "Each church wants to have this power, takes the key, that is of the Holy Spirit, especially the Hutterites, the Swiss, the Bilgisch (= Pilgramites, from Pilgram Marpeck), etc., and no one group has peace with the others in God; each judges the others, and yet all come short in the judgment [of God]" (Kunstabuch, folio 42b). Hulshof (Straatsburg, 234) quotes from the Strasbourg archives a statement of Petrus Novesianus of c1555, which lists the religious groups of that time as "Papists, Zwinglians, Lutherans, Schwenckfelders, Anabaptists, and the latter as Hutterites, Hofmannites, Swiss, Bilgramites, Zabites, etc." And a complaint by certain ministers to the Strasbourg authorities in 1561 lists the Anabaptist groups in Strasbourg as Bilgerer (Pilgramites), Sattlerische (Swiss Brethren), and Gabrielites (q.v.).

Evidently the Pilgramites were a distinct group from the Swiss Brethren as late as 1561 (Maler), though Kiwiet holds that the Strasbourg Conference of 1555 united the differing groups. However, the Pilgramites must have been small and localized; the Swiss Brethren extended north as far as Cologne and Hesse. The Pilgramites left no continuing separate congregations, and may well have merged into the Swiss Brethren upon the death of Marpeck and the withdrawal of Scharnschlager to his retreat at Ilanz. The Swiss Brethren continued in the later Swiss, Alsatian, and Palatine Mennonites (including the Amish).

By the last quarter of the 17th century the name "High Germans" or "Upper Germans" was given to the Swiss Brethren, at least in some quarters. For instance, the reply of the Strasbourg Conference of 1592 to the Socinians (see Strasbourg Conferences and Ostorodt) has the title, An Answer of the Swiss Brethren, also Called High Germans, to the Polish, in the form in which it appears in the Dutch Mennonite publication of 1649 entitled Handelinge der Vereenigde Vlaemse en Duytse Doopsgezinde Gemeenten. The phrase "Swiss Brethren, also called High Germans" is not in the text of the document but was added by the Dutch editor, and therefore reflects Dutch usage. In the article High Germans (ME II, 739) van der Zijpp calls the Strasbourg Conferences of 1556 (1555) and 1559 (1557) "meetings of the High Germans." A note by Leenaert

Klock in the Concept of Cologne of 1591 says that this confession was approved by "the ministers and elders and congregations of the regions of Alsace, Breisgau, Strasbourg, Wittenberg [=Weissenburg], Landau, Neustadt, Landesheim, Worms, and Kreuznach," which congregations the beginning of the confession itself calls "High German" in the following words, "we, ministers, elders, and brethren of both sides, whom men have named with two kinds of names, Netherlandish or Frisian, and Upperlandish or High German." The original meaning of "High German" therefore was in effect the Swiss Brethren located in the Palatinate and Strasbourg or along the Upper Rhine. H.S.B.

Swiss Brethren in Moravia. In Moravia all non-Hutterite Anabaptists were known as Swiss Brethren, hence the term includes such groups as the Philippites (q.v.). There were Swiss Brethren in Nikolsburg (q.v.), where there was a congregation, at Bergen, Polau, Wisternitz, and Voitelbrunn, and some also in Passwitz, Rubau, Seletitz, and in the mountain town of Jamnitz. In the great persecution of 1535 many of the Swiss Brethren were expelled from Moravia and returned to their old homes in South Germany and Switzerland. A number (now known to have been Philippites) fell prisoner to the Bishop of Passau (q.v.). A number of Swiss Brethren of Jamnitz imprisoned in Passau were released upon the intervention of their baron and protector, Heinrich von Lomnic, through his burgrave in Passau, offering security for damages and payment of costs. When the persecution in Moravia had subsided somewhat, the Brethren again assembled in Polau, Muschau, Znaim, Tasswitz, and other places. The preacher of the Jamnitz congregation, Oswald Glait (q.v.), was drowned as a martyr at Vienna in 1545. About that time the Swiss Brethren gradually began to join the Hutterian Brethren. The first to do so was the preacher Hans Klöpfer (q.v.) at Polau, who united with the Hutterites at Schäckowitz with four other brethren in 1543. Nevertheless there were remnants of the Swiss Brethren congregations in Moravia as late as 1591 at Znaim; in a suburb of Eibenschitz they still had a small congregation in 1618. Erhard's list of sects in Moravia (1589) names Swiss Brethren and Pilgrim Brethren (Marpeckites?). A number of Swiss Brethren families migrated from Moravia to the Danzig area after 1600; a Schellenberger and a Schmidt fled to Przechovka as late as 1634. HEGE, H.S.B.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 152; G. Bossert, "Aus der nebenkirchlichen religiösen Bewegung der Reformationszeit in Württemberg," in Blätter für württembergische Geschichte XXXIII (1929) 8; ML IV.

Swiss German Dialects. There are many Swiss German dialects, e.g., Basler, Berner, Züricher. Each village and each Alpine valley has its own version. There are certain distinctive sounds in the language, such as the guttural ch for k in addition to German ch; the ending li for lein, or a light v sound for l, especially in the Emmental. The Swiss dialects are Alemannic.

The Anabaptists survived the 16th century in only two areas of Switzerland; viz., around Zürich and in the Emmental east of Bern. When they emigrated to non-Germanic lands they retained their Swiss dialect; those who went to German-speaking lands adopted the German dialect of the region. In a single generation in the Palatinate the Zürich and Bernese Anabaptists had completely adopted the speech of the new land. The Emmental Mennonites who found refuge in the French-speaking Bishopric of Basel, in the French-speaking part of the Sundgau, and later in Ohio and Indiana, retained their Swiss dialect. In the Holee and Schänzli congregations in Basel the dialect is not used in services. In the remaining Swiss congregations the services have always been conducted in dialect. The Les Bulles and Pruntrut congregations are, however, changing to French. In the Emmental the current dialect is used. But also in the congregations in the Bernese Jura, whose members are descendants of expellees from the Emmental, the dialect has been almost perfectly preserved. In services the Scripture reading and hymns are in official (High) German, but addresses and prayers are in dialect. In the Mennonite schools of the Jura an effort is made to retain the dialect. A drama, Barbara (Bern, 1948), by Heinrich Künzi, dealing with the Anabaptists in the period of persecution, is written in the Bernese dialect.

In Wayne and Putnam counties, Ohio, and in Berne, Ind., services were conducted in Bernese Swiss until well toward the close of the past century. Most of the churches changed from the dialect to standard German before changing to English. Today in the Swiss communities of Ohio and Indiana most persons over 30 years old can carry on at least a limited conversation in their Swiss dialect. The dialect as spoken here contains many old Bernese words nearly extinct in their homeland, and also many Anglicized terms hardly recognizable by either the Swiss or Americans.

The Swiss are proud of their dialects. In the Bern cantonal parliament the Bernese dialect is used. Early school instruction is given in the local dialect. Important dialect authors have been Rudolf von Tavel, Simon Gfeller, Albert Bächtold, and Johann Howald, who translated Matthew, Mark, Luke, and Acts into "Bärendütsch," giving the language a standard orthography and grammar. D.L.G., S.G.

Swiss Mennonite Church (GCM) was organized Dec. 2, 1904, near Starkweather, N.D., with Christian Kauffman in charge. About 1910, when a number of families moved, the address of the church was changed to Alsen, N.D. The first meetings were then held in the Town Hall. The present meetinghouse was dedicated on Sept. 13, 1919, and is located in Alsen. This church is a member of the Northern District. The membership in 1957 was 79, with Leonard Harder as pastor. D.G.R.

Swiss Mennonite Church (GCM), located near Whitewater, Kan., was organized by about ten families who left Emmental, canton of Bern, Switzerland, in 1883 and settled in Butler County, Kan. At first the Swiss worshiped in the Emmaus Mennonite Church (q.v.). Other Swiss Mennonites joined this group. Soon separate worship services were started, and in 1890 the Swiss Mennonite Church joined the Western District Conference and in 1892 the General Conference. D. Gerber was the first minister. In 1921-26 John Roth was the leader. In 1929 the membership was 62 and the Sunday-school attendance 180. Theodore Roth was the leading minister 1930-55. Since 1955 Dan H. Dalke has been the pastor. In 1957 the group had a membership of 141. The change from the German language to the English took place in recent years. After World War II the congregation built a new meetinghouse. C.K.

Delbert Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottsdale, 1953) 157; Western District Conference Reports 1890-1957.

Swiss Mennonites in the Netherlands. During the 16th and early 17th centuries there was hardly any contact between the Dutch and the Swiss Mennonites. About 1640, when the Dutch Mennonites became aware of the bad conditions of the Mennonites in Zürich, Switzerland (see Hattavier), and soon after, of the persecutions in the canton of Bern, they tried both directly through one of their members, Adolph de Vreede (q.v.), who visited Bern, and especially by the intervention of the Netherlands States-General (q.v., see François Fagel) to support their Swiss brethren and to ameliorate their lot. This intervention, however, had only slight effect, and particularly in the canton of Bern conditions gradually grew worse. Bernese authorities had resolved to remove all the Mennonites from their territory because of their refusal to do military service and to unite with the state church. On March 18, 1710, a shipload of Bernese Mennonites who were to be forcibly transported to the English colonies in North America were released by order of the Dutch government when they arrived at Nijmegen (q.v.) in the Netherlands. Nearly all of them returned to the Palatinate (q.v.), Germany. A small number of Swiss Mennonites seem to have emigrated to the Netherlands as early as 1660, settling in the province of Groningen; Swiss Brethren from the Palatinate are also reported to have settled near the city of Groningen. The Dutch Mennonites, whose delegates had set up a committee for the relief of foreign Mennonites in February 1660 (see Fonds voor Buitenlandsche Nooden) and who upon the initiative of Jan van Ranst (q.v.) of Rotterdam had made a proposal in 1671 to help the oppressed Mennonites in Switzerland by bringing them all to the Netherlands and settling them there at the expense of the Dutch Mennonites, began a major relief undertaking in 1711, when many Mennonites had to leave Switzerland. Johann Ludwig Runckel (q.v.), the "resident" (i.e., ambassador) of the Netherlands in Switzerland, made contact with the Dutch government and the Dutch Mennonites and after much negotiation with the Bernese authorities organized the emigration to the Netherlands. Runckel faced many difficulties. The Bernese Mennonites had just rejected the invitation of King Frederick I to settle in Prussia because they did not like to leave their native country, in spite of all persecution and misery. Also the controversy between the Amish (q.v.) and Reist (q.v.) groups was unfavorable to the success of the emigration, for often the Reist group refused to sail in the same ships with the Amish. Besides all this, many Mennonites in the canton of Bern had gone into hiding, although a mandate of amnesty had been proclaimed by the government of Bern. Finally 363 persons, including some non-Mennonites, were more or less voluntarily loaded into four ships and sailed from Basel on July 18, 1711. At Breisach, Germany, thirteen Mennonites left the ships. The others arrived at Amsterdam on Aug. 3, where they were warmly welcomed by the Dutch Mennonites, who attended to their many wants. Provided with many things (including an amazing quantity of hooks and eyes!), they were divided into four groups, and sailed on Aug. 20 from Amsterdam to Harlingen in Friesland (21 persons), to Groningen (126), to Kampen (87), and to Deventer (116). A few remained in Amsterdam. Some of these immigrants were penniless; others had brought their money, even considerable amounts. Some were craftsmen, others farmers. The craftsmen were directed to Groningen and Deventer; the farmers obtained farms near Kampen, Groningen, and Sappemeer. Both the craftsmen and the farmers received ample support from the Dutch Committee. At Groningen Elder Alle Derks (q.v.) was very active in behalf of the refugees; at Deventer Steven Cremer (q.v.) aided them.

The Swiss emigrant group which was conducted to Harlingen were followers of Hans Reist (all the others were Amish). Only a few stayed at Harlingen; most obtained farms near Gorredijk in Friesland, but they did not feel at home here; in May 1712, with the aid of the Dutch Committee they were settled amidst their coreligionists near Kampen. But because of objection to the Amish views most of them moved to the Palatinate in the next year.

In the following years most of the group which was located at Deventer moved to Kampen or to Groningen and Sappemeer, some emigrated to the Palatinate, and a few soon joined the Deventer Old Flemish Mennonite church. There was no Swiss Mennonite congregation at Deventer as there was at Kampen and at Groningen and Sappemeer.

The Kampen group used the Swiss-German language for two or three decades, and then adopted the Dutch in its services. Elders of this group were Daniel Ricken 1712-36, Peter Teune 1736-63, Jacob Stähly 1736-57, Hans Hupster 1769-92, and finally a Dutch Mennonite, Jan Hans Hoosen 1805-22. In 1822 their congregation merged with the Dutch Mennonite church at Kampen.

That there were serious difficulties in the Swiss Amish group (which congregation is not clear) in the Netherlands, so serious as to cause a suspension of all communion, baptism, marriages, and ordinations for at least six years, is revealed by a letter written by Johannes Nafziger, an Amish bishop of Essingen near Landau in the Palatinate in 1781. Nafziger tells of three successive committees of Amish ministers from the Palatinate and Alsace sent to Holland in 1766, 1767(?), and 1770 to settle the dispute and supervise the congregation there, which they successfully did. The letter is published in MQR II (1928) 198-204.

The Groningen-Sappemeer group, which was augmented in the following years by the arrival of some new immigrants from Bern, worshiped both in the town of Groningen and near Sappemeer. Their first elder was Hans Anken (q.v.), who seems to have served both in Groningen and Sappemeer as did his successors until about 1760. About 1720 a schism arose among these Swiss Brethren, dividing them into the Oude Zwieters (Old Swiss) and Nieuwe Zwieters (New Swiss). The cause of this schism is said to have been the purchase of a house by Elder Anken, which a part of his congregation, composed of very plain people, considered too sumptuous and too worldly. The Oude Zwieters were the more conservative group, not only in dress, but also in maintaining their native tongue. Their church services also differed from those of the New Swiss, who soon adapted themselves to the Dutch way of living and worshiping, using the Dutch language by about 1750. In the Old Swiss services, after the preacher had finished his sermon other brethren spoke to express their agreement with the sermon or to add a few words from the Bible. They knelt for (silent) prayer and practiced footwashing in their communion services. They had no special confession of faith; the German Ausbund was their hymnal.

Both at Groningen (about 1720 in a house "Achter de Muur") and in Sappemeer (in a house on the Kleinemeer) the Swiss Brethren had meetinghouses, which were used in turn both by the Old and the New Swiss. Gradually the ties between the members living in and near Groningen and those in Sappemeer relaxed. In Groningen the Old and New Swiss merged about 1780. Here the Swiss congregation bought the former Waterlander meetinghouse in the Pelsterstraat in 1815. After the death of their last preacher, Christiaan Jacobs Leutscher, who served 1812-d.24, the Swiss congregation merged with the Dutch Mennonite congregation of Groningen.

At Sappemeer the Oude Zwieters and Nieuwe Zwieters seem to have merged about 1790. In the meantime some Old Swiss had joined the Sappemeer Old Flemish church, whereas many New Swiss joined the Waterlander congregation. The (united) Swiss congregation of Sappemeer merged with the main Dutch congregation before 1802.

Preachers and elders of the Groningen-Sappemeer Swiss groups (as far as the lists are complete and reliable) were as follows:

New Swiss: Hans Anken, elder 1712-?, Michael Ruysser (Riszer) 1711-59, elder after the death of Anken, Peter Leenders 1711-57, Jan van Ko(o)men, d. 1743, Anthony Kratzer 1740-79, elder 1760, Christiaan Ancken 1754-70, Jan Leenders 1754-59(?), Rudolf Leutscher 1755-61. Then the Groningen New Swiss group was led by Balster Franssen (Wolkammer) 1762-82, Hendrik Cornelis 1768-1808, elder 1794, Rudolf (or Roelof) Jans 1781-d.90, Izaak Jannes Leutscher (1740-1826) 1799, elder 1811, David Jacob de Goed 1811-13, and Christiaan Jacobs Leutscher (1812-24). The last leaders of the Sappemeer group were Isaak van Kalkar (Calcar) 1772-96, Alle Cornelis 1791-1800, and Ties Hansen Top 1791-97. Old Swiss: Abraham Looover (Laufer); d. 1774, living near Groningen, elder 1726, Claus Gerber 1739-61, Peter Riegen (Ricken) 1740-72. Jacob Stehle (Stähly), the elder of the Kampen Swiss Mennonite group, also seems to have served the Groningen-Sappemeer group 1736-57. David Righen (d. 1796), preacher 1767, elder 1774, was the last elder of this group.

The Swiss Mennonites in the Netherlands, who at first lived and worshiped rather separately from their Dutch coreligionists both because of their language and their particular views and practices, gradually adjusted themselves to the Dutch Mennonite practices. But not all. A number of them, particularly members of the Kraster (Krätzer), Rijkens (Rich, Ricken), and Stuckje (Stucky) families, joined the Reformed Church in the late 18th and the 19th centuries.

Many descendants of these Swiss Mennonites are still found among the Dutch Mennonites everywhere; particularly the names of Meihuizen (Maihuser), Boer, Rijkens (Rich, Ricken), and Teune.

After 1717 a number of Swiss emigrants moved from the Netherlands to America, receiving financial support from the Dutch Mennonites. (See Groningen, Kampen, Sappemeer.) vdZ.

Of the hundreds of letters, documents, and records concerning the Swiss Mennonites found in the Amsterdam Archives, only the most important items are mentioned here:

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1009 f., 1060, 1065, 1151, 1196, 1210-12, 1216, 1225, 1392, 1746 f., 1757-83; 1866-68, 1881; II, 2, Nos. 50 b. 866; J. Huizinga, Stamboek of Geslachtsregister der Nakomelingen van Samuel Peter (Meihuizen) en Barbara Fry (Groningen, 1890) I, 1-143; Müller, Berner Täufer, 158 f., 164-94, 257-328; Delbert L. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottsdale, 1953) 56-66; H. Dassel Sr., Menno's Volk in Groningen (Groningen, n.d.) 21 f., 39-42; M. G. de Boer, "Vom Thunersee zum Sappemeer," in Berner Zeitschrift f. Gesch. und Heimatkunde, 1947-I, repr.; Naamlijst; DB 1869, 7-11; 1881, 103 f.; 1908, 85-105; 1909, 127-55.

Switzerland, a mountainous country in the center of Europe, area 15,940 square miles, population 4,700,297, with eternally snow-covered Alpine ranges in the southern part, and the blue Jura Mountains in the northwest which extend from Geneva to Basel. Between the Alps and the Jura is the great Swiss plateau, which extends about 240 miles from Geneva to Lake Constance, a rolling terrain broken by smaller plains. Switzerland is a confederation of 22 cantons based on the principles of freedom of the old confederacy. Since the adoption of the new federal constitution in 1848 and its extension in 1874 the nation has become a strongly knit confederacy.

This mountainous land, whose inhabitants loved liberty and were for the most part earnestly religious, is the land of the birth of the Anabaptist movement and the homeland of innumerable refugee and emigrant Anabaptists or Mennonites. In the history of Anabaptism the early decades of the 16th century were of decisive significance. Of all the Anabaptist brotherhoods in Europe at the time of the Reformation, it is generally agreed that the group at Zürich was the first to constitute itself as a brotherhood alongside the prevailing church. The leaders were Conrad Grebel (q.v.), Felix Manz (q.v.), and George Blaurock (q.v.). These men were the friends of Zwingli in the beginning of the Reformation. But as soon as he sponsored the establishment of a state church, and placed the religious leadership in the hands of the temporal government, they broke with him.

The strict Biblicism of the Zürich Brethren was also soon apparent in their adoption of the baptism of believers and the rejection of infant baptism. In a solemn hour on Jan. 21, 1525, they openly confessed and confirmed their experience of salvation in baptism, although a few days before (Jan. 18) the baptism of infants had been made obligatory by the city council. This was actually the founding of the first Anabaptist congregation. With fiery zeal they promoted the truth they recognized; recognition led to confession, with the result that the movement expanded to such an extent that in a short time there were thriving congregations not only in such Swiss towns as Zürich, St. Gall, Bern, and Basel, but far beyond the Swiss borders, in the Tyrol and South Germany, and adjoining German-speaking lands.

But the consequence was not only a great revival, but also the great tragedy in the history of the Anabaptist movement in the cruel persecution throughout Europe, which lasted more than two centuries in Switzerland. Zürich was first to adopt a policy of violent suppression under the influence of Zwingli. A large number of mandates (q.v.) were issued in the Swiss cities named above for the extermination of the movement. But when no other measures sufficed to crush the movement, the death penalty was adopted. The first death sentence of the new Protestant state church—which had only a short time before been in a severe battle for freedom of religion and conscience—was carried out on Felix Manz in Zürich on Jan. 5, 1527. From then on, we find the Swiss confederacy in a constant struggle with the Anabaptist movement.

The Anabaptist problem was discussed as a federal issue in 1527. On Tuesday, Aug. 2, "the mayor, council and great council of the city of Zürich" sent an invitation to Bern, Basel, Schaffhausen, Chur, Appenzell, and St. Gall to meet in conference in Zürich on account of the Anabaptists, who were steadily increasing in spite of mild and also severe punishment. It was their opinion "that such sect and sinning should not be tolerated within or without our confederacy, since their intent is to destroy not only the true, right, inward faith of Christian hearts, but also external and human order and laws of Christian and orderly government, contrary to brotherly love and good morals." In order to preserve the common Christian peace and to serve the fatherland, the Zürich council proposed that the Protestant estates send a delegation to Zürich on Aug. 12-14 to discuss the matter of punishing seditious Anabaptists.

An agreement (Concordat) was reached by the assembled cantons and a strict mandate issued against the Anabaptists. The document contains first a thorough justification of the mandate. Besides the "eternal and saving Word of God" the "sect and separation" of the Anabaptists had made itself felt, which, to be sure, seeks to defend its principles from the Bible. But it was clear that Anabaptism could not exist according to the Word of God, but must be rejected, and infant baptism be recognized, which had heretofore been practiced generally in Christendom and which is in accord with the Word of God.

Nevertheless the Swiss Brethren continued to increase in Switzerland. At the sessions of the federal parliament in Baden in January 1530, the Anabaptist question was again under discussion. The Protestant towns, Zürich, Bern, Basel, St. Gall, and Constance, united to adopt a common policy against the Anabaptists, because the "confused, miserable sect of the Anabaptists with their rabble and their doctrine are becoming everywhere more numerous and more dangerous, whereby in all true Christian faith great defection and division, much misery, shedding of blood and unrest results."

Much misery and shedding of blood did indeed result from it, but not because of the faith of the Swiss Brethren, but because of the intolerant attitude of the government. It was actually the Protestant estates who insisted on it under the influence of the clergy. The Protestant cantons were very serious in their threat of making Anabaptism a capital crime. The bloody drama begun with Felix Manz in Zürich was continued in other Swiss cities. The Martyrs' Mirror names forty martyrs in Bern alone in 1529-71.

In the course of time there were frequent negotiations between the various cantons concerning the Anabaptists. On July 4, 1585, a conference between the city council of Bern and Zürich was held in Aarau, at which it was decided that those who clung to their faith after friendly instruction should be arrested and led out of the country. A resolution of June 15, 1660, repeated this order of expulsion. But love of country brought many an exile back to the homeland.

This policy of a "Christian government" toward its subjects in the hope of preserving unity of the church, practiced throughout the 16th-18th centuries, did not succeed in wiping out Anabaptism.

There is a vast amount of source material on the faith and life of the Swiss Brethren in the Reformation period. The basic principles are best found in the records of the Zofingen (q.v.) disputation, July 1-9, 1532, and the debate (Täufergespräch) in Bern, March 11-17, 1538. Their doctrines agree exactly with the seven articles of the Schleithem (q.v.) Confession of 1527. The center of the entire movement lay in the attempt to build their congregational life on the original sources of the Christian church. Their inner and outer life they sought to conform to the teaching of Christ, especially the Sermon on the Mount, and the apostolic teaching of salvation. They defended complete freedom of faith and conscience, the requirement of discipleship, rejection of the oath, and nonresistance, since the Christian should never take revenge, but always practice the love of one's enemy. To realize this New Testament, apostolic church, the first Anabaptists suffered severely. In this bitter contest they were, to be sure, defeated; it remained their only lot to endure injustice.

The causes of the Mennonite emigration from Switzerland were (1) persecution; (2) the military question or nonresistance; (3) an unfavorable economic situation and the restriction of opportunity for development. The large number of emigrations from Switzerland were in general not voluntary withdrawals, but rather expulsions from the country. To expel foreigners on account of religious propaganda in conflict with the state church might be understood; but to banish native citizens, quiet, obedient subjects on account of religious matters is today considered an impossibly severe punishment. Many Mennonites had to emigrate from the cantons of Bern and Zürich involuntarily, especially in the second period of the Zürich Anabaptist movement, the beginning of the 17th century. This wave of emigration removed the last of the Mennonites from the canton of Zürich by about 1700.

The first place of refuge where toleration for extra-church religious movements was found was Moravia. In the south of this margraviate, in the region of Nikolsburg, many Swiss Anabaptists settled. Balthasar Hubmaier (q.v.) was one of the first arrivals from Switzerland (1526). Here the Anabaptists were permitted to organize according to their principles, at least for a time. The Swiss Brethren formed an independent branch of the Moravian Anabaptists. At Jamnitz (q.v.) and other localities congregations of considerable size gathered. Immigrants from St. Gall and Appenzell joined these congregations.

From Moravia a number of Anabaptist emissaries undertook their dangerous missionary journeys to Switzerland, "to gather the lambs of the Lord." Three of these missionaries were captured in Zurzach (Aargau) in 1582 and executed in the town of Baden. Bern tried to stop the emigration to Moravia, fearing the loss of a large number of its subjects. It seems, however, that this missionary work was successful. The chronicles of the Hutterian Brethren report, "In this year, 1585, so many people came from Switzerland that they could not all be received; but a good part of them were received." And further, "In this 86th year several hundred Swiss came here to the brotherhood . . . who desired to adjust themselves in the faith."

A second major refuge was the Palatinate, especially in the 17th and 18th centuries. The large number of Mennonite family names of Swiss origin now in the Palatinate points to an extensive spread of Anabaptism through the immigration of Swiss Brethren. About 700 persons moved from the canton of Bern to the Palatinate in 1671 and arrived there in the most impoverished condition. The very first arrivals came as early as 1655.

Another place of refuge was the Netherlands (see Swiss Mennonites in Holland). The Dutch Mennonites had most generously sympathized with their oppressed brethren. This matter was discussed at the general synod of the Mennonites in Amsterdam on Nov. 5, 1670. The forcible deportation of the Mennonites to the East Indies or to America was thwarted by Dutch intervention. Some Swiss Brethren settled in Holland.

Numerous traces of Swiss emigration are found in Alsace-Lorraine and France. The fact that there are no Mennonites in the interior of France indicates immigration. The almost exclusively Bernese names substantiate their Bernese origin. In 1671-1711 there was a large settlement of Bernese Mennonites in Upper Alsace, in the Vosges and the French Jura (Doubs). In the Montbéliard area Count Leopold Eberhard put Mennonites in charge of his estates. These Mennonites thrived.

The later goal of emigrating Swiss Mennonites has been chiefly the United States. There were some Swiss Mennonites among the first Palatine Mennonite immigrants to Pennsylvania in the early 18th century. The emigration of Bernese Mennonites to America was very heavy in the first half of the 19th century. The Mennonites of Pennsylvania are of Swiss origin, nearly all from the canton of Bern, but some from Zürich. Emigration from the Emmental and the Jura was also very strong in 1830-80. These Mennonites settled chiefly in Ohio, Indiana, and Ontario. A glance over the entire emigrant complex of Swiss Mennonites shows that many Mennonites in other lands are related by spiritual as well as blood ties to those of Switzerland.

Concerning the economic conditions of the Swiss Mennonites in the 16th-17th centuries there is little information. Living conditions even after the passing of persecution were extremely simple. These people were very modest in their demands and cultivated a quiet family life, regarding work as a God-given task. In spite of innumerable difficulties the Mennonites have pioneered in new methods of agriculture, which was their principal occupation. In the agricultural history of Switzerland and other adoptive lands the Swiss Mennonites occupy an outstanding place, which has been recognized by objective specialists. An unusual understanding of cattle raising and dairying can be found among the Swiss Mennonites.

Although large blocks of Swiss Mennonites have taken root and contributed to the growth of Mennonitism elsewhere, there has remained in Switzerland a remnant of Mennonite families, who call themselves the "Altevangeliſche taufgesinnte Gemeinde." The congregations are distributed as follows: Basel-Schänzli (q.v.), with a meetinghouse since 1903; west of it close to the French border, Grand Lucelle (q.v.), to which belong the Mennonites living on the lonely scattered farms as far as Delsberg. In the extreme north of the Bernese Jura lies Kleintal (q.v.), with its center in the Moron chapel, built in 1893, and a meetinghouse in Perceux since 1921 above the cave in the mountain known as the Geisskirchlein, where tradition says the Mennonites used to hold their services during persecution. One of the largest congregations is Sonnenberg (q.v.), southwest of Perceux, with its chapel Jeangisboden, built in 1900, and two other meetinghouses at Fürstenberg and Les Mottes. To the south, opposite the Chasseral chain, is the smallest congregation, Mont Cortébert of Cortébert-Matte. On the high plateau of the Jura is the Chaux d'Abel (q.v.) congregation, with a school erected in 1863, the gift of David Ummel to the congregation (burned down and rebuilt in 1917). The large chapel built in 1905 belongs to the young people's association, of which several Mennonites are members. Some of the Mennonites on Mt. Chaux d'Abel or Sonvilierberg meet in a hall in the home of the Jungen family. The canton of Neuchâtel has only the Chaux de Fonds congregation. Its chapel was built in 1894 outside the town of Les Bulles. The former Locle-Bressels (q.v.) congregation is merged with Chaux de Fonds.

The most widely ramified and one of the largest congregations in Switzerland is the Emmental (q.v.) congregation with its seat at Langnau, where its organ, Der Zionspflger, is published. In Kehr near Langnau stands the first Mennonite chapel built in Switzerland. It was erected in 1888, and was followed by one at Bomatt a.d. Emme and one at Aebnit near Bowil in 1899. Subsidiaries of the Emmental congregation are found at Emmenholz near Solothurn and Pay de Gex (q.v.) near Geneva, which was founded early in the present century by Abraham Geiser.

All of these congregations are united into a conference, whose total membership varies from 1800 to 2,000 souls. The Basel congregation with a chapel on Holestrasse belongs to the Alsatian conference. (See articles on all the Swiss cantons for detailed accounts, e.g. Bern).

From 1946 to 1952 the MCC maintained its European headquarters at Basel, and since then has continued to have an office there, including the Agape Verlag established in 1954. In 1951 the European Mennonite Bible School was established in Basel, moved in 1957 to Bienenberg near Liestal, some 10 miles inland. Basel has become the center of international Mennonite exchange and fellowship for Swiss, French, and South German Mennonites. In 1952 the Fifth Mennonite World Conference was held at St. Chrischona, near Basel.

S.G.

E. Egli, Aktensammlung zur Gesch. der Züricher Reformation (Zürich, 1879); Ein Wahrhaftiger Bericht von den Brüdern im Schweizerland in dem Zürcher Gebiet, von dem 1635ten bis in das 1645te Jahr, a printed booklet found in the Central Library at Zürich and printed as an appendix to all American editions of the Ausbund; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Müller, Berner Täufer; S. Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931); E. H. Correll, Das Schweizerische Täufermennonitentum (Tübingen, 1925); D. L. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists and Their American Descendants (Scottsdale, 1953); H. S. Burrage, A History of the Anabaptists in Switzerland (Philadelphia, 1882); R. Nitsche, Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in der Schweiz (Einsiedeln, 1885); L. von Muralt, Glaube und Leben der schweizerischen Täufer in der Reformationszeit (Zürich, 1938); G. Thormann, Proberstein oder . . . Prüfung des Täuferturns (Bern, 1693); R. Friedmann, Mennonite Piety Through the Centuries (Goshen, 1949); Paul Peachey, Die soziale Herkunft der Schweizer Täufer (Karlsruhe, 1954); TA Zürich; ML IV.

Sword and Trumpet, The, a 24-page (plus cover) 8 x 11 quarterly published by a group of interested Mennonites (MC) in Virginia (largely Denbigh, Fentress, and Harrisonburg), first issue January 1929. It announced itself on the masthead as "Devoted to the Defense of a Full Gospel, With Especial Emphasis upon Neglected Truths, and to an Active Opposition of the Various Forms of Error that Contribute to the Religious Drift of the Times," and described itself as "a faith-defending drift-opposing religious quarterly, published under the sanction of the Virginia Conference, . . . intended to supplement every other loyal paper in the Church and supplant none, . . . to be an unmistakable and uncompromising expression of Mennonite Conservatism." Its founder and editor-in-chief until his death in 1938 was Bishop George R. Brunk of Denbigh, with Ernest G. Gehman of Harrisonburg as office editor, and J. L. Stauffer of Harrisonburg as associate editor from January 1934. Upon Brunk's death publication ceased. It was revived in smaller format (6 x 9), at first 50 pp., then 40 pp., in October 1943, with J. Irvin Lehman as editor (to 1953) and George R. Brunk, Jr., as associate editor. J. Ward Shank has served as editor since January 1954. Ernest G. Gehman has continued without interruption as office editor.

The character of the journal, as stamped upon it by its first editor, has been generally well maintained, although some of its earlier polemic character has been softened. Its chief concerns have been to resist Calvinism (eternal security), Modernism, and popular Fundamentalism, and to support a strong conservative position in church teaching, practice, and discipline. Its circulation in 1959 was c 2,000. H.S.B.

Sybout (Sybrant) Obbes, an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded on Oct. 21, 1536, at Leeuwarden in Friesland, Netherlands. He was baptized in the winter of 1534. When seized because of heresy he recanted, but soon he "again adhered to the sect of the Anabaptists." Caught again he was sentenced to death. vdZ.

J. Reitsma, Honderd jaren uit de Geschiedenis der Hervorming . . . in Friesland (Leeuwarden, 1876) 63.

Sybrandi, a Dutch Mennonite family. (1) Sybren (Sybrand) Sybrandi, b. 1772 at Leeuwarden, d. June 17, 1854, at Haarlem, was educated for the ministry at the Amsterdam Mennonite seminary 1801-5 and served the congregation of Nijmegen 1805-7 and Haarlem 1807-49, in which year he retired. In 1818-45 he was a trustee (1827-28 and 1839-40 moderator) of the A.D.S. (q.v.) and during the same period curator of its seminary.

His son (2) Klaas Sybrandi, b. Nov. 18, 1807, at Haarlem, d. there Sept. 5, 1872, was also trained at the Amsterdam seminary and then served as pastor at Nijmegen 1830-34, Groningen 1834-38, and Haarlem 1838-71; then he retired because of illness. He succeeded his father as a delegate in the A.D.S. and curator of the seminary 1845-72, serving as A.D.S. president 1849-50 and 1857-58. Pastor Klaas Sybrandi was a man of great learning. In 1829 he obtained his Ph.D. degree at the University of Leiden with a dissertation on Plato's Gorgias. He devoted himself particularly to the study of Greek and Dutch literature, publishing a number of literary studies. Besides these he published many devotional contributions in periodicals, some sermons, and a historical paper in the Doopsgezinde Bijdragen of 1867. For many years he was a trustee of the Teyler (q.v.) Theological Association at Haarlem. C. Sepp wrote his obituary.

Another son of (1) Sybren Sybrandi was (3) Jacob Sybrandi, b. 1818, at Haarlem, d. Dec. 26, 1895, at Kampen, who after his training at Amsterdam was a Mennonite pastor of Beemster 1844-51 and Kampen 1851-95. vdZ.

C. Sepp, "Levensbericht" in Levensberichten van de Maatschappij voor Ned. Letterkunde, 1873; N.N.B.Wb. IV, 1291 f.; DB 1867, 159 ff.; 1873, 193; 1896, 204; 1904, 73.

Sycamore Grove Mennonite Church (MC), located 4 miles northwest of Garden City, Cass Co., Mo., a member of the South Central Conference, was organized in 1868 by Bishop Jacob Kenagy. It was known as the Clearfork Church until 1883, when the present name was adopted. Sunday school was begun in 1871. It was an Amish Mennonite church and a member of the Western A.M. Conference. All services were conducted in German until 1896. In 1885 the Bethel Mennonite Church (q.v.) was organized as a more progressive English language group. In 1947, when Bethel was dissolved, the members joined the Sycamore Grove congregation. Missionaries sent out by this congregation were Nellie King and S. Paul Miller. The membership in 1957 was 223, with James D. Yoder as minister.

R.Z.

Symon Fijts, a Mennonite preacher and elder at Texel, an island in the Dutch province of North Holland, in 1569. He visited the martyrs Tijs Juriensz (q.v.), a preacher, and Jan Claesz of Muiden (q.v.) in prison and was present at their execution. He was a personal friend of Jan Smit (q.v.), who was hanged by the Spaniards in 1572 at Haarlem. He furnished valuable material concerning these martyrs to the editors of the martyrbook, Historie der warachtighe getuygen Jesu Christi (1617), which van Braght used in his Martyrs' Mirror. (DB 1873, 141; 1899, 104, 120; Mart. Mir. D 481, 641, E 823, 962; ML I, 644.)

K.V., voZ.

Symon Sieurdszoon, apparently one of the Anabaptists participating in the assault on the Oldeklooster (q.v.), was executed at Leeuwarden in Friesland, Netherlands, on April 10, 1535. (K. Vos, Menno Simons, Leiden, 1914, p. 228.)

voZ.

Symon Symonsz, an Anabaptist martyr, was beheaded on March 17, 1537, at Leeuwarden in Friesland, Netherlands. He was charged with having been rebaptized, "accepting the covenant (verbond) of the Anabaptists." He rejected the Mass and spoke disrespectfully of the Catholic Church. His property was confiscated. His place of residence is not stated. The sentence is published in DB 1917, 89 f.

voZ.

Syntgen: see Sijntgen.

Syouck Haeyes, a citizen of Leeuwarden in Friesland, Netherlands, was present with Frans Cuyper (q.v.) when Menno Simons preached in a field near Leeuwarden in 1542. On Nov. 14, 1542, Syouck was sentenced to banishment from the territory of Leeuwarden. Syouck was probably not a Mennonite. (K. Vos, Menno Simons, Leiden, 1914, p. 67, 92, 231.)

voZ.

Syoucke Metselair, an Anabaptist who had participated in the attack on the Oldeklooster (q.v.), was executed at Leeuwarden in Friesland, Netherlands, on April 10, 1535. (K. Vos, Menno Simons, Leiden, 1914, p. 228.)

voZ.

Sytze (Zijtze) Dirks, an Anabaptist martyr, was sentenced to death by the Court of Holland on May 16, 1535. He was a native of Gauw, Friesland. In March 1534 he had joined the Anabaptists who sailed from Amsterdam intending to go to Münster (q.v.). At Bergklooster (q.v.) he was arrested. Sytze is said to have been an Anabaptist preacher. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 745; DB 1917, 121, No. 148.)

voZ.

Syria, including Lebanon, which is now a separate political unit, is a land of historic importance on the eastern coast of the Mediterranean Sea. Damascus, its ancient capital, and Antioch were centers for the beginning and spread of Gentile Christianity. Judaism, Christianity, and Mohammedanism have been the three predominant religions. In modern times both Roman Catholicism and Protestantism have been active in missionary attempts to revive the old churches. Mennonites have been related to this area through the work of the United Orphanage and Mission (q.v.), which was begun in 1898 by the Mennonite Brethren in Christ among Armenians at Hadjin, Turkey (q.v.), and Near East Relief. During World War I missionaries were forced to leave Turkey; thousands of Armenians lost their lives, while the remainder fled or were deported. Refugee camps were set up in Damascus, Aleppo, and Beirut, from which Armenians were gradually settled in the cities of Syria. To serve these people the United Orphanage and Mission Society returned missionaries for work in Syria. A staff of four to six was maintained in 1923-38; World War II again stopped operations. During this period relief and missionary work was carried on in association with the Spiritual Brotherhood, a group of Armenian Christians under the leadership of Abraham Sefarian. Churches were started in six cities, Alexandretta, Damascus, Kirik Khan, Latakia, Aleppo, and Beirut, with a membership eventually of one thousand. On the departure of the missionaries in 1938 the churches continued independent work. In 1957 the United Missionary Church (formerly MBC) again sent three missionaries to assist in the indigenous work being carried on by Samuel Doctorian in Beirut.

In 1919-21, the Mennonite (MC) Relief Commission for War Sufferers (q.v.) co-operated with the Near East Relief (q.v.), which had been organized in November 1915, in relief work in Syria, with workers serving at Beirut, Aleppo, Mardin, and other places. (See Relief Work.)

In 1957 Menno Travel Service (q.v.) opened a Near East office at Beirut, Lebanon. S.F.P.

Storms, What Hath God Wrought (Springfield, Ohio, 1948); Our Bi-Monthly Letter, representing the United Missionary Society Operating in Syria.

Syvert Clercq (Stewerdus Clericus) was a Dutch Anabaptist, at first a follower of Melchior Hofmann (q.v.), later a Münsterite (see Münster). According to the confession of Jan van Batenburg (1537) he was an influential leader, but there is no information concerning his activities. In 1536 he attended the Anabaptist leaders' meeting at Bocholt (q.v.) in Westphalia, Germany. (DB 1917, 117, No. 81, 120, No. 121; 1919, 193; Mellink, Wederdopers, 251 f.)

voZ.

Tabor Academy began its operations with the opening of Tabor College (q.v.), Hillsboro, Kan., in 1908, and was operated under the Tabor College Corporation, which was granted its charter by the State on March 19, 1908. The curriculum provided a standard high-school education with a heavy emphasis on Bible. In its early years it also provided the normal training course for students preparing to teach.

During the early years of the Corporation, the academy dominated the program almost completely. The first-year enrollment of 78 steadily increased until it reached 176 in 1920. From 1916 to 1927 the average was 141. In 1926 the college enrollment surpassed the academy and from that time the academy declined until the college closed for reorganization in 1934-35. During this year the school became a conference institution of the Mennonite Brethren Church.

When the college program was again started under conference operation, the academy continued its program but never regained its earlier enrollment. It was discontinued in 1945 when the conference voted to "leave the operation of the educational program on the secondary school level to local congregations and group organizations." There were several reasons for this decision. (1) Academies which developed in Kansas, Oklahoma, and California relieved the need for conference control of secondary education. (2) As more and more emphasis was placed on college work, it became difficult to operate two schools under one organization. (3) The increasing popularity of public schools kept many students from coming. (4) The cost of operating a dual program became too great. W.J.P.

Tabor College is a four-year Liberal Arts College located in Hillsboro, Marion Co., Kan., owned and operated by the Conference of the Mennonite Brethren Church of North America through its Board of Education. As early as 1881, three years after the first conference of the Mennonite Brethren Church, the subject of education became a conference issue. The 1884 conference report reveals growing interest in a "Fortbildungsschule" (training school) to retain the German language and to train teachers and mission workers. A School Association was organized in the M.B. Church of Goessel, Kan., which, though it received no direct support from the conference, conducted a Bible school in the small village of Canada, Kan., for two years. In 1886 the school was moved to Lehigh. Lack of leadership and finances forced the Association to discontinue.

Meanwhile another School Association, supported by several Mennonite groups, organized a school near Buhler, Kan., in Reno County. J. F. Duerksen was appointed to direct the school. In 1899 Duerksen was transferred to the head of the German Department of McPherson College in McPherson, Kan., after an agreement was reached that the M.B. Conference would sponsor the German Department.

By this arrangement Duerksen was able to serve as spiritual counselor for Mennonite students. The future educational leadership of the M.B. and K.M.B. conferences received its stimulation under this provisional agreement with McPherson College. This arrangement worked satisfactorily for five years, but soon students began to dream of a conference school. H. W. Lohrenz and P. C. Hiebert, both students of McPherson, became interested in a conference school; and J. K. Hiebert, minister of the Ebenfeld M.B. Church, helped Lohrenz promote the plan and bring the issue before the conference. In 1907 a recommendation for an M.B. college was approved in a special meeting of M.B. and K.M.B. conference representatives. A School Association was formed to carry out the program. Articles of Incorporation were prepared, and a charter was granted by the State of Kansas on March 19, 1908. Hillsboro was chosen as the site when it offered $6,533 in cash, building lots, material, and labor. The management of the corporation was vested in a board of directors composed of nine voting members. J. K. Hiebert was the first board chairman. The school was named Tabor College, and the Society was called the Tabor College Corporation. In the spring of 1908 the building was begun. It was completed at a cost of $13,500. Although the building was not yet completed, classes started on Sept. 14, 1908, in the Church with three teachers—President H. W. Lohrenz, P. C. Hiebert, and P. P. Rempel—and 39 students. Before the year was over the enrollment reached 102, and three more faculty members were added: Z. C. Bartel, Katharina Friesen, and Tina Schultz. By 1910 instruction was offered in seven departments with seven teachers. The academy and the preparatory school dominated the early years of the program.

The early aims of the college as stated by its first president, H. W. Lohrenz, were to offer a liberal arts education in a Christian setting, to prepare young men and women for spiritual leadership in the church, and to provide a program of vocational training. It was the special concern of the Association, of the Board, and of the teachers that the school be a seminary of real Christianity, where the spirit of prayer could prevail and where souls could become better grounded in the spiritual life.

During the first ten years the student enrollment increased to about 200, and the faculty increased to 15 members. The rapid progress, however, was halted temporarily when on April 30, 1918, a fire destroyed the building and practically all of its contents, with a total loss of about $24,000. A new fire-proof three-story building, 130 x 90 ft., and a dormitory known as the Mary J. Regier Ladies Home were soon built. Two years after the fire, classes having been housed in temporary quarters throughout the city, Tabor was once more in its own home.

Following the dedication of the new building Sept. 12, 1920, the school enjoyed several years of prosperity and progress. In 1924 a gymnasium was built. Soon, however, the lack of full accreditation for the college division began to be reflected in a decline of enrollment. In 1927 a concerted effort was made to meet the requirements for state accreditation. This goal was achieved. In order to preserve this status, President Lohrenz made the proposal to the conference of 1930 that the college be operated as a conference school. The conference, however, was not ready to accept this responsibility; this left the college with a very uncertain economic foundation. Economic insecurity continued to hamper the college program. The situation was further aggravated by the depression and its aftermath, a decline in student enrollment, the resignation of influential teachers, and hesitant support from the conference. In 1932-33, with less than 100 students and only six full-time teachers, the college lost its state accreditation.

At the General Conference of 1933 the Tabor College Corporation made another official offer to the conference, inviting the church to operate the school. The college then became the property of the M.B. Church. After temporarily closing its doors for reorganization in 1934, the school resumed operation in 1935.

The newly appointed President A. E. Janzen succeeded P. C. Hiebert, who had served as president 1931-33. Janzen introduced the Thousand Friends Plan—each friend giving $10.00 annually—which, together with the church offering, provided a stable financial basis. The board adopted the policy that the institution could not borrow money. The college received a two-year accredited status during the first year as a conference school. The years since 1935 have been characterized by moderate but steady growth in physical facilities plus continuous improvements in the curriculum and in the quality of instruction.

Although the college from its beginning offered a four-year course, in 1942 the Board appointed P. E. Schellenberg as president to expand and strengthen the four-year Liberal Arts course. In 1945 the academy was discontinued. In 1947 a program was set up to meet state requirements for the Secondary Teachers' Certificate. Schellenberg served until 1951, when J. N. C. Hiebert was called to the presidency. Hiebert was inaugurated Feb. 3, 1952, but health conditions forced him to resign in the fall of 1953. Leonard J. Franz then served as acting president until Frank C. Peters was named president-elect in 1954.

At the General Conference of 1954 the conference educational program was reorganized. Under a unified board the U.S. Area Conference was made responsible to operate Tabor College, Pacific Bible Institute (q.v.) and the Mennonite Brethren Biblical Seminary (q.v.). The seminary was moved from Tabor College to Fresno, Cal. The Board then initiated a Budgeted Giving Plan which provided the economic basis for an expansion of the conference educational program. Full accreditation of Tabor College became a major objective. In working toward that goal a long-range building program was inaugurated.

When Frank C. Peters resigned in 1955, Leonard

J. Franz was appointed president. Under his leadership the first project, a modern library, was completed in 1957. A completely new science department was developed on the first floor of the administration building in 1957. Dormitory facilities were improved, and on May 25, 1958, ground-breaking ceremonies initiated the building of a new student center and gymnasium, a fitting climax for the fiftieth anniversary.

Since its beginning in 1908 over 4,000 students have attended Tabor College. The maximum enrollment was 422 in 1946-47. The 1958 enrollment was 290. The teaching staff has been increased to 30 members.

Tabor College is a member of the Kansas Foundation for Private Colleges, the Council for the Advancement of Small Colleges, and the Council of Mennonite and Affiliated Colleges. The official publication of the college is the Tabor College Bulletin.

Student activities are governed by a student governing body, the Tabor College Associated Students. The religious organizations of the campus are unified in the Christian Fellowship Association, which is the result of a union of the Gospel Team, the Mission Band, the Peace Group, the YMCA, and the YWCA. The Blue Jay is the college annual, and the Tabor College View is the student paper.

The Annual Bible Conference, running for eight days during the second semester, brings to the community outstanding Bible expositors. The Spiritual Life Emphasis Week, designed primarily for the college family, offers spiritual inspiration during the first semester. Mission and peace conferences are conducted periodically. Chapel services four times a week bring worship into the center of the curriculum. The College Chapel Hour is a weekly radio program, reflecting the testimony of a Christian college. It was started in 1953 and has been carried by 14 stations including HCJB, world-wide missionary station in Quito, Ecuador.

The controlling idealism of the school is well stated in its catalog: "Underlying the philosophy of a Christian Liberal Arts College is the concept that God is the controlling power in the Universe; that Christ is the Divine Mediator and Saviour of man, the fullest revelation of God and the directive in producing a wholesome standard of human conduct. The founders of Tabor College believed that the world and man can best be explained in terms of a Biblical orientation, and they believed that when this concept becomes the integrating force in a college, life becomes meaningful for the student, the faculty, the church, and society." W.J.P.

Tabor College Herold, a 16-page 6 x 9 in. monthly paper published from January 1912 to 1931, with D. E. Harder as editor, to provide a link between the school and its constituency. It contained news as well as theological, literary, and educational articles. During 1930 a student paper was started under the title As You Like It. In 1937 it was changed to the Tabor Spectator, and since 1940 it has been called the Tabor College View. The Tabor College Bulletin is the publication interpreting the college to the constituency. W.J.P.

Tabor College of Theology. When Tabor College was founded in 1908 by the Tabor College Corporation in Hillsboro, Kan., the study of the Bible was regarded as the core of educational activity. Although the great demand for a liberal arts program resulted in a divisional curriculum, the Bible Department from the first provided unity, direction, and purpose for the entire college program. In addition to offering courses required for academy and college graduation, the Bible Department also offered special courses for students who chose to concentrate on Bible study.

In the early years a Five-Year Bible Course was offered academy and preparatory students. Many of the courses were taught in the German language. This practical course was reduced to a Four-Year Bible Course in 1916. Meanwhile as the college division expanded, a Three-Year Theological Course was added.

During the early years of instruction outstanding teachers like H. W. Lohrenz, P. C. Hiebert, P. P. Rempel, D. E. Harder, and H. F. Toews gave guidance and instruction in the Bible to many students who have become pastors, teachers, and missionaries in the conference program. In more recent years P. R. Lange, Abraham H. Unruh, D. Edmond Hiebert, C. F. Plett, Waldo Hiebert, and Lando Hiebert have helped develop the Bible Department.

The first degree course, the Collegiate Bible Course which led to the degree of Bachelor of Theology (Th.B.), was introduced in 1924. During the year 1934-35 the college was closed for reorganization. Shortly after the college was reopened as a conference school of the Mennonite Brethren Church, the Bible Department again expanded. In 1938 the Bachelor of Religious Education (B.R.E.) degree was added. In 1942 the Graduate of Theology (Th.G.) degree was introduced. In 1944 the College of Theology was finally organized as a separate organization. During the same year the Bachelor of Divinity (B.D.) degree was added. This program continued until the conference voted to move the seminary to Fresno, Cal., in 1955. Since then Tabor College has had only a typical college Bible department.

W.J.P.

Tabor College View, official biweekly publication of the Associated Students of Tabor College, Hillsboro, Kan., 4 pages, 15 x 11 in., published in cooperation with journalism classes since Sept. 1, 1940, press work by the Mennonite Brethren Publishing House. It is distributed to students, faculty, parents who subscribe, and since 1953 to M.B., K.M.B., and E.M.B. men in I-W service. The circulation is 500. Editors are chosen annually by Student Council.

L.J.M.

Tabor Mennonite Brethren Church, now extinct, located in Hamilton County, Kan., was established in 1907. It was disbanded a few years later because of the drought.

C.K.

Tabor Mennonite Church (GCM), located 3 miles south and 1½ miles east of Goessel, Marion Co., Kan., a member of the Western District Conference, is a sister church to Alexanderwohl. The church building was dedicated on Oct. 25, 1908. The church was organized on Jan. 21, 1909, with 115 charter members. H. R. Voth and C. Frey were the pioneer leaders. In the fall of 1909 P. H. Richert was called as pastor and elder, serving until 1946. H. B. Schmidt was pastor 1944-57, followed by James H. Waltner 1958-. In 1938 the church building was enlarged. Several pastors and missionaries have gone out into mission fields. The church has three Christian Endeavor societies, three sewing societies, and a Mennonite men's organization. The membership in 1956 was 422.

D.S.T.

Taconis, a Mennonite family at Joure in Friesland, Netherlands, who had a noted nursery in the 19th century. Inne Taconis (b. 1815 at Joure, d. 1865 at Nieuwe Niedorp) was pastor of the Nieuwe and Oude Niedorp Mennonite congregation 1841-65. His wife was Aagtje Ris. Their son Klaas Ris Taconis (b. 1844 at Nieuwe Niedorp, d. 1878 at Joure) was pastor of the Noordeind van Graft congregation 1872-75. In 1875 he retired because of bad health. (DB 1865, 167; 1876, 129; 1879, 140.)

vdZ.

Tadema, a Dutch family name, originally of the province of Friesland, both Mennonite and non-Mennonite. A Mennonite branch is found in the 18th-19th centuries, members of which were public notaries, among whom was P. Tadema of Akkrum in the early 19th century, who was a deacon of the local congregation. Descendants of this family are Jelte Karel Tadema (Nijkerk in Friesland, 1842-Haarlem, 1899), who was a partner of the F. Bohn printing and publishing company at Haarlem, serving the Haarlem Mennonite congregation as a deacon 1871-99. Both his sons, Jan Cornelis Tadema (Haarlem, 1870-) and Johannes Leendert Tadema (Haarlem, 1874-1949), were partners of the Bohn publishing company. Both joined the Haarlem Mennonite Church and Johannes Leendert served as deacon 1904-49.

vdZ.

Tadzhik SSR: see Soviet Central Asia.

Taede Ruyterdszoon (Joncker Kath), of Hettingahuys, a Dutch Anabaptist martyr, was beheaded at Leeuwarden, the capital of Friesland, on Sept. 30, 1559, because of his Mennonite convictions. Particulars are lacking.

vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 746; J. Reitsma, Honderd jaren uit de Gesch. der Hervorming ... in Friesland (Leeuwarden, 1876) 64.

Taffin, Jean (1529/30-1602), a Calvinist theologian, who studied at Geneva under Calvin and Beza, French pastor at Metz, Antwerp, and Heidelberg (where he was superintendent of the Reformed church), from 1573 court chaplain of Prince William I of Orange (q.v.), and 1584-1602 pastor of the French (Walloon) Reformed church at Amsterdam, attacked the Mennonites in his Instruction contre les erreurs des Anabaptistes (Haarlem, 1589), which book also was translated into Dutch: Onderwysinghe teghens de dwalinghe der Wederdooperen (Haarlem, 1590), and into German: Kurtzer Unterricht wider die Irrthumb der Wiedertäufer (Amberg, 1597). The book contains four parts: I. Concerning the Incarnation of Christ; II. Concerning the baptism of the infants of Christians; III. Concerning the obligation, authority, and power of the magistracy; IV. Concerning the oath.

G.H., vDZ.

B. Glasius, Godgeleerd Nederland III ('s Hertogenbosch, 1856) 411-13; C. Boer, Hofpredikers van Prins Willem van Oranje (Assen, 1952); ML IV.

Taju, on the Indonesian island of Java, acquired a hospital in 1918, built by the Dutch Mennonite Mission Association (q.v.). Dr. Gramberg (q.v.) was for a number of years the director of this hospital. It was completely destroyed by a band of fanatical Mohammedans on March 8, 1942. For some time there was also a small Mennonite congregation at Taju, which belonged to the Margoredjo (q.v.) district church. (Jaarverslagen of the Dutch Mennonite Mission Association.) vDZ.

Tak (formerly Tack), a widely ramified Dutch Mennonite family, found from the 16th century at Zierikzee, from about 1600 also at Vlissingen, Brouwershaven, and particularly at Middelburg, all in the province of Zeeland. In the course of the 17th century its members moved to Rotterdam and Haarlem. Abraham Jansz Tack, b. 1562 at Zierikzee, moved to Vlissingen about 1590, where he married Maeyken Jan Denysdochter and probably operated a grocery. His grandson Jan Samuels Tack (Vlissingen, 1629-97), a buckwheat miller, was a preacher of the Vlissingen Mennonite congregation from 1673 until his death. His sons and grandsons were grocers. In the early 18th century the Tacks moved from Vlissingen to Middelburg, where they were grocers, grain merchants, and manufacturers of tobacco products and chocolate; one branch owned an ironworks at Middelburg from c1740. In the 19th century some Taks were lawyers and government officials. Hemerijk Tak and De Maret Tak are side branches from 1774 and 1805 respectively.

Many of the Taks until recent times served the church as deacons at Vlissingen, Zierikzee, Middelburg, Brouwershaven, Rotterdam, Leiden, Koog-Zaandijk, and Nijmegen. Samuel Adriaansz Tak (1737-1808), of Vlissingen, was trained for the ministry at the Amsterdam Lamist seminary and served from 1765 until his death as the (last) pastor of the Mennonite congregation at Zierikzee. Abraham Tack, who about 1675 was a preacher of the Huis-kopers (Danzig Old Flemish) congregation at Haarlem, probably was a member of the same family. vDZ.

Ned. Patriciaat XLIV (1958) 308-22; Bijblad Nederl. Leeuw, 1950, 78-80; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 2169, 2206; II, Nos. 2382 f., 2389 f., 2520; DB 1863, 135; 1868, 93; 1884, 50; 1885, 92, 95; 1907, 169.

Taler (Thaler, Taller), Hans, an Anabaptist martyr, was put to death at Stertzing in Tirol (formerly Austria, now Italy) in 1532 with Lambrecht Gruber (q.v.), Hans Beck (q.v.), Laurenz Schumacher (q.v.), Peter Plaver (q.v.), and Peter Hungerl (q.v.). They were tortured, but still persisted in their faith and were therefore sentenced to death. (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 105; Mart. Mir. D 33, E 440; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 103.)

Talma, a village in the Caucasus, where landless Mennonites from the regions of Halbstadt and Gnadenfeld in South Russia organized a Mennonite Brethren congregation in 1901 in the Terek region. It became an independent congregation. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 445, 478.)

Talma Mennonite Brethren Church: see Terek Mennonite Brethren Church.

Taming (Dah-ming) (China) Mennonite (GCM) Mission. Taming is the largest city (pop. 50,000) in the southern tip of Hopei Province, and the political, educational, and commercial center of that area, county seat of Taming County (pop. c520,000). Missionaries of three Protestant denominations, as well as one independent worker, were located in this city or its suburbs. Those of the General Conference Mennonite Church lived in the city and the south suburb. The Mennonite work had started farther south with center at Kaichow (q.v.). In 1920 the mission expanded to the north, occupying Taming as a second center. Two missionary residences and buildings for a primary and junior high school were erected in the south suburb compound of 8½ acres. In this city a large church seating 1,000 and a lower primary school were built. Chinese buildings were remodeled for a missionary residence, a dispensary, and 10 homes for Chinese workers. In a south suburb compound near the city a street chapel and a Young Women's Home Training and Bible School were built. The normal missionary staff was two families and two or three single women. Growing Chinese participation gave rise about 1928 to an indigenous movement known as the "Society to Prepare for Church Independence." It was responsible for starting three churches and several preaching places with local workers and funds. In 1939 the society was absorbed in an all-field church organization. All missionaries left or were interned during World War II and never returned because of Communist occupation, but the Chinese church has continued active. S.F.P.

Tamme(n)s, Jan, a Dutch Mennonite (Old Flemish), probably a preacher, in the town of Groningen (q.v.), who was excommunicated in 1688 because of his Collegiant sympathies and his view that baptism must be by immersion. He held somewhat advanced ideas and could not believe that the Groningen Old Flemish branch was the only true Christian church. He defended Christoffel Wensing (q.v.) when Wensing joined the Collegiants. His followers were called the Jan-Tammesvolk (q.v.). (DB 1883, 75, 78, 81, 85.) vDZ.

Tampa (Kan.) Mennonite Brethren Church was organized in 1915 with 60 members who had come from Russia. The first leader was Konrad Lepp. In 1958 H. H. Hiebert was pastor, with 30 members. M.A.K.

Tampa Mennonite (MC) Mission, 1407 Ida Street, Tampa, Fla., operated by the Lancaster Conference, is the outgrowth of the missionary efforts of C. B. Byer and wife, who came to the city in 1927. For a time services were held in a tent on 15th Street; and in 1929 the present church was built. Work among the Spanish-speaking people (mostly Cubans) was carried on in rented buildings until 1946, when property was bought at 1613 9th Avenue, to serve as a meeting place and as kindergarten and first and second grades of school. The Ida Street mission and work among Latins (the Ybor City Mission) were considered one congregation until 1949. The membership in 1949 was 34. In 1952 the College Hill Mission at 3506 Machado Ave. was begun among the colored people. The membership in the three missions in 1958 was: Ida Street 20, with Martin Lehman as pastor; Ybor City 20, with Isaac Frederick; and College Hill 7, with Alvin Weaver. Ybor City conducts a Christian day school, called Sharon, with John Wenger as principal.

T.H.B.

Tanneken, the name of many Anabaptist martyrs, particularly in Flanders. It is the same name as Anneken (Anna), the "T" before Anneken being an abbreviation of the article "het" (the). vdZ.

Tanneken, an Anabaptist martyr, who by special permission of the council of Flanders, was secretly beheaded in the court of the Gravensteen castle at Gent, Belgium, at three in the afternoon on June 27, 1560, after she had given birth to a child. Miertgen (q.v.) was executed at the same time. Their corpses were immediately buried in a pit. Tanneken was born at Kortrijk in Flanders and was the wife of Hans de Smet (q.v.), who had died as a martyr on Aug. 7, 1559. Her official name was Anneken Gressy; she was commonly called Tanneken Godt-betert. Tanneken and Miertgen, who were in prison for more than a year, are said to have spoken to the people who passed beneath their windows and to have thrown letters to the street, thus proclaiming their faith. Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror gives only a brief account on these martyrs, erroneously giving the date of execution as 1559. Particulars have been published by A. L. E. Verheyden. Tanneken is one of the martyrs of Gent celebrated in the song "Ic moet een liet beginnen," No. 14 of the Lietboekken. (Offer, 348, 556 ff.; Mart. Mir. D 246, E 620; Verheyden, Gent, 26, No. 73.) vdZ.

Tanneken van Aken, an Anabaptist martyr, is identical with Tanneken van Cluyten (q.v.).

Tanneken van den Broucke: see Tanneken van Mechelen.

Tanneken (Tryken) van Cluyten, an Anabaptist martyr, was executed by drowning at Antwerp, Belgium, on Dec. 31, 1558. She was born at 's Hertogenbosch, Dutch province of North Brabant. Further particulars are lacking. With many other martyrs executed at Antwerp in 1562 and after, she is celebrated in the hymn "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), No. 16 of the Lietboekken. vdZ.

Offer, 566, No. 40; Mart. Mir. D 202, E 583; Antw. Arch.-Bl. VIII, 456, 466; XIV, 24 f., No. 277; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 72.

Tanneken Delmeere (Tanneken Jans), an Anabaptist martyr, of Oudenaarde in Flanders, the wife of Jacques Massois, was secretly executed by beheading, together with Lynken Claes (q.v.), within the Gravensteen castle at Gent, Belgium, on Aug. 14, 1561. She confessed that she had left the Catholic Church in 1550, and since then had regularly participated in Mennonite meetings. In 1560 she was baptized at Gent by Joos (Joachim Vermeeren, q.v.). Both Tanneken and Lynken refused to recant in spite of the unceasing and able endeavors of the inquisitor Titelman (q.v.). After several months in prison, weary of all the trials, they sent the warden to the magistrate with the message that all further attempts to "convert" them would be futile. Thereupon the death sentence was pronounced and immediately executed upon these two brave martyrs. (Verheyden, Gent, 27, No. 79; idem, "Mennisme in Vlaanderen," ms.) vdZ.

Tanneken Janssen, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on Feb. 17, 1573, with four other victims. She was sentenced to death because she was rebaptized and had attended forbidden meetings. Further particulars are lacking. (Antw. Arch.-Bl. XIII, 105, 106, 173; XIV, 90 f., No. 1011.) vdZ.

Tanneken Leonets, an Anabaptist martyr: see Anneken van Brussel.

Tanneken van der Leyen (Verleyen), an Anabaptist martyr, was executed at Antwerp, Belgium, on Oct. 5, 1555, by being bound into a sack and drowned in the Scheldt River. The accounts on this martyr in the Offer des Heeren and the following martyr books including van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror are very concise, mentioning only that Tanneken was a "jonge dochter," i.e., an unmarried woman, of Gent, and that she died steadfast; the exact date of the execution is not given. Génard published a few facts: while still living at Gent Tanneken had joined the Mennonites, but when she was arrested there she recanted. Upon her release she moved to Antwerp and joined the Mennonite congregation there. After her second arrest she was repeatedly tried, first on Jan. 27, 1555. Thus she must have been in prison a relatively long time. She left some property, which was confiscated. Génard also states that before she was executed she had to take off her outer clothing and put on a pair of linen pants. Tanneken is named in the hymn "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader," No. 16 of the Lietboekken. (She is erroneously called Janneken van der Leyen in ML II, 648.) vdZ.

Offer, 564, No. 5; Mart. Mir. D 161, E 550; Antw. Arch.-Bl. VIII, 426-28, 430, 468; XIV, 20 f., No. 226; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 72.

Tanneken van Mechelen (van den Broucke), the wife of the martyr Hans van der Straeten (q.v.), was arrested with her husband at Antwerp, Belgium, in 1571, when she was only 17 years of age, and recanted. As a punishment she was confined in a Catholic convent at Breda, Netherlands, but escaped to Danzig (q.v.). Here she made contact with the Mennonite congregation and after repentance was accepted into the church. (Mart. Mir. D 540, E 875.) vdZ.

Tanneken van der Meulen, an Anabaptist martyr, was executed at the Vrijdagmarkt in Gent, Belgium, on Dec. 22, 1569, by burning at the stake after being strangled. Particulars are lacking. Jaecxken van Hussele and Jaecxken Teerlings died with her as martyrs. She is commemorated in the hymn "Alsmen schreef duyst vijfhondert jaer ende twee en tsestich mede," found in the Lietboecxken.

vdZ.

Offer, 653, No. 40; Mart. Mir. D 407, E 759; Verheyden, Gent, 55, No. 184; ML III.

Tanneken van Roosbroecke, an Anabaptist martyr: see Anneken van Roosbroecke.

Tanneken Vermeeren, an Anabaptist of Antwerp, Belgium, who was in prison there in 1565 because of her convictions. She may have been the same person as Tanneken Wagemans, a Mennonite who escaped from prison at Antwerp during the night of March 13, 1567, with some 60 other prisoners among whom there were eight Mennonites, thereupon moving either to Emden or Cologne. But it is also possible that Tanneken Vermeeren is not identical with Tanneken Wagemans, and that she was executed or died in prison. (Vos, Antwerpen, 339 f.)

vdZ.

Tanneken Walraven, an Anabaptist martyr who was burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on the evening of Pentecost, May 22, 1575. Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror adds that she was executed with her mouth screwed up to prevent speaking to the crowd. She was the wife of Jan Verschelt and the mother of Preacher Jaques Walraven (q.v.) of Amsterdam. (See also Janneken Walraven.)

vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 693, E 1007; Antw. Arch.-Bl. XIII, 193, 201; XIV, 96 f., No. 1085.

Tanowitz (Slavic, Dunajovice), a Bruderhof of the Hutterian Brethren, founded in 1591 after they were expelled from Pergen and Voitelbrunn by Siegmund von Dietrichstein (q.v.). On Aug. 10, 1619, the Bruderhof was burned down by soldiers. (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 206, 374; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 87, 693 ff., 710.)

Tapper(t), Ruardus (Rieuwert) (1485-1559), a Roman Catholic priest and professor at the University of Louvain, inquisitor in the Netherlands and from 1537 papal head inquisitor. He was active against all kind of "heresy" and also had a hand in many lawsuits against Mennonites. Tapper was narrow-minded, dogmatic, and cunning, and was greatly hated and feared by the people. By his sly methods and his ruthlessness he did great harm to the Reformation cause though he did not succeed in extirpating the Protestant and Anabaptist-Mennonite movements.

vdZ.

N.N.B.Wb. V, 877-79; L. E. Halkin, La Réforme en Belgique (Brussels, n.d.-1957) 58, 64; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 380, 394a, 394b.

Targier: see Tersier.

Tasch (Tesch), Peter, an Anabaptist (Melchiorite) leader, preacher, and author in Hesse, Germany. His work as a missionary extended as far as England (see his letter to Georg Schnabel, q.v.). His tracts, Von der Taufordnung Christi, Vom Eid, and Von der Menschwerdung, were apparently very influential. In 1536 he was apprehended with a number of other Anabaptists, among whom was Leonhard Fälber. Bucer (q.v.) persuaded him in the Marburg colloquy (Oct. 30—Nov. 1, 1538) to join the Reformed Church, and he was frequently used to lead his former associates and brethren to conversion. He is the author of the booklet, Bekentnis oder Antwort etlicher Fragstücke oder Artickeln der gefangenen Täufer und Anderer im Land zu Hessen (Dec. 9, 1538), which was signed by Fälber and eight other Anabaptists, and which was a modified confession of their faith, yielding a number of doctrinal points. (See Fälber for particulars.) His later life was by no means above reproach. (See Bucer and England.)

Rembert, Wiedertäufer, 269, 453, 457; Paul Wappler, Die Stellung Kursachsens und des Landgrafen Philipp von Hessen zur Täuferbewegung (Münster, 1910) 253; E. Belfort Bax, Rise and Fall of the Anabaptists (London, 1903) 336; ML IV.

Taschringmaker, an Anabaptist martyr: see Jasper.

Tashkent, capital of Uzbek USSR, Soviet Russia, former capital of Turkestan (q.v.). This city played a significant role in the history of the Mennonites who migrated to Central Asia (q.v.) in 1880 ff. under the leadership of Klaas Epp (q.v.) and Abraham Peters (q.v.) to find a refuge and establish new settlements. One group resided here temporarily.

Under the Soviet government Tashkent has become a very significant center in Central Asia with a population of about one million. Mennonites who have drifted to this area have thus far not organized a church; some attend the Baptist services. Their number is likely not as large in this area as in Alma Ata, Karaganda, and some other places. (See Soviet Central Asia.)

C.K.

Taubenkobel der Hutterischen Wiedertäufer is the title of a violent and scurrilous polemic against the Hutterian Brethren written by Christoph Andreas Fischer (q.v.). A copy is in GCL.

Tauber, Caspar, a wealthy and respected citizen of Vienna, the first Lutheran martyr of Austria, whose valiant confession of his faith was praised by the Anabaptists although he was not one of them. Tauber was summoned to the court with two other persons on a charge of spreading heresy and reading Lutheran books. Although he defended himself brilliantly in a public debate Ferdinand had him arrested. The heresy court as well as the clergy tried to lead him to recantation. A supposed recantation by Tauber was actually published, but it was repudiated by his coreligionists. He apparently did consent to withdraw certain "errors." The charges against him were that he denied the real presence of Christ in the communion, rejected all the blessings and ceremonies of the (Catholic) Church, denied the existence of purgatory, repudiated the confessional, denied the intercession of the saints, and believed in the priesthood of all believers. These beliefs he is said to have recanted in a document he signed on Aug. 27, 1524. When however he was brought before the officials to make a public recantation he refused to do so and was consequently executed Sept. 12, 1524. The Geschichts-Bücher report his martyrdom as follows: "In the year 1525 (correct to 1524) Kaspar Tauber of Vienna was burned for the sake of the Gospel. He was led out before daybreak, first decapitated, and then burned. A report claimed that he had given the executioner money to pierce him thrice as though he had pierced himself (suicide). He confessed the faith joyfully, regardless of wife, property, and money."

Luther reckoned Tauber among the first martyrs of the Gospel but Ottius rated him as one of the "factious people," while Cochläus rated him several degrees lower. The Anabaptists placed him in their martyrologies. A hymn on Tauber's martyrdom was published in 1525 under the title Ain christenlich Lied des bewainlichen todes Caspar Taubers genannt, Bürgers zu Wien . . . Gedicht im Jahr 1525, reprinted in Wackernagel, Kirchenlied III, 436-38, with the beginning line, "Nun hört, ich will euch singen aus trauriklichem Müt." Wolkan (Lieder, 285) mistakenly lists it as one of the hymns of the German Anabaptists. It does not appear in the Ausbund or the Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder. Tauber appears in the Chronik but before the beginning of the Anabaptist history. The Catholics labeled him as an Anabaptist to discredit him,

LOSERTH, H.S.B.

A. Nicoladoni, ADB, vol. 37, 423-29; Georg Loesche, Geschichte des Protestantismus in Oesterreich (third ed., Vienna and Leipzig, 1930) 64; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 43; Mart. Mir. D 2, E 414; ML IV.

Tauchnitz, Carl Christian Philipp (1798-1884), a prominent German book dealer, and a warm friend of the German Mennonites. In the winter of 1830 a Baptist preacher in London told him about the German Mennonites, and when he returned to Germany he visited Weierhof, Monsheim, Kindenheim, Spitalhof, and Sembach. In 1831 he became acquainted with several congregations in Baden, where "the Easter days passed very pleasantly and blessedly." On April 17 of that year he preached in Spitalhof on the occasion of the baptism of J. Rothen (q.v.). He also preached at the Weierhof and in Oberflorsheim. He frequently took part in the conferences of the Mennonites in the Palatinate and Hesse. He promoted the publication of the first Palatine hymnal (1832) by friendly persuasion of the opponents of the book. He corresponded with most of the Palatine preachers and by word and deed aided in the revival of the brotherhood. He also published several Mennonite works, among them three books by Johannes Molenaar (Catechismus 1841 and 1854, Andenken 1844, and Evangelische Stimmen 1844, a collection of sermons), one by Herman Reeder (Predigten 1843), and one by B. K. Roosen (Menno Symons 1848). He was especially interested in the founding of a Mennonite theological school, but in vain. He rendered a lasting service to the Mennonites as well as to other free churches. (Menn. Bl., 1884, 38, 43; Gem.-Kal., 1899, 43; ML IV.)

NEFF.

Täuferakten and Täuferakten-Kommission: see Quellen.

Täufergut, the property taken from Swiss Anabaptists by the government at Bern (q.v.): see Confiscation of Property.

Täuferjäger (Anabaptist-Hunters), a permanent police agency especially created to catch the Mennonites, one of the most infamous institutions of the Bernese state government in the first half of the 18th century. A blind zeal for the preservation of religious uniformity had taken possession of the aristocratic government, and it became the duty of the Täuferkammer (q.v.) to create its own agency to apprehend the Mennonites, the "Anabaptist-Hunters." It was largely composed of rough brutal men, irresponsible persons who hunted down the Mennonites with ruthless violence and injustice in the service of the government.

For the discovery of a concealed Mennonite the Bernese council offered a reward of 30 crowns on Dec. 28, 1709 (a crown is about equal to a dollar). The "Hunters" were ordered to look especially for Mennonite preachers and keep their eyes open for those who offered their houses and barns for meetings. It was reported that the Mennonites were living in the most remote of the Alpine huts. Everywhere they were to be hunted like game. In the Mennonite homes these men caused tremendous damage, especially if they thought they were on the trail of a preacher.

Among the common people the "Hunters" found little sympathy. Wherever possible people hindered them and protected the Mennonites. Bonfires were lit and bells were rung to warn of the approach of the hated "hunters." Some citizens had to pay heavy fines for helping the victims escape. In the middle of the 18th century this institution was discontinued.

NEFF, S.G.

Samuel Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931); ML IV.

Täuferkammer and Täuferkommission: see Commission for Anabaptist Affairs.

Täufer-Memorial: see Anabaptist Memorial.

Täufer-Testamente (Anabaptist Testaments) were 17th and 18th century reprints of the Froschauer (q.v.) New Testament, which were widely used by the Swiss Brethren, so named by the Bernese authorities in their anti-Anabaptist decrees because they were printed for and used solely by the Swiss Anabaptists in preference to the authorized Luther version. The appearance of the "Anabaptist Testaments" evoked consternation among the clergy of Bern, Switzerland, and they tried to eliminate these "falsified and dangerous translations." The government issued a mandate against the Mennonites on May 21, 1693, in which one of the orders was that "the proscribed Basel Testaments and other suspicious books of this sect" be confiscated. The Reformed clergy were to explain to the Mennonites the errors in the translation, take the Testaments from their owners, and substitute "the Basel Testament of Luther's version." Exactly what editions of the Froschauer Testament were referred to as Täufer-Testamente is not clear. As the article Froschauer Bibles and Testaments shows, editions are known of 1588, 1647, 1687, 1702, 1729, 1737, 1790, and 1825. The Pennsylvania Mennonites had an edition reprinted at Ephrata, Pa., in 1877.

S.G., H.S.B.

Täuferurbar, an official Bernese register of Anabaptist property confiscated in the canton, established by a mandate of Feb. 23, 1729, now in the Bernese Staatsarchiv. This register affords insight into the methods by which countless Anabaptist families were practically ruined by the violent measures of the government. One purpose of the register was to give the authorities information as to the spread and development of Anabaptism at this time in order to have help in suppressing it. Another purpose was to give an accounting of what was done with the confiscated property. (Müller, Berner Täufer; ML IV.)

S.G.

Taußers, a castle in the Puster (q.v.) Valley, Tirol, Austria (now Italian), where Aendle Sackmann of Ritten, an Anabaptist woman, and Hans Kräl (q.v.) were put to death for their faith. Elise von Wolkenstein was long imprisoned here. (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 280; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 369 ff.; ML IV.)

HEGE.

Taufgesinnt, the German counterpart of the Dutch 'Doopsgezind' (q.v.), was introduced into North Germany under Dutch influence as early as the mid 17th century as an alternate for the name Mennonite. But in Germany, contrary to the development in Holland, it never displaced "Mennonite" and never became part of an official name. In Switzerland, however, it was used by 1810 in a petition by the Langnau Mennonite congregation to the Bernese government, and it ultimately became a part of the official name of the Swiss Mennonite conference (see Altevangeltische Wehrlose Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden). The name Taufgesinnt appeared in the titles of a considerable number of German books and booklets in the 18th and 19th centuries, but soon disappeared, and is now completely out of use. The first-known printed use of the name was in the 1660 West Prussian Confession, where the expression "Die vereinigte Flämische, Friesische und Hochdeutsche Tauffs-gesinnete oder Mennoniten in Preussen" is used. The first German edition of the Dordrecht Confession (1664), however, used only the name "Mennoniten," as did the 1678 Prussian confession. The standard general Mennonite history by Anna Brons carried the title Ursprung, Entwicklung und Schicksale der Taufgesinnten oder Mennoniten in all three editions (1884, 1891, and 1912). The official periodicals did not use Taufgesinnt on their mastheads.

H.S.B.

Taufreden, Hutterite baptismal instructions, since c1560-70 standardized and strictly regulated. Baptism for the brethren has always been a most solemn event, preparing the candidate for his life's pledge to the "narrow path," and thus the instructions preceding this event have always been given much attention (see Catechetical Instruction). The procedure of instruction, baptismal examination, and the ritual itself has been preserved to the last detail almost unchanged. The standardized text of these instructions

(see Sermons, Hutterite) is also known from old codices and recent copies.

Ever since the "Golden Age" of the Hutterites (1560-90) books had been written containing the baptismal agenda and the instructional sermons or Taufreden, which afford a good insight into the doctrine and Bible exegesis of the Brethren. Very few of the baptismal candidates were newly won converts; most of them had grown up on the Bruderhofs, and were between 20 and 23 years of age, mature enough to weigh the obligation involved in their baptism.

The oldest known codex containing the famous Taufreden is of 1599 (in Bratislava, q.v.); since its title page is missing, Beck called it Codex Ritualis. Two more or less identical codices containing these Taufreden, written in 1643 and 1652, are in the library of Esztergom (q.v.), Hungary; an 18th-century copy was formerly found in the library of the Moravian Brethren, Herrnhut, Saxony. The text of the Taufreden probably goes back to the time of Peter Walpot (q.v.), c1570.

Up to recent times it was the custom among the Brethren to assemble the candidates on Friday and Saturday preceding the Sunday of the baptismal ritual, usually two hours before the regular evening prayer meeting for preparatory instruction. On Friday the First Taufrede (described below) was read, which treated Genesis 1-19. Then followed a lengthy prayer by the group, and a sermon (called Lehr) dealing with inner rebirth (John 3:3). On Saturday the Second Taufrede was read, followed by a penitential sermon and lengthy prayer, after which came the second Lehr, this time on Romans 6. On Sunday morning came the Third Taufrede, treating the church and its principles. After a prayer the meeting was concluded by the third Lehr on Matt. 28:16-20 (baptism). This ended the worship hour. Then the candidates were examined before the congregation, answering the standardized questions with a simple yes, after which they were baptized. The Hutterites of today follow the same procedure, with the exception that the instruction is now spread over a week.

The text of the Taufreden is of very high order. The first Taufrede is an exposition of the first book of the Bible, especially the first 19 chapters: Creation, fall, and man's very beginnings. The second Rede shows the difference between the Christian way of living and the secular way. The theological elements of this sermon are to a large extent borrowed from Riedemann's Rechenschaft (q.v.), e.g., such topics as What Sin Is, Concerning Original Sin, and God Punishes Those Who Are Disobedient to His Word. Christians, we read, are not baptized to become poor sinners but to enter a new life (Rom. 6). The third Rede makes it clear that Christ is and ever will be our Mediator, Redeemer, and Reconciliation. "True faith is nothing but an attachment of the heart to God and Christ. He who believes from the heart is assured and sealed by the Holy Spirit [here Ezekiel 36 is quoted as a reference!]. He receives strength from above to do the good which he could not do before, and to hate the evil he could not hate before." The candidate is to become aware of what is expected of him, namely, regret for his former sins, penitence, and readiness for a new, committed life, in which the old Adamic man has died away. All this leads to separation from the world, to Christian resignation (Gelassenheit, q.v.), and to full communion of goods.

The text of these three Taufreden, together with the traditional agenda of the ritual, will be published in Vol. II of Glaubenszeugnisse as item No. 21. It is a very good illustration of the Hutterite sermon technique and gives an insight into the Anabaptist frame of mind as it reveals itself internally, that is, unobserved by the outside world. R.F.

Lydia Müller and Robert Friedmann, Glaubenszeugnisse II (Gütersloh, 1960); W. Wiswedel, "Die alten Täufergemeinden und ihr missionarisches Wirken. III. (a), Die Ausrüstung der Sendboten," Archiv für Reformationsgeschichte XLI (1948) 116-18.

Tauler, Johann (c1330-61), a noted mystic of the Middle Ages, the son of a well-to-do citizen of Strasbourg, entered the Dominican Order at an early age, probably led to do so by Eckhart. He studied in Cologne under Nikolaus of Basel and Eckhart. For a short time he lived in Strasbourg, preaching and teaching with success. Then he returned to his native town and preached there until his death.

The story told in the Meisterbuch of the "Friend of God from the highlands" (Rulman Merswin) does not deal with Tauler, as had been supposed (by Preger and Ludwig Keller, q.v.). The books Buch von der geistlichen Armut and Betrachtungen des Leidens und Sterbens Jesu were not written by him. The hymns formerly attributed to him have also been proved to be spurious. But his sermons, published in various editions, are considered genuinely his. They were much read in certain Mennonite circles, especially in South Germany. The best loved was the "Nachfolge des armen Lebens Jesu," which was, however, falsely attributed to him. NEFF.

H. von Redern, Der Gottesfreund Johann Tauler (1923, a popular biography); RGG V; J. M. Clark, The Great German Mystics: Eckhart, Tauler, and Suso (Oxford, 1949); ML IV.

Taurida, a Russian province of the Ukraine bordering to the south on the Black Sea and the Sea of Azov, in the west on the Province of Kherson, and in the northeast on Ekaterinoslav. Originally the Crimea was a part of the province. In 1897 the province had a population of 1,447,790 and an area c22,000 square miles. The land consists primarily of rolling steppes. The capital was Simferopol.

Taurida became the second province chosen by the Mennonites for settlement. In 1804 ff. the Molotschna (q.v.) settlement was established in the eastern part of the province, which ultimately became the largest Mennonite settlement in Russia, consisting of 56 villages. In 1862 Mennonite settlements in Crimea (q.v.) were started (more than 25 villages). Fürstenland (q.v.), a daughter colony of the Chortitza settlement, consisting of 6 villages, originated in 1864. Before World War I the total Mennonite population numbered 36,000, distributed over some 90 villages in these settlements and many estates and consisted of 9,234,000 acres. The province of Taurida had a larger Mennonite population than any other province.

During World War II when the German army approached, the Soviet government succeeded in removing most of the population eastward. For this reason fewer Mennonites have come to America from this province since World War II than from Ekaterinoslav, where the Soviets were unable to evacuate the Mennonites west of the Dnepr River when the German army approached. (See also Molotschna, Ukraine, Russia.) C.K.

Die Mennoniten-Gemeinden in Russland (Heilbronn, 1921); Jakob Quiring, Die Mundart von Chortitza in Süd-Russland (Munich, 1928); Friesen, Brüderschaft.

Tavistock (Ont.) Amish Mennonite Church, a branch of the East Zorra A.M. congregation, a member of the Ontario A.M. Conference, was started in 1942, seven years after the first branching out of the East Zorra congregation into the Cassel Church, when the East Zorra meetinghouse became crowded. Since many members were living in Tavistock and vicinity, it was decided that a branch of the church be established there. After several worship services had been held in a public library hall, the board of the local Presbyterian church, owing to a dwindling membership, invited them to use its church. This arrangement was very satisfactory until 1949, when the Presbyterians sold the building. The A.M. group then constructed a new building and dedicated it in July 1951. Until June 1954 Bishop Henry Yantzi was assisted by three ministers, Daniel Wagler, Joel Schwartzentruber, and David Schwartzentruber. Since that time David Schwartzentruber has been the minister in charge. Summer Bible school, young people's meetings, tract packing, and other activities are held in conjunction with the East Zorra and Cassel congregations. The combined membership of the Tavistock, East Zorra, and Cassel congregations was 887 in 1958; the membership at Tavistock alone was approximately 200. R.BE.

Taxation. Special levies or fines were imposed in the 16th century as a milder form of persecution alongside the harsher forms of confiscation of property, exile, imprisonment, and execution, and were continued on down into the 18th century after the harsher forms were abolished. In Zürich in 1525 parents who would not have their children baptized were fined up to five pounds, while in 1526 those who baptized others were given fines of 10-15 pounds. In some cases the Anabaptists had to pay the trial costs. Later those who aided Anabaptists were given fines, while the Anabaptists themselves were fined more heavily. In the mandate of the diet of Augsburg of 1577 lenient judges were threatened with money fines. In most of the mandates of the time similar threats were made against all who would favor the Anabaptists. In the Palatinate those who failed to report Anabaptists were threatened with fines, while in Hesse recanting Anabaptists who returned to their faith were required to pay into the treasury for the poor; Anabaptists leaving their homeland had to pay an emigration fee of 10 gulden.

In the 17th and 18th centuries in the Palatinate all Mennonites were subject to special taxation. A head tax was collected for attendance at their services, which had previously been forbidden. Another special tax was imposed as compensation for exemption from military service. Soon a general tax was imposed. Hutterites living in Mannheim in the mid-17th century were freed from guard duty on payment of two to three gulden per family. Although the Concession of 1664 granted by the Electoral Palatine government mentioned the right of exemption from militia duty, in the course of time a special annual tax was imposed toward the cost of maintaining the militia, at first three gulden per family, later six, and finally twelve gulden. The Mennonites protested this tax, at times on the grounds of poverty, at other times on grounds of conscience since they did not want to contribute toward war in any respect. Frequently special fees were levied for registration of deaths, births, and marriages. The Mennonite settlement of Ibersheim was a special case, since here the settlement paid an annual special tax of 50 gulden in place of head taxes.

The collection of the Mennonite head taxes in the Electoral Palatinate, Baden-Durlach, and other territories often led to quarrels between the local and general authorities; usually the general authorities won out, while the Mennonites paid the bill. With every change of rulers the Mennonites had to petition for a renewal of their privileges and usually had to pay extra "donation money in this connection." At times large sums of money were forced out of Mennonite pockets into the princely treasuries by simple pressure or extortion. In Alsace the Mennonites had a long and hard struggle to secure and maintain the privilege of exemption from military service, in the course of which heavy payments of money had to be made. Sometimes families preferred to emigrate to America rather than keep on paying the severe taxes. It was only toward the end of the 18th century, when the valuable contribution of Mennonite farmers to the improvement of agriculture was recognized, that the levies of special "protection money" finally lessened and later ceased. The French Revolution (1789) in general finally put an end to the special taxation of Mennonites in South Germany and Alsace.

In other parts of Germany as well special levies were imposed upon Anabaptists and Mennonites, in effect in return for limited toleration. In East Friesland (q.v.), for instance, the ruler Rudolf Christian in 1626 introduced the practice of requiring a certain payment per family annually in return for a Schutzbrief (letter of protection), thereby setting a pattern for his successors until East Friesland became Prussian in 1744. But even the Lutheran pastors in this area, particularly in Norden, joined in extorting money by demanding that the Mennonites pay taxes for the upkeep of Lutheran churches and by collecting fees for services, such as funerals, which they did not render. It was only in 1894 that the Mennonites were freed from making contributions to the state church. Similar fees had to be paid by Mennonites in Crefeld to the Reformed Church until they were released from them by the king of Prussia c1720, although in 1721 he required the payment of a fee for the privilege of exemption from military service. In other places also in Germany money payments were required in lieu of military service. In 1814 in West Prussia, when the Landsturm (militia) was established, Mennonites were required to pay a certain sum per acre to support the Landsturm. In Prussia Mennonites were everywhere required to pay the same church taxes (for the support of the state church of course) until into the 20th century. In West Prussia the long legal battle necessary to free the Mennonites from the state church taxes was not victoriously concluded until 1922.

War Taxes. Among the Anabaptists in Moravia the differences regarding payment of special war taxes to support the war against the Turks led to a serious division in 1527. In Nikolsburg Hubmaier led a group ("Schwertler," q.v.) who paid the tax and approved the use of the sword in self-defense against the Turks, while the opposing group ("Stäbler," q.v.) were negative on both points. In 1511 the "Pikards" in Austerlitz declared they could not pay the war taxes, which were against their conscience. The agreement of Nov. 26, 1556, between the Palatine and Hutterite Anabaptists in the region of Kreuznach stipulated the following regarding the payment of war taxes: "But what is blood money, and serves wars or other unrighteous things or undertakings of the government out of itself and not out of divine orders and thereby attacks the conscience, the God-fearing man is not obliged to pay them, because God demands of him that he love his enemy (Matt. 5; Rom. 12), and the God-fearing man has promised this to God, and he shall not make any weapon that serves only that end (Isa. 2; Mic. 4), that the God-fearing man may not be a partaker in their wickedness or blood guilt."

The Hutterites consistently refused to pay war taxes and special levies. Peter Riedemann's Rechen-schaft of 1545 says on this point: "For war, killing, and bloodshed (where it is demanded especially for that) we give nothing, but not out of wickedness or arbitrariness, but out of the fear of God (I Tim. 5) that we may not be partakers in strange sins."

In the United States some contemporary pacifists have refused to pay that portion of their federal income taxes which they calculate goes to support the military department and preparation for war, which is now about two thirds of the total; few if any Mennonites have taken this course. However, in the time of the Revolutionary War (1776-83) the Mennonites of the Franconia Conference (q.v.) in Pennsylvania divided over their attitude toward the Revolution, including the payment of special war taxes, the majority being opposed to the payment of such taxes. As a consequence Bishop Christian Funk (q.v.) and his small group of followers were expelled in 1777. H.S.B.

Taylor, Georg: see Hausrath, Adolf.

Taylor, Thomas, b. 1561/2 in western England, d. at Haarlem, Holland, in 1655. He is said to have been the youngest son of a nobleman. With some other men who did not agree with the doctrines of the English State church he fled to Holland, unable to take along anything but a Bible and a little money. In Haarlem he started a textile business. He married Prijntje (or Proontje) van de(n)

Kerchhove(n), a Mennonite refugee from Flanders, and joined the Flemish Mennonite church of Haarlem. Throughout his long life his business was prosperous and he died a wealthy man. He is the ancestor of the Dutch Teyler (q.v.) family. vvZ.

M. Teyler-van Geleyn, "Stamboek der Teyler's" (manuscript found in the City Library of Haarlem; Blaupot t. C., Holland I, 64; Eigen Haard, 1885, No. 10.

Tayus, Johannes (d. 1630), a Dutch Reformed pastor, who in 1601, when he was pastor at Brouwershaven in the province of Zeeland, wrote Proeve van de Leere der Wederdooperen . . . in elf punten. Daerby een corte weerlegghinge . . . (Leiden, 1601). The source of Tayus for his opposition to the Mennonites was the Protocol (q.v.) of the Leeuwarden Disputation of 1596. Tayus referred only to the arguments of the Reformed disputants, neglecting the Mennonite arguments. vvZ.

Tazewell County, Ill. The first Amish Mennonites in Tazewell County settled at Wesley City a few miles southeast of Peoria in 1831. This group met with the Black Partridge congregation in Woodford County until 1837, when Michael Moseman was ordained to lead the Wesley City congregation. This settlement developed into a strong congregation. In 1868 the congregation became a part of the "Egley" movement and is today the Groveland congregation of the Evangelical Mennonite Conference. About 1840 other Amish Mennonite immigrants who had settled along Dillon Creek near Tremont were organized into a congregation under Bishop Andrew Ropp. This congregation was known as Pleasant Grove and today is a part of the Morton congregation.

The first Mennonite church, as distinguished from the Amish, in Illinois was the Union Church organized near Washington. The first settlers came into the area in 1833 but apparently the church was not organized until the early 1840's. A Sunday school was organized in the Union Church around 1865, one of the first in the state. The Union Church no longer exists, most of the members having gone to the Metamora Church with which there had been conjoint services for many years.

In 1958 there were M.C. congregations at Hope Dale, Morton, Dillon, Highway Village, and Pleasant Hill; G.C.M. congregations at Hopedale, Pekin, and Washington; and E.M. congregations at Groveland and Morton (organized in 1958). There were approximately 1,700 Mennonites in Tazewell County. T.R.S.

Tchayachy (Chayachy) Mennonite Brethren Church served the villages of Nikolayevka, Alexeyevka, and Tatyankovka of the Slavgorod Mennonite settlement (q.v.), Siberia. The leading minister was Wilhelm Giesbrecht, assisted by Heinrich Wiens, Jacob Eck, and Johann Harder. Worship services were originally conducted in school buildings. In 1922 a church was erected which was used conjointly with the Mennonite church of this area. C.K.

Gerhard Fast, In den Steppen Sibiriens (Rosthern, 1957) 78.

Tchayachy (Chayachy) Mennonite Church was located in the Slavgorod Mennonite settlement (q.v.) in Siberia, and served the following villages: Nikolayevka, Alexeyevka, and Tatyankovka. The leading minister, Heinrich Peters, was assisted by Peter Nickel, Cornelius Fast, and a Görzen. Worship services were conducted together with the Mennonite Brethren of this community in a meetinghouse (erected in 1922) and in schools. (See also Slavгород Mennonite Church.) C.K.

Gerhard Fast, In den Steppen Sibiriens (Rosthern, 1957) 72.

Tchernoglas (Chernoglas), a Mennonite settlement and village, also known as Gerhardstal, located in Novopokrovskaya, province of Ekaterinoslav, Ukraine, Russia, was established by about 25 families or 130 persons in 1860 on a rented estate of 2700 acres. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 676.) C.K.

Tchongrav (Chongrav) Mennonite Brethren Bible School was established at Tchongrav (Chongrav), Crimea, in 1918 through the efforts of Johann Wiens (q.v.) and with the approval of the Mennonite Brethren Conference. He was joined by Abraham H. Unruh, Heinrich J. Braun, and Gerhard Reimer as teachers. In 1924 the government closed the school, which had at that time 50 students and was offering a three-year course. The Winkler, Man., Bible School was in a sense a continuation. C.K.

Abr. Unruh, Die mennonitische Bibelschule zu Tschongrav, Krim, in Russland (Winkler, 1928).

Tchunayev (Chunayev, Tchunaevka) Mennonite Brethren Church, also known as Margenau, was founded in 1899-1900, 15 miles west of Omsk, Siberia, Russia, on the west side of the Irtysh River. Approximately 2,700 acres of virgin steppe was purchased from a Kirghiz named Chunayev, by Heinrich and Gerhard Ewert of the Neu-Samara settlement, and Johann F. Matthies, Franz Balzer, and Julius Dick of the Molotschna settlement. These five families are regarded as the Mennonite pioneers of West Siberia.

H. Ewert became the first minister of the congregation and Kornelius Martens the first teacher of a school organized in 1900. During the next four years a number of families from Molotschna, Ignat'yevka, and Crimea, including Elder Jacob G. Wiens, joined the Tchunayev church. Under Wiens's leadership branch churches were organized along the Transsiberian Railroad extending approximately 225 miles. Assisting ministers in the early days were Heinrich Ewert, David Janzen, Cornelius Klassen, Johann Friesen, and Wilhelm Giesbrecht. Upon the resignation of Wiens in 1912, Jakob F. Hübert became the elder in June 1913. Headquarters of the congregation now were located in the village of Margenau, Akmolinsk district, 70 miles west of Omsk, where a church building had been erected in 1907. The membership reached 600. Branch congregations were located at Friesenov (q.v.) Mikhaylovka, Gorkoya, Kremleva, and several other places. Assisting ministers at this time were Jacob H. Wall, Gerhard P. Reimer, Gerhard J. Wiens, and J. J. Regier.

In 1929, because of Communist pressure, Elder Hübert emigrated to Brazil, where he became the founder and elder of the M.B. Church at Curitiba, Parana. In 1937 the last minister of the Tchunayev congregation was exiled by the Communists and the church was dissolved. Members of the church scattered to various parts of Europe, Canada, the United States, Paraguay, and Brazil.

Another M.B. church in this area, at least in later years, was the Smolyanovka Mennonite Brethren Church, of which Nikolai Siemens was the minister. In 1927 he reported on the life of the church, including a successful evangelistic campaign conducted among the neighboring Russian population in co-operation with the Russian Baptists (Unser Blatt, 1927, 42). Johann Heide, an M.B. minister of the Isil'-Kul area, who served as the minister of a Baptist church in the city of Isil'-Kul in the 1920's, reported in 1926 that the church had a membership of 118 and its own meetinghouse (Unser Blatt, 1926, 247). Additional reports about the activities of the Mennonite Brethren congregations in the Omsk region are found in Unser Blatt. In many instances the Mennonite Brethren worshiped jointly with the Mennonites. In 1930 all organized religious activities had to be discontinued since the ministers were exiled and the church building confiscated. (See also Friesenov and Gorkoya Mennonite Brethren Church.) For the latest developments in the religious life in the Omsk settlement, see Omsk Mennonite settlement and Omsk Mennonite Church. I.G.N., C.K.

Dirks, Statistik, 1905, 56; D. H. Epp, Adressbüchlein, 1913; Gerhard Fast, In den Steppen Sibiriens (Rosthern, 1957) 142 ff.; A. H. Unruh, Die Geschichte der Mennoniten-Brüdergemeinde (Winnipeg, 1954) 205 ff.

Teachers' Association: see Mennonite Teachers Association (Lehrerverein), Mennonite Teachers Association of Kansas, and the following article.

Teachers Association, The Mennonite (MC), is a semiautonomous organization affiliated with the General Educational Council of the Mennonite Board of Education. It was organized in 1951 with 159 charter members. All members of the church who are actively engaged in teaching or who have qualified for the teaching profession at the elementary, secondary, or collegiate level are eligible for membership; students enrolled in teacher education programs are eligible for associate membership.

The purposes of MTA are (1) to encourage a spirit of fellowship and unity among Mennonite teachers; (2) to assist members in solving ethical problems peculiar to Mennonite teachers; (3) to foster conviction for the promulgation and the preservation of Christian faith and practice; (4) to cultivate the concept that teaching should be an avenue of service; (5) to serve as a clearinghouse for the exchange of valuable experiences and of good teaching techniques; (6) to assist in teacher placement; (7) to encourage teachers to grow professionally; (8) to champion the cause of the Mennonite teacher in every phase of his profession; and (9) to co-operate with the General Educational Council in promoting the educational program of the Mennonite Church.

The annual meeting of MTA is held in conjunction with the annual meeting of the Mennonite Board of Education. The Association seeks to foster some of its purposes through the organization of local Mennonite teachers organizations. In the spring of 1958 the Association published the first issue of the MTA Bulletin. In 1958 the officers of MTA were Harold D. Lehman, president; J. Lester Brubaker, vice-president; and E. Grant Herr, secretary-treasurer. K.L.M.

Teck (Deck), Ulrich, an Anabaptist of Waldshut, was expelled from the canton of Zürich, Switzerland, on Nov. 18, 1525, with Michael Sattler (q.v.) and Martin Lingg (q.v.) of Schaffhausen. He was evidently very active in the Anabaptist cause in the canton of Zürich. One of the men he baptized there was Hans Künzi of Klingnau. S.G.

L. von Muralt, Glaube und Lehre der schweizerischen Wiedertäufer (Zürich, 1938) 24 f.; TA Zürich, 109, 136, 197, 261, 284; ML II, 658.

Teenstra, a Dutch Mennonite family, originally from the hamlet of Teerns near Leeuwarden in Friesland, where they were farmers. Later this family is found in the province of Groningen. Some of its members were pioneers in agriculture, as was Marten Dirks Teenstra (Teerns 1742-Zuurdijk 1806). His sons Douwe Teenstra (1768-1823) and Aedsge Teenstra (1776-1813, married to Fokeltje de Waard) in 1795 reclaimed the Ruigezandster polder near Zoutkamp in northwestern Groningen. Douwe is also named for inventing a new way of threshing rape-seed (colza). In the 19th century some of the Teenstras were farmers near Grijskerk, where they were also deacons of the Mennonite congregation. In this century they traded in grains. vdZ.

Van der Aa, Biogr. Wb. XVII (Haarlem, 1874) 43; S. K. de Waard, Aanteekeningen uit de Geschiedenis van Doopsgezinden in't Westerkwartier . . . (Groningen, 1901) 31, 33, 40, 41, 44.

Teere Vriezen (Tender Frisians), a name sometimes given to the Young Frisians. (See Frisian Mennonites.) vdZ.

Teerns, Jelle Sipkes van (1738-March 29, 1823), whose father was a farmer near Leeuwarden in Friesland, Netherlands, and who at first was a farmer himself, thereupon a carpenter, educated himself by reading, particularly on history and theology. In 1768 he was chosen as preacher of the Veenwouden Mennonite congregation and earned his living by continuing his carpentry. He soon established a reputation as an eloquent preacher. In February 1771 he moved to IJlst, where he served the small Waterlander congregation for nearly 50 years, retiring in 1818.

Jelle Sipkes was a clear-headed man; his piety had a strong moralistic tendency; his ideas were rather liberal, both concerning religion and politics. He was always interested in political affairs; as a "patriot" (q.v.) he took an active part in the government both of his home town and the provincial government of Friesland in 1795-96. In his private life he had to contend with many sorrows and cares because of illness in his family. Parts of his diary were published by H. J. Busé in Doopsgezinde Bijdragen 1909. His son Sipke Jelles van Teerns (1776-1829), a baker by trade, was like his father an untrained minister, serving at Irnsum from 1804 until his death. (DB 1870, 151; 1909, 49-103; 1912, 110; Naamlijst 1829, 49 f., 54.) vdZ.

Teickowitz (Takowitz), a castle and village owned by Baron Georg Christoph Teufel, and a Bruderhof of the Hutterian Brethren in Moravia. The baron defended Claus Braidl (q.v.) in 1593. The Bruderhof was plundered by troops and partly burned down on Dec. 14, 1620. In October 1622 the Brethren were driven out of Teickowitz, leaving all their property behind. They settled in Hungary. (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; ML IV.) HEGE.

Telner, Jacob, a well-to-do Quaker merchant of Amsterdam, formerly a resident of Crefeld, Germany, was the major liaison between William Penn and his agent Benjamin Furly in Rotterdam, and the thirteen Mennonite-Quaker families of Crefeld who settled Germantown, Pa., in 1683. He was baptized a Mennonite in Amsterdam on March 29, 1665, but became a Quaker there sometime before 1676, possibly as early as 1667. Soon after 1678 he moved to Crefeld and threw himself actively into the promotion of emigration from the Rhineland to Pennsylvania. He is probably as much as any one responsible for the Crefeld colonization of Germantown. In 1678-81 he visited New York and Pennsylvania at least once. On March 9 and 10, 1682, Telner, Dirck Sipman of Crefeld, and Jan Streypers of Kaldenkirchen, each bought 5,000 acres of land in Pennsylvania, securing deeds signed by William Penn personally and executed in London. On June 18, 1683, Telner was with the thirteen emigrant Crefeld families in Rotterdam, at which time he sold 2,000 acres to the three brothers Op den Graeff and 1,000 acres each to three other Crefeld emigrants. He later bought more land there, for he owned a block of land near Skippack which was for a time called Telner's Township. Before Dec. 12, 1684, Telner had arrived in New York and visited Philadelphia and Germantown, but returned to New York to spend the winter there with his family, settling in Germantown in the spring of 1685. Here he lived until 1696, when he returned permanently to Europe. In 1709 ff. he was active in aiding the Palatine and Swiss Mennonites as well as others to get to Pennsylvania. William Penn was so appreciative of his services that he gave him a special grant of 100 acres of "Liberty lands" in Philadelphia's suburbs. Throughout all this time Telner was also active religiously as a Quaker wherever he went. Hull calls him "one of the most useful Quakers of his time." H.S.B.

William I. Hull, William Penn and the Dutch Quaker Migration to Pennsylvania (Swarthmore, 1935), biography of Telner pp. 239-53, from which the above sketch was drawn.

Telugu Mission (MB). The Field. The Telugu mission field of the Mennonite Brethren Church of North America is located near the city of Hyderabad, Deccan, India, in the State of Andhra Pradesh, a small section of the field extending into the Madras Presidency. The Muse River forms the northern boundary between the Mennonite Brethren and the American Baptist fields. From here the field extends southward to the Tungabhadra and Kiswa rivers for a distance of about 120 miles. The maximum width from the east to the west is about 150 miles. The mission field embraces some 10,800 square miles with a population of 1,540,000 scattered in 2,500 villages and Hyderabad City. The field is not a large flat steaming, unhealthy jungle, but is dotted with hills, reaching in some cases to the height of 3,000 feet. Besides, there are some beautiful woods and fertile fields. A railroad traverses the field from north to south and four mission stations, Shamshabad, Jadcherla, Mahbubnagar, and Gadwal, are situated along this railroad. The territory is divided into ten mission fields with a mission center located in each field: Hughestown, Shamshabad, Jadcherla, Kalva-Kurthy, Deverakonda, Nagar-Kurnool, Wanaparty, Mahbubnagar, Narayanpet, Gadwal fields, with a section designated as the "Home Mission," which is being served by the Telugu Mennonite Brethren Convention.

The Founding of the Mission. The mission was founded in 1899 by a group of four missionaries consisting of the N. N. Hieberts, Elizabeth Neufeld, and Anna Suderman. Since the field had formerly been claimed by the American Baptist Mission Union and since it lay between some of their mission stations, credit must be given to the kind co-operation of the Baptist missionaries and to Abraham Friesen, a Mennonite Brethren missionary from South Russia who was serving at Nalgonda, a neighboring Baptist mission station. His help and advice was of great value in securing the field and beginning the work.

On Oct. 10, 1900, the missionaries occupied a very suitable place in Hughestown, three miles south of Secunderabad and just a short distance north of Hyderabad, on an elevated section overlooking both cities, as well as a number of villages. It seemed an ideal location for a mission station. In November of that year they began regular preaching services and opened a school for children.

The new work, however, was not permitted to continue very long. On Jan. 14, 1902, Hiebert became sick and was ordered by the doctor to leave India. In March he and his wife returned to America, never to see India again. Elizabeth Neufeld and Anna Suderman temporarily transferred to the mission of the Mennonite Brethren of Russia and the Baptist Missionary Union. The Hieberts were replaced by John H. Pankratz and his wife, who arrived in India Oct. 20, 1902. Since the original mission station had only been rented, the new missionaries purchased a suitable site for a mission compound in the suburb Mulkapet, taking possession on Nov. 26, 1903. Only four days later they conducted the first service in their home. Abraham Friesen had transferred several national workers to this new work and thus an effective ministry could be begun. In addition to the evangelism, school-work was immediately begun, as well as work among the women and the sick. On March 27, 1904, the missionaries, national workers, and a few Christians gathered at the mission station Mulkapet to organize the first Mennonite Brethren Church among the Telugus under the auspices of the Mennonite Brethren Church of North America.

The Growth of the Mission. The Mulkapet mission station was liquidated in 1913 and the work was transferred to Hughestown. Since 1914 the field has been known as the Hughestown mission field.

MISSION STATIONS AND FIELDS

	Devera- konda	Gadwal	Hughes- town	Jadcherla	Kalva- Kurthy	Mahbub- nagar	Nagar- Kurnool	Shamsha- bad	Wana- party	Nara- yanpet
Square Miles	1,200	1,200	1,100	700	800	1,400	1,200	1,200	1,200	1,000
Population	180,000	170,000	230,000	90,000	100,000	230,000	160,000	120,000	160,000	200,000
Villages	270	250	230	120	130	300	250	150	250	325
Year Founded	1910	1936	1903	1933	1933	1936	1906	1920	1913	1955

Statistical Summary as of 1953. Villages—2,175; stations—9; boarding schools—13 (8 elementary, 3 middle, 1 high, 1 Bible); hospitals—6; staff through the years—59 (20 couples, 19 single women); under appointment—5 (2 couples, 1 single woman); baptized believers—14,000; organized churches—180; church buildings—170; ordained or licensed ministers—113; village evangelists and teachers—175; Bible women—120; villages with Christians—200.

A monthly church paper in the vernacular was begun in 1920, the Suvarthamani, which has become the official organ of the indigenous church. The printing press first established at Nagar-Kurnool has been transferred to Mahbubnagar. In 1943 a high school was begun in Shamshabad, which has also been transferred to Mahbubnagar; it offers a three-year course, and had an enrollment of 100 in 1953. The Bethany Bible School, begun in 1920 for the training of indigenous workers, was begun at Nagar-Kurnool, transferred in 1930 to Shamshabad, and in 1946 to Deverakonda. Nearly all of the 300 ministers, evangelists, teachers, Bible women, and other Christian workers have received their training in Bethany.

The advances in recent years have been particularly in strengthening the indigenous church and organizing it on a sound basis. On each of the station fields the churches have formed a field association which has a large annual gathering. All the churches together have formed the Andhra Mennonite Brethren Convention, which is ultimately to take full responsibility for the church in India. A Mission and Church Council, on which the mission has six and the church eight members, handles matters of common concern to both. G.W.P., J.H.L.

G. W. Peters, The Growth of Foreign Missions in the Mennonite Brethren Church (Hillsboro, 1952); Mrs. H. T. Esau, The First Sixty Years of Mennonite Brethren Foreign Missions (Hillsboro, 1954).

Teminabuan, a mission station on the Dutch part of New Guinea (q.v.) operated since 1953 by the Dutch Mennonite Mission Association (q.v.). vdZ.

Temmerman, François, an Anabaptist martyr: see Fransoois de Timmerman.

Tempel, van den, a former Mennonite family, found at Emden, East Friesland, Germany, and in the Netherlands, particularly at Amsterdam, but also at Leiden. Jan Tonnis (1607-72) was a Mennonite cloth merchant at Emden; he had been trained for this business by his uncle(?) Jacob Theunis(z) (q.v.) at Amsterdam. Jan Tonnis was not only a successful businessman but also a son of the muses, publishing a moralistic-religious play in verse: Josephs droef en bly-eind Spel (Groningen, 1639). Since his shop was called "In den Tempel van Salomo" he was commonly called Jan Tempel, and van den Tempel became the family name of his descendants.

Abraham van den Tempel, b. 1622 at Leeuwarden in Friesland, d. Oct. 4, 1672, at Amsterdam, who was a son of the Mennonite preacher and painter Lambert Jacobsz (q.v.), at first applied himself to cloth trade, being trained in Amsterdam and later, c1636-c42, by his relative, the above Jan Tonnis at Emden, whose family name he took. From 1645 he had a cloth shop at Leiden. But he too was not only a businessman, but also a well-known and, in his time, famous painter, particularly painting portraits. His pictures are still found in the Amsterdam Rijksmuseum, the Mauritshuis museum at The Hague, and the city museum of Leiden. One of the well-known Dutch painters who was influenced by van den Tempel was Frans van Mieris, who may have been a Mennonite, and who worked in his studio. Abraham van den Tempel was baptized in 1643 in the Amsterdam Lamist church. He was married to Trijntje Hogemade. vDZ.

Winkler Prins Encyclopedie (6th ed. Amsterdam) XVII (1953) 373; idem, Supplement (1955) 411; Amstelodamum Yearbook XXV (1928) 85 f., 108; W. Martin, Rembrandt en zijn tijd (De Holl. Schilderkunst in de XVIIde eeuw II) 3d ed. (Amsterdam, n.d., 1944) 154, 220, 227; Thieme-Becker, Allg. Lexikon der bildenden Künstler (Leipzig, 1938).

Tempelhof, a village established in 1868 by members of the Temple church or Friends of Jerusalem of Mennonite background from the Molotschna settlement and others from Bessarabia. The settlement was located on the Kuma River in the foothills of the Caucasian Mountains. Tempelhof was a seat of a Temple church. (See also Temple Church.)

C.K.

Temple (German, Tempel) Church (Deutscher Tempel or Jerusalemsfreunde) was organized on June 19, 1861, by Christoph Hoffmann (q.v.), a Lutheran clergyman, at a meeting of the Friends of Jerusalem at Ludwigsburg near Stuttgart, Germany. The movement rooted in Württemberg Pietism. Gottlieb W. Hoffmann, the father of Christoph Hoffmann, had founded the separatist settlement of Korntal near Stuttgart. Philipp M. Hahn (q.v.) influenced Christoph Hoffmann regarding the establishment of the kingdom of God on earth and called all true believers "out of Babel," to which he later added the notion of gathering them in Palestine in order to be enabled to "build the temple of God"

(Eph. 2:21-22; I Pet. 2:51). Already in 1854 Hoffmann had started the paper Süddeutsche Warte, an "organ for the gathering of the children of God in Jerusalem."

Germany. First the group established a school at Kirschenhardthof, near Marbach, Württemberg. Close co-workers of Hoffmann were G. H. Hardegg and Christoph Paulus. In 1858 a delegation went to Palestine to investigate settlement possibilities. In 1860 five young men were sent thither as pioneers. In 1866 a settlement was established near Nazareth, and in 1869 the colony of Haifa was established. Jaffa, Saron, and Rephaim followed. Christoph Hoffmann was the leader of the movement. When he died in 1885 he was succeeded by his son, Christian Hoffmann.

The Pietism of the Temple movement was soon given up and was replaced by a humanistic-rationalistic philosophy. Many of the former friends of Hoffmann turned their backs on him. The rationalism of the University of Tübingen which he had fought in his early days he now embraced. The emphasis on an undenominational, nondoctrinal enlightened Christianity, living a good life, remained with the Templers. They were good business people and promoted cultural endeavors.

Russia. The contact between the Temple movement of Württemberg and the Mennonites of the Ukraine was established through Nikolai Schmidt (q.v.), who had traveled in South Germany and became acquainted with the school at Kirschenhardthof. As a result Johannes Lange (q.v.) of Gnadenfeld (q.v.) attended the school and became a teacher of the Gnadenfeld Bruderschule. His influence as a disciple of Christoph Hoffmann in the school as well as in the community was objected to. A long-drawn-out controversy took place in which the ecclesiastical and civil authorities and the government became involved. Johannes Lange was imprisoned in Halbstadt in 1863. Twenty Mennonites then signed a document organizing the Evangelische Mennonitische Gemeinde of Gnadenfeld which was the beginning of the Temple Church or the Friends of Jerusalem in Russia (1863). In 1866 representatives of this new group obtained permission and established a new settlement in the Kuban (q.v.) area.

In 1868 a delegation rented an estate from Count Orbeliani for thirty years. The Gnadenfeld Templers were joined by those of Württemberg background living in Bessarabia and established the Tempelhof (q.v.) settlement. On the other side of the Kuma River Orbelianovka was established by Württemberg settlers only. In addition two villages were established on the Kuban (q.v.) River named Alexanderfeld (q.v.) and Wohldemfürst (q.v.). With few exceptions all Templers moved to these new settlements. Common names were Lange, Schmidt, Goerzen, Goerz, Arndt, Hausknecht, Rempel, Hübert, and Görke. The pioneer life was difficult, but soon some prosperity was achieved. Great emphasis was placed on education and the development of the cultural life. The two villages on the Kuban River were located adjacent to the Mennonite Brethren settlement. In religious matters the Mennonite Church, the Mennonite Brethren, and the Temple Church, each went its own way, but they co-operated in matters pertaining to the economic and cultural life of the community. When Hoffmann published his five epistles in 1877-82 which attacked the doctrines of the Trinity, pre-existence of Christ, reconciliation, and justification in a rationalistic manner, most of his Mennonite followers deserted him. The periodical of the group, Die Warte des Tempels, warmly defended "old evangelical" Mennonitism.

In 1896 the thirty-year lease of Tempelhof and Orbelianovka expired. In 1896-97 the group then started the villages of Olgino (q.v.) and Romanovka (q.v.) near Sukhaya Padina, consisting of 30 farms with 4,860 acres.

Palestine. Around 1870 some Temple Mennonites moved to Palestine. When in 1902 the Temple settlement Wilhelma near Lydda was established, Mennonites from Wohldemfürst and Alexanderfeld, including Heinrich Sawatzky, Jakob Friesen, Franz Friesen, Johann Friesen, Jakob Goerzen, and Peter Decker, joined this settlement. A photograph of the Temple Council in Palestine in 1935 shows the following members of Mennonite background: Heinrich Sawatzky (Wilhelma), Theodor Fast (Jerusalem), Nikolai Schmidt (Jerusalem), Kurt Lange (Bethlehem), Jacob Decker (Wilhelma). During both World Wars the Templers were interned as German citizens. During World War II the young families were deported to Australia. When the state of Israel was established the remainder had to leave. Of these, 49 persons were sent to Germany, while early in 1949 223 persons landed in Melbourne, Australia, the remainder later going to Germany. In 1953 1,230 Templers were in Australia, living in Victoria, New South Wales, and South Australia. Templers of Mennonite background now live scattered in Germany, Austria, and Canada. Among the latter are particularly those who left Russia before World War I.

Friedrich Lange, the brother of Johannes Lange, was a teacher in Russia and Haifa and wrote Geschichte des Tempels (Jerusalem, 1899), a book of 941 pages, relating the early history of the group.

C.K.

Heinrich Sawatzky, Templer Mennonitischer Herkunft (Winnipeg, 1955); Franz Isaac, Die Molotschnaer Mennoniten (Halbstadt, 1908); H. Götz, Die Molotschnaer Ansiedlung (Steinbach, 1951); Gesellschafts-Vertrag und Satzungen . . . der Tempelgesellschaft (The Temple Society Central Fund) (Jerusalem, 1922); Chr. Hoffman, Mein Weg nach Jerusalem (2 vv., 1881-84); E. Rohrer, Die Tempelgesellschaft (1920); Friesen, Brüderschaft, 87, 727; Menn. Bl., 1888, 139; 1890, 27; 1894, 5; Fritz Grünzweig, Die Evangelische Brüdergemeinde Korntal (Metzingen, 1958); ML IV.

Temple Hill Mennonite Church (MC), located on Route 33 in Greene Co., Va., 3 miles east of the Skyline drive. The meetinghouse is an unused Methodist church, which was purchased by the Middle District of the Virginia Conference. John Kurtz opened the work on April 13, 1941, and served as pastor for 10 years. The present (1957) membership is 23, with Byard Shank as pastor. N.J.H.

Temple (German, Tempel) Mennonite Churches were located in Olgino-Tempelhof in the province of Stavropol at the foothills of the Caucasian Mountains, and at Alexanderfeld (Alexandrodar), Velikoknyazhevsk, Kuban (q.v.) district, the latter with Isaak Fast as elder from 1884. Dirks reports a total membership of 148 of whom 49 were active (1905). Johann Lange, Johann Schmidt, Dietrich Dick, and N. Gengenbach served the Olgino-Tempelhof congregation.

The Templers of this area associated closely with those of Palestine. In 1881 Christoph Paulus, his son Franz Paulus, and Friedrich Lange from Palestine visited the Temple congregation in Russia. At this time some guiding principles were agreed upon. Some of the Mennonite Templers joined the settlements in Palestine (see also Temple Church).

C.K.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 87, 727; Fr. Lange, Geschichte des Tempels (Jerusalem, 1899) 797.

Temperance: see Alcohol.

Tennessee, an inland state lying in the east south-central part of the United States, bounded on the west by the Mississippi River. The Unaka Mountain Range of the Blue Ridge traverses the eastern section of the state in a southeasterly direction. The population is largely rural, but during recent years the Tennessee Valley Authority has encouraged the building of large plants by the Aluminum Corporation of America and a rural electrification system that is revolutionizing the state's economy.

The state became the home of an Amish and a Mennonite settlement during the closing decades of the 19th century. In 1872 the Amish bishop, John Stoltzfus, of Lancaster County, Pa., with five of his children and their families, founded a congregation near Concord (q.v.) in the southwestern part of Knox County. Another settlement (now extinct) of Amish and Mennonites sprang up about 1890 near McEwen in Dickson County (q.v.) about 40 miles west of Nashville. The Concord congregation declined after the death of its founder, several families uniting with the Plymouth Brethren in Knoxville. With a new influx of both Amish and Mennonites after 1884 the membership grew to over 100. A decline set in after the Amish element in the congregation repeatedly voted against conference affiliation. The district mission board of the Virginia Mennonite Conference (q.v.) sponsors the present membership of 11. The same board sponsors the Mennonite Gospel Mission (q.v.) in Knoxville, membership 37. The Ohio and Eastern Conference (MC) maintains two mission stations in the northeastern corner of the state at Shauns and Indian Springs, and two others just across the border near Lansing and Grayson, N.C.

In 1923-56 the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren maintained a congregation at Shell Creek, Carter County, in the extreme northeastern corner of the state across the North Carolina line, where the conference has a congregation in Watauga County (q.v.). About 1934 Robert F. Sherrard, a Defenseless Mennonite (q.v.) residing at Gibsonburg, Ohio, founded a mission at Smithville, DeKalb County, near the geographical center of the state. The Evangelical Mennonite Conference (q.v.) in 1956 reports 54 members in four congregations in this and adjoining counties served by ministers in Smithville and McMinnville. A growing Old Order Amish congregation near Ethridge, Lawrence County, in the extreme southern part of the state and 140 miles east of Memphis, founded in 1946 by a group including two ministers from Apple Creek, Ohio, now numbers 61 members, with three ministers and two deacons.

J.S.U.

Ter Meer (ter Mehr), an outstanding Mennonite family of Crefeld (q.v.), Germany, coming originally from München-Gladbach (q.v.), where Jan ter Meer (1594-1672) was a Mennonite elder from about 1628. In 1654 he moved to Crefeld (see Meer, Jan ter). Mewes (Bartholomäus) ter Meer (1622-92), b. at Deventer, moved to Crefeld in 1654 and became a citizen in 1679. His son Klaas (1650-98) was a lay preacher of the Crefeld congregation, whose daughter Grigen (1675-1711) was the wife of the Mennonite Jan Crous (preacher 1716-24). Abraham ter Meer (1729-1804), a grandson of Klaas, was a book dealer in Crefeld and publisher and founder of a lending library; he was the center of a group of intellectual clergymen and citizens under the spirit of the Enlightenment. The persons now living who bear the name are descendants of Klaas ter Meer; but the branch of Privy Councillor Edmund ter Meer (1852-1931), founder of the dye factories of Weiler, ter Meer in Uerdingen, is no longer Mennonite.

E.C.

Beiträge zur Geschichte rheinischer Mennoniten (Weierhof, 1939) 22 f., 81, 118 f., ML IV.

Terek Mennonite Settlement was located in the southeastern corner of European Russia, on the Terek River, which flows into the Caspian Sea in the Eastern Caucasus, bordered on the north by the Aktash River, and situated north of the railroad between Rostov and Petrovsk on the Caspian Sea.

The settlement was established in 1901, on 66,960 acres of land purchased by the Molotschna settlement from the Lvov brothers for about 1,000,000 rubles. The landless families received 108 acres each, while some individuals who had farms were permitted to purchase land in order to make the financing of the purchase possible. The total settlement was divided into 17 villages, each village consisting of 24 to 35 farms, each of which had 108 to 216 acres of land. Some land was not distributed and remained community land, and some of it was wasteland. The journey from the Molotschna settlement to the Caucasus took about a week. Each village received a name and a number, as follows: 1, Wanderloo; 2, Khartch; 3, Talma; 4, Konstantinovka; 5, Sulak; 6, Alexandrovka; 7, Maryanovka; 8, Rohrbach; 9, Nikolayevka; 10, Müdelburg; 11, Prätoria; 12, Ostheim; 13, Taranovka; 14, Kameshlak; 15, Kaplan; 16, Agrakhan; 17, Aktash. The latter two villages never materialized. Villages 1-13 were settled at once, and 14 and 15 in 1904. The settlement consisted of 536 families with 3,400 persons. The soil varied greatly and was somewhat sandy. Some of it had a saltpeter content. The land was flat, with some brush. The wells were, as a rule, 15 to 35 feet deep. Some community wells were much deeper. Soon it was discovered that there was oil in the soil. World War I prevented the drilling of wells.

Every village had a Schulze (q.v.) and the settlement had an Oberschulze (q.v.), the first of whom was Gerhard Schmidt of Nikolayevka, followed by Gerhard Regehr and C. H. Toews. In 1915 a Cossack was put into this office by the government. When the Revolution broke out in 1917 he was succeeded by Cornelius Penner.

The settlement had an organization for the care of orphans (see Waisenamt). The first manager of this orphanage was Heinrich Günther, succeeded by C. H. Schmidt. The settlement also had a fire insurance patterned on the Molotschna fire insurance. The mail was originally received in the neighboring town of Khassav-Yurt. In 1908 post office and telegram service were established in the village of Nikolayevka. Nikolayevka was also the seat of the Oberschulze. The "Feldscher" in charge of the health program was M. Freimut. The distributing center (apothecary) was located in Talma. Mrs. Abram Funk, Mrs. G. W. Warkentin, and Margaretha Fast served as midwives and nurses. Cornelius Fast and F. F. Enns also distributed medicines.

During the first years the instruction of children took place in private homes. Most of the teachers had a very poor education. The teachers soon organized a "Lehrerkollegium," of which Cornelius Penner was the chairman. The school board consisted of Franz Enns, Bernard Fast, and Heinrich Sukkau. Regarding the religious life and the churches, see Terek Mennonite Church and Terek Mennonite Brethren Church.

The settlement made slow economic progress. In 1902 there was a total crop failure. Some soon began to irrigate land. Many, not accustomed to this practice, became discouraged. In 1908 and 1909, after repeated crop failures, many left. On the irrigated land the farmers harvested good crops of winter wheat. A commission consisting of four Tatars, two Russians, and two Mennonites of the Khassav-Yurt district, with the help of the St. Petersburg government, arranged to have irrigation canals established or improved. In addition to the "Talmak Canal" a second one was established known as "Richat-Canal." Irrigation took place in July or August. Two crops a year were harvested. Winter wheat, barley, oats, corn, sugar cane, and vegetables were raised. Great damages were caused by grasshoppers in 1909-10, and by frequent floods recurring in June, July, and August. In 1905, 105 persons died of malaria and typhoid fever, spread by the floods. In 1905 a dike about ten miles in length was constructed along the river in order to prevent floods.

The Mennonites raised cattle, horses, and hogs which they had brought along from the Molotschna settlement. They received good prices for their produce in the markets of Khassav-Yurt and Petrovsk. Because of the distance from markets, stores were opened in various villages, e.g., in Talma (Johann Derksen), Khartch (Daniel Boschman), and Rohrbach (Jacob Rempel). Cornelius and Franz Toews had a lumber and implement store in Nikolayevka. Most of the goods came from Khassav-Yurt and Petrovsk. In 1912 a state bank was opened in Nikolayevka. Johann Nickel established a flour mill in Talma and David Klassen built one in Nikolayevka. Smaller mills were found in various villages. A number of brick factories and carpenter and blacksmith shops were in operation. The governor of the Terek region visited the settlement in 1908 and 1913, and was received with great honors. During the war many of the men served in forestry camps and in hospitals.

With the Revolution of 1917 a new period started. First the settlers were hopeful. But it soon became apparent that the Nogays, Tatars, and Kumeks were now able to exploit the Mennonites without restraint, even driving away their horses during the night. Many Mennonites lost their lives during these attacks. The settlement held prayer meetings and asked the government for help. Finally, when life seemed impossible here, they decided to flee.

On Feb. 8, 1918, a two-mile caravan of settlers moved in the direction of the city of Khassav-Yurt, leaving everything behind that they had built up in seventeen long years. Villages 7, 8, 10, and 11 followed later. Before they left they were attacked again. Many had to flee on foot. On February 18, the larger part of the refugees was transported westward by train. The settlers abandoned 1,600 horses, 2,300 cows, 2,400 sheep, 958 hogs, implements, furniture, and all other property which could not be taken along.

Some of the settlers remained for some time in the Kuban area or outside the danger zone of the native population which had tormented them. In 1920, after the new government had been established, they were invited by the Dagestan administration to return to their settlement. After some negotiations in the capital, Petrovsk, an agreement was reached that they would get their farms back, that the trip to the settlement would be free of charge, that all the items which had been stolen would be returned, etc. In the spring of 1921 sixty families returned, and in the fall of 1921 forty-five more families followed. They settled in the villages 1-5 and 9. Some help was received from American Mennonite Relief. Many homes, churches, and other property had been destroyed. C. P. Toews became the chairman of the Mennonite administration. Soon theft and murder were repeated and it became obvious that the Mennonites could not stay at the Terek. By 1925 most of them had moved away. Many of them joined the movement to Canada. Others scattered over the various Mennonite settlements in Russia. The Terek Mennonite settlement was the only undertaking of this nature by the Mennonites of Russia which was a complete failure. C.K.

C. P. Toews, Die Tereker Ansiedlung (Steinbach, 1945); D. H. Epp, Mennonitisches Jahrbuch No. 10 (Berdyansk, 1913) 121.

Terek Mennonite Brethren Church was established in 1901 in the Terek Mennonite settlement (q.v.). In 1905 Jacob Dörksen was leader of the congregation; in 1913 it was Christian Ch. Schmidt. Other ministers were Cornelius Wittenberg, David Wölk, Gerhard Wiens, Gerhard Sukkau, Johann Löpp, and Heinrich Sukkau. In 1910 the congregation became independent. In 1912 it built a meeting-house in the village of Talma. The congregation was dissolved when the settlers left the settlement in 1923. C.K.

C. P. Toews, Die Tereker Ansiedlung (Steinbach, 1945) 22; H. Dirks, Statistik der Mennonitengemeinden (Leipzig, 1906); D. H. Epp, Adressbüchlein (Taurien, 1913).

Terek Mennonite Church was established in 1902 in the Terek Mennonite settlement (q.v.). Among the first ministers were Wilhelm Sudermann, Dietrich Derksen, Cornelius Fast, Bernhard Fast, and Dietrich Klassen. Later Franz Enns (q.v.), who soon became elder, Heinrich Balzer, David Balzer, Gerhard Wiens, Heinrich Regehr, Jacob Bärg, Benjamin Ewert, Cornelius Klassen, and Johann Dück were elected. In 1905 the congregation had a total membership of 1,078, of whom 424 were baptized. A meetinghouse was established in the village of Khartch and a more substantial one in 1908 in the village of Müdelburg. Franz Enns served the congregation as minister in 1903-6 and as elder 1906-18. He was a very talented leader. With the dissolution of the settlement in 1923, the congregation was dissolved. C.K.

Heinrich Dirks, Statistik der Mennonitengemeinden (Leipzig, 1906); D. H. Epp, Adressbüchlein (Taurien, 1913); C. P. Toews, Die Tereker Ansiedlung (Steinbach, 1945) 22.

Terhorne (in Humsterland): see Humsterland and Noordhoorn.

Terhorne (in old documents often called Terhorne in Waterland), a village in the Dutch province of Friesland, the seat of a Mennonite congregation, which according to Blaupot ten Cate was founded before 1550; this early date is, however, questionable. Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized 30 persons here in 1561-66, and it is supposed that the letter of Sept. 1, 1557(?), by Menno Simons, Letter to the Brethren in Waterhorne, was addressed to the Mennonites of Terhorne.

There is not much information about the Terhorne congregation. About 1713 it joined the Sociétéit of Mennonite congregations in Friesland. The congregation, whose members were mostly farmers and skippers with some fishermen, was until the end of the 18th century rather conservative as to living and dress: in 1765 a woman was not admitted to communion because she wore a gold cap (oorijzer).

The baptized membership, numbering some 110 about 1713 and 125 in 1738, was 119 in 1838, 128 in 1861, 144 in 1901, and 86 in 1958. The present meetinghouse was dedicated on Sept. 24, 1865. An organ was installed in 1907, replaced in 1939. The parsonage, still in use, was a gift of the H. W. van der Velde family in 1855.

Until 1782 the congregation was served by preachers chosen from its own members; then (lay) preachers were called in from outside, one of whom, Oeds Roelofs (q.v.) Dantuma, a baker, served with great blessing from 1791 to 1836. The first pastor of Terhorne educated at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary was Jan Hendrik Akkerman, serving 1837-39; he was followed by Pieter Overbeek 1841-67, H. G. Dornseiffen 1867-1902, J. Koster 1902-5, A. Stiel 1905-9, G. A. Hulshoff 1910-13, A. de Vries Mzn 1914-35, J. W. Sipkema 1938-42, J. P. Keuning 1942-45, F. H. Sixma 1945-48, P. Messie 1949-53, and Miss J. Gorter 1954. Among the church activities are a Sunday school for children and ladies' circle.

vdZ.

Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 89, 94, 189, 226, 248, 252, 254, 306; DB 1861, 142; Opera Omnia, 392; Writings, 1055.

Ternaard, a village in the northern part of the Dutch province of Friesland, the seat of a Mennonite congregation since 1849, in which year it split off from the Holwerd-Blija congregation as an independent church. While still a part of the Holwerd (q.v.) congregation the Ternaard group was usually called Vischbuurt, because the meetinghouse was found in Vischbuurt outside of the village of Ternaard. After this group had become independent, a new meetinghouse was built at Ternaard in 1850 and the old Vischbuurt church was sold. The Ternaard church was provided with an organ in 1894. Church activities include a youth group, ages 18-25; a youth group, ages 12-18; Sunday school for children; and a ladies' circle. Outstanding families in the Ternaard congregation are Bierma and Hidema.

The baptized membership of Ternaard was 31 in 1850, 67 in 1901, 109 in 1958. Pastors serving here have been L. E. Halbertsma 1850, L. Noteboom 1852-58, A. A. Deenik 1860-81, pulpit vacant 1881-97, U. J. Reinders 1897-99, F. W. W. Braak 1900-6, J. G. Frerichs 1906-14, J. H. van Riemsdijk 1914-22, J. Kooiman 1923-30, Jac. Hulshoff 1930-37, K. T. Gorter 1937-39, J. A. A. Meijer 1940-46, Miss H. G. Zijlstra 1946-52, F. R. van der Meulen 1953. (DJ 1850, 45-47; DB 1882, 127; 1895, 179; 1900, 230.)

vdZ.

Terneuzen, a town in Dutch Zealand Flanders, where there is a Mennonite Kring (circle), founded in 1942. The pastor of Aardenburg (q.v.) is in charge of this group, now (1958) numbering 19 Mennonites.

vdZ.

Terre Hill Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church located in Lancaster County, Pa., was organized in 1882. In 1957 the congregation had 80 members with Robert W. Smock serving as pastor. R.C.R.E.

Terry Civilian Public Service Camp No. 64 was opened near Terry, Mont., Jan. 15, 1943, and was closed June 30, 1946. Under the Bureau of Reclamation and the Farm Security Administration, and operated by the Mennonite Central Committee, Camp Terry helped to develop the Buffalo Rapids irrigation project to improve about 30,000 acres in the level valley of the Yellowstone River. More than 280 men from twenty-two states worked in Camp Terry during its three years of operation. A farm and community school was held in the camp during the winter of 1944-45. An illustrated book, This Is Our Story, was produced by the campers in 1944.

M.G.

Melvin Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, 1949) 169-76.

Terschelling, a Dutch island (1947 pop. 3,544) formerly belonging to the province of North Holland, now to Friesland, with 264 Mennonites. Mennonites have been here since the 16th century. On his visits here Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized 12 persons in 1563-65, and at least 166 in 1568-82. Shortly after there were two or three congregations of different branches. There may have been a Flemish church, concerning which there is, however, no information. From about 1600 there was a congregation of followers of Elder Jan Jacobsz (q.v.), who made several visits to the island for baptism and communion services. This congregation, whose members were mostly engaged in farming, had its main center in the village of Midsland, while a simple meetinghouse was also found in the village of West-Terschelling. The Janjacobsgezinden (q.v.) often had difficulties with the governors of the island, who refused to acknowledge the marriages performed in their meetinghouses. In 1622 and again in 1679 the governors ordered their marriages to be performed by the magistrates. Finally in 1686 the governor consented to the old practice of having marriages performed in the meetinghouses by the elders. During the 18th century, when the Janjacobsgezinden were less conservative than those in Friesland, the ties with the other Janjacobsgezinden gradually were loosened; the congregation was usually called Old Flemish and later even Zonist (q.v.). Until 1782 this congregation was exclusively led by ministers chosen from the local membership, but in 1782 a preacher was called from outside, viz., A. S. Cuperus (q.v.), who served here 1782-90 and prepared the merger with the Terschelling Lamist church, which came into being in 1790; at this time the baptized membership of the Janjacobsgezinden numbered 73.

The Lamist church was in the 17th century called the Waterlander (q.v.) congregation. In the 18th century it was called United Waterlander and Flemish church, or simply Flemish church, and also Lamist (q.v.) congregation. It was always smaller and less conservative than the Janjacobsgezinden. Its members for a large part were engaged in shipping. In 1713, 70 members of this congregation, which must have been nearly the entire male membership, were commanders of Greenland whalers and other vessels. It had its largest meetinghouse in the village of West-Terschelling and a small one at Midsland. Until the merger it was served by lay preachers, sometimes called from their own members, later mostly from outside. For the salaries of these preachers the congregation was regularly subsidized by those of Amsterdam, Haarlem, and Rotterdam. At the time of the merger with the JanjacobsgEZinden (1790) the membership was only 50.

In 1666 a severe blow struck the island; during a raid by the British, then at war with the Dutch, 350 houses of West-Terschelling were reduced to ashes, 180 of which belonged to Mennonites, and two of the Mennonite meetinghouses burned down. A contribution of 11,175 Dutch guilders was raised in several Dutch Mennonite congregations to rebuild these homes and churches. In 1734-36 the two congregations of Terschelling contributed to the relief of the Mennonites in Prussia.

In 1790, when the two congregations merged, neither of the meetinghouses at Midsland was being used; the united congregation used the two meetinghouses of West-Terschelling until 1817, when the former JanjacobsgEZinden meetinghouse was sold, only the old Waterlander meetinghouse near the harbor being used henceforth. This church was remodeled in 1850 and installed an organ in 1851. As a gift of the A. C. H. Eschauzier family of The Hague in 1910 it acquired a new organ and stained glass windows, two of them with Biblical figures.

The membership, 123 at the time of the merger in 1790, was 95 in 1830, 125 in 1861, 144 in 1901, 140 in 1958.

After the merger the congregation was at first served by untrained preachers: Eelke Reins van der Werf 1790-d.1818, Dirk Huisman 1818-21, B. P. Boonstra 1822-28, and J. S. Bakker 1830-63. The first pastor educated at the Amsterdam seminary was Karst S. van der Meulen, serving 1863-65, followed by J. H. van der Veen 1866-92, S. D. A. Wartena 1894-97, W. J. Kühler 1897-1902, G. Fopma 1902-8, R. D. Boersma 1908-12, S. I. van der Meulen 1913-16, B. P. de Vries 1916-20, J. D. Dozy 1922-26, O. T. Hylkema 1926-28, W. I. Fleischer 1928-33, J. E. Tuininga 1934-36, G. M. Kusters 1936-41, J. Wieringa 1942-47, Miss T. van der Zijpp 1951-54, and A. P. Goudsbloem 1957-.

Church activities include a Sunday school for children and a ladies' circle. Terschelling was one of the first Mennonite congregations in the Netherlands to have a choir (1895). Mennonite families at Terschelling, some of which are still found among the membership, are Swart, Doeksen, Roos, Rotgans, Duyf, Oepkes, Spits, Reedeker, Smit, Schol, Vis, Eschauzier, and Bakker.

vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1180; II, Nos. 361, 1065, 2266-77; II, 2, Nos. 488-91; Blaupot t. C., Holland I, 24; II, 47 f., 196, 203, 205, 233; DJ 1850, 33-35; DB 1861, 88-93, 167 f.; 1895, 181 f.; De Zondagsbode XXIV (1910 f.) No. 10, p. 39; J. Loosjes, "Jan Jacobsz en de Jan-JacobsgEZinden" in Ned. Archief voor Kerkgeschiedenis XI (1914) 235-38 (repr. 51-54); church records of Terschelling.

Tersier (in the 17th century also Targier, possibly the original form), a Dutch Mennonite family, probably of Flemish descent, was found at Dordrecht in the 17th century. (1) Abraham Tersier (the name Ferrier, DB 1862, 104, is wrong), married to Geertruid Terwen, was chosen in 1691 as elder of the Dordrecht Mennonite congregation. His son (2) Jacob Tersier (Targier) (Dordrecht 1688-1735) was renowned for his poetry in the 18th century; even after he had become blind in 1712 he continued to compose poems, which were written down by his friends. A volume of his verse, Gedichten, was published after his death in 1737 at Delft. (3) Joachim Targier, also a poet, may have been his brother. He was a physician and the author of Medicina Compendiaria (Leiden, 1698). (4) Abraham Targier, a son of (2) Jacob, obtained his M.D. degree at the University of Leiden in 1739 and practiced medicine in his home town until his death in 1770. His son (5) Bartholomeus Tersier (Dordrecht, 1742—Haarlem, 1824) obtained his M.D. degree at Leiden in 1769 and practiced medicine at Haarlem for more than fifty years. He was a trustee of the Mennonite Peuzelaarsteeg congregation from 1772 until his death. (6) Abraham Tersier (d. after 1810), probably a son of (3) Joachim, studied theology at the Lamist seminary 1761-68. Though he did not complete the course, he served as the (last) minister of the small congregation at Middelharnis (q.v.) 1771-1804. The congregation dissolved in 1805. There are no Tersiers in the Mennonite church at present.

vdZ.

DB 1862, 104; 1868, 92, 95; 1908, 109-13; Van der Aa, Biogr. Woordenboek XVIII (Haarlem, 1874).

Tersteegen, Gerhard (1697-1769), a leading German Pietist, born in Mörs, Germany, lived in Mülheim an der Ruhr and was trained in business. Here he was attracted by mysticism and devoted his life to the promotion of his religious convictions. In 1728 he gave up his business occupation, devoting his full time to helping people with their spiritual and physical needs by leading in devotional meetings, counseling, and practicing medicine as a lay physician. He translated writings by Jean de Labadie, Thomas à Kempis, and others. He published a number of his own writings including Auserlesene Lebensbeschreibung heiliger Seelen (3 vv., 1733-53), which included biographies of Catholic and Protestant "saints." In his large correspondence, Mennonites were included. Particularly the von der Leyens and Arnold Goyen of Crefeld were in close touch with him. He even preached in the Crefeld Mennonite church. His writings and songs ("Gott ist gegenwärtig," "Ich bete an die Macht der Liebe") have influenced Mennonite piety in many countries. Tersteegen was the father of Pietism (q.v.) along the Lower Rhine.

C.K.

RGV V, 1052; Dirk Cattepoel, "Das religiöse Leben in der Krefelder Mennonitengemeinde des 17. und 18. Jahrhunderts," Beiträge zur Geschichte rheinischer Mennoniten (Weierhof, 1939) 15-17.

Tertullian, Quintus Septimius Florens (c160-c222), the great Church Father of Carthage, the son of a captain, well educated, familiar with Greek, was converted to Christianity and defended its doctrines in numerous writings. His book De Baptismo (Concerning Baptism), in which he attacked infant baptism, is of especial interest to Mennonites. Very earnestly he insisted on faith as the unconditional requirement for a true baptism. This book shows that infant baptism was not yet a universal custom in the church of the second century. The Martyrs' Mirror has on its last page an address of encouragement to the martyrs who were confined in prisons at the time of the heathen emperors written by Tertullian. In 1522 Conrad Grebel procured and forwarded to Vadian a copy of the new edition of Tertullian (ed. by Beatus Rhenanus at Basel, 1521). It is probable that he read Tertullian, since he mentions him in the letter to Müntzer (1524). Menno Simons also read Tertullian. It is intriguing, but speculative to think that Tertullian's attack on infant baptism may have influenced the Anabaptists. (Mart. Mir. D 838-40, E 1139-41; ML IV.)

NEFF, H.S.B.

Terwe(n), a former Dutch Mennonite family, probably stemming from Flanders, Belgium, from where they emigrated because of persecution. It was widely ramified, one branch living at Middelburg, Rotterdam, Amsterdam, and another in Dordrecht, Rotterdam, Haarlem, Utrecht, and Gouda. In the Mennonite congregations of all these towns its members were deacons. The Dordrecht branch was leading in the Mennonite Church of this town from the early 17th century until c1725. Jacques Terwen, a preacher or a deacon of the Flemish Dordrecht congregation, signed the Dordrecht Confession in 1632. His father(?), Hendrik Terwen, d. Oct. 2, 1625, was an elder of this congregation; another Hendrik Terwen was an elder of the same congregation from 1658. In Amsterdam the Terwens were found in both the Lamist and the Zonist congregations from c1670 until the end of the 18th century. Most members of the Terwen family were well-to-do businessmen and manufacturers. Some of them, e.g., Josine Terwen of Dordrecht, and Laurens Terwen (d. 1705 at Dordrecht), also had poetic interests. Cornelis Terwe, living at Dordrecht in the 17th century, contributed a hymn to the hymnal Lusthof des Gemoeds by Claes Stapel (q.v.). vdZ.

DB 1862, 103, 104; N.N.B.Wb. V, 899; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 1770, 2099; church records of Middelburg, Rotterdam, Amsterdam, and Utrecht.

Terwey, Jan, b. Oct. 11, 1883, at Amsterdam, who in 1903 was the first Mennonite after many decades to refuse to serve in the army, military service having become compulsory in the Netherlands in 1898. This refusal, then a novelty among the Dutch Mennonites, caused some sensation in the brotherhood. Terwey, who was a painter and etcher, and beautifully illustrated a book for children by Cor Bruyn, shortly after 1920 emigrated to Switzerland. (DB 1904, 233; information by Jan Gleysteen, Amsterdam.) vdZ.

Tesch, Peter: see Tasch, Peter.

Teschenmacher, Laurenz (Lorenz), a citizen of Aachen (q.v.) in Germany, was charged there in 1533 with Lutheranism. Though in a first trial

Teschenmacher refused to give information about his heresy, it was soon proved that he was an Anabaptist and had taught the "new doctrines" in sermons which were attended by his followers. Further particulars are lacking. vdZ.

Testament is the title often given to the letters which the Anabaptist martyrs wrote to their relatives after they had been sentenced to death, particularly to their children. Anneken (q.v.) Jans of Rotterdam wrote such a "testament" to her little son, which begins with the words "Isaiah, receive your testament" (Mart. Mir. D 48, E 453); Joost (q.v.) Verkindert wrote to his children: "Keep this letter for a testament" (Mart. Mir. D 526, E 863). The testament of Soetken van den Hout(t)e to her children (found in Mart. Mir. D 277, E 646) was separately printed in 1579. vdZ.

Testamenterleütterung (Testament Explanation) Erleütterung durch auszug aus Heiliger Biblischer schrift/ tail vnd gegentail/ sampt ains tails angehangen beireden/ zu dienst vnnnd fürderung ains klaren urtails/ von wegen underschaid Alts vnd News Testaments/ vnnnd jre beder Sündtuergebung/ Opfer/ Erlösung/ Gerechtigkait/ Gnad/ Glauben/ Gaist/ Folck unnd anderm so grundtlich/ lautter vnd nutzlich nie ersehen/ genant Testament-erleütterung.

This book of over 800 pages is one of the fascinating Bible concordances (q.v.) which the Anabaptists published. They published topical concordances partly because of their devotion to the Bible and their need for this type of literature, and partly also, no doubt, because an Anabaptist book could not be so easily detected when it was written in the form of a concordance.

The Testamenterleütterung, published sometime between the beginning of 1544 and May 6, 1550, at Augsburg by the printing press of the Marpeck brotherhood, is, however, much more than simply a concordance. As the title indicates it consists of a series of excerpts from the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments (each cited an equal number of times) along with the "tail und gegentail." (These terms are related to debates, and might be translated "affirmative and negative.") In the preface the editor indicates that he will refrain from giving the position of those who insist that the Old and New Testaments are identical and that redemption was present already in the Old Testament. Since that position had received abundant publicity, the Testamenterleütterung tried to present the other side of the argument, and to show that there is a real difference. The plan of the book is simply to take a number of key concepts, such as the Holy Spirit, forgiveness, or peace, and amass Scriptural references to them, first under the heading "Yesterday," then under the heading "Today," then finally a section on "Promised Yesterday." Sometimes a section is also added entitled "Longed for Yesterday." This interesting division of history between yesterday and today, yesterday being defined as before the death and resurrection of Christ, today being defined as after these events, is a result of the Marpeck brotherhood's struggle with three opposing ideologies, (1) the Reformed position on the Old Testament, (2) the spiritualistic tendency to relegate everything to the inner man and thus also wipe out all historical progression, and finally (3) the perversion of power which had taken place upon the fringes of Anabaptism at Münster where the Old Testament was made the standard of life.

Four reasons motivated the writing of this book. First, the author wished to refute the commonly held opinion that Christ's suffering worked retroactively into the Old Testament period. To hold such a position is to deny the commonly accepted assertion in the Apostles' Creed that Christ descended into hell, for there would have been no need for Christ to proclaim redemption to the patriarchs if they had already had all the gifts of salvation. Secondly, the suffering and resurrection of Christ is slandered if it is projected into the Old Testament. Thirdly, since the New Testament is clear on the point that redemption came only through Christ, to be vague on the distinction between the Old and New Testaments means to lessen the authority of the Scripture and to imply that it contradicts itself. Fourthly, through a confusion of the relation of the two Testaments earthly power is perverted from its rightful use and used against God's divine purpose.

The abundant use made of this book by the writers of the Verantwortung as well as the testimony of Jorg Seifried at Augsburg in May 1550 indicates that the Testamentelerleütterung was written by Marpeck and his associates. The preface begs the reader not to be too concerned about the author, and if the "Beireden" (explanations) do not suit him, to read only the Scripture passages. Gerhard Hein has suggested that Leupold Scharnschlager (q.v.) is primarily responsible for the book.

The influence of the Testamentelerleütterung is seen by two references in 16th-century literature. Jacob Andrea (q.v.) warns his hearers of the Anabaptist book Today and Yesterday in his sermons at Esslingen, Württemberg (printed 1568). According to Jan Kiwiet a reference to it also occurs in Andreas Ambergius' Disputatio contra Anabaptistarum errores (Wittenberg, 1598), folio A 2. Within the Anabaptist brotherhood it is difficult not to see its influence in the Frankenthal Disputation (q.v.), where many days were spent on this precise subject of the relation of the Old and New Testaments. The Testamentelerleütterung represents the finest attempt on the part of the Anabaptists to define the relationship of the Old and New Testaments without injustice to either. It is a monument to a brilliant attempt to arrive at a Biblical theology.

Two copies of this concordance have survived to modern times. One is in the Zürich Zentralbibliothek, the other formerly in the Prussian Staatsbibliothek in Berlin.

W.K.L.

Jan J. Kiwiet, Pilgram Marbeck . . . (Kassel, 1957) 77-80; Wilhelm Wiswedel, "Die Testamentelerläuterung," Blätter für württembergische Kirchengeschichte XLI (1937) 64-76; Torsten Bergsten, "Pilgram Marbecks Auseinandersetzung mit Kaspar Schwenckfeld," Kyrkohistorisk Arsskrift, 1957 and 1958; John C. Wenger, "The Life and Work of Pilgram Marbeck," MQR XII (1938) 160 f.; Johann Loserth, ed. Quellen und Forschungen zur Geschichte des oberdeutschen Täuferturns (Vienna and Leipzig, 1929) 579-84 (Preface to Testamentelerleütterung);

Jacob Andrea, Drey und dreissig Predigen Von den furnehmsten Spaltungen in der christlichen Religion (Tübingen, 1568) Part 4, Sermon 5, p. 101 f.; H. W. Wolff, Die Einheit des Bundes. Das Verhältnis von Altem und Neuem Testament bei Calvin (1942).

Testimony. Formerly it was the custom in the congregations of the American Mennonite (MC) and Amish Mennonite groups having the plural ministry to have all the ordained men sit on "the long bench" behind the pulpit on the pulpit platform throughout the service and at the close of the sermon to have each in order of seniority, from a seated position, give a brief "testimony" to the sermon. This consisted normally of a few general comments of appreciation, endorsement, and emphasis. The first to testify concluded with the phrase "further liberty," which was an invitation to the next in order. Sometimes the testimony included a statement of disagreement with the sermon, or it might have been the simple statement "I can say yea and amen to the teaching," or "The message we have heard from the brother is according to the Word of God." The custom is still followed to some extent in the morning services in the Lancaster Conference and the Washington County, Md.-Franklin County, Pa., Conference and in two congregations of the Franconia Conference. It is uniformly followed in the Old Order Amish congregations everywhere. Among the latter it is expected that a senior layman or two will also briefly state his endorsement of the sermon, if he can sincerely do so. In some cases individuals were named by the Amish bishop to give testimony. After the testimonies, the minister who preached the main sermon leads in prayer. The custom was formerly followed also in the Volhynian Swiss churches in Kansas and South Dakota in the G.C.M. group. In Virginia (MC) usually only one minister "testified."

An anecdote is told of an Amish congregation in Johnson County, Iowa, which occurred about 1900, when a layman was called upon who had been sleeping during the sermon and who honestly stated: "I am sorry that I was sleeping and would not want to be responsible for what I did not hear, but what I heard and understood was in accord with God's Word."

The intent of the custom is clearly to (1) give united and strong support to the teaching offered, and (2) furnish a check of the content of the preaching of any one minister by all the others. Information is not available as to the antiquity of the custom or its practice in other groups, but it must have been brought from Europe to America in the earliest times, and probably goes back to the beginning of Anabaptist history, at least in Switzerland and South Germany. In Sappemeer (q.v.), Holland, in the Old Swiss congregation "after the preacher had finished his sermon other brethren spoke briefly to express their agreement with the sermon or to add a few words from the Bible."

The universal custom in the Mennonite (MC) conferences of having "testimonies" given to the conference sermon, both in the district conferences and the general conference sessions, by a number of ministers selected by the moderator, is a direct descendant of the testimony in the congregational services. It is strongly maintained in the conference sessions even though it has been dropped in the congregations. H.S.B.

Melvin Gingerich, Chapter XVII, "Church Services," in The Mennonites in Iowa (Iowa City, 1939).

Teufel, Eberhard (1884-1957), a Lutheran minister and church historian, was educated in the Württemberg seminaries at Schöntal and Urach in 1898-1902, and at the University of Tübingen 1902-6, as a student of the church historian Karl Müller. In 1910 he studied the Moravian Brethren communities at Herrnhut and Niesky. He served in various rural pastorates in Württemberg, wrote a number of articles on the history of the Herrnhut free church, and published the first scholarly biography of Rothe, the pastor at Berthelsdorf, which position was under the patronage of Zinzendorf, titled "Johann Andreas Rothe (1688-1758): Ein Beitrag zur Kirchengeschichte des sächsischen Oberlausitz im 18. Jahrhundert," in Beiträge zur sächsischen Kirchengeschichte XXX (1917) and XXXI (1918), a total of 200 pages. He participated in the Festschrift for the 70th anniversary of Karl Müller (1922) with an article, "Luther and Lutherum im Urteil Sebastian Francks." For decades he did research on the Anabaptists and Spiritualists. One result of this was the valuable historiographical report, "Täuferum und Quäkertum im Lichte der neueren Forschung," which appeared in the Theologische Rundschau 1941-48: XIII, 21-57, 103-27, 183-97; XIV, 27-52, 124-54; XV, 56-80; XVII, 161-81. He also wrote a number of articles on Anabaptist topics, among them "Der Täuferprozess gegen Pfarrer Hechtlein in Schalkhausen bei Ansbach 1529-30" (Ztscht f. bayerische Kirchengeschichte, 1949); "Religiöse Nebenströmungen der Reformation: Wiedertäufer und Schwenckfelder in der Reichsstadt Schwäbischgmünd u. im Remstal," (MS in GCL); "Die Beschlagnahme u. Verwaltung des Täufergutes durch den Fiskus im Herzogtum Württemberg im 16. und 17. Jahrhundert" (Theologische Ztscht VIII, 1952, 296-304). His only full-length book was a biography of Sebastian Franck, a favorite of his, "Landräumig, Sebastian Franck, ein Wanderer an Donau, Rhein und Neckar (Neustadt an der Aisch, 1954).

The task of organizing the papers left by the late Christian Hege, coeditor of the Mennonitisches Lexikon, led him into collaboration in the third volume of that work. He was appointed as successor to Walther Köhler after the latter's death in 1946, on the board of the Mennonitischer Geschichtsverein. He was the chief promoter of the renewed publication of the Anabaptist documents (begun in 1930), and was chosen secretary of the Täuferakten-Kommission (q.v.) which is composed of representatives of the Geschichtsverein and the Verein für Reformationsgeschichte. He had been assigned the task of editing the second volume of Württemberg Täuferakten, begun by G. Bossert, Jr., but died (June 27, 1957) before he could complete the task. He contributed a number of articles to this ENCYCLOPEDIA. His residence in the last years was Fellbach, a suburb of Stuttgart, Germany. H.S.B.

Ernst Crous, "Eberhard Teufel," Gesch.-Bl., 1955, 32-36.

Teune (Tönnen), a Dutch family descended from the Swiss Thöne family, members of which came to the Netherlands in 1711 because of persecution in Switzerland, settling first at Deventer-Kampen, later also at Sappemeer. The Thöne family in Switzerland was originally not Mennonite, though the Touny mentioned by Peachey, who was an Anabaptist at Bern in 1537, may have belonged to this family. Among the Swiss immigrants to the Netherlands in 1711 was Hans Thönen (Tonnen), a Reformed farmer from Frutigen, b. c1661, married to Catherina Ricken (Rich), who was a Mennonite. With their nine children they settled first at Deventer, but soon after near Kampen. Among these immigrants was also Peter Teune (Tönnen), unmarried, aged 25, a shoemaker, who was a preacher of the Swiss congregation at Kampen 1736-63. Descendants of this Teune family were found in the Sappemeer and Kampen Mennonite congregations until recent times, but most of them gradually left the Mennonite Church. About 1900 a descendant, J. Teune, was a deacon of the Hilversum congregation. vdZ.

Paul Peachey, Soziale Herkunft (Karlsruhe, 1954) 122, No. 286; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1323; Müller, Berner Täufer, 309, 312, 324, 325; D. L. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottsdale, 1953) 49, 65; J. Huizinga, Stamboek ... van Samuel Peter (Meihuizen) en Barbara Fry (Groningen, 1890) 25, 32, 67, 114, 115, 117.

Teunis (Tunes), Abraham, of Crefeld: see Tunis.

Teunis, Jacob, was an elder of the Janjacobsgezinden (q.v.), a branch of the Dutch Mennonites. He was ordained with Lourens Jansen by Jan Jacobsz (q.v.) himself at Hoorn in 1603. He served until 1618, in which period he was very active in visiting the congregations for baptism and communion. He baptized 670 persons and founded a number of new congregations in Friesland. A song found in the Nieuwe Gheestelijke Liedekens says that he "suffered persecution because of the truth" on the island of Ameland. vdZ.

Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 164; J. Loosjes in Ned. Archief v. Kerkgesch. XI (1914) 197, 207, 209.

Teunis Jansz, a member of the (Old) Frisian congregation at Alkmaar(?), Holland, published a letter in 1586/7 addressed to the Frisian and the Flemish Mennonites, in which he protested against the Huisko(o)per (q.v.) quarrel. Because of his moderate position he was expelled from the church at Alkmaar. (DB 1876, 31 f.) vdZ.

Texas, the largest state, area 263,644 sq. miles, in the United States, located in the south-central part of the country, is bounded on the south by Mexico and the Gulf of Mexico. It ranks sixth in population. It ranks first in the number of cattle raised, and first in number of farms, which produce wheat, cotton, rice, sorghum, oats, as well as many vegetables, fruits, and nuts. Petroleum is the leading industrial product. The agricultural opportunities as well as the mild climate of the southern part of the state attracted Mennonite settlers to Texas as early as the first decade of the 20th century. The Mennonite Year-Books of 1905-8 listed a Mennonite preacher Bernard Kroeker of Richmond, near Houston in Ford Bend County. He had 7 members of the Nebraska and Minnesota E.M.B. conference, who held their services in a schoolhouse. By 1905 Mennonite (MC) settlers arrived in the Tuleta area in Bee County, approximately 60 miles northwest of Corpus Christi. The 1907 Year-Book listed Peter Unzicker and D. S. King as preachers of this settlement. In 1957 this church, Tuleta (MC), had 10 members. E. S. Hallman was long pastor and bishop here. In the same general area northwest of Corpus Christi is Calvary Mennonite Church (MC), near Mathis, with a membership of 66 in 1957. This congregation is an outgrowth of mission activity launched in 1946. Forty miles west of Corpus Christi in Alice is a Mennonite mission (MC), started in 1958. A third MC mission, located in Corpus Christi, was started in 1956.

A second center of Mennonite settlement is in the Premont area, approximately 50 miles southwest of Corpus Christi and approximately 100 miles northwest of the extreme southeastern tip of Texas. The Mennonite Brethren moved into this region in 1927 and organized the Premont M.B. Church, which in 1952 had a membership of 53, plus a Mexican chapel with 7 members. Other Mennonites moved into this area in 1928, establishing the Falfurrias congregation (MC), now known as La Gloria, with 25 members in 1957.

Between Laredo and Brownsville along the Rio Grande River the Mennonite Brethren have established a flourishing chain of 7 missions with a total of 271 members as follows: Chihuahua at Mission 72, Grulla 52, La Casita at Garciasville 28, La Joya Chapel at Mission 6, Los Ebanos 74, Lull at Edinburg 15, Mission City Chapel at Mission 24. All the mission churches in southeast Texas work chiefly among the Mexicans.

Two Mennonite churches are located in the northwest part of the state, near the boundary of the Oklahoma panhandle. The Perryton Mennonite Church (MC), which in 1957 had a membership of 50, was begun in 1943. The Bethel Mennonite Church (GCM), in the same county at Waka, had a membership of 18 in 1957. Thus the entire Mennonite membership for Texas in 1957 was 500.

At Texline, in the extreme northwest of Texas on the New Mexico border, a C.G.C. congregation existed 1930-40. M.G.

Texas Mexican Border Mission (MC), carried on in southern Texas with Mathis as a center, where the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities erected a church in 1955. Mathis is centrally located. This mission is under the direction of the General Mission Board although it is located in the South Central Conference district. In 1945 there were 50 baptized members, scattered over the entire district; in 1957 the membership was 66. This mission was officially organized at Normanna, Tex., on Dec. 11, 1938, when A. H. Kauffman and wife, the first missionaries, became members of the Mexican Mission. On Jan. 1, 1939, Kauffman was ordained to the ministry. During the first few years David Alwine and wife and Arthur Shertz and wife were helpers in the work. On May 12, 1940, the first and only Mennonite Mexican conference was held at Normanna, with representatives present from the mission stations of Falfurrias, Tynan, and Helena. In 1944 the Calvary Mennonite Church was organized at Mathis. In September 1946 the Kauffman family returned to Indiana and the Wm. Lauver family was appointed to take charge of the work in Texas. In 1954 J. Weldon Martin was the superintendent of the mission work until June 1957, when Paul Conrad became the pastor. A voluntary service unit worked at Mathis for several years, assisting in the building of the church and other work.

In August 1958 work was begun at Alice, 35 miles southwest of Mathis, with Sylvester Zapata as licensed pastor. The mission in Corpus Christi, begun in 1956 by Don Brenneman, was continued by J. Weldon Martin. A.H.K.

Texel is the largest of the Dutch North Sea islands (1953 pop. 10,070, with 902 Mennonites); it belongs to the province of North Holland. Means of subsistence are sheep farming, flower growing, agriculture, and tourist trade. On Texel are found the villages of Den Burg (pop. 2,890), Oudeschild (775), Den Hoorn (455), De Koog (515), Oosterend (910), De Waal (275), and De Cocksdorp (345). Anabaptists-Mennonites were found on this island from shortly after 1530. The martyrs Thijs (q.v.) Olbrants and Jan (q.v.) Gerrits, executed in 1543 and 1564, were natives of Texel. Elder Lee-naert Bouwens visited the island twice in 1563-82, baptizing 13 persons there. Soon after this the Mennonites of Texel were divided into Waterlanders, Frisians, and Flemish. These branches merged gradually in the 17th-18th centuries. After 1772 there were only two congregations, that of Den Burg, Waal, and Oosterend, and that of Den Hoorn; since 1949 there has been only one congregation, called the Texel Mennonite congregation. For the early history, see Burg, Hoorn, Oosterend, and Waal.

The Mennonites of Texel, particularly in early times forming an important part of the population, could develop rather undisturbed. Only in 1649 (not 1643 as is stated in ME I, 614) there were some difficulties with the Reformed clergy and the magistrates. In this year Claes (q.v.) Arentsz, elder of Nieuwe Zijpe, on the occasion of a baptismal service at De Waal, Texel, slightly spoke of infant baptism, and was therefore arrested, but soon set free on bail. Soon after he had to return to the island to answer for his opinions to the Reformed clergy. In this dispute he was assisted by Galenus (q.v.) Abrahamsz and two other preachers of the Amsterdam Lamist congregation.

The Texel congregation now (1958) numbers 572 baptized members; meetinghouses are found at Den Burg, Den Hoorn, Oosterend, De Waal, and De Koog, whereas meetings are also organized at Oudeschild in a rented hall. The meetinghouse at De Koog was dedicated Dec. 18, 1955. At present the Texel congregation has two pastors: J. J. J. van Sluys 1954-58, Miss T. van der Zwaag since 1955, and H. van Bilderbeek since 1958. Well-known Mennonite families of Texel are Keyser, Daalder, Eelman, Roeper, and Bakker. (Blaupot t. C., Holland I, 195-97; DJ 1957, 21-25.) v.vZ.

Texline Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, now extinct, located near Texline, Dallam Co., Tex., was organized in 1930 with 40 members. H. J. Mininger was their pastor, and later Sam L. Fricke was ordained to the ministry. A meeting-house was built in 1932. Because of the drought and sandstorms, the members soon began to leave, and the congregation became extinct in 1940. H.J.M.

Teyler, a former Dutch Mennonite family. The ancestor of this family was Thomas Taylor (q.v., 1561/2-1655), who moved from England to Haarlem, Holland, where his descendants lived for about two centuries. Like their ancestor they were textile merchants and particularly manufacturers of silk. The Teyler family was very wealthy. A well-known member was Pieter Teyler (q.v.) van der Hulst. A branch of this family lived in Amsterdam c1660-c1780. Most of the Amsterdam Teylers were Zonists (q.v.), though some were Lamists (q.v.). Both in Haarlem and Amsterdam a number of Teylers were deacons. vdZ.

M. Teyler-van Geleyn, "Stamboek der Teyler's"; W. P. J. Overmeer, Teyler van der Hulst (n.p., n.d.); Mennonite church records of Haarlem and Amsterdam.

Teyler Foundation (Dutch, Teylers Fundatie) is the name of a foundation at Haarlem, Holland. Pieter Teyler (q.v.) van der Hulst willed his house with an important library, many art treasures and valuable rare items, together with a considerable amount of money to found it. The Teyler foundation, which came into being after the death of Teyler in 1778, is governed by five directors; it embraces a "Hofje," i.e., a home for aged women (founded by Teyler in 1756), a museum at Haarlem, in 1885 accommodated in a new building, containing paleontological, mineralogical, and physical sections, a coin and medal room, a collection of graphical art, including a rich collection of etchings by Rembrandt (q.v.), pictures, rare books, etc., the publication of a periodical Teyler's Theologisch Tijdschrift (1903-11, continued under the name of Nieuw Theologisch Tijdschrift 1912-46), and two scholarly associations, each administered by a board of six members. The First Association is for religion and theology, the Second for science, history, literature, and art. Both associations offer annual prizes for the best essay on a specific subject, posited by the trustees of the associations; the manuscripts, which are awarded a prize (a gold medal, or 400 Dutch guilders), are published at the expense of the foundation.

Among the prize winners there have been a rather large number of Mennonites; e.g., for the First Association, Daniel Hovens, Gerrit Hesselink (3 times), Petrus Loosjes, Cornelis de Vries, Jan van Gilse, Jacob Kuiper (3), Jeronimo de Bosch (2), Jan Kops Jac.zn, Hendrik van Voorst (3), Allard Hulshoff (3), Willem de Vos (3), Jan Brouwer (3), Willem Bruin (2), Rinse Koopmans, N. G. van Kampen (2), L. Weydmann, Chr. Sepp, and W. I. Leendertz.

Among the publications of the First Association the following deal with Mennonite history: W. J. Leendertz, Melchior Hofmann (1883); F. O. zur Linden, Melchior Hofmann (1885); J. C. van Slee, De Rijsburger Collegianten (1896); K. O. Meins-ma, Spinoza en zijn Kring (1896); and P. Kawerau, Melchior Hofmann als religieus Denker (1954).

From 1858 to 1892 the directors of the Foundation granted an annual subsidy of 1,000 guilders to the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary. vdZ.

E. van der Ven, Origine et but de la Fondation Teyler ... (1881); Chr. Sepp, Proeve eener Pragmatische Gesch. der Theologie in Nederland ... (Amsterdam, 1868) 48 f. et passim; J. Craandijk in Eigen Haard 1885, No. 10; DJ 1840, 112.

Teyler van der Hulst, Pieter, b. March 25, 1702, at Haarlem, Holland, d. there April 8, 1778, was a descendant of Thomas Taylor (q.v.), a son of Isaac Teyler and Maria van der Hulst. Pieter Teyler van der Hulst was married in 1728 to Helena Wijndand Verschaven, of Amsterdam.

He was a loyal Mennonite of somewhat liberal convictions. In 1735, when the Amsterdam Lamist (q.v.) congregation on the occasion of starting its theological seminary intended to found a General Dutch Mennonite Conference, Teyler in opposition to the views of his Haarlem co-deacons, promoted this conference ardently but vainly, for the ADS (general conference) was not founded until 1811. He served his home church, the Waterlander Peuzelaarsteeg congregation, as a deacon, and from 1750 he was trustee of the Klein Heiligland orphanage.

He was a silk manufacturer and merchant; through inheritance and through his own prosperous business he became a very wealthy man; yet he is said to have been very sober and even thrifty in his private life, at the same time a benefactor of the poor, liberally contributing to all kinds of charitable associations. In 1756 he founded a home for old women at Klein Heiligland. Being a man of study and scientific interests, Teyler, like many notable persons of this age, collected in his stately house in the Damstraat a large number of books, pictures, physical instruments, and valuable art treasures. After the early death of both his children and his wife (d. 1754) Teyler in 1756 willed his entire property to a foundation which would relieve poverty and promote science and art. (See Teyler Foundation.) vdZ.

N.N.B.Wb. V, 903 f.; DJ 1917, 21-35 (with portrait); DB 1876, 116; De Zondagsbode XXVII (1913-14), Nos. 46-47.

Tgahrt (Tjahrt), Peter, was listed as an elder of the Deutsch-Kazun (q.v.) Mennonite Church before World War I. No other information is available. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 719.) C.K.

Thaler, Hans: see Taler, Hans.

Thau (Tau) is the last letter of the Hebrew alphabet. The Latin Bible version of the Vulgate reads in Ezek. 9:4 and 6, that a part of the people of Jerusalem were marked with the "sign of tau" on their foreheads, and that these thus marked would be saved in the coming great tribulation. It was apparently Melchior Hofmann who, being acquainted with the Vulgate, introduced this expression in Anabaptism. It then means, as the martyr Anneken Jans (q.v.) points out, that "those signed by the Lord, who have received the sign of Tau on their foreheads" are "the chosen, who follow the Lamb"

(BRN II, 72, 76). The expression was used by David Joris (q.v.) in his Wonder-Boeck, but also by Menno Simons (in Opera Omnia, 1681, fol. 183a, 282b, 636a; Writings, 59, 713, 416). For Menno too it has the meaning of salvation: "So we are marked on our foreheads with the sign of Tau, Ezek. 9. So the kingdom of God is within us." In the same sense the word is used in the booklet Christelijcke Proeve (q.v.) of 1570, where the Christians are admonished to penitence, that they might be sealed with the sign of Thau in the day of judgment.

VDZ.

BRN II, 72, note 1, 76; DB 1917, 156-59; H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamsz (Haarlem, 1954) 12.

Theobald, a Mennonite elder at Worms: see Winter, Diebold.

Theobald, Zacharias, a Lutheran clergyman, published a book in 1628 with the title, Warnungschreiben vor den alten Wiedertäufern und neuen Schwärmern (new edition in 1702), in which he sought to prove that the Weigelians and Rosicrucians, etc., were Anabaptists and also to show "what misery and wretchedness they have caused" (Keller, 20 ff.). Calvary mentions this book in his catalog of rare and precious books (Berlin, 1907) on page 61 under the title, Wiedertäuferischer Geist . . . das ist: Glaubwürdiger und Historischer Bericht, was Jammer und Elend die alten Wiedertaufer gestiftet und angerichtet (Nürnberg). NEFF.

Ludwig Keller, Die Waldenser und die deutschen Bibelübersetzungen (Leipzig, 1886) 20 ff.; J. H. Ottius, Annales Anabaptistici (Basel, 1672) 4; ML IV.

Theologia Deutsch, the original name for the book described in the article Deutsche Theologie. The statement of that article that the book was written c1500 by Berthold Pirstinger has not been generally accepted by scholars, the majority of whom still hold that it was written c1400 by an unknown member of the Teutonic Order at Frankfurt.

The most recent research shows that a number of Anabaptists were familiar with the book and some even quoted from it. According to Kiwiet, Hans Denk took over from the Theologia Deutsch the term "Ordnung Gottes," which he discussed extensively in two of his writings: Was geredt sey and Ordnung Gottes und der Creaturen Werk, although he reinterpreted the content of the concept. It is possible that similarities of phrase and thought found in both Thomas Müntzer and Hans Denk may be due to the use of a common source, i.e., the Theologia Deutsch, instead of through direct influence of Müntzer's writings upon Denk.

The 16th-century Hutterites also knew and used the Theologia Deutsch. It is quoted under the title Theologia Germanica twice in Peter Walpot's article "Concerning True Surrender and True Community of Goods," written about 1577, published in English translation in MQR XXXI (1957) 59, 62.

Kiwiet holds that the Theologia Deutsch, although first rated highly by Luther (to c1523), soon became a book of the "outsiders" (his opponents), i.e., of the Anabaptists, Schwencfelders, and the later Pietists, and "became a very beloved booklet for many Anabaptists and Anabaptist leaders, especially among the South Germans and the Hutterites." He says that the Theologia Deutsch is not basically a mystical book, but an anti-mystical writing, which insists upon Christian discipleship in life rather than a concentration on inner bliss. The full significance and influence of the Theologia Deutsch for Anabaptist doctrine and history remains to be much more fully explored. H.S.B.

G. Baring, "Neues von der 'Theologia Deutsch' und ihrer weltweiten Bedeutung," Archiv f. Ref.-Gesch. XLVIII, 2 (1957) 1-10; J. Kiwiet, "Die Theologia Deutsch und ihre Bedeutung während der Zeit der Reformation," Gesch.-Bl. XV (1958) 29-35; the latest English edition with introduction is to be found in Late Medieval Mysticism (Vol. XIII of the Library of Christian Classics, ed. Ray C. Petry, Philadelphia, 1957) 327-51.

Theological Schools and Seminaries: see Seminaries.

Theology, Anabaptist-Mennonite. An old and almost universal tradition among Mennonites views "theology" with much distrust. It is well expressed in the following statement by van der Zijpp regarding the Dutch Mennonites: "From the very rise of Anabaptism Dutch Mennonites were often very averse to theology, fearing that systematic theology might be a hindrance or even a danger to real Christian piety. This is not only found among many of the martyrs, but for instance also in Galenus (q.v.) Abrahamsz and in general among those Mennonites who were influenced by Collegiant (q.v.) opinions. The fear that simple pious love for Christ might be depraved and sterilized by theological speculation is still a common phenomenon in present-day Dutch Mennonitism."

This fear of theology had its origin in part in the bitter experience of the Anabaptists (and later Mennonites) that it was the theologians who were their worst enemies, whether Lutheran, Reformed, or Catholic, and who were often responsible for prodding the rulers into harsher measures of persecution; Melancthon and Bullinger are good examples of this. Anabaptists frequently referred to the theologians as "Schriftgelehrten," i.e., "scribes" (with the New Testament overtone of condemnation as enemies of Christ). Later on in the 17th-19th centuries it was the theologically trained pastors who were the harshest critics of the Mennonites and who attempted, often without success, to prevail upon the princes to refuse to admit Mennonites to their territories, or to expel them after admission, or to forbid their public worship. The princes for their part often favored the Mennonites because of the economic advantage they brought, and were therefore on the whole more tolerant than the "theologians." Theological literature contained much bitter invective and harsh condemnation of the Mennonites.

Another root of the fear of theology was undoubtedly the experience that theological speculation and disputation was often remote from life, a type of rationalistic intellectualizing with little fruit in piety and ethics, whereas the Anabaptist-Mennonite emphasis was on newness of life, holy living, and discipleship. Some scholars hold that the Anabaptists deliberately chose not to write "theology" in the usual sense because of their basic understanding of Christianity in dynamic life terms rather than as a set of intellectual propositions to be integrated into a logically coherent whole. Anabaptist doctrine was, of course, based on a set of implied, though not always explicit, theological assumptions. And in spite of the repression of publication, and other interference with the free expression of their teachings, the writings of men like Pilgram Marpeck (q.v.), Menno (q.v.) Simons, Dirk (q.v.) Philips, Peter Riedemann (q.v.), and Peter Walpot (q.v.) are couched in coherent theological terms. Nevertheless, the Anabaptist-Mennonite movement has had little philosophical or systematic theology of the type represented by an Aquinas, Melancthon, Calvin, or Hodge; a major exception was the great Dutch 19th-century liberal theologian Sytse Hoekstra (q.v.). But it has had doctrinal expression, in major and minor topical writings, as well as in comprehensive works attempting to cover the entire field of doctrine in systematic form; these expressions have been, however, largely expositions of "Bible doctrine" and not consciously theology in the classical sense. For the Anabaptists doctrinal expression was more often than not occasional, i.e., written to meet specific needs, and therefore usually apologetic or polemic. Sometimes it was in response to attacks by the outside enemy—e.g., Menno Simons against Martin Micron (q.v.) or Gellius Faber (q.v.), Balthasar Hubmaier (q.v.) on Baptism, Pilgram Marpeck against Schwenckfeld (q.v.); sometimes it was to combat emerging error within the brotherhood—the Schleithem Confession, Menno Simons against David Joris (q.v.) or Adam Pastor (q.v.), Pilgram Marpeck against Johannes Bunderlin and the Spiritualists; sometimes it took the form of testimonies before the magistrates or to accusers in general—the Rechenschaft of Peter Riedemann, the Confession of Thomas von Imbroich, the letters and testimonies of the martyrs in the Martyrs' Mirror; sometimes it was simply to strengthen the faith of the brotherhood, such as many of the writings of Menno Simons and the Hutterite writers, and certain early tracts on attitude toward the state, such as Clemens Adler's, and the Aufdeckung der Babylonischen Hürn und Antichrists.

What the Anabaptist theological production might have been if the earlier educated leaders of Switzerland and South Germany had not been almost totally wiped out remains a matter of speculation, particularly in view of what a Marpeck, Scharnschläger, Riedemann and Walpot did achieve.

Some of the marginal Anabaptist figures, such as Melchior Hofmann (q.v.), wrote speculative eschatological treatises, and others like Christian Entfelder (q.v.) and Johannes Bunderlin (q.v.) wrote spiritualist tracts. But the main Anabaptist line eschewed these areas and emphases.

A significant amount of theological expression is to be found in the records of the Anabaptist disputations, such as Zofingen 1532, Bern 1538, Frankenthal 1571, Emden 1578, Leeuwarden 1597, at which the Anabaptist participants were compelled to respond to the challenges of the Reformed or Lutheran theologians on various points of theology. John H. Yoder reports over 40 such theological encounters in the first 20 years of Anabaptist history. It is his judgment that the transition from the more practical questions to "systematic theology" occurred at the Frankenthal debate.

In general, the "theology" of the Anabaptists was a deliberate attempt to understand and express the message of the Bible, particularly of the New Testament as it applies to life. Repeatedly appeals to opponents expressed a willingness to be taught of the Bible, and demanded in turn of the opponents that they teach from the Bible and promise obedience to the Bible. Although Anabaptist Biblicism at times turned into a simplistic and somewhat over-literalistic or even legalistic handling of the Scriptures, this was by no means general or typical of the movement. The clear distinction, characteristic of Anabaptism, made between the Old and New Testaments and the insistence upon a progressive revelation, with Christ as the norm of all Scriptural truth, is evidence of this.

In the central classic theological points of historic Christian faith the Anabaptists were in basic agreement with the major Protestant bodies. Ulrich Zwingli (q.v.) described the early Zürich Anabaptists as differing from him "only in some minor points." Some modern writers have sought to stamp the early Anabaptists as partly anti-Trinitarian. But the Italian and Polish anti-Trinitarians and Socinians (q.v.) were not a part of the Anabaptist movement, as recent research (e.g., DeWind) has shown, even though they favored adult baptism. It has likewise been shown that the charge of unitarianism against Hans Denck (q.v.), the South German Anabaptist leader, was without basis in fact. Adam Pastor (q.v.), who became a unitarian, was expelled by Menno and his coelders. There was a tinge of universalism in Hans Denck. The Christology of Menno Simons and Dirk Philips (derived apparently from Melchior Hofmann) and after them of many of the Dutch Mennonites and their descendants in West Prussia and Russia, manifested an aberration from classic Christology, similar to that of Valentinus, in that it taught that the flesh of Christ was created de novo in Mary's womb, and was not of Mary's flesh. Their concern was to secure in this way a sinless Christ, free from the taint of original sin.

Although it is true that the Anabaptists held the basic Reformation emphases of the sole authority of the Bible in matters of faith and life, and justification by faith, the interpretation of Anabaptism by some modern Mennonite historians as basically only Reformation Protestantism with a few added points such as adult baptism, the free church, and ethical earnestness, is an inadequate view. Rather, as more intense research in the documentary sources has shown, Anabaptism is theologically a major type of Protestantism with a theological focus of its own alongside of Lutheranism and Calvinism. It is related to both the latter positions, but through its emphasis on the lordship of Christ, obedient discipleship, and the visible church, it is more closely related to Calvinism.

While most Anabaptists who expressed themselves on the subject of original sin (q.v.), did not hold the typical Catholic and Reformation doctrine, they did teach the sinfulness of man, his dependence upon the grace of God and the sacrifice of Christ for forgiveness and redemption, and his need for justification by faith, regeneration by the Holy Spirit, and the continuing work of the Holy Spirit in sanctification, guidance, and strengthening. None of the above topics was the subject of conflict between the Anabaptists and the other Protestants.

In their conception of communion and baptism as symbols, the Anabaptists were Zwinglians, except for Hubmaier who was Lutheran. In their rejection of infant baptism they were not original (most Reformation thinkers at first questioned pedobaptism, often several years before 1525, often as a logical consequence of the emphasis upon justification by faith), but the Anabaptists alone in Reformation times, except for the anti-Trinitarians, adopted believers' baptism as the full consequence of the concept of responsible faith in and obedience to Christ. Baptism was for them rather the symbol of commitment to discipleship and sanctification than of cleansing from past sin.

It was in the doctrines of the church (q.v.) and discipleship (q.v.) that the Anabaptists diverged most emphatically from official Protestant theology, although their stands on certain other points, such as rejection of the oath, refusal to hold governmental office, complete rejection of participation in warfare, insistence upon separation of church and state, and advocacy of freedom of conscience, were also striking divergences which cost them heavily in opposition and persecution. They understood Christianity in terms of discipleship to Christ and acceptance of His full lordship with consequent absolute obedience, rather than chiefly enjoyment of forgiveness and peace with God through justification, although insisting on the latter. They understood salvation not primarily as the attainment of a right status but rather as the production of a right life. They did not teach sinless perfection, but did hold that the Christian can and must live a life of victory over sin, and that it is possible for the church to make measurable progress toward Christ's ideal for her as a body "without spot or wrinkle." The practice of real church discipline as universally demanded among them is evidence both of the absence of perfectionism and of the serious endeavor to attain the highest standards. That this very endeavor has led at times to harshness and schism, as well as tended toward legalism, cannot, on the other hand, be denied.

It was in the doctrine of the church that the divergence from the rest of Christendom, both Catholic and Protestant, was most complete. The Anabaptists broke completely with the medieval concept of the Christian social order (church-state) as expressed in the term "corpus christianum," substituting the "corpus Christianorum." They were the first to insist upon a free church, separate from the state, separated from the world, composed only of committed disciples, who had through personal conversion and dedication accepted Christ as Saviour and Lord. This believers' church they conceived of as a brotherhood, with leaders but without a hierarchy, with responsibility of all the members for the total life and ministry of the church, a disciplined body, a church of order. By their doctrine of the two kingdoms (not the two kingdom doctrine of Luther), the one the kingdom of Christ, the other the kingdom of this world ruled by Satan, they drew a clear line between the church and the general social order. Since the state was in this general social order "outside the perfection of Christ," although instituted by God and responsible to God, the church could have no part in it nor be subject to it in matters of faith, etc. Finally, the church was understood as a suffering church, bound to suffer in its conflict with the kingdom of this world, as it sought to create the holy community of love within its brotherhood circle, but through victorious steadfastness in suffering demonstrating that it was the body of Christ and would ultimately conquer.

In addition to its distinction from standard Protestantism the Anabaptist theological position must also be distinguished from Spiritualism (q.v.). It was Alfred Hegler of Tübingen who first (c1890) clearly distinguished Spiritualism as a distinct theological position in the Reformation period, and demarcated it from Anabaptism. The Spiritualists were individualists, sometimes bordering on mysticism, yet also rather rationalistic, who minimized external religious forms and ceremonies, in effect denied the necessity for church organization, emphasized the "inner word" of Scripture over against the "outer word," and professed to live from the special presence of the Spirit of God within. Sebastian Franck (q.v.) was the outstanding radical Spiritualist of the Reformation period; Caspar Schwenckfeld (q.v.) was one of a somewhat different type. Among the early Anabaptists there were a number of spiritualistically inclined persons (all of whom soon left the movement), such as Bänderlin, Endtfelder, Jakob Kautz (q.v.) and Obbe (q.v.) Philips. Obbe's individualistic spiritualism stood in contrast to the disciplined church concept of Menno and Dirk Philips, and was a major factor in his withdrawal in 1540. (See his Bekentenisse.)

The struggle with the Spiritualists was the chief theological conflict in the history of early 16th-century Anabaptism, and resulted in the purging of this element. William Klassen has pointed out that this separation took place as early as 1531 in Strasbourg, as is shown by the two Marpeck booklets published there in that year, the Clare Verantwurtung (q.v.), and Ain klarer vast nützlicher unterricht (q.v.), the former directed against Bänderlin, the latter against Schwenckfeld. The battle with Schwenckfeld continued for another twenty years and resulted in the outstanding theological writings of the South German Anabaptists, the Vermanung (1544), the Testamenterleütterung (1544), and the Verantwurtung (1545-50), all by Marpeck and his associates, particularly Scharnschläger (q.v.).

A central idea in Marpeck's theology was that of the covenant; according to Klassen it was more significant than the idea of discipleship. The Vermanung was called the "testimony to the covenant," the Testamenterleütterung "the explanation of the covenant." As a regulative theological concept the covenant idea holds together the divine act and man's response, God's proffered grace and man's obedience. This blending of God's part and man's part in redemption and life is a major aspect of the Anabaptist genius, transcending as it does the limitations of the sola fide doctrine, and on the other hand avoiding a pure moralism. "Covenant" is basically an Hebraic idea, and as Kiwiet has pointed out the Anabaptists were much nearer to the Hebraic world view than to that of the Greeks.

Anabaptist theology has been held by some scholars to be based largely on the Gospels, with special emphasis on the Sermon on the Mount. The evidence of the documents does not support this conclusion. Rather the Anabaptists drew their views from the entire New Testament, using the Pauline epistles and especially First Peter as well. This was particularly true of Marpeck and his associates, but also of Menno Simons.

H.S.B.

Netherlands. The early Dutch Anabaptists and Mennonites, lacking theological education, were not able to draw up an adequate scholarly theology. Neither Menno (q.v.) Simons, nor Dirk (q.v.) Philips, nor the other older leaders were real theologians; Adam (q.v.) Pastor was an exception. Neither were most Mennonite doctrinal writers of the 17th and 18th centuries scholarly theologians, even when they produced "theological" books. Among Dutch Mennonite authors whose books are theologically important are A. van Eeghem (q.v.), Galenus (q.v.) Abrahamsz, J. Rijdsdijk (q.v.), G. de Wind (q.v.), J. Stinstra (q.v.), Cornelis Ris (q.v.), Allard Hulshoff (q.v.), and W. de Vos (q.v.). The Dutch Mennonite confessions of faith are not to be considered as theological writings in a strict sense. Until the 18th century Mennonites usually occupied themselves with only such theological problems as they felt necessary for combating the views of their Catholic and particularly their Calvinist opponents. In this way, for instance, Jacob Pieters van der Meulen (q.v.) wrote about the apostolic succession (q.v.), and many authors wrote on believers' baptism. Thus 17th-century Mennonite theology generally was apologetic in character, being mostly engaged in defending the creed. This changed little even after the founding of the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary in 1735, in which philosophy, science, and the New Testament (especially for the practice of the ministry) were taught rather than systematic theology. About 1700 a few Dutch Mennonite ministers like Douwe Feddriks (q.v.) and Jacobus Rijdsdijk (q.v.), who studied theology, not for the defense of Mennonite doctrines, but for its own sake, were largely influenced by Calvinism, so that their theological systems can hardly be considered Mennonite.

Eighteenth-century Mennonite theology, such as that of J. Stinstra (q.v.), took its starting point from the conviction that the human mind as such, and human religious experience, can be the source of knowledge concerning God. These views were developed still more consistently in the modern liberal theology of the 19th century as in the system of S. Hoekstra Bzn (q.v.) and his disciples. For Hoekstra, for example, "the piety of the heart" was basic, rather than revelation in the Scriptures; the Bible had no foundational, only illustrative, value. The truth of the Bible is what the human mind (heart) has thought out (experienced) as truth. This liberal theology did not really expound in the strict sense a doctrine concerning God but rather a doctrine of the human understanding of God. It should therefore be called anthropology rather than theology. This type of theology tended strongly toward a psychological understanding of human religious experience and finally resulted in a philosophy of ethics, as is seen in the theological works of I. J. le Cosquino de Bussy (q.v.).

Though liberal theology is still very common in Dutch Mennonitism, much has changed in recent decades. Recent theological studies such as those by J. E. van Brakel, Christelijk Geloof (1934), W. Leendertz, Dogma (1917), Dogma en Existentie (1933), Rangorde van Geestelijke Waarden (1940), and Gods woord in mensenhanden (1953), and F. Kuiper, Leven uit de Hoop (1958) breathe a different spirit. Among the very few Dutch Mennonite theologians of the 19th century who did not follow Liberalism was Samuel Muller (q.v.), who taught at the Amsterdam seminary (1827-56), but who had little influence; his pupils sided largely with Modernism.

vdZ.

Germany, France, and Switzerland. The chief and really only theological writers of the Mennonites of these countries were George Hansen (q.v.) of Danzig (d. 1703) and Gerritt Roosen (q.v.) of Hamburg (1612-1711), the former writing in the old Anabaptist spirit, the latter already tinged by Pietism. Pietism exerted a significant influence in the 18th century in Hamburg, Crefeld, and the Palatinate (Peter Weber, q.v.) and in the 19th and 20th centuries in Switzerland, France, South Germany, and West Prussia. Modern religious liberalism made its inroads into Crefeld and Emden, parallel to that in the Netherlands, and to a lesser extent in Elbing and Danzig.

Russia. The century and a half of Mennonite life in Russia produced no significant theological literature, and brought forth no great changes in Mennonite piety except through the entrance of Pietism through the Mennonite Brethren movement and the introduction of millenarian doctrine in the early 20th century, largely in the M.B. group.

North America. Pietistic influence has been moderately strong in most North American Mennonite groups from the beginning in Colonial Pennsylvania, and millenarian doctrine was imported in the first quarter of the 20th century into considerable sections of all Mennonite groups in both the United States and Canada. The most conservative groups show neither influence. Only a slight touch of modern liberalistic influence was felt in the United States in one or two major groups, now largely overcome. A vigorous revival of interest in the Anabaptist theological heritage marks the middle decade of the 20th century, and there are signs of the emergence of a theology rooted in the distinctive Anabaptist-Mennonite heritage but thoroughly Biblical. A scrutiny of the theological literature produced by North American Mennonites of all branches reveals that apart from short pamphlets and a few brief specialized treatises, only two volumes of any significance have appeared, both by writers in the Mennonite Church (MC)—Bible Doctrine (1914) by Daniel Kauffman (1865-1944) and others, on a simple popular level, and Introduction to Theology (1954) by J. C. Wenger (1910-), on a more advanced level.

The latter volume is the only substantial offering of a comprehensive systematic theology by any Mennonite writer outside of Holland. (See Baptism, Bible, Church, Communion, Discipleship, Eschatology, Ethics, Free Will, Fundamentalism, Incarnation, Liberalism, Martyrdom (Theology of), Original Sin, Pietism, Sacraments, Spiritualism, in addition to articles on the various individuals named above.)

H.S.B.

The Recovery of the Anabaptist Vision (Scottsdale, 1957) contains several essays bearing on Anabaptist theology: H. S. Bender, "The Anabaptist Vision" (first published in 1944); Fritz Blanke, "Anabaptism and the Reformation"; J. H. Yoder, "The Prophetic Dissent of the Anabaptists"; Robert Friedmann, "The Doctrine of the Two Worlds"; F. H. Littell, "The Anabaptist Concept of the Church"; J. L. Burkholder, "The Anabaptist Vision of Discipleship"; Robert Kreider, "The Anabaptists and the State"; and John Oyer "The Reformers Oppose the Anabaptist Theology"; S. Hoekstra Bzn, Beginnelsen en leer der oude Doopsgezinden, vergeleken met die van de overige Protestanten (Amsterdam, 1863); J. Kühn, Toleranz und Offenbarung (Leipzig, 1923); L. von Muralt, Glaube und Lehre der schweizerischen Wiedertäufer in der Reformationszeit (Zürich, 1938); Fritz Heyer, Der Kirchenbegriff der Schwärmer (Leipzig, 1939); F. H. Littell, The Anabaptist View of the Church (n.p., 1952); J. C. Wenger, The Doctrine of the Mennonites (Scottsdale, 1950); E. Händiges, Die Lehre der Mennoniten in Geschichte und Gegenwart, nach den Quellen dargestellt (Kaiserslautern, 1921); Cornelius Krähn, Menno Simons (1496-1561) (Karlsruhe, 1936); H. W. Meihuizen, "Spiritualistic Tendencies Among the Dutch Mennonites of the 16th and 17th Centuries," MQR XXVII (1953) 259-304; G. D. Kauffman, "Some Theological Emphases of the Early Anabaptists," MQR XXV (1951) 75-99; the MQR XXIV (January 1950) contains a series of articles on Anabaptist theology reporting the papers of the Anabaptist Theological Seminar held at Goshen College in 1949, including Robert Friedmann's "Anabaptism and Protestantism" and H. S. Bender's "Anabaptist Theology of Discipleship"; D. E. Smucker, "Theological Triumph of the Early Anabaptists," MQR XIX (1945) 5-26; Heinold Fast, "The Dependence of the First Anabaptists on Luther, Erasmus, and Zwingli," MQR XXX (1956) 104-19; C. J. Dyck, "The Christology of Dirk Philips," MQR XXXI (1957) 147-155; H. S. Bender, Conrad Grebel (Goshen, 1950); J. J. Kiwiet, Pilgram Marbeck (Kassel, 1957).

Theology of Martyrdom, a substantial and significant treatment of certain aspects of early Anabaptist theology, written by Ethelbert Stauffer, in an essay, "Märtyrtheologie und Täuferium." Using original source material drawn largely from the Martyrs' Mirror, the Ausbund (q.v.), Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, the Hutterite Geschicht-Buch, and Menno Simons' works, Stauffer presents an integrated Anabaptist vision of victory for the church and the kingdom of Christ through suffering and martyrdom, in which the Anabaptist martyrs are seen as following in the footsteps of the suffering saints of the Old and New Testaments and most of all in those of Christ Himself. (See Martyrdom, Theology of.) H. W. Meihuizen wrote on the theology of the martyrs as found in the Offer des Heeren.

H.S.B.

Ethelbert Stauffer, "Märtyrtheologie und Täuferium," in Ztschft f. Kirchengeschichte XLII (1933) 545-98; the article appeared in English translation in MQR XIX (1945) 179-214; H. W. Meihuizen, "De geloofswereld onzer martelaren, voor zover die af te lezen valt uit het Offer des Heeren," in Algemeen Doopsgez. Weekblad V (1951) Nos. 35-50; idem, "De verwachting van de weder komende Christus en het rijk Gods bij de Oude Doopsgezinden," in Stemmen uit de Doopsgez. Broederschap III (1954) No. 3, 42-50.

Thessalonica (Saloniki), a city of Greece which belonged to the Ottoman (Turkish) Empire in the 16th century. Its population is mixed Greek and Macedonian (Slavic). From a hymn in the Ausbund (all editions since 1785, pp. 892-95) it has been known that contacts once existed between certain Brethren in this city and Anabaptists in Moravia. Recent research has cleared up the matter, proving that such contact was of a twofold nature. (a) Italian anti-Trinitarians (q.v.) around Venice had to flee from the Inquisition in that city soon after 1550; some of them went to Moravia and joined the Hutterites (see Sega, della) while others went to Thessalonica where the Moslems granted them asylum. Among the latter was Antonio Rizzetto (q.v.) who, however, after a time became disillusioned with his group in Thessalonica. Having received letters from Francesco della Sega (q.v.) saying that he had found the true church of Christ in Moravia, Rizzetto went there c1560. Beck (Geschichts-Bücher, 211-12) gives the story in some detail, based on a letter of 1601 by Claus Braidl who vividly remembered the event. Whether Rizzetto came alone or with a group of Brethren from Thessalonica the letter does not say.

(b) Another event involving these two groups c1550 is related in the Martyrs' Mirror (D 400-2, E 365-67) on the basis of an old Dutch booklet called Het Brilleken (1630). Three "Greek Brethren" had undertaken the long journey from Thessalonica to Moravia (Nikolsburg and Pausram, q.v.) to inquire about these spiritually kindred Brethren. The Hutterite communal life did not, however, appeal to them. They went to the Swiss Brethren, likewise at Pausram, whose life and thinking they liked extremely well. Conversation was carried on in the Latin language. The account of their faith given by the "Greek Brethren" was then written down in the form of a "Confession." This document was carefully preserved (in German) and was copied a number of times by later Mennonites (a copy in GCL). This document shows, however, that the visitors came not from Thessalonica but from Larissa in Thessaly, some 120 miles to the south of Thessalonica. When the three Greeks left, one of them, a tailor, left his shears with the Swiss Brethren as a souvenir. From the records it appears unlikely that the Greeks went to other places; Mehrning (q.v.) in 1646 claimed (on hearsay only) that they went as far as the Netherlands.

The character of the Greek visitors is not easy to determine. Their Confession sounds like a Swiss Brethren confession. The most likely conjecture is that they were Greek-Slavic Bogomiles (q.v.). They claimed to have manuscripts from the time of the apostles; but very likely these documents were of more recent origin (though centuries old, written in Old Slavonic). Nothing positive is known about the source of their information about the Anabaptists. The claim of Het Brilleken that in the 1530's the Turks had taken an Anabaptist as a prisoner from Moravia to Thessalonica where he spread the news of his Anabaptist church must be taken with much reservation. The Turks did not invade Moravia at that time. The visit of 1550 did not lead to any further contacts.

The Ausbund hymn, "O Herr, thue auf die Lefzen mein," seems to be based on the story in the Martyrs' Mirror, having been composed sometime before 1695. Unfortunately it is marred by many serious inaccuracies and should not be used as an historical source. R.F.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Robert Friedmann, "Christian Sectarians in Thessalonica and Their Relationship to the Anabaptists," MQR XXIX (1955) 54-69; H. A. DeWind, "Anabaptists in Thessalonica," ibid., 70-73; ML IV.

Theunis (Teunsen), Jacob, was an elder of the Janjacobsgezinden (q.v.) in the Netherlands. He was ordained at Hoorn on Sept. 20, 1603, by Jan Jacobsz himself. Theunis, who was active until 1618, doing much traveling, baptized 700 persons. He also stayed in Prussia, where he baptized a few persons. (Blaupt t. C., Friesland, 164; DB 1889, 4.)
vdZ.

Theunis Teeckssen (Anthonis Frederick), of Naarden, Holland, a Sacramentist (q.v.) martyr, executed on Oct. 26, 1529, at The Hague, after he had been in prison for two years. On the way to the scaffold Theunis is said to have sung the hymn "Ick arm schaep aen groener heyde" (I, poor sheep in the green moor), which was a very popular hymn among the early Dutch Mennonites. The martyr Reytsen (q.v.) Aysesel also sang this hymn. It is inserted in Veelderhande Liedekens of 1556 and a number of old Mennonite hymnals. vdZ.

J. G. de Hoop Scheffer, Geschiedenis der Kerkhervorming in Nederland ... tot 1531 (Amsterdam, 1873) 587-91.

Theunis Theunisz, a Mennonite preacher either at Vlaardingen or at Dordrecht, preached at Klundert (q.v.) in the Dutch province of North Brabant; the meeting, attended by about 50 persons, was surprised by the police and a number of those present were arrested and after trial put to death at Breda (q.v.). Theunis and many others, however, were able to escape. (DB 1912, 31-33.) vdZ.

Theunis (Theunis, Anthoen) van Waesten(e), an Anabaptist martyr, is identical with Anthonis Schoonvelt (q.v.). vdZ.

Theunisz (Teunis), Jacob, b. c1569 at Leer, d. 1625 at Emden, was a cloth merchant at Amsterdam and about 1620 a deacon of the Amsterdam Waterlander Mennonite church. He was married to Pietertgen Lubbertsdochter, the daughter of Elder Lubbert Geritsz (q.v.) and was a loyal and liberal member of the church. All of his children were important leaders. They are Anthoni Jacobsz (q.v.), surnamed Roscius, a physician and preacher at Hoorn, Lambert Jacobsz (q.v.), a noted painter and preacher at Leeuwarden, Isaak Jacobsz Rooleeuw (q.v.), a silk merchant at Amsterdam, and Jacob(us) Rooleeuw (q.v.), a dyer and preacher at Amsterdam. vdZ.

Theunisz (Tonissen, Anthonisz), Jan, who called himself also, Joannes Antonides, a Dutch Mennonite,

b. at Alkmaar c1569, d. 1637(?) at Amsterdam. This highly gifted but turbulent man is one of the most remarkable personalities among the Dutch Mennonites. With his fiery eyes, his protruding nose, and his long beard reaching to his belt he was a conspicuous figure. He married four times: first to N. N., then to Metgen Claesd., thereupon (1603) to Trijntgen Adriaans van Alckmaer, and finally (1612) to Swaentien Hillebrants of Amsterdam. At first a thread twister, he settled at Leiden as a book printer c1599, at the same time operating a bookshop, which was transferred to Amsterdam in 1604, where he soon added his own type foundry. From 1606 he also ran a well-known inn, called "D'os in de Bruyloft," also called "de Menniste Bruiloft" (wedding-party). This inn was an unusual place; it was provided with many curiosities and objects of art; musical performances were given there, attended by the upper ten of Amsterdam; among the regular visitors were Joost van den Vondel (q.v.) and the Waterlander preachers Wybrandsz, Hesseling, and Anso. Another business of this man was the distilling and sale of brandy. But first and foremost Jan Theunisz was a man of learning. Though a self-made man, he knew many languages, not only German and French, and probably also English, but also Latin and Greek, and even Hebrew, Arabic, and Ethiopian. Among the books he printed and published were Verscheyden Schriftuerlijke Liedekens (Scriptural hymns) (1603), a book by the Flemish Elder Claes Claesz (q.v.), a number of books by Coornhert (q.v.), Coolhaas, and other liberal theologians, a kind of newspaper, but also books which he translated from the Hebrew, the first in this language ever published in the Netherlands. The pamphlets and poems he wrote were usually anonymous, bearing the devices "Jaecht naet Beste" (Strive for the best) or "een liefhebber der waarheyt" (a friend of the truth). In 1612 he was appointed professor of Arabic at the Leiden University, but already in 1613 he had to give up his professorship because it was considered improper to tolerate a Mennonite in the university; in 1617-26 he taught Hebrew at the "Duytse Academie" at Amsterdam.

Jan Theunisz was a member of the Amsterdam Waterlander congregation, but he was a troublesome member and the church board had much to do with him. In 1612 he was censured for some unknown dissension; again in 1613 because he had offended his brother-in-law contrary to I Cor. 6:4, 6; in 1615 because of a quarrel with his wife. But this was only a prologue to what followed: from 1621, when a conflict arose in the congregation between Nittert Obbes (q.v.) and the other preachers, Theunisz sided with Obbes. He published the polemic drawn up by Obbes, gave it the offensive title of Raeghbesem (1625, q.v.). On Dec. 21, 1625, Jan Theunisz disturbed the communion service in the Waterlander "Groote Spijker" meetinghouse, causing much offense by his foolish conduct; thereupon he was banned (Jan. 25, 1626). He attacked the Amsterdam preachers in a number of pamphlets, and also the Waterlander leader Hans de Ries (q.v.), who defended them against Obbes. Among these publications were Der Hanssijsche Mennisten Socinianismus, and Der Hanssijsche Menniste Gheest-drijveren Historie, both in 1627 at Amsterdam. On Dec. 17, 1634, Theunisz became reconciled with the church, confessing his guilt "in that he had done wrong in word and with writing." vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 1206, 1225; H. F. Wijnman, "Jan Theunisz alias Joannes Antonides . . .," in Jaarboek Amstelodamum XXV (1928) 29-123; Kühler, Geschiedenis II, passim.

Thielemann von Nunkirchen: see Nunkirchen, Thieleman von, where the page reference to Mart. Mir. D 143 should be corrected to 132. The article Christian (ME I, 577) requires the correction of Blankenburg, Holland, to Blankenberg in the Duchy of Jülich. vdZ.

Thielman Naeberchs (Naebrechts), an Anabaptist martyr drowned on Jan. 27, 1560, at Antwerp, Belgium, with three other brethren. In the hymn "Aenhoort God, hemelsche Vader," found in Offer des Heeren, this martyr is simply called Thielman. Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror does not name him. Some particulars have been published by P. Génard: Thielman Naeberchs was a native of Milleghen (?) and a tailor by trade. He lived at Antwerp; his furniture was confiscated. vdZ.

Offer, 567, No. 62; Bibliographie II, No. 570; Antw. Arch.-Bl. IX, 6, 10, 18; XIV, 28 f., No. 308.

Thielt: see Tielt.

Thielt, Paulus van, a Dutch elder: see Paulus van Meenen.

Thiendorf and Preussisch Rosengarth, a former Mennonite congregation situated south of Elbing and east of Marienburg, West Prussia. The origin of the congregation, which was originally called the Kleinwerder congregation since it was not permitted to build a meetinghouse and could therefore not be named for a village, dates back to the Reformation. Dutch Mennonites are mentioned for the first time in Wengeln on the north shore of Lake Drausen in 1557. But they had no doubt been there for some time previously, at least since 1543, when the Anabaptists were expelled from the neighboring Prussian Oberland. The records show that by 1590 the west shore of Lake Drausen with the meadowlands of Kampenau, Markushof, Eschenhorst, and Rosengarth (about 150 hides) was in the hands of the Dutch settlers. (For the settlement of the Lake Drausen Lowlands, see West Prussia.) In 1586 Koen Hendrichs, Hans van Mechelen, Jacob Smet, and Long Dirk were representatives of the Kleinwerder congregation.

The congregation seems to have received its stamp from Jan Gerrits van Embden, who came to West Prussia in 1607 because as a Waterlander he did not like the many schisms among the Mennonites in the Netherlands. He was chosen as elder in the Kleinwerder congregation. He was at the same time elder of the United Frisian, Waterlander, and High German congregation in Danzig. As late as 1786 Elder Gerhard Wiebe of Ellerwald called the Kleinwerder congregation "Waterlandish."

Gerrits van Embden traveled to Moravia in 1610 and visited the five High German congregations there (see West Prussia). There had been contacts for some years between his congregation in the Kleinwerder and Moravia. In 1604 Josef Hauser, a Hutterite preacher in Moravia, with seven other Hutterites and their wives, came to Prussia. They took a lease for ten years on a farm in the Kleinwerder at Wengeln to establish a Bruderhof for seventy-three persons. Some West Prussian Mennonites were also admitted. But the relations were apparently not the best, for the Hutterite chronicle records that when the Mennonite party was to come to communion Peter von Hasel (Hasselt?) and his wife refused to do so, and were banned for defaming the Bruderhof, accusing it of starving its people.

Since competition with the Elbing craftsmen also created difficulties the Hutterites soon sold their Bruderhof. But there were apparently some Hutterites in the Marienburg Lowlands in after times, perhaps even an independent congregation, for in 1700 Abraham Hartwich wrote in his description of the Werder, "A distinction is made in the Werder between the Manists of two branches, the 'Fine' or Flemish and the 'Coarse' or Frisians. . . . The latter condemn all other sects of the Anabaptists, including the Hutterites, but they gladly receive them when they have been expelled from other Mennonite groups. Therefore they are also called 'Garbage carts'" (Hartwich, 279). Apparently at the beginning of the Thirty Years' War, when the Hutterites were expelled from Bohemia, a considerable number of them came to West Prussia, especially to the Kleinwerder, and were absorbed by the Mennonites.

Worship services were held in homes for a long time. In 1728 the congregation met at Markushof at the home of the elder Melchior Froese. In that year they received permission from the Bishop of Culm to build a meetinghouse. Hitherto a barn had served the purpose, into which benches were carried for the congregation.

The Kleinwerder Mennonites belonged to the Frisian wing. In 1772, when Polish Prussia was incorporated into Prussia, an attempt was made to unite the Flemish and Frisian congregations. The representatives of the Frisians, in order to make a concession to the Flemish, pledged themselves to prohibit mixed marriages with Catholics and Lutherans. On this point conflict arose within the Frisian congregations which in 1791 led to the schism of the minority of the Kleinwerder members under Elder Sperling, who favored the more liberal position. This group built a meetinghouse in Markushof (q.v.) and organized a congregation. The original congregation kept the meetinghouse in Thiendorf. A healing of the schism occurred in 1888 when the dam broke at Jonasdorf and the Nogat River flooded the Kleinwerder. Together they built a new meetinghouse in 1890 at Preussisch Rosengarth. This meetinghouse, contrary to Mennonite custom, had a tower.

The revival movement of New Pietism affected some of the West Prussian Mennonites. Johann Quiering of Preussisch Rosengarth, elder of the Thiendorf congregation 1848-63, was deeply pietistic. His example was no doubt fruitful in his congregation.

It was especially among the Kleinwerder Mennonites that a new impulse of deepening religious life occurred in the late 19th century, coming from the Gemeinschaftsbewegung (q.v.). In their homes they held Bible study meetings and prayer meetings, as well as practicing the customary Mennonite neighborly love. Johann Wieler established several homes for orphans, which were under the management of the institution called Friedenshort.

When the mass exodus of the Mennonites from West Prussia set in in 1945, Cornelius Dirksen remained in the community as the only West Prussian elder, under extreme difficulties serving his people in spite of his own physical weakness. Among the many who died of privation he also buried his wife, who died in 1947. In October 1947 he was expelled from West Prussia.

According to a number of letters written to the Amsterdam Committee for Foreign Needs (May 19, 1767, and Aug. 2, 1767) the Thiensdorf congregation in 1767 then numbered 2,000 souls; the Lord's Supper was attended by 1,200 members. In 1852 the congregation had 808 baptized members, in 1887 766 and 349 children, in 1939 1,124 members. The elders of the last 200 years were Melchior Froese 1728, Johann Peters of Markushof c1730, Heinrich Peters of Markushof c1730 (lived and died in the church building), Jacob Siebert of Nogathau c1758-84, his son Johann Siebert, preacher 1770, elder 1785-98, Wilhelm Martens of Thiergarth 1798-1833, Franz Cornelson of Thörichthof, preacher 1808, elder 1834-48, Johann Quiring of Preussisch Rosengarth, preacher 1823, elder 1848-63, Johann Penner of Thiensdorf 1864-89, Johann Kädtler of Alt-Rosengarth 1889-1912, Johann Cornelson of Thiensdorf 1912-22, Cornelius Dirksen of Markushof 1922-47. H.P.

Heinrich Wiehler, "Aus der Geschichte der Vereinigten Mennonitengemeinde Thiensdorf-Markushof," in Menn. Bl., 1928, 92-94, 99 f., 108 f.; Emil Händiges, "Zum 200-Jahrfeier des Baus der ersten Mennonitenkirche in Thiensdorf," Menn. Bl., 1928, 56-58; Naamlijst 1793, 58 f.; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1571-78, 1703-12; idem II, 2, Nos. 735 f., 857; Ernst Crous, "Vom Pietismus bei den altpreuussischen Mennoniten im Rahmen ihrer Gesamtgeschichte 1772-1945," Gesch. Bl., 1954, 7-29; "Zwei verdiente Aelteste aus der ehemaligen Gemeinde Thiensdorf-Preussisch Rosengarth, Westpreussen," Gem.-Kal., 1953, 23-26; Abraham Hartwich, Geogr.-histor. Landesbeschreibung der drei im poln. Preussen liegenden Werder (Königsberg, 1722); Wolkan, Geschichts-Buch, 470 ff.; Hans Alenson, Tegen-Bericht op de voor-Reden vant groote Martelaar Boek 1630, BRN VII; ML IV.

Thiers, Barbara von: see Barbara von Thiers.

Thierstein, John R. (1867-1941), a Mennonite (GCM) teacher of modern languages, editor and conference worker, was born in Bowil, Swiss canton of Bern, July 22, 1867. In 1882 the family came to America and settled on a farm near Whitewater, Kan. He attended the Mennonite Seminary at Halstead, graduating in 1892, and secured his A.B. degree in 1896 from the University of Kansas. On Oct. 2, 1895, he married Margaret M. Dirks.

Thierstein had begun his teaching career upon his graduation from the Halstead Seminary. He taught in several Kansas schools 1896-1903, and at Bethel College 1903-4. In 1904 he became president of Freeman Junior College, serving for four years. In 1908 he returned to Switzerland for graduate work, receiving his Ph.D. from the University of Bern in 1910. His dissertation was entitled Novalis und der Pietismus (Bern, 1910). For five years he then served as principal of the Atchison County (Kansas) High School. In 1915-21 he served on the faculty of Bluffton College, after which he came to Bethel College where he served until his death in such capacities as professor of education, German, and French, director of the teacher placement bureau, and editor of the Bethel College Monthly (q.v.).

Thierstein also served many years as a member of the General Conference Board of Publication, being chairman at the time of his death (1941). He had served two terms as secretary of the G.C.M. Church and was a member of the Historical Committee of the General Conference at the time of his death. In 1937-41 he was editor of The Mennonite (q.v.). As chairman of the Board of Publication he also contributed substantially toward the production of the Mennonite Hymnary. While in Switzerland the Thiersteins had adopted a son, Frederic Novalis, who died as a young man in 1926. J.F.S.

Thies (de) Droochscheerder, a follower of the revolutionary Anabaptist leader Jan (q.v.) van Geelen, was active at Antwerp, Belgium, in 1535, but like other Münsterites in Belgium he had practically no success. (Vos, Antwerpen, 217.) vdZ.

Thiessen (Thiesen, Tiessen, Tyssen, Tieszen), a family name common among Mennonites of Prusso-Russian background, was first entered in the Danzig record in 1685. The name was common in Tiegenhagen, Ladekopp, Rosenort, Fürstenwerder, Heubuden, Elbing, Königsberg. Bernhard Thiessen (q.v.) was a minister at Ibersheim, Germany. Dirk Tiessen was a preacher of the Old Flemish Grosswerder congregation, serving as elder of the Petershagen district from 1755, and of the entire Grosswerder congregation 1767-after 1802. Peter Thiessen Sr. and Peter Thiessen Jr. were preachers of the Danzig Flemish church from 1774 and 1800. From Prussia the name was transplanted to Russia. B. H. Unruh lists seventeen bearers of the name who moved to Russia. Outstanding was Johann Thiessen, who owned a flour mill in Ekaterinoslav and was a benefactor of Mennonite causes. He was killed in 1920. Julius J. Thiessen, of the Molotschna, Russia, was an outstanding minister and teacher. Jacob Thiessen, b. 1888 at Olgafeld in Fürstenland, Russia, emigrated to the Netherlands in 1914, and served as minister in the Mennonite congregations of Ouddorp 1939-45 and Blokzijl 1946-53. John Thiessen, of North Newton, Kan., was a missionary in India and is now executive secretary of the Board of Missions of the General Conference Mennonite Church. Jacob J. Thiessen, pastor of the First Mennonite Church of Saskatoon, Sask., has been chairman of the Canadian Mennonite Board of Colonization and president of the Conference of Mennonites in Canada for many years. Franz C.

Thiessen (q.v.) was an able educator and minister of the Mennonite Brethren in Canada. Dirk P. Tieszen was a minister (GCM) at Marion, S.D. His son Edward D. Tieszen was the owner of the Tieszen Clinic at Marion. C.K., vdZ.

Reimer, Familiennamen, 119; A. A. Töws, Mennonitische Märtyrer I (N. Clearbrook, 1949) 151; Unruh, Hintergründe.

Thiessen, Abraham, a Russian Mennonite, expelled from Russia because of his courageous opposition to Russian injustice, fled to Switzerland, arriving in Zürich on May 15, 1876. He published the following writings: Ein Rätsel, oder die Frage: weshalb war ich vom Jahre 1874-76 in Verbannung?; Die Lage der Deutschen Kolonisten in Russland (Leipzig, 1876); and Ein Brief, nur für die Mennoniten im berdjanskischen Kreise (Odessa, 1872).

John Horsch, Kurzgefasste Gesch. der Mennoniten (Elkhart, 1890) 126; Menn. Bl., 1876, 95; ML IV.

Thiessen, Bernhard (1814-55), a minister of the Ibersheim (q.v.) Mennonite Church, was born in Danzig, Germany, studied theology at the universities of Berlin and Bonn, and was the first theologically trained and professional Mennonite minister in Ibersheim (q.v.). On June 11, 1843, on a journey, he had preached a sermon in the Ibersheim Mennonite Church, and was thereupon chosen on July 16, 1843, as minister of the congregation. On Sept. 17, 1843, he was ordained as elder by Johannes Risser (q.v.), minister of the Sembach Mennonite Church. On June 22, 1845, he married Henriette Sophie Mathilde Schmidt (d. 1849) of Danzig. He performed the functions of his office until May 28, 1855, when he died of a stroke. (ML IV.) A.Br.

Thiessen, Franz C. (1881-1950), a high-school teacher, minister, and musical editor of the Mennonite Brethren Church, was born Aug. 6, 1881, in Rückenau, South Russia, the son of Cornelius and Katharina Nickel Thiessen. He was married twice, first on Aug. 19, 1901, to Lydia Wieler (d. 1908) of Rückenau, and on April 10, 1910, to Margareta Wieler of Rückenau. He had six children. Thiessen received his education in the Ohrloff Zentralschule 1895-97, the normal school at Halbstadt 1898-99, and private studies at Theodosia, Sevastopol, and Kharkov.

Thiessen served for many years in educational work. His work included teaching in the elementary school at Reinfeld, Zagradovka settlement of South Russia 1901-2, the Rückenau Academy 1905, the Alexanderkrone Zentralschule 1906-8, the Davlekanovo Zentralschule 1911-24, the German-English Academy of Rosthern, Sask., 1925-32, the Bible School at Winnipeg, Man., 1932-39, and the Mennonite Brethren Bible School at Abbotsford, B.C.; he was connected with the Mennonite Educational Institute at Abbotsford from 1944 until his death, first as a cofounder and the first principal and later as a teacher. He was ordained to the ministry in 1937 and was pastor of the Northend M.B. Church in Winnipeg 1940-43. In 1924 he was the director of the Mennonite emigration from Russia, in 1924-

25 editor of Der praktische Landwirt, and in 1936-40 editor of Der kleine Afrikabote.

Franz C. Thiessen was a gifted musician, contributing in both Russia and Canada to choral work. He was rated an authority in this field, and compiled many books of songs for choirs and Sunday schools. He was chairman of the song committee of the M.B. Conference, and his largest and latest work was the new German hymnal for the M.B. Conference. He was also very active in youth work and published several books, Knospen und Blüten, with poems and dialogs for youth meetings. He compiled and published textbooks in German and religion for Canadian Mennonite schools, taught Sunday school, preached, and was very active to the day of his death, Feb. 24, 1950. H.F.K.

Thiessen, Johann, a Mennonite from Russia, was a missionary of the Dutch Mennonite Mission Association on the island of Sumatra (q.v.), Indonesia. In July 1901 he took the place of both Nicolai Wiebe (q.v.) and Gerhard Nikkel (q.v.) at Muara Sipongi (q.v.), serving until 1912. The Board of the Association was dissatisfied with Thiessen's work, since he was more Baptist-minded than Mennonite. In 1912 upon his return to Europe he became a Protestant missionary at Brussels, Belgium. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 554 ff.) vdZ.

Thijmon Hendriksz (Thomas Henriczn), an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded April 12, 1537, at Amsterdam, because he had attended forbidden meetings (of the Anabaptists). He had been rebaptized about three years previously and held heretical views. The sentence in full is published by van Braght. Thijmon was a native of Kampen in the Dutch province of Overijssel. (Mart. Mir. D 415, E 766; Grosheide, Bijdrage, 140 f., 307.) vdZ.

Thijs Gerrits: see Gerrits, Thijs.

Thijs Hendriksz (Tijs Hermansz), an Anabaptist martyr, executed at Leeuwarden in Friesland, Netherlands, on May 2, 1553. Thijs, who was paralyzed, was put to death with a young woman, Berendge (q.v.), by drowning. They were bound into a sack and thrown from a boat into the town moat. After the sentence was pronounced Thijs protested against the plan of a secret execution and said, "Cats and dogs are thus drowned." They wanted to be executed publicly at the official place of execution, desiring to give a testimony of faith before the bystanders.

There is a song commemorating the firmness of faith of these two martyrs: "Een nieuwe liet heb ic gedicht, van twee schaep wtgekoren." This hymn, found in the hymnal Veelderhande Liedekens, is included by Wackernagel. (Mart. Mir. D 150, E 539; Wackernagel, Lieder, 131.) vdZ.

Thijs Joriaensz (Jeuriaensz), an Anabaptist martyr, executed at Muiden, Netherlands, in 1569 (exact date unknown), with Jan (q.v.) Claesz by burning at the stake "chained together like horses." Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror, following the martyr book of 1626, whose authors obtained data from Simon Fijts (q.v.), a Mennonite preacher of Texel, gives a circumstantial report about these martyrs. Thijs was a native of Rarop (Ransdorp near Amsterdam) and a "dienaer int woord" (preacher). While visiting the congregation of Muiden (q.v.) with Jan Claesz, where Thijs was to preach, they were apprehended and imprisoned in the castle of Muiden for about half a year. Thereupon they were conducted to The Hague, where they remained in arrest for half a year, and then returned to the Muiden castle. After another stay there of about three months they were sentenced and executed.

Van Braght includes two letters by Thijs, one written on the 15th day of his imprisonment and addressed to his "brethren and sisters," i.e., the members of his congregation (at Ransdorp?), and one dated at The Hague Feb. 5, 1569, to the congregation of Edam (q.v.) in North Holland. Van Braght reports that he chose from the letters written by Thijs Joriaensz which had been published before. Of these the following editions are known (some may have been lost): Een Christelijke Sentbrief geschreven wter gevangenisse, van de Sendinghe, Inleydinge ende coemste Jesu Christi, followed by Eene hertgrondelijke en Christelijke Sentbrief, and a hymn by Thijs (n.p., 1577; repr. n.p., 1579; Haarlem, 1586), and Een Christelijke Sentbrief, van de sendinghe, Inleydinge ende coemste Jesu Christi in deser werelt . . . (Amsterdam, 1586). Of a booklet by Thijs Joriaensz and Job (q.v.) Janze, Twee brieven . . . met een cleyn voorrede with four hymns (n.p., 1609) there is only one copy extant, and of this only the first part. It is found in the Amsterdam Mennonite library. These letters by Thijs and Job Janze were addressed to the Frisian leaders Jan (q.v.) Willems and Lubbert Gerritsz (q.v.).

Unlike most of the martyrs, Thijs took part in the schisms which arose at this time among the Dutch Mennonites, dividing them in several branches. Thijs sided with Dirk (q.v.) Philips and the Flemish branch, vehemently asserting that the Frisians were wrong. In his letter he insisted on keeping the congregation "on a solid base and cleansing it from aberrations." These passages in question are not found in van Braght, who shortened the letters. The hymn composed by Thijs, "Ick roep tot u o schepper mijn, waer sal ick zijn?" is included in Wackernagel, Lieder. Letters by Thijs Joriaensz in a French translation are found in Enchiridion ou Manuel de la Religion Chrestienne . . . (n.p., 1608), containing works of Dirk Philips, Menno Simons, and others, translated by Virgile de Las.

vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 480-89, E 833-41; Bibliographie I. 205-12, 660 f.; Wackernagel, Lieder, 207; Blaupot t. C., Holland I. 27; Biogr. Wb. IV, 574 f.; DJ 1840, 64 f.; DB 1870, 51; 1887, 116; 1893, 62; 1899, 78, 90 f., 104, 138.

Thijs Olbrants, an Anabaptist martyr, a native of the Dutch island of Texel, was sentenced to death by the Court of Holland at The Hague on Sept. 15, 1534, and beheaded the same day or the next. Thijs, who had been among the Anabaptists who sailed in March 1534 from Amsterdam in order to go to Münster (q.v.) in Westphalia, was arrested near Bergklooster (q.v.) but released upon recantation.

But soon after he was again active, reading the Scriptures in Mennonite meetings, and was apprehended a second time and now, remaining steadfast, sentenced to death. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 744 f.; DB 1873, 140; 1917, 115, No. 47; ML III, 297.)

vdZ.

Thijs in die Starre (Mathys Spangemecker), an Anabaptist of Maastricht (q.v.) in the Netherlands, who after recanting was beheaded at Maastricht on Feb. 4, 1535. With some 15 or 16 others he had been arrested on Jan. 28, 1535. They were all members of the congregation founded by Henric Rol, and after his martyrdom in September 1534 were led by Jan Smeitgen (q.v.). In the trial of Thijs and the others interesting information about the congregational life and views of this Maastricht Anabaptist congregation was given. There was a growing Münsterite (q.v.) spirit among these Maastricht Anabaptists. The whole group recanted except Bartholomeus (q.v.) van den Berge and Mente (q.v.) Jan Heynendochter. Thijs's wife, also a member of the congregation, fled after the execution of her husband; the city board took care of their children.

vdZ.

W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik . . . I (The Hague, 1937) 116-18 et passim.

T(h)ijs-Gerritsvolk, a branch of the Dutch Mennonites, followers of Elder Thijs Gerrits (q.v.), who separated from the main Frisian body in 1589 together with Elder Jan Jacobsz (q.v.); but in 1599 he left the Jan Jacobsz group. The Thijs-Gerritsvolk were a branch of the strict Frisians (Harde, or Oude Vriezen). This group, which always was rather small, was dissolved soon after the death of its leader (1601). In later times, when the reason of the schism was forgotten, some strict branches of the Dutch Mennonites, like the Huiskopers (q.v.) or Danzig Old Flemish and Ukowallists (q.v.) occasionally, though incorrectly, also were called Thijs-Gerritsvolk.

vdZ.

Thirnheim, about two miles southwest of Sinsheim (q.v.) in Baden, Germany, formerly the seat of a Mennonite congregation founded c1670 by Swiss immigrants. In 1731 (there is no earlier information) Rudolf Lienhard of Rohrbach was the preacher. The family names were Lienhard, Meyer, Herr, Brand, Plätscher, Wisler, Kratter, and Meili. This information is taken from a letter written to the Dutch Mennonite Committee of Foreign Needs at Amsterdam on Nov. 1, 1731. Soon after 1731 this congregation, called Dürnen or Diernen or Dirnheim in the Dutch Naamlijst, was united with that of Immelhausen (q.v.). (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1471 f.; Müller, Berner Täufer, 210; Naamlijst 1765 ff.)

vdZ.

Thirty Years' War (1618-48), that terrible war that was so significant to the political and economic position of Germany, was of far-reaching effect on the Mennonites as well, although they took no part at all in this war between Catholicism and Protestantism. To the Mennonites the Thirty Years' War brought one advantage, namely, that the death penalty in religious matters was no longer inflicted on them. The last death sentence passed on an Anabaptist occurred on May 24, 1618, when Jost Wilhelm, "a pious man," was executed for his faith in a village near Bregenz in Vorarlberg in Austria. Both Catholic and Protestant powers were occupied with other cares than the extermination of the peaceful Anabaptists.

Nevertheless the Mennonites also suffered terribly in the course of events. In Moravia, the only country in which they had been granted toleration and religious freedom at the time, the Catholic leaders, after their victory at the White Mountain near Prague (Nov. 8, 1620), were intent on either converting or expelling them. On Sept. 17, 1622, Emperor Ferdinand II and on Sept. 28 Cardinal Dietrichstein (q.v.) issued mandates banishing the Hutterites out of Moravia. More than 20,000 persons were robbed of their possessions and in spite of the cold were driven into misery with their children and their sick. They sought refuge chiefly in Hungary and Transylvania. The few who remained in Moravia were exiled by further decrees on March 2, 1624, and Dec. 17, 1628.

In the principalities of North Germany the Mennonites were in general spared the confusion of war, though some deep wounds were inflicted here too. The village of Wüstenfelde between Lübeck and Hamburg, where Menno Simons spent the last years of his life and where he was buried, was completely destroyed. In several parts of North Germany the Mennonites were tolerated in the course of the war and were given freedom of religion, for instance in Holstein and East Friesland, as well as in Polish West Prussia, whereas they were still persecuted in Cleve, Jülich, and Berg.

The Peace of Westphalia (Oct. 24, 1648), which concluded the Thirty Years' War, secured religious equality to the great churches in Germany, but no legal status or recognition was granted to the Mennonites. After the suffering of the war years and the moral deterioration in the depopulated country, every government head was glad to have some people with moral standards who would work diligently in rebuilding the devastated country. Thus Charles Louis, the Palatine elector, willingly granted refuge and limited religious liberty in 1664 to Mennonites expelled from Switzerland. They settled on both sides of the Rhine; on the right bank they settled on the devastated land between Wiesloch and Wimpfen, where in the spring of 1622 the two main battles of the Palatinate were fought. Also Mennonite refugees from Flanders were accepted in Crefeld and here laid the foundation of a new industry, the manufacture of silk and velvet; Crefeld is still the German center of this industry. (ML I, 447 f.)

HEGE.

Thirty-Fivers: see Reidenbach Mennonite Church.

Thoenis (Tönnis, Theunis) von Hastenraed: see Hastenrath, Theunis van.

Thomae, Markus: see Stübner.

Thomae, Nikolaus (Nicolaus Sigelsbach) (1492-?), pastor in Bergzabern, Palatinate, Germany, a close friend of Oecolampadius (q.v.) in Basel and of Johann Bader (q.v.) in Landau. He engaged in a debate with Hans Denk (q.v.), and wrote a detailed report about this encounter in an important letter to Oecolampadius on April 1, 1527. He spent a week in Strasbourg and discussed sixteen difficult points, especially the matter of baptism, with Capi-to (q.v.) and Bucer (q.v.). He had frequent contacts with Anabaptists, with whom he "associated on a friendly basis, for they are God-fearing and brave people" (Gelbert), as he wrote to his friend Conrad Hubert, Jan 28, 1529. Thomae was not a great scholar. His Latin was not exact. Anabaptists like Hans Denk and Ludwig Haetzer (q.v.) far surpassed Thomae in their mastery of the ancient languages. E.T.

J. P. Gelbert, Magister Johann Baders Leben und Schriften, Nikolaus Thomae und seine Briefe (Neustadt, 1868) 159 f.; Christian Hege, Die Täufer in der Kurpfalz (Frankfurt, 1908); Ernst Stähelin, Briefe und Akten zum Leben Oekolampads I (Leipzig, 1927) 337 and 335 f.; II (1934) 51 f., 894; idem, Das theologische Lebenswerk Oekolampads (Leipzig, 1939); Eberhard Teufel, "Täufer-tum und Quäkertum," Theologische Rundschau XIII (1941) 184; ML IV.

Thoman(n), Ruedi, an aged farmer living at Zollikon (q.v.) near Zürich, Switzerland, in whose house Felix Manz (q.v.) and Jörg Blaurock (q.v.) read the Scriptures, baptized, and administered the Lord's Supper on Jan. 25, 1525. The next day in the early morning Marx Bosshart, Ruedi's son-in-law, and Ruedi himself, were baptized by Blaurock. A few months later the Zollikon congregation was dissolved by the Zürich magistrates. Ruedi Thoman reported to the government officials of Zürich (end of January, or early February 1525) about the meeting held in his house. His information is very important for knowledge of the practices of baptism and communion in the early Anabaptist period. After this trial there is no further information about Ruedi Thoman; like most of the Zollikon Anabaptists he may have recanted. vdZ.

TA Zürich, Nos. 29-32; Fritz Blanke, Brüder in Christo (Zürich, 1955) 27-32.

Thomas (Thomas Pelsser), a Hutterite martyr, a preacher, was burned at the stake in Brno in 1527 with Balthasar (q.v.) and Dominicus (q.v.) after a valiant confession of his faith. According to the Hutterite Chronicle, this execution took place in 1528. (Mart. Mir. D 18, E 428; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 63; ML IV.)

Thomas (Tomes), Antonius, is identical with Elder Antonius van Coelen (q.v.).

Thomas (Toenis) Arentsz, an Anabaptist martyr burned at the stake with two others June 28, 1553, at Leeuwarden in Friesland, Netherlands. He was (re)baptized, rejected the Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation, and believed "that all that is done in the (Catholic) church is idolatry." He persisted in his heresy, i.e., he died as a loyal member of the Mennonite church. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 746; J. Reitsma, Honderd jaren uit de geschiedenis der Hervorming ... in Friesland (Leeuwarden, 1876) 63.

Thomas Drucker is identical with Thomas von Imbroich (q.v.).

Thomas Franssen was executed with the sword at The Hague, Netherlands, on Nov. 12, 1536. He was a native of Utrecht and lived at Amsterdam, where he was arrested in the fall of 1536. He was tried at Amsterdam (tortured on Nov. 7) and then taken to The Hague, where the trial was continued. Thomas was charged with crimes of buying and reading heretical books, failing to observe the regulations of the (Catholic) church, eating meat on fast days, and working on holy days. He had not attended (Catholic) church services for three or four years because he did not believe the doctrine of the Mass. In the documents he is said to be a "Lutheran," i.e., heretic, and a Sacramentist (q.v.), who taught false doctrines. It is not clear whether he was an Anabaptist, but apparently he was, for he is said to have been rebaptized and to have administered baptism himself. Because he refused to recant and to be instructed by the Catholic theologians, he was sentenced to death. His head was to be put on a pole and his property confiscated. (Grosheide, Bijdrage, 99 f.) vDZ.

Thomas (Tonis) Gerritsz, a Dutch Anabaptist, a native of Lochem, Gelderland, was executed on Jan. 7, 1539, at Delft, Dutch province of South Holland, with Herman van Kelder. They were followers of David (q.v.) Joris, and during their trials they gave information concerning the immoral sexual practices of the group which were so severely censured by Menno Simons. (Mellink, Wederdopers, 216, 401.) vDZ.

Thomas Hendricksz, an Anabaptist martyr: see Thijmon Hendriksz.

Thomas van Imbroek: see Imbroich, Thomas von.

Thomas Imwald (Thoman im Waldt auff Aldein) of Aldein, an Anabaptist martyr, was put to death at Fill (q.v.) in the Adige Valley, Tirol, on Nov. 16, 1529, with Georg Frick (q.v.) and two other brethren and four sisters of his faith. In his cross-examination he said he had been baptized by Georg Blaurock (q.v.).

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 89; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 74 f.; Wolk, Geschicht-Buch, 53 and 54; Mart. Mir. D 27, E 435; ML IV.

Thomas (Tomas), Jan, a Dutch Mennonite preacher, b. Jan. 28, 1682, at Oosterlittens, d. July 26, 1744, at Surhuisterveen. He was a farmer, but accepted a call as minister of the Heerenveen-Knippe congregation, serving here 1714-20 and in the Surhuisterveen congregation 1722-44. His colleague Jan Joghems of Drachten preached his funeral sermon on Aug. 17, 1744. In 1719 he published at Heerenveen: Kort Onderwijs voor de Jeugt in de voornaamste Gronden van den Christelijken godsdienst. The Reformed pastor of Heerenveen discovered in this booklet a number of "Socinian (q.v.) errors," and so Thomas was summoned before the Reformed classis and thereupon suspended by the government. Soon after, however, he was active again, baptizing on Jan. 21, 1720. But again he was suspended and the government pressed his dismissal on account of the mandates issued by the States of Friesland in 1662 and 1687 against Socinians, Quakers, and "Dompelaars." The Frisian government, alarmed by Jan Thomas's Socinianism, in 1722 had a confession drawn up which was to be signed by all Mennonite preachers in the province of Friesland, and which emphatically repudiated the doctrines of Socinus. Jan Thomas, who belonged to the liberal wing of the Dutch Mennonites and who had much contact with the Collegiants (q.v.), also published his induction sermon at Heerenveen: Den Wandel der Geloovigen in de vrese Gods (Heerenveen, 1716), and translated the first Psalm into the Frisian language. (Blaupt t. C., Friesland, 205-8; N.N.B.Wb. VIII, 1295; DB 1896, 149-75.) vDZ.

Thomas, Jan, an elder of the Flemish Mennonites in Groningen, Netherlands, who together with his coelders Teunis Gerrits and Cornelis Jans wrote a letter (February 1632) to the Flemish (Lamist) congregation of Amsterdam rejecting the invitation to the meeting to be held at Dordrecht, where Flemish and Old Flemish were to be united. They expressed the hope that the Amsterdam congregation would likewise oppose the unification. The merger, however, came about in 1632 on the basis of the Dordrecht (q.v.) Confession. Of Jan Thomas there is no further information. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 590.) vDZ.

Thomas Janszn, of Amsterdam, a Dutch Anabaptist: see Jan van Delft.

Thomas Janszoen, a Dutch Anabaptist martyr, sentenced to death on April 10, 1535, by the court of Friesland at Leeuwarden. He was rebaptized and arrested, but pardoned after recanting; afterwards he again joined the Anabaptist "verbondt" (congregation) and was put to death. (DB 1917, 90.) vDZ.

Thomas, Jurjen, a preacher of the Old Flemish Mennonites in the Dutch province of Groningen. As an opponent of Elder Uko Walles (q.v.), he was banned on March 4, 1637, by a meeting of elders, because "he was not obedient to the elders." This meeting was probably held in the town of Groningen (not at Noordbroek as stated in ML II, 448). After he was censured Thomas is supposed to have lodged a complaint against Walles with the magistrates; in any case Walles soon after was banished forever from the province of Groningen. Afterwards Jurjen Thomas attacked Walles in a booklet, Vermaninge oft indachtig-makinge in een Nootwendige Verantwoordinge (1645). Jurjen Thomas had a number of adherents, commonly called Jurjen-Thomasvolk, which for some time formed a separate branch of the Groningen Old Flemish Mennonites, but may soon have dissolved or joined some other group. In the same meeting in which Jurjen Thomas was dismissed, his son Thomas Jurjens had also to answer for his opinions, but he unlike his father conceded and conformed to the views of Uko Walles. vDZ.

Blaupt t. C., Friesland, 161; idem, Groningen I, 68-70, 72, note 1, 77; DB 1876, 39, note 2; ML II, 448.

Thomas Mennonite Church (MC) was the third congregation organized in the Johnstown District of the Allegheny Conference (formerly Southwestern Pennsylvania District Conference). This section had no church building for nearly one hundred years after the first Mennonite settlers came into the vicinity. They attended services a few times a year at the Blough church (erected 1836), which was the original congregation in this area. Prior to 1874 they also occasionally had services in the summer in the Thomasdale Schoolhouse about two miles from Thomas Mills. Names of original settlers in the Thomas church area were Thomas, Croyle, Saylor, Johns, Mishler, Woods, Speigle, Hershberger, Kaufman, Gindelsperger, Alwine, and Lehman. A house of worship (36 x 50 ft.) was erected near Thomas Mills in 1874 on a plot of ground sold by John Thomas, Sr., for $50. In 1916 a new brick building (46 x 70 ft.) was erected to take care of the increasing membership. The church is located about ten miles southwest of Johnstown. The congregation conducts a mission at Headrick just north of Johnstown. Ordained men who have served the congregation have borne the names of Gindelsperger, Hershberger, Saylor, Eash, and Wingard. In 1957 the membership of the congregation was 167, with Aldus Wingard as bishop-pastor. J.L.H.

Thomas Streck, a Mennonite, a native of Wachtebeke in Flanders, lived at Gent, Belgium, where he was arrested in 1566. Although he was only 18 years of age, he very eloquently and firmly confessed his faith. He is said to have "seduced" many persons, and for his "heresy" he was sentenced to death. For some reason or other the execution was postponed. Thomas, being very frank, requested his release. Verheyden believes that he was not put to death but sent to the galleys (q.v.) after June 10, 1566. vDZ.

A. L. E. Verheyden, "De Doopsgezinden te Gent 1530-1630," in Bijdragen tot de Geschiedenis en Oudheidkunde te Gent (1943) 114 f.

Thomashof, located 2 miles south of Durlach, Baden, Germany, an influential South German Mennonite conference and retreat center, and rest home, called Bibelheim Thomashof, was established by the purchase on March 26, 1924, of the former inn (Kurhaus) by that name with 2 acres of land, lying adjacent to Lamprechtshof, the farm of Elder David Horsch, by a group of men from the Badischer Verband (q.v.), who call themselves the Bruderrat (Brother Council) and have owned and operated it. It was dedicated June 29, 1924. On Dec. 27, 1954, an added 30-bed guest building was completed and dedicated. Chr. Schnebele has been the housefather from the beginning. Regular weekly Sunday services are held in the chapel, as are occasional Bible conferences, ministers' weeks, youth conferences, etc. The deaconess work of the Verband also has its headquarters here. Paying guests desiring recreation in a quiet spiritual atmosphere are received at all times. H.S.B.

Thomasz, Jacob, a member of the Waterlander Mennonites, probably at Amsterdam, was opposed to any kind of confession in the Mennonite church. For this reason he attacked Hans de Ries (q.v.), who together with Lubbert Gerritsz (q.v.) had drawn up a confession in 1610. In Vriendelijcke Aenspraecck (1613) Thomasz charged de Ries and some of his friends, e.g., Yeme de Ringh (q.v.), with tyrannizing the church. On March 26-28, 1613, Thomasz had to answer before the church board of Amsterdam for his disloyal conduct. The outcome is not known. (DB 1864, 45, 49, 52-54.) vDZ.

Thomme (Tombe, Combe), Absolon van, an Anabaptist martyr: see Absolon de Zanger.

Thompson Hutterite Bruderhof of the Dariusleut (q.v.) branch, located near Glenwood, Alberta, was founded in 1918. In 1950 the population numbered 76, with Paul J. Tschetter as head preacher. D.D.

Thöne (Tönnen): see Teune.

Thonis (Theunis) van Waesten(e): see Anthonis Schoonvelt.

Thormann, Gorg, a Swiss Reformed theologian, wrote a book of 700 pages on the Anabaptists, Prober-Stein oder Schriftmässige . . . Prüfung dess Täußerthums, zu allgemeiner Erbauung abgefasst (Bern, 1693). (See Proberstein.)

John Horsch, "Accusations Against the Swiss Brethren," MQR VIII (April 1934) 79; ML III.

Thorn (Polish Torun), a town in Poland situated on the Vistula, where Mennonites lived in 1586. The members may have joined the Obernessau (q.v.) (also called Nieschewski, q.v.) congregation. In 1678 the magistrates of Thorn issued a mandate forbidding the citizens to shelter Arians, Anabaptists, and Mennonites. vDZ.

Felicia Szper, Nederl. Nederzettingen in West-Pruisen . . . (Enkhuizen, 1913) 152, 202 f.

Three Rivers Civilian Public Service Camp No. 107, about 7 miles north of Three Rivers, and about 80 miles southeast of Fresno, Cal., was opened in May 1943 and closed in June 1946. It was operated by the Mennonite Central Committee under the National Park Service. The chief work of the men was fire suppression and fire fighting. The camp had a capacity of 150 men. On Sequoia Trails, an illustrated book produced by the men, presents the activities of the camp. M.G.

Melvin Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, 1949) 160-61.

Threshing Stones, used by the Mennonites of Russia and in few cases in the prairie states and provinces, became the emblem of Bethel College and also of agriculture. The threshing stone is a seven-ribbed cone-shaped stone wheel with a round hole through the horizontal axis. It was about thirty inches long and two feet in diameter. Each six-inch rib is tapered from six inches at the base to two and one-half inches at the outer edge. In Kansas such threshing stones were cut according to a wooden model by a stone quarry near Florence, the model having been prepared by the early Mennonite settlers.

The cut grain was spread in two concentric circles on the threshing floor with the heads of the grain facing each other. The threshing stone was pulled by two horses; the ribbed stone rolling over the heads of the grain knocked the grain and chaff from the straw, after which the grain was fanned. Some of these stones are found in the Kauffman Museum in North Newton, Kan., and on Kansas Mennonite farmyards.

J.A.D.

Thudichum, Friedrich (1831-1913), professor of law at the University of Tübingen. In his two-volume work, Die Deutsche Reformation 1517-1525 (Leipzig, 1907), he gives the Anabaptists a friendly and favorable testimony in these words: "With the most absolute confidence I state as my verdict: to the Brethren is due the credit of having defended in innumerable oppressions a Christianity which alone agrees with the teachings of Jesus and of being among those to whom we owe an enlightened interpretation of philosophy, ethics, and theology, with whose aid in the course of the centuries a humane legislation, nobler international law, and a better organization of the Protestant church has everywhere been achieved" (Vol. II, p. 161). Thudichum was one of the few pupils of Ludwig Keller among German scholars, unique among his fellows, and was ridiculed by the guild. (ML IV.) NEFF, E.T.

Thumb von Neuburg, Hans Konrad (d. 1555), hereditary marshal of Württemberg, a friend of the Anabaptists in Württemberg and of Schwenckfeld, indeed related to him. He and his brother Hans Friedrich (Obervogt in Kirchheim and Teck) accepted the Anabaptists into their villages, viz., in Stetten. There in 1539-44 Hans Konrad sheltered a leader of the Anabaptists, Konrad Sax, employing him as a cooper. For a long time Burkhard Schilling was active as pastor in Stetten and gained adherents there for Schwenckfeld. In 1544 Hans Konrad was removed from his office of hereditary marshal and fell into disfavor with Duke Ulrich. The chief charge against him was his favoring of the Anabaptists and Schwenckfelders, and permitting them to live on his estate Korntal. Until 1544 he constituted an element of unrest in Württemberg; it was impossible to oppose him since he had won the duke to his side. Not until the reform party succeeded in making him disliked at the court could the Reformation be carried out successfully. (TA Württemberg, 1167.) G.Bos.

Thun, a town and district of the canton of Bern, Switzerland, situated on Lake Thun. Moritz Losenegger (q.v.) a citizen of Thun, was in prison there as early as 1532. Concerning the spread and development of Anabaptism in the district of Thun there is not much information. In the 17th century and probably even earlier, Anabaptists were found in the villages of Goldenwil, Wattenwil, Hilterfingen, Sigriswil, Diesbach, and a few other hamlets, all mountain villages on the north shore of Lake Thun. Jakob Ammann (q.v.), the founder of the Amish (q.v.) Mennonites, was of Erlenbach near Thun. In the course of time a number of Anabaptists from the Thun area emigrated; among the emigrants moving in 1711 to the Netherlands were members of the Schneider, Ruff (Rupp), Reuszer (Risser), Richard, Sorg, Schlappach, Eicher, Kienzi, Krähenbühl, and Rüegegger families from Sigriswil and other villages in the Thun district. Others moved to the Swiss Jura in the 18th century. In 1823 only 85 Mennonites were living in the Thun district (Ritschard, Stähli, Freyenberg, and Winteregg families).

vdZ.

D. L. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottsdale, 1953); Müller, Berner Täufer, 310 f.

Thungen, Konrad von, bishop of Würzburg, bloody persecutor of the Anabaptists from 1525 on. (See Eberhard Teufel, "Taufertum und Quäkertum im Lichte der Neueren Forschung," Theol. Rundschau XIV, 1942, pp. 145 f.)

Thuringia (Thüringen), a German state (6,022 sq. mi. and 2,927,497 pop. in 1946), located in the heart of Germany and in the heart of the area of the Lutheran Reformation, bounded on the south by Bavaria (Franconia), on the west by Hesse, and on the east and north by Saxony; capital Weimar. Other cities of importance are Erfurt, Gotha, Eisenach, Jena, Mühlhausen. The modern boundaries of Thuringia are not identical with those of the Reformation period, and the territory has suffered many changes in its rulers. In 1946 it was incorporated into the East German state as the westernmost province.

The history of Anabaptism in Thuringia has been exhaustingly treated from the sources by Paul Wappler in his classic work Die Täuferbewegung in Thüringen von 1526 bis 1584 (Jena, 1913, 540 pp.), in which the first 227 pages give the narrative history, the remaining 300 pages a reproduction in extenso of all the archival materials bearing on the subject. Wappler's own summary (pp. 220-27) will be printed immediately following in translation, with slight additions by the writer. Wappler's work is fair, accurate, and thorough and has not been superseded, requiring only some minor revisions. The 1913 volume includes the pertinent material from his two previous works: Inquisition und Ketzerprozesse in Zwickau zur Reformationszeit (Leipzig, 1908), and Die Stellung Kursachsens und des Landgrafen Philipp von Hessen zur Täuferbewegung (Münster, 1910).

H.S.B.

"Anabaptism in the heart of Germany was a consequence of the great disappointment that had taken possession of broad strata of the people in an increasing measure because of Luther's conservative reformation position and the moral unfruitfulness of his young established church, as well as his position in the Peasants' War, who had shared the mind of Thomas Müntzer both in his mystical and enthusiastic basis and in certain apocalyptic and eschatological expectations. The first center of Anabaptist propaganda (beginning in the summer of 1526) was found in the Saxon enclave of Königsberg in Franconia, where Hans Hut, and with him the cooper Volk Kolerlin, the sexton Kilian Volckaimer (q.v.), the peasant Sebastian, and the cabinetmaker Eukarius Kellermann and Joachim Mertz worked for the Anabaptist cause. In their revelations a major role was played by the imminent Turkish invasion and the extermination of the ungodly that was to begin therewith. But this activity was discovered in early February 1527. Beutelhans and Wolf Schomingers, citizens of Königsberg, as well as the miller of Aurach and Kaspar Spiegel of Ostheim, were put to death, and a number of others escaped with only a penalty of disgrace. At the same time in electoral Saxony a decree was issued permitting only those who had been regularly called to the office of preaching to perform the functions of pastoral care.

"Probably from Franconia Anabaptism thereupon pushed up into northern Thuringia in the course of 1527, where Müntzer's social revolutionary ideas had continued to smolder. The leader in the agitation here was the furrier Hans Römer (q.v.) of Eisenach. With him were the furrier Christoph Peisker of Quedlinburg, the peasant Volkmar Fischer (q.v.) of Rohrborn, and the shoemaker Christoph of Meissen (q.v.) or of Mühlhausen. They proclaimed the violent restoration of Jerusalem. Their first goal was an open attack on Erfurt on New Year's Day of 1528. The plot was, however, discovered and twelve of the conspirators were executed. The Anabaptist preachers, however, escaped. Of these, Hans Römer was arrested at Göttingen and Volkmar Fischer at Erfurt in 1534. Fischer was executed. [In the article Königsberg Hege challenges the validity of the above charge of revolutionary action. He says, "The death sentence was pronounced on them in spite of a lack of evidence of an intended revolution (all the racked prisoners instead stressed their nonresistance), and in spite of the fact that the burgomaster and council of Königsberg praised their previous conduct, rejected all suspicion of revolutionary plans, and asked their lives to be spared, and that the council of Koburg gave a similar testimonial for Wolf Schreiner."]

"From Franconia and from Hesse about the end of 1526 Anabaptism also penetrated into western Thuringia. Its apostles were Volkmar of Hildburghausen, Michel of Uettingen, the Franconian Georg of Staffelstein, Niklas Schreiber, Hans Both (q.v.), and Katharina Valebs. Apocalyptic proclamations constituted the chief theme of their preaching.

"But now Anabaptism progressed along more and more moderate lines. Its principal differences with the established church were now over original sin, infant baptism, and the bodily presence of Christ in the communion. The last of these points came to take on the character of a confession with the Anabaptists. Their ideal was the congregation of saints. Therefore one finds among them also to a greater or lesser degree a withdrawal from the state and its institutions, quiet acceptance of suffering as the cross of Christ, and a simple, devotional religious service by preachers chosen by the congregation. The first arrests in western Thuringia occurred in early 1528. A sexton was executed at Mehlis. Others recanted at Gotha and Georgenthal, but some rejoined the Anabaptists. Six of them were consequently beheaded at Reinhardsbrunn on Jan. 18, 1530. But Anabaptism made most inroads in western Thuringia in the Hausbreitenbach district, to which the lenience of Prince Philip of Hesse, under whose jurisdiction half of the area lay, and the nearness of the Anabaptist congregation of Sorga (q.v.) near Hersfeld contributed. Here, besides other apostles, Melchior Rinck (q.v.) worked. The basic lines of his system of theology were mysticism and a thoroughly spiritualistic view of the Scriptures. Hence his opposition to all purely external religious customs from which reason is excluded. Called to answer for himself repeatedly, expelled from the country, and punished with imprisonment, Rinck nevertheless continued his Anabaptist activity within Hessian and Thuringian lands.

"To counter the threatening growth of Anabaptism Justus Menius wrote his book in 1530, Der Widdertauffer lere und geheimnis aus heiliger schrift widerlegt, which presents an excellent picture of Anabaptism from the point of view of its opponents. Nevertheless Anabaptism continued to progress in western Thuringia. A number of residents in Hausbreitenbach were arrested in October 1531. An official opinion by the Wittenberg theologians in general favored capital punishment, but upon the intervention of Philip the prisoners were divided, the Saxons beheaded and the Hessians, upon recantation, released. On Nov. 11, 1531, the authorities succeeded in taking Melchior Rinck and eleven of his audience at Vacha. Saxony wanted to have him executed, but he was now sentenced by Philip to life imprisonment.

"Meanwhile Anabaptism was also making progress in the beech forests belonging to the Stift of Fulda. An Anabaptist apostle appeared here as a prophet of God and miracle worker and won a large following. About 40 of them were seized with the apostle on March 25, 1532, at Spahl in the Rockenstuhl district, after valiant self-defense, and taken to Fulda. Overcome in the prison atmosphere by religious madness, most of them remained steadfast and cheerfully submitted to beheading, only the fellow travelers recanted and were then released. But now the places of Melchior Rinck and the executed apostles of Anabaptism had been filled by others, like Georg Zaunring (q.v.), Georg Stein, Jakob Schmidt, Christoph of Moravia, the sexton Alexander [q.v., whom Wappler elsewhere calls "one of the noblest figures in the Anabaptist movement" of Middle Germany], the tailor Ilgen, Hans Both, and others. Their center was the Anabaptist congregation at Sorga. From there they developed lively agitation especially in Hausbreitenbach. In early January 1533 arrests were again made here—the peasant Fritz Erbe (q.v.) of Herda, and Margaretha Kochs, 'die alte Garköchin.' In July, eighteen more were examined at Berka. But in the end all were released, since Philip continued to oppose the execution demanded by John of Saxony. Only Fritz Erbe and Margaretha were held, Erbe in a city tower of Eisenach, and later in the Wartburg, until his death in 1548. In Gotha the tailor Hans Riemer of Altenbergen was tried in July 1533. He escaped execution by recanting in the last hour.

"Meanwhile Anabaptism had found a new footing in northern Thuringia. The Anabaptist apostles working here were first Volkmar of Hildburghausen, Bernhardus, Georg of Staffelstein, and Katharina Valebs. The chief Anabaptist center here was the area of Frankenhausen. In early 1529 the first examinations were undertaken here. The arrested Anabaptists finally recanted. But in early January 1530 thirteen more were arrested, for the most part stemming from Franconia. Four, who refused to recant, were drowned, and the others expelled from the country. In the middle of 1530 seven more Anabaptists were arrested. Of these, Katharina Valebs, who remained steadfast, was executed, and Erhard Polrus (q.v.), who had backslidden, was burned through the cheeks. Now the sexton Alexander began a wide-scale propaganda for Anabaptism throughout northern Thuringia and the southern Harz. With him Jakob Schmiedeknecht was working. They held their secret meetings for a time in Landgrafroda near Allstedt, Frankenhausen, and Sangerhausen. Finally, however, Alexander was seized with the others in the autumn of 1533 and executed in November at Frankenhausen. Meanwhile in the region of Mühlhausen (q.v.) Hans Both was continuing the propaganda begun by Alexander. The soul of the movement here was Ludwig Spon. He was arrested in May 1533 with six others and was not released until mid-November by Philip. In September of that year the Anabaptists had been expelled from Sorga. They went to Moravia (q.v.), whither, in spite of Hans Both's disappointment there, Anabaptists continued to go until the end of the 16th century.

"In northern Thuringia and in the Harz area Alexander's propaganda was quickly carried on by Peter Reusse of Ruse and Heinz Kraut (q.v.) of Esperstedt in its full scope. Especially at Emseloh and Holdenstedt they had numerous followers. They maintained connections with the Hessian Anabaptists, the followers of Melchior Rinck. In early April 1534 Georg Knoblauch (q.v.) of Emseloh and his wife were arrested. But he recanted and was released. His wife, however, remaining steadfast, suffered death. Following her, two other Anabaptists were executed. A place of refuge for the Anabaptists of Hesse, who called themselves 'Friends of God,' was the Schneider Mill at Zorge near Ellrich. From here contacts were again established with the Anabaptists of Mühlhausen, who were again working for Anabaptism, e.g., in the area of Neunheiligen. At the end of October 1534 and in January 1535 several residents of Mühlhausen and the vicinity were arrested. But by the middle of 1535 all were released, in spite of the fact that Saxony insisted on capital punishment. They now found a refuge in the Lutter Forest near Lauterberg in the Harz and at Halberstadt, where, following the example of the first Christian church, they led a holy life full of brotherly love in all simplicity. In addition to Peter Reusse and Heinz Kraut, Georg Köhler (q.v.) now began to work for the Anabaptist cause. In Riestedt and in the vicinity of Mühlhausen, where Barbara Meissrod's home became a new center for them, they were very successful. In early April 1535 arrests were made in Riestedt. A new hiding place for the followers of Anabaptists was now Schraubenstein between Riestedt and Emseloh. From here they frequently visited their brethren at Halberstadt. On Sept. 2, 1535, two of them, including Georg Köhler, were seized, and soon after beheaded at Sangerhausen with another Anabaptist woman. The same fate soon struck three of the Anabaptists of Halberstadt, who were drowned in the Bode at Gröningen. On Nov. 20, 1535, Heinz Kraut with a number of Anabaptists, including Georg Knoblauch, were at the home of Hans Peissker (q.v.) of Kleineuterdorf near Orlamünde, a miller. On the next morning all were arrested, a total of 16 persons, and taken to the Leuchtenburg. The women were detained here, while four of the men, among them Heinz Kraut and Hans Peissker, were taken to Jena, and four others, including Knoblauch, were taken to Neustadt on the Orla, and three to Kahla. The prisoners at Jena, whose trial was conducted by Melanchthon (q.v.), were with one exception unresponsive to teaching. They were consequently beheaded on Jan. 26, 1536. Of the other prisoners, at first only Peissker's daughter Margaretha recanted. But after many attempts, in which Melanchthon again participated, both on the Leuchtenburg and at Kahla, all but one were persuaded to recant. The steadfast one was beheaded. A consequence of this Anabaptist trial was that Melanchthon wrote the second Saxon Anabaptist mandate on April 10, 1536, and also the Verlegung etlicher unchristlicher Artikel, welche die Wiedertäufer jurgeben. Nevertheless there were further arrests of Anabaptists in eastern Thuringia in 1539 and 1540; the prisoners recanted and were released.

"For the Anabaptists of northern Thuringia and at the Harz Mühlhausen was a center from 1535 on. In the place of Heinz Kraut and Georg Köhler, a certain Matthes was the leader. At the beginning of October 1537 the Mühlhausen city council took steps against these conventicles. Ten of the arrested men and women were drowned in the Unstrut and four expelled from the city. Of the remaining four prisoners, two were drowned on Jan. 17, 1538. About the same time an Anabaptist execution took place at Brücken on the Helme. But still Anabaptism did not disappear from northern Thuringia. In 1544-45 there were again Anabaptist trials at Mühlhausen, but now Philip vigorously opposed their execution.

"In western Thuringia sympathy for Anabaptism was long preserved, especially by the long imprisonment of Fritz Erbe. Two men, who were found in conversation with him in November 1537, were beheaded as blasphemers at the end of January 1538. The excitement caused by this execution was the occasion for the writing of Justus Menius's booklet in 1538, Wie ein iglicher Christ gegen allerley lere, gut und böse, nach Gottes befelch sich gebürlich halten soll, a book which denoted a lapse toward Catholic concepts. During Lent of 1539 three Anabaptists were again discovered in the tower with Fritz Erbe. They escaped death by recanting. The same thing recurred in early 1540 in the case of three Anabaptists at Kreuzburg. Meanwhile Anabaptism was gaining the upper hand in Fritz Erbe's home community. On Feb. 7 and 8, 1544, a large Anabaptist cross-examination was held at Berka, but again it took its course without result because of the lenience of Philip.

"In the parish of Gotha the peasant Klaus Ludwig of Tüngeda caused some trouble. Repeatedly examined by Myconius, he always managed to avoid execution by recanting.

"In the gravure of Henneberg Count Wilhelm throughout his life strictly prevented the penetration of Anabaptism into his lands. In 1528, 1529, 1531, 1550, and 1551 there were executions. The last Anabaptist arrested emigrated in 1560.

"After the middle of the 16th century the decline of Anabaptism in Thuringia became increasingly evident." H.S.B.

Thurman Mennonite Church (MC), located one mile north of Thurman, Col. The original settlers came from Nebraska and homesteaded in this area, retaining their conference affiliations with the Kansas-Nebraska and later the Iowa-Nebraska conferences until 1958, when the congregation joined the South Central Conference. The first minister to serve the church here was Joe Schrock, followed by N. M. Birky, Aaron Unternahrer, and Earl Yeackley (the pastor in 1958). On March 22, 1916, the first meetinghouse, built before 1888, was destroyed by a prairie fire; the present frame building was built on the same site. In 1956 the building was moved to its present location in Thurman. Largely because of the drought, the membership, which at one time numbered over 100, had decreased to 14 by 1958. E.YEA.

Thysken and his wife Mariken (q.v.) Vrencken died as Anabaptist martyrs. They were drowned at Stockheim "int Lant van Ludich" (Liege in Belgium?). The year of their execution is unknown; it happened before 1547 according to information given by the martyr Metken (q.v.), who was their sister-in-law. vDZ.

W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het bisdom Luik ... I (The Hague, 1937) 326, 399.

Tiaert Tyercxsoon, of Dokkum, an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded at Leeuwarden in Friesland, Netherlands, on Feb. 8, 1539, because he was rebaptized and harbored "heretical views" concerning the Mass and the doctrines of the (Catholic) church. vDZ.

J. Reitsma, Honderd jaren uit de Geschiedenis der Hervorming ... in Friesland (Leeuwarden, 1876) 63.

Tiardus Sneekensis (Tjaert van Sneek): see Tjaert Renick.

Tibben, a nickname formerly used for the Mennonites in the Netherlands. In 1549 the name "Tip" was given to the Mennonite woman Hadewych (q.v.) in Leeuwarden. In the trial of the martyr Reytsz (q.v.) Aysesz in 1574 there is a question concerning "Mennonites and Tibben." In a mandate issued in 1612 in the district of Twente (q.v.) in the Dutch province of Overijssel is found the phrase "the congregation of the Tibben or Anabaptists." In the same year mention is made of the "Mennonites or Tibben" who are numerous in Westphalia. In the Dutch town of Deventer is found the Tibbensteeg (narrow street). In the province of Groningen the name of Tibben for Mennonites was still common in the 18th century. Thus it can be asserted that the name Tibben was formerly used in Friesland, Groningen, Overijssel, and Westphalia; the name was unknown in Holland and Flanders.

The meaning of the word Tibben is not clear. It is thought to have been derived from a Christian name Tibbe, or the family name Tibma of a person who would have been a follower of Menno Simons, but such a name is unknown. Some are of the opinion that it was derived from a hamlet in Friesland near Dokkum. Broese van Groenou thinks the word is etymologically connected with the Flemish verb dubben, Latin dubitare. Then a Dibbe or Tibbe would be a dubious person, who cannot be trusted; the word dubbe in Flemish also means hypocrite. But this explanation is too farfetched; moreover the name Tibben for Mennonites was unknown in Flanders. Several interpretations of the word Tibben do not satisfy. The most satisfactory one is still the view of de Hoop Scheffer (DB 1882, 40) that the Mennonites were sometimes called Tibben after a certain, now unknown, person named Tibbe (or Tjibbe), a corruption of Thiebout. vDZ.

Blaupt t. C., Friesland, 375; Mart. Mir. D 682b, E 998; DB 1882, 34 ff.; 1888, 49; Friedrich Brune, Der Kampf um eine evangelische Kirche im Münsterland, 1520-1802 (Witten, 1953) 122 f.; ME III, 779.

Tiboel: see Tieboel.

Tichelaar, a Dutch family name, very common in the province of Friesland, where tichelaar means owner of a tile factory or maker of brick. There have been many Tichelaar families unrelated to one another. A Mennonite Tichelaar family is still found at Makkum, Friesland. They have been well-to-do owners of tile works and formerly also of sawmills and paper mills. This family is mentioned as early as about 1660, in which year Freerck Jans, a farmer's son, who in 1676 assumed the family name of Tichelaar, bought a tile factory at Makkum. This factory, now N. V. Tichelaars Kleiwarenfabriek (Tichelaar's Clayware Factories, Inc.), is still run by a descendant of the first owner Freerck Jans, the present director being Jan Pieter Tichelaar (b. 1893). This factory now specializes in art pottery; it made the two Mennonite plates pictured among the illustrations of ME I, XXV, Nos. 1 and 2. Many members of this Tichelaar family have been deacons of the church and trustees of the conference of Friesland, Pieter Ymes Tichelaar (d. 1808) being treasurer of the Zuiderklasse (q.v.) and J. P. Tichelaar in 1941-54 a trustee of the A.D.S. (General Mennonite Conference). Pieter Jans Tichelaar (d. 1890) bequeathed a considerable gift of money to the Makkum congregation.

A member of this Makkum Tichelaar family was Hoito Tichelaar, b. 1743 at Makkum, d. there on March 1, 1818. After studying at the University of Franeker and the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary he served as pastor at den Hoorn on the island of Texel 1765-66, Bolsward 1766-67, and Amsterdam 1767-1810, until 1801 in the Lamist congregation and from then in the United Mennonite congregation of Amsterdam. He took a keen interest in the merger of the Lamist and Zonist churches (1801). He published only his Aanspraak aan de kinderen in het Doopsgezinde Weeshuis (Amsterdam, 1777) and a funeral sermon for his colleague Gerard van Heyningen: Lykrede (Amsterdam, 1801). Hoito Tichelaar is said to have been "always eager to oblige"; as a pulpit orator he was not very popular:

his sermons are said to have been "old-fashioned, stiff, and affected."

Other Dutch Mennonite preachers of this name, probably not related to the Makkum Tichelaar family, were Jan Jacobs Tichelaar (c1648-1721), preacher at Stiens until 1704/5 and in the congregation of Oost-Vlieland 1704/5-21, and Douwe Abesz Tichelaar, d. 1746, who was a preacher of the Waterlander congregation on the island of Ameland 1706-46. Nicolaas Tichelaar belongs to the Tigler (q.v.) family. vDZ.

De Vrije Fries XXVII (Leeuwarden, 1920) 36-40; Klei, orgaan voor de Klei-verwerkende Industrie II, No. 2 (June 1952) 136-40; Menn. Life VII (1953) 126; XI (1956) 183 f.; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 710, 915a, 1055, 1474-76, 1480, 1485, 1579-81, 2505; G. A. Wumkes, Stads- en Dorpskroniek van Friesland, 2 vv. (Leeuwarden, 1930, 1934) passim; Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 211, 363, 366; Naamlijst 1815, 41; 1829, 23; DJ 1850, 123; DB 1889, 17, 21; 1898, 12 f., 20, 32; 1899, 211; 1912, 76, 82-86.

Tieboel (Tiboel) (and Tieboel Siegenbeek, a branch of the Tieboel family), an old, originally non-Mennonite family, found as early as c1580 at Emmerich, Germany, who moved to the Netherlands in the early 18th century. Most Tieboels formerly lived in Friesland. Jacobus Tieboel (1760-1830), a physician of Leeuwarden, was married to Christina Lugt (1761-1811), of Amsterdam; both were Mennonites. In the 18th century a Mennonite branch was found at Workum; here Daniel Tieboel was a town clerk; his daughter Geertruida Tieboel was married in 1799 to Matthijs Siegenbeek (q.v., 1774-1854). Their son was Daniel Tieboel Siegenbeek (1806-66), a jurist at Leiden, married to Elisabeth van Heukelom (18.-74). He served many years as a deacon of the Leiden Mennonite congregation and was a trustee of the A.D.S. (General Mennonite Conference) 1851-57 and a curator of the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary. The last years of his life he was mayor of Leiden. vDZ.

G. A. Wumkes, Stads- en Dorpskroniek van Friesland I (Leeuwarden, 1930) passim; DB 1903, 110; 1905, 41; N.N.B.Wb. II, 1317.

Tiege, a Prussian Mennonite village name transplanted to the Molotschna and Zagradovka settlements in the Ukraine; Barnaul, Siberia; and Neu-land, Paraguay. (See Villages.) C.K.

Tiege, a village of the Molotschna settlement (q.v.), Russia, established in 1805, consisting of 4,503 acres (20 farms), which developed into a significant economic and cultural Mennonite center. In addition to the village school, it had a school for the deaf established by Gerhard Klassen in 1885 (see Marientaubstummschule). Tiege was also the name of an important Mennonite village in the center of the delta of the Vistula and Nogat in West Prussia, near Ladekopp. C.K.

H. Götz, Die Molotschnaer Ansiedlung (Steinbach, 1951) 13, 115; Friesen, Brüderschaft, 655.

Tiege Mennonite Brethren Church, of the Zagradovka settlement in Russia. Among the first settlers there were six families who belonged to the M.B. Church, who in 1873 chose Jakob Richert as their first minister. Services were held in private homes until 1881, when a building in Altona was bought for this purpose. Membership grew rapidly; by 1885 there were 100 members. In 1888 a church was built in Tiege. In 1892 Richert moved away and Isaak Regehr became the leading minister. He retired in 1902. Johann Nikkel was then elected and ordained elder. From this date the church became an independent unit, having formerly been a branch of the Friedensfeld M.B. Church. In 1922 the Tiege church had 427 baptized members; two of their former members were missionaries in foreign fields: Mrs. Abraham Hübert in India and Heinrich Reimer in Kamerun, Africa. In 1929 Elder Nikkel was arrested and starved to death in prison. The other ministers experienced a similar fate. The church building was taken over by the Soviets and converted into a club. All organized church life ceased to exist. G.L.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 425-27, 462-64; G. Lohrenz, Sagradowka (Rosthern, 1947) 79.

Tiegenhagen, a village in the northern part of the lowlands of the Vistula Delta, below sea level, protected from the sea by dikes. The village was founded c1350 by Teutonic knights. When their rule decayed, the village was overtaken by marsh and alders. Not until 1550 were attempts made to resettle the area. By 1640 Tiegenhagen was the Mennonite center of the Tiegenhof Lowlands, where the Mennonites owned over 200 hides of land. Tiegenhagen was also the seat of the Mennonite mutual fire insurance, which was founded in 1623 and covered all the farms and other buildings owned by Mennonites in the Grosswerder. About 1620 Claass Kreker possessed the three "Freihufen" of the village, which his descendants still held in 1750.

The Tiegenhagen Mennonite church belonged to the Flemish branch; until 1639 it was served by the elder of Danzig, but then chose Hans Siemens as its elder and thus became an independent congregation. (See West Prussia for a list of the elders of the congregation.) As this Grosswerder congregation continued to grow, it was decided in 1735 to establish four quarters: Elbing Quarter (Rosenort congregation), Tiegenhagen Quarter, Orloff Quarter (Ladekopp congregation), and Bärwald Quarter (Fürstenwerder congregation). All four quarters were to have a single elder, but each was to have its own preachers. Gradually the daughter congregations of the Grosswerder congregation became independent and in the first half of the 19th century chose their own elders, Fürstenwerder being the first to do so in 1809. In 1814 Abraham Wiebe of Tiegenhagen was chosen as elder of the other three quarters. When Wiebe died in 1833, the Tiegenhagen congregation became independent and chose Peter Reimer of Tiegenhagen as its elder. The Ladekopp congregation thereupon chose Jacob Wiebe in the same year, while Rosenort continued to be served by the elder of Tiegenhagen. Finally in 1857 Rosenort chose Nicolaus Fast as its elder.

A special grant by the Bishop of Culm permitted the Mennonites of Tiegenhagen to build a frame church "40 ells long, 22 ells wide, 7 ells high along the walls, with ordinary doors and windows, thatch roof, a chimney extending above the church and an apartment for residence in it" (Driedger). Until 1892 this frame church was in use. In that year the old church was torn down and a new brick church erected on the same site on the bank of the Tiege. The congregation was incorporated in 1882. Between the two World Wars a monthly meeting was held in the northern part of the congregational area in Steegen in the home of Jacob Hamm. The congregation was served by an elder, five preachers, and two deacons. The membership remained rather constant throughout the last century. In 1852 the congregation numbered 591 baptized members. In 1858 there were 754 Mennonites including children, who owned 168 hides of land. In 1887 the baptized membership was 433, with 229 children. In 1940 there were some 800 Mennonites who belonged to the Tiegenhagen congregation and lived in the north of the Grosswerder area and in the Danzig Lowlands. H.P.

Abraham Driedger, "Aus der Geschichte der Mennonitengemeinde Heubuden," Menn. Bl., 1939, 42; Ernst Regehr, "Zur 300-Jahrfeier der Gemeinde Rosenort," Menn. Bl., 1939, 61 f.; Gustav Reimer, "Ein aufgefundenes Kirchenbuch," Menn. Bl., 1939, 22 f.; Horst Penner, Ansiedlung menn. Niederländer im Weichselmündungsgebiet von der Mitte des 16. Jh. bis zum Beginn der preussischen Zeit (Weierhof, 1940); ML IV.

Tiegenhof, a town (1939 pop. 3,000) in the Gross-Werder, 20 miles east of Danzig in West Prussia, Germany. In 1562 the Mennonite immigration from the Netherlands to Tiegenhof began, at a time when the region was under the Polish crown. The king had borrowed money from Hans Simon and Steffen Loytzen (q.v.), a banking firm of Danzig, and given them the Tiegenhof area as security, whereupon the Loytzen brothers built a Hof on the Dutch pattern (a model farm with Dutch cows). The farm was initially called "the new farm," and later the Loytzenhof. In order to cultivate the region, which was largely marshy and covered with reeds and underbrush to such an extent that it was not arable, the brothers invited Dutch Mennonites to settle there to clear and drain it. After a certain number of free years the Mennonites were to pay for the lands they made arable at the rate of 52 Talers and 13 chickens per hide. In 1581 the Loytzen firm became bankrupt, and Ernst von dem Weiher took over the district. He completed the castle which the Loytzen brothers had begun; the farm was now called the Weiershof. In 1784 the castle was razed and the Protestant church here built of the materials thus secured. About 1760 the name Tiegenhof came into use.

The central location of the town for the Mennonite congregations in the Gross-Werder area made it a convenient meeting place for conferences of the Mennonites of East and West Prussia, which frequently met here, and for Bible conferences.

E.Re.

E. Regehr, Geschichts- und Predigertabelle der Mennonitengemeinde Rosenort (2d ed., Elbing, 1939); Felicia Szper, Niederländische Niederzettingen in West-Pruißen . . . (Enkhuizen, 1919) 95-113, 205, 221, 223; ML IV.

Tiegenhof Fire Insurance. In the early 17th century Mennonite farmers in the Tiegenhof area drew up a "Brandordnung" for mutual aid in case of fire.

This arrangement was permitted by the burgomasters of Danzig in 1622. In the next year the Tiegenhöfer Feuerversicherung was founded at Tiegenhagen. It existed until the Mennonites in the Prussian area were expelled from their farms in 1945, and was the model of the Mennonite fire insurance companies in Russia. vDZ.

Horst Penner, Ansiedlung Menn. Niederländer im Weichselmündungsgebiet . . . (Weierhof, 1940) 19, 21.

Tiegerweide, a Prussian Mennonite village name transplanted to the Molotschna settlement, Ukraine, and Omsk, Siberia. (See Villages.)

Tiel, a town in the Dutch province of Gelderland (1954 pop. 15,000, with 25 Mennonites) where a Kring (group) of Mennonites was founded in 1948, particularly by the activity of H. B. Kossen-van Rhijn, the widow of Pastor D. Kossen (q.v.). In 1958 the membership of this group numbered 27; the minister in charge is the pastor of Wageningen (q.v.); services are held seven or eight times a year. vDZ.

Tieleman, Abraham, b. c1733 at Amsterdam, d. there April 26, 1820, was a lay preacher of the Danzig Old Flemish "op de Smallegraft" congregation at Haarlem 1766-86; 1786-88 he served in the Danzig Old Flemish church "bij de Kruijkes" at Amsterdam; in 1788 this small group merged with the Zonists (q.v.); in 1790 Tieleman, who had resigned at the merger, became a preacher of this Zonist congregation. In 1801, when the Zonist church merged with the Lamist, Tieleman retired. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 1418; DB 1898, 21 f.; Naamlijst 1829, 23.) vDZ.

Tieleman uyt den Nunckerken, an Anabaptist martyr: see Nunkirchen, Thielemann von.

Tielen, Tieleman: see Sittert, Tielen Tielman van.

Tielt, a town (pop. c13,000) in Flanders, Belgium, was the center of an Anabaptist congregation in the 16th century. Their preacher, Paulus (q.v.) van Thielt or van Meenen, was an influential elder, who played a large role in the dissensions of the day; he fled to the northern Netherlands. His sister-in-law, Prijntgen Maelbouts (see Pierijntgen van Male), the widow of his brother Jacob de Bakker, was beheaded at Gent in 1564. A letter written by him (BRN VII, 215) indicates that he was opposed to a strict interpretation of the ban. The martyr Jelis Strings (q.v.), who was seized at Werwik with Pieter and Jelis Potvliet, all of them from Tielt, and burned at the stake there in 1562, advised Paulus to flee. In 1568 he baptized the martyr Jan (q.v.) van Alckeren outside Halewijn in the presence of 50 members. In 1605 he was a preacher in the congregation at Haarlem, Holland. He was a large, tall man. Elder Jacob (q.v.) de Rore also preached in Tielt. In 1573 Anthonis (q.v.) Ysbaerts was burned at the stake in Tielt; he had been a servant of the bailiff of Gent and had thus participated in the execution of a number of Anabaptist martyrs. After his conversion he fled to Friesland, but returned to Tielt to help another fugitive from Tielt get some of his possessions. On his visit he was recognized and arrested. A monk, Pieter de Bakker, tried in vain to lead him to recant. By persecution and emigration the Tiel congregation died out probably by 1580, although a few Mennonites were still living in or near the town in 1629. (ML IV.) K.V.

Tiene, Marie, an Anabaptist martyr named acrostically in the song "Met menschlijcke tongen niet." (Wolkan, Lieder, 80.)

Tiessen: see Thiessen.

Tietes, Jacob: see Huizinga.

Tiets Jan Colmerswijff, a Dutch revolutionary Anabaptist arrested on April 7, 1535, when the Oldeklooster (q.v.) was recaptured. She was taken to Leeuwarden, the capital of Friesland, and drowned there on April 14, 1535. (K. Vos, Menno Simons, Leiden, 1914, 229.) vDZ.

Tiettye Douwes, an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded on Dec. 7, 1549, at Leeuwarden in Friesland, Netherlands, with Laurens (q.v.) Tiettyts, who may have been his son. Tiettye had been (re)baptized before the end of March 1535. Further particulars are lacking. vDZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 746; J. Reitsma, Honderd jaren uit de Geschiedenis der Hervorming . . . in Friesland (Leeuwarden, 1876) 63.

Tiffin Civilian Public Service Unit No. 147 at the Tiffin State Institute, Tiffin, Ohio, opened in June 1945 and closed in November of that year when the place was changed from a home for epileptics to a mental institution. The twenty CPS men engaged in farm and maintenance work. The Mennonite Central Committee operated this unit, composed of men interested in music, who participated in music classes after their working hours. M.G.

Melvin Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, 1949) 246.

Tigler (formerly also Tichelaar), with its lateral Tigler Wybrandi branch, a Mennonite family found in Friesland, Netherlands, as early as 1657. In this year (1) Carst Sickes, probably a native of Stiens near Leeuwarden, had a "tichelwerk" (tilework) at Leeuwarden, from which the family derived its name. Carst and his descendants for many generations were loyal and active members of the Waterlander congregation at Leeuwarden (q.v.). His son (2) Claes Karsten Tichelaar (Tigler), d. c1725, was from 1680 a preacher of the congregation and the prosperous owner of the tileworks and other businesses. A sermon of his, Predicatie on II Pet. 1:13 f., preached on Aug. 7, 1718, was published at Leeuwarden (n.d.-1719). He was rather liberal-minded: and on Nov. 26, 1719, after a quarrel he and his son (3) Djurre Clases, and his brother Tjerk Karsten (d. 1722), a deacon of the church, were banned on the ground that they worshiped with and participated in a communion service of the Remonstrants at Dokkum. Claes Tigler did not take his excommunication very seriously, considering it invalid because the meeting at which it was decided upon was illegal. Most members of the church sided with him. The city government, intervening, stated that Jansen's attitude was unchristian. A further meeting of the members nominated new trustees and the ban of the three Tighers was withdrawn.

(3) Djurre Clases Tigler (Leeuwarden 1688-1760), the owner of the tileworks and of a limekiln, later a wholesale dealer, increased the fortune of the family. He is said to have been one of the wealthiest citizens of his home town. He served the church for many years as a deacon.

His sons were (4) Gerben Djurres (1725-1806) and (5) Klaas Djurres (1724-1811). This Klaas Tigler (also called Nicolaas Tichelaar) studied theology at the University of Franeker and the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary and served the Mennonite congregation of Huizen (q.v.) as preacher for a few months in 1750. He then moved to Leeuwarden, where he accepted a call for half-time service. Until 1752 he was a regular preacher of the Leeuwarden congregation; from then he preached only occasionally. Although after that time he devoted himself mainly to the study of science and literature and the managing of his property, he still remained active in serving the interests of his congregation as well as of the Mennonites in Friesland in general. In Leeuwarden he brought about a merger (1758) of a small congregation meeting at de Zwitterwiltje, usually called the Frisian church, with the large Waterlander congregation. He also was a trustee of the Conference of Friesland. He was married to Hiske Heringa, who died in 1784; they had no children. Klaas Tigler willed most of his wealth (he left over 500,000 Dutch guilders) for a foundation to give financial support to young men of the Tigler family who wished to study at a Dutch university. This foundation is called the Klaas Tigler Leen (q.v.).

A lateral branch of the Tigler family is the Tigler Wybrandi family, which descends from Cornelis Wybrandi (b. at Berlikum 1775, d. at Leeuwarden 1839), a merchant and owner of an oil press. Some of the Tigler Wybrandis also served the church as deacons, e.g., Jan Tigler Wybrandi, d. 1912, who was a deacon of the Utrecht congregation in 1897-1903, 1906-8, and 1912. Another member of this family in a side branch was Klaas Overbeek Tigler (1784-1847) of Dokkum, who after studying at the Amsterdam seminary in 1804-10 served the Mennonite congregation of Franeker 1811-46. (DB 1874, 60-74; Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 185, 221; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 1955.)

Tijs, an Anabaptist martyr: see Thijs Hendricksz.

Tijs van Lind(t) (Thijs de Lind, Thys Hille, Thijs op den Berch, real name Thijs van Lin), an Anabaptist martyr, a pious man who was held in high regard for his benevolence to the poor. Since he could not be persuaded to recant even by the use of torture, he was sentenced to death and burned at the stake at Roermond, then belonging to the duchy of Geldern, now in the Dutch province of Limburg, in July 1551 (not 1550, as van Braght erroneously stated). Van Braght's account in the Martyrs' Mirror relates that "shortly after the burning of the pious witness of Jesus Christ" a severe fire broke out in Roermond, which many thought was "a punishment for the innocent blood." This fire did not, however, strike until July 16, 1554.

NEFF.

Mart. Mir. D 98, E 496; W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik . . . I (The Hague, 1937) 342, 352, 355; DB 1899, 140, 142; ML II, 657.

Tijs Rarop: see Thys Jurriaens.

Tilsit, a town (pop. c60,000) now Russian, in former times Lithuanian, in the 17th and 18th centuries Prussian. In the vicinity of Tilsit (Tilsit Lowlands) Mennonites from West Prussia settled in 1713 ff. Most of them, however, by the order of Frederick William I (q.v.), had to leave the country in 1724; they went to the Culm (q.v.) area and to Tragheimerweide (q.v.) in West Prussia. Shortly after 1740, during the reign of Frederick (q.v.) the Great, a new group of immigrants settled in the neighborhood of Tilsit. The Mennonites of the Tilsit Lowland formed the congregation of Plauschwarren (q.v.), later called Adlig Pokracken (q.v.). In 1776 there were 16 Mennonite families with 77 souls in the Tilsit district, four families living in the town of Tilsit. In 1861, 29 Mennonites were living in the town of Tilsit and 49 in the Tilsit-Ragnit district; in 1910 these figures were 100 and 50 respectively, and in 1925, 85 and 50. (For details see East Prussia, Gumbinnen, Lithuania, and Memelniederung, and the literature mentioned there.)

vbZ.

Timmerman, a common Dutch family name, "timmerman" meaning carpenter. In Mennonite history a number of Timmermans are found, in many cases not related to one another. Herman (q.v.) (de) Timmerman was a well-known Mennonite elder in Flanders. Cornelis Jentjes Timmerman was a Mennonite lay preacher at Harlingen in Friesland 1713-d.65, who is said to have possessed a considerable library, which was auctioned after his death. In Prussia and particularly in the towns of Danzig and Königsberg, there lived also a number of Mennonite Timmermans, from the 18th century usually called Zimmerman(n). This Prussian Timmerman-Zimmerman (q.v.) family is obviously of Dutch descent.

vbZ.

Timmerman, Herman: see Herman (de) Timmerman.

Tinnegieter, Jeronimus (Jeroen): see Jeroen Tinnegieter.

Tippecanoe County (Ind.) Swiss Mennonite Settlement: see Rossville and Buck Creek.

Tirion, a Dutch Mennonite family whose ancestor, Darther Christoffel Geeraertsoon Tierjon (1605-53), moved from Belgium to Rotterdam, Holland, where he died. His son Izaak Tirion (1628-99) lived at Rotterdam and later at Gouda, where he was a deacon in the church. Izaak was married to Suzanna Nieukerck of Amsterdam. His sister Jannetje Tirion was married to Abraham van Loon (q.v.) of Gouda. His son Christoffel Tirion (1675-1711) studied medicine, and after obtaining his M.D. degree studied for the ministry under Galenus (q.v.) Abrahamsz at Amsterdam, and served as preacher in the Amsterdam Lamist congregation 1700-3. In August 1703 he was censured and excluded from the communion service because of misconduct. In June 1704 he was called as preacher by the Mennonite congregation of Utrecht. Here he was preacher with the conservative Jakob van Griethuyzen, and the majority of the congregation were strongly opposed to Tirion's more liberal views. When a number of his followers severely criticized van Griethuyzen, a schism seemed inevitable, but this was averted by the resignation of Tirion in 1720; he moved to Amsterdam, where he practiced medicine until his death in the next year. Besides his medical thesis of 1695 he published Predicatie over de Versoekinghe onses Heeren Jesu Christi, a sermon (Amsterdam, 1700), and Lykreden (funeral sermon) over Johannes Andries (Utrecht, 1706). Christoffel Tirion was married to Dorothea Aldenhove; their son was Izaak Tirion (1708-65), married c1730 to Johanna Abrahams Fries (1708-34) of Amsterdam and after her death to Johanna Koster (d. 1793) of Alkmaar. Izaak was also a loyal member of the church and a warm friend of Collegiantism (q.v.), serving 1746-51 as a trustee of "De Oranjeappel" (q.v.), the Collegiant orphanage. He was a successful printer and publisher of books at Amsterdam. The publishing business was continued by his son and his grandson, both named Izaak Tirion. The latter conducted it until 1811, when he entered into partnership with the Mennonite publisher Johannes Müller (q.v.).

Jacob Tirion (1703-68), a son of Christoffel Tirion, moved to Crefeld, Germany, and founded the Crefeld branch of this family; his daughter Hester Tirion (b. 1740) was married to Wopko Molenaar (q.v.), a Mennonite pastor of Crefeld. Jan Tirion (Crefeld 1745-Amsterdam 1832) moved back to Amsterdam. His grandson Jan Tirion was a deacon of the Mennonite congregation at The Hague.

In 1585 there was among the Mennonites of Gent, Belgium, a Pieter Tryon, from whom this family may have descended. Risler is, however, of the opinion that the Tirion family originated from the area of Liège, Belgium, the name originally having been Thierry.

vbZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 684 f., 1767, 2296; DB 1863, 24, 84; 1896, 61, 70; 1918, 64; (H. B. Berghuys), Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinde gemeente te Utrecht (n.p., n.d. 1926) 45; Walther Risler, "Ein europäisches Stammbuch vor 150 Jahren: das Tirionsche Freundschaftsalbum," Die Heimat XXV (1954) No. 3-4, 137-40.

Tirol, one of the strongest centers of Anabaptism during the 16th century and a fountainhead of great leaders of the movement. After the establishment of the Hutterite (q.v.) brotherhood in Moravia practically all Tirolean Anabaptists turned Hutterite, with the exception of a few individuals who followed Pilgram Marpeck (q.v.).

Tirol, a province of Austria, named after the Counts of Tirol (near Meran), came into the possession of the Hapsburgs (of Vienna) c1360. Its population is German except for the area of the bishopric of Trent where the population is Italian (no Anabaptists lived there). In 1918 South Tirol, i.e., the part of Tirol situated south of the Brenner Pass, was ceded to Italy. Tirol is a mountainous area and the people are sturdy, forceful, and proud of their "liberties." The seat of the provincial government is the city of Innsbruck, situated at the point where the east-west road along the Inn Valley crosses the north-south road over the Brenner Pass, the lowest (4,000 ft.) pass over the Alps. The Inn River flows into Bavaria (border town Kufstein), thence into the Danube at Passau. The main sections of Tirol are the valleys of the Inn, the Eisack, and Adige rivers, and several bishoprics. (1) The Inn Valley (q.v.), with the cities Innsbruck, Hall, Schwaz, Rattenberg (q.v.), and Kufstein, is rich in ores; its miners represented the most alert social element of Tirol at that time. The old road from Germany to Italy leads through this valley, making it economically well situated and progressive. (2) The Eisack Valley, south of the Brenner Pass, near the bishop's seat at Brixen, is soon joined by the Puster Valley (q.v.), the home of Jakob Hutter and Jörg Zaunring. The towns of the Eisack Valley are Klausen (q.v.) and Guffidaun (q.v.), where Jörg Blaurock (q.v.) found his martyr's death in 1529. (3) The Adige (q.v.) Valley (German, Etschtal) extends through Meran and Bozen down to the border of Italian-speaking Trent. (4) The area of a number of bishoprics such as Brixen (q.v.), Salzburg (q.v.)—Kitzbühel (q.v.) belonged to this bishopric—and Freising (from Rattenburg to Kufstein). In all these ecclesiastical domains the Hapsburg government had less to say and little executive power, although pressure was always exerted.

Anabaptism in Its Struggle with the Hapsburg Government. There is insufficient source material to decide precisely how or when Anabaptism reached Tirol. Very little is known for the time prior to 1527. As everywhere else in German lands, Tirol also experienced a peasant revolt in 1525, under the leadership of a certain Geismaier, which though partly political and economic, was no less a revolt against a decaying Catholicism and a cry for spiritual renewal. Strangely enough, Lutheranism did not have the same appeal here that it had in Germany proper. The first reliable information concerning Anabaptist mission work dates from November 1527. At that time both Leonhard Schiemer (q.v.) and Hans Schlaffer (q.v.) had entered the Inn Valley from Bavaria. Schiemer was caught at Rattenberg and suffered the first recorded death as a martyr in Tirol in January 1528. Schlaffer was caught about the same time near by in the mining city of Schwaz, where it was said that of 1200 inhabitants 800 were Anabaptists, and was put to death in February 1528. These two executions began the sad spectacle of relentless hunting, torturing, and killing of Anabaptists, which lasted almost to the end of the 16th century. It was carried out mainly upon the stern command of Ferdinand (q.v.) of Hapsburg, living in Vienna, who never wearied of insisting upon the harshest measures. But in spite of the pyres and burning fagots all along the Inn Valley Anabaptism only took deeper roots. One chronicler reports one thousand executions up to 1530, although the records of 1539 account for hardly more than 600, and the Hutterite chronicle speaks of "only" 386 executions up to 1542. Whichever figure is correct, the challenge was severe, but the undaunted spirit of this sturdy mountain folk was ready to meet it. Not Lutheranism but Anabaptism became the answer to the ills of the Catholic Church, from 1527 to 1627. The sharpest of all the numerous mandates (q.v.) issued by Ferdinand against the Anabaptists was that of Aug. 20, 1527, proclaimed in Tirol on Nov. 20 of that year. No fewer than 1,200 copies were taken to Innsbruck to be distributed among the clergy and city and county authorities, and to be announced everywhere from pulpits and market places. Actually, however, it had no deterrent effect; judges and jury often felt compassion for the humble victims and hesitated to comply with the orders from Vienna or Innsbruck; only the threat that all sympathizers and Half-Anabaptists (q.v.) would be dealt with like Anabaptists achieved the desired effect. That so many Anabaptists escaped the vigilance of the authorities and traveled safely to the "promised land" of Moravia, and that so many missionaries from Switzerland, Bavaria, and Moravia worked here at least for the first 50 to 60 years, holding meetings and building up congregations, proves that no government action could quench the spiritual fire and the serious determination of the population. It was not until the end of the Council of Trent (1563, see Counter Reformation) and the internal reforms of the Catholic Church, together with the coming of the Jesuits (q.v.), that the vigor of the Anabaptist movement was broken.

In 1527 Schiemer and Schlaffer had come to the Inn Valley from Bavaria, spreading the teachings which they had received from Hans Hut. In May 1529 Jörg Blaurock, who was a refugee from Switzerland, was working ceaselessly in the Adige and Eisack valleys, apparently most successfully. When he was finally caught and executed in Guffidaun (q.v.) near Klausen, Sept. 6, 1529, a young boy of eight was watching this weird spectacle: Peter Walpot (q.v.), the later outstanding bishop of the Hutterites in Moravia. It is possible that Jakob Hutter (q.v.) received his first news of the Anabaptist movement from some brethren in Carinthia (q.v.), just east of the Puster Valley. That is about all that is known of outside influences in Tirol. For the greater part Tirolean Anabaptism was an indigenous product. Pilgram Marpeck (q.v.) (formerly a Lutheran of Rattenberg) was also converted c1527, and likewise Leopold Scharnschläger (q.v.), a native of Hopfgarten near Kitzbühel. Members of the Tirolean nobility also now and then turned Anabaptist. Among them were Helene von Freyberg (q.v.), mistress of Münichau castle near Kitzbühel, who gave asylum to many an Anabaptist (she was one of the few followers of Pilgram Marpeck); Erhard Zimmermann, the former administrator of Neuhaus; Agnes von Waltenhofen (nee Trautmannsdorf); Christopher Fuchs, captain of the border castle of Kufstein; and Anton and Siegmund Wolkenstein, who belonged to one of the oldest and most highly respected noble families of southern Tirol. Only a recantation at the last moment saved the Wolkenstein brothers from a martyr's death. Helene von Freyberg, however, had to leave the country, bequeathing her estate to her sons.

Johann Loserth (q.v.) published in 1892-93 an almost exhaustive account of Anabaptism in Tirol. Recent research by several Innsbruck historians (e.g., Widmoser, Kolb) has added little to the established facts. Widmoser, who in 1951 summarized all this research, comes to the conclusion that Tirol must have produced close to 20,000 Anabaptists during the 16th century (with more than 600 executions all told). Although Widmoser clearly takes the traditional anti-Anabaptist position he has had to admit "that one cannot help getting the impression that the government intentionally exaggerated the danger and perniciousness of Anabaptism in order to get a legal title for its ulterior purpose: the dominance of the state over the church." Previously Widmoser had expressly stated that the persecution was carried out mainly by the Hapsburgs, while the ecclesiastical princes (Brixen, Salzburg, Freising) prior to the Council of Trent (1563) had little power to parallel these activities. Widmoser reveals another motive for the severe persecution, far removed from all spiritual concerns; viz., that Ferdinand needed for his Turkish Wars the money accruing from the confiscation of Anabaptist property. Loserth reports of one peasant who sold his homestead for 1,600 guilders, and another Anabaptist left property behind valued at 12,000 guilders (1555).

Ferdinand was absolutely ruthless. All kinds of tricks were improvised to ferret out the Anabaptists. Special "Anabaptist hunters" (Täuferjäger) were organized, and spies appointed to report on secret meetings. The reward for the capture of an Anabaptist, originally 20-40 guilders, was raised to 60-70 guilders, even to 100 in case of a leader. And finally the most severe of all deterrents was applied, the sentencing of these "obstinate heretics" to the galleys of Andrea Doria of Genoa, imperial captain of a navy in the Mediterranean. But this most inhuman measure was even less effective than the pyres of the Inn Valley. Ferdinand attended to every minute detail in the fight against Anabaptism; every case had to be reported to him personally in detail, and the archives of Tirol and Vienna are full of mandates and correspondence in these matters. Hesitant courts were reprimanded and vigilant officials were praised whenever a big catch succeeded. He even prescribed that in case of recantation the offender should be "only" beheaded. Nevertheless the authorities in the various court districts frequently aided the Anabaptists in their flight to Moravia. Since the majority used the waterway down the Inn, a supervision of the boat traffic was enjoined by the king, but in the great majority of cases the emigration nevertheless succeeded.

Two government officials deserve special mention, one more bent on the method of persuasion, the other more on persecution. Dr. Gallus Müller (q.v.), Catholic court chaplain in Innsbruck, realizing the shortcomings of his church and having attended a provincial synod at Salzburg in 1537, hoped to exterminate the "error of heresy" by internal improvement, which, however, was never carried out. His work with the imprisoned Anabaptists Leonhard Lochmaier (q.v.), and Georg Liebich (q.v.) and Ursula Hellriegel (q.v.) is discussed in the pertinent articles in this ENCYCLOPEDIA. No real communication could be achieved between the victims and this Catholic theologian. Soon Dr. Müller changed his mind and aided in drawing up the mandate of November 1539, which calls the Anabaptists not only "falsifiers of the Scriptures" but also outright revolutionaries.

At the same time the notorious Wolfgang Künigl (q.v.), imperial court prosecutor and specialist in Anabaptist hunting in Lower and Upper Austria (q.v.) in 1527-28, was sent by Ferdinand to Brixen to consult with the prince-bishop as to the best method of halting this "heresy." The result of this conference was a memorandum to the king, dated Oct. 17, 1539, entitled, Anzeigungen, aus was Ursachen die Wiedertauffer in disem Lande der Fürstlichen Grafschaft Tyroll Iren Fuss dermassen gesetzt und bishero über etlicher Obrigkaiten allem möglichsten Fleiss nit haben mügen ausgerent werden. The question is asked: Why does the common man adhere to Anabaptism? The answer, somewhat evasive, blames the judges and juries as being too lenient, using the rack too little, allowing the Anabaptists to show the courage of their faith in public. Easing their punishment had done no good. One thing had become clear, namely, that terror did not terrify. In spite of no less than 600 executions (an official figure!) in 1527-39, the expected results were still lacking. The most efficient remedy, i.e., internal church reforms, did not occur to these ecclesiastics and magistrates, who simply wanted to bring these men back into the fold of the Roman Church with a minimum of effort. The king replied with new mandates advising the omission of doctrinal discussion at trials because they merely excited the interest of the public.

The difficulty of finding compliant courts is seen in the trial of Hans Mändl and his two codefendants in 1561, when three of the judges were placed under police surveillance. After 1561 Jesuits came to Innsbruck, and an internal reform was eventually imposed from Rome as the most efficient countermeasure against spreading Protestantism. From now on Anabaptism declined in Tirol. Those who were strong gladly sold their property and emigrated to Moravia, which was then enjoying its Golden Age. Nevertheless the Anabaptist movement in Tirol still had the sympathy of wide circles of the population. Loserth says the Jesuits were no more successful at persuasion than Gallus Müller had been. In the later 16th century (Ferdinand died 1564), the government, better organized than ever before, made more systematic efforts to eradicate any deviation from Catholicism. It became increasingly difficult to evade raids by soldiers, since the majority of both nobles and peasants had now become less disposed to protect these clandestine groups, perhaps an aftereffect of the work of the Jesuits. After 1600 Anabaptism was practically extinct in Tirol, even though the records occasionally mention brethren up to 1627. The Thirty Years' War, the expulsion of the Anabaptists from Moravia in 1622, and a new spirit of the time had reduced the further growth and spread of Anabaptist teachings. Tirol manifested more or less the same picture as Switzerland, Germany, and Moravia. (See also Judicial Procedures, II.)

Development of Anabaptism in Tirol. The story of Anabaptism appears very different when looked at not from the outside, as the official records reflect it, but from the inside where the intrinsic issues are discussed and at stake. For this purpose other source material must be consulted—the writings and chronicles of the Anabaptists themselves. In few countries was the absolute seriousness of life's conduct and the commitment to the way of discipleship more eagerly sought after than in Tirol. Hence few countries produced more and greater leaders than this Austrian province. Jakob Hutter and Hans Amon, Hans Mändl and Peter Walpot, Jeronimus Käls and Hans Kräl, were all outstanding leaders of the Hutterite movement both in Tirol and Moravia. Marpeck and Scharnschlager were equally outstanding leaders of a related Anabaptist movement, different in many ways and yet of the same roots. These men did not produce great doctrinal treatises (except Marpeck and Scharnschlager), but their epistles (q.v.) and hymns written in prison, and their farewell words at the place of execution, recorded in the chronicles, as well as their written defenses before the courts (Urgichten), are moving witnesses to their spiritual depth and strength.

There can be little doubt that Anabaptism took its start in the lower Inn Valley around Rattenberg and Schwaz, both mining cities. Even though the activities of both Schiemer (q.v.) and Schlaffer (q.v.) were but short-lived (1527-28), they left a profound impression which was still felt 50 or even 80 years later. The Kunstbuch (q.v.) of the Marpeck circle, dated 1561, contains their writings as do the numerous Hutterite codices of Moravia and Slovakia. They laid the groundwork, continuing Hans Hut's apostolate, and the Tiroleans remained loyal to it, even though Anabaptism arose independently in other places also, such as Kitzbühel, Brixen, Clausen, Pustertal, etc. The geographic situation—many valleys separated by high, snow-covered mountains—should have worked for independence and particularism; and yet Anabaptism was a fairly uniform movement based on the understanding of the pure Word of the New Testament and obedience to God's commandments (discipleship). Of all places Rattenberg had the highest number of martyrs: 71 by 1542. This is a graphic illustration of the staunchness of the brethren and sisters, in full awareness of the dangers involved. A second wave of new commitments is reported around 1558, due most likely to the work of Hans Mändl (q.v.), and as late as 1603 Anabaptists were still passing through Rattenberg.

Of Blaurock and his brief activities south of the Brenner Pass (1529) mention has already been made. But the movement which arose in the nearby Puster Valley and around the city of Bozen (Bolzano) was of more permanent consequence. Here Jörg Zaunring (q.v.) was active as early as 1528 in the "Ritten" district, and most likely also Jakob Hutter (q.v.), who was born in the Puster Valley. From the Italian-Tirolean border in the south to Kufstein in the north, from the Eisack Valley on the Brenner road to Carinthia in the east, Hutter was active, a true apostle of the new teachings. He must have been an acknowledged leader by 1528-29, for the brotherhoods in the Puster and Eisack valleys decided to send him and Siegmund Schützinger (q.v.) to Moravia to inquire whether there was a chance there for a more stable brotherhood life. After a long conversation with Jakob Widemann (q.v.) in Austerlitz, Moravia, the two men returned hopefully, and now the first group of emigrants under the leadership of Zaunring went to Moravia. Other trips by Hutter followed in 1531 and 1533. The activities and the success of this man are truly amazing. When persecution (temporarily) became very acute also in Moravia, Hutter was urged to return to Tirol (1535), where he was finally caught and cruelly martyred in February 1536. Also Hans Amon (q.v.), bishop in Moravia 1535-42, had spent the years 1530-34 moving all over Tirol. Persecution did not dishearten these people but only speeded the emigration to Moravia. Among these refugees were Jeronimus Käls (q.v.), the schoolmaster of Kufstein, a most noble and dedicated representative of Anabaptism, executed in Vienna in 1536.

Ulrich Stadler (q.v.), though a Tirolean, did not become an active leader until his emigration to Moravia and thence to Poland (d. 1540). Both Onophrius Griesinger (q.v.) and Leonhard Lochmaier (q.v.), upon whom Dr. Müller had vainly tried his persuasive arguments, were imprisoned in Brixen and there sealed their faith with their death. It is difficult to imagine the incredible hardships in the dungeons and prisons of that time. Georg Liebich (q.v.), who lay in the Vellenburg near Innsbruck for two years (1540-41), experienced haunting visions which drove him nearly mad. Bats, rats, and other vermin made his "dark hole" almost unbearable. The same is told of Hans Kräl (q.v.), who in 1557 was captured and thrown into a dungeon of the castle tower of Tauffers (Puster Valley): his clothing rotted from his body and he nearly perished in filth and vermin. In addition to all this, he spent not less than 37 weeks in the block. But he came out to become eventually one of the outstanding leaders of the brotherhood in Moravia where he was bishop 1578-83.

One of the strongest personalities of the Tirolean Hutterites of the mid-16th century was Hans Mändl (q.v.), born near Guffidaun in the Eisack Valley, whose activities extended from 1536 to his tragic end in 1561. He was won for the new faith by Griesinger and suffered imprisonment several times. He was one of the finest apostles Anabaptism ever produced, and accordingly his success was simply amazing. But in 1560 he and two fellow Anabaptists were caught in the Inn Valley. His trial and end is well described in the Hutterite chronicle, and his epistles are testimonies of the best Anabaptist spirit known. His readiness to suffer for the sake of his faith has few parallels in the annals of Anabaptism.

One of the last martyrs to be executed in Tirol was Nicholas Geyerspüchler (q.v.), a miller from the neighborhood of Kitzbühel. Though illiterate (an exception; most Anabaptists from Tirol could not only read and write but were extremely skillful in their epistles and other writings), he was most successful in his mission work throughout his home district, whither he had been sent by the Moravian brotherhood. In 1566 he, too, was caught, and after much work by Jesuits and his steadfast defense was first beheaded and then burned, in 1567.

The great church reforms of that time no doubt had some effect, and Anabaptism outside Moravia gradually began to decline. Moreover, the milder regime of Emperor Maximilian II (see Habsburg) in 1564-76 soon brought these horrifying executions almost to a conclusion. Two more outstanding Tiroleans became Hutterite leaders, but no longer as apostles or missionaries, but as bishops of a well-established brotherhood church in Moravia. Peter Walpot (q.v.), born 1521 near Klausen, where he had witnessed the death of Blaurock in 1529, seems to have emigrated to Moravia at an early age; in 1542 he was already a preacher, and in 1565-78 a very successful Vorsteher or bishop. He was succeeded by Hans Kräl (q.v., from Kitzbühel), who was bishop in 1578-83 and also continued the great Hutterite chronicle. His previous mission work in Tirol had likewise been of unusual success, as the increasing stream of newcomers from Tirol testifies.

More martyrs were still to come, such as Andreas Pürchner (1584), Georg Wenger, and Jacob Platzer (1591), but in general Anabaptism in Tirol had spent itself by the turn of the century. In the neighboring smaller provinces of Vorarlberg (q.v.), west of Tirol, which by and large played a minor role in this story, the last martyrs were executed in 1618.

Loserth in his classical study of Tirolean Anabaptism also collected some material pertaining to the methods of the missionaries in their tireless and dangerous endeavor to reach the widest possible circles. One person deposed at court that he unexpectedly found a notice in his house inviting him to a meeting somewhere in the woods; another heard whispering in the bushes and upon approaching found a group of Anabaptists who brought him special information. Now and then a missionary approached someone who disliked his message, but rarely was he betrayed to the authorities. Many people were indifferent, but it often happened that a young girl or a man servant by chance picked up the words and eventually traveled to Moravia to learn more of that new teaching. When the "good time" set in in Moravia in the second half of the century, the arguments became even more attractive, and people were ready to sell their property and leave their old homes. That the main stock of Hutterites was Tirolean was brought home recently also in an unexpected way: when in 1937 two American Hutterites revisited their old places in Europe, they discovered that their own German language was simply a Tirolean dialect—and this in spite of the fact that they themselves were not of Tirolean extraction.

LOSERTH, R.F.

Hartmann Ammann, "Die Wiedertäufer im Pustertal und deren Urgichten" in Programm des Gymnasiums in Brixen, 1896-97; Beck, Geschichtsbücher; Josef Beck and Johann Loserth, "Georg Blaurock und die Anfänge des Anabaptismus in Graubünden und Tirol," in Vorträge und Aufsätze der Comenius-Gesellschaft VII (Berlin, 1899); Ernst Correll, "Anabaptism in Tyrol, a Preview and Discussion," MQR I (1927) 49-60; Paul Dedic, "Literaturbericht über den österreichischen Protestantismus von 1918-38," in ARG XXXV (1938) 252 ff.; Anton Dörr, Tiroler Volksgut auf dem Heidenboden (Eisenstadt, Austria, 1951), who found a miracle play among the Habaners of Burgenland, Austria, which originally was a Christmas play from the lower Inn Valley; Heinold Fast, "Pilgrim Marbeck und das oberdeutsche Täuferum," in ARG XLVII (1956) 212-42, particularly 220 note; Hans G. Fischer, Jakob Huter, Leben, Frömmigkeit, Briefe (Newton, 1956); R. Friedmann, "Die Briefe der österreichischen Täufer," in ARG XLIII, 30-80; bibliography for Tirol, etc., ibid., 161-87 f.; Kirchmaier, Chronik des Stiftes Neustift bei Brixen, Fontes Rerum Austriacarum I (Vienna, 1854); Johann von Kripp, "Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in Tirol," in Programm des Staatsgymnasiums zu Innsbruck (Innsbruck, 1897); Loserth, Anabaptismus; idem, Communismus; Eduard Widmoser, "Das Tiroler Täuferum," in Tiroler Heimat XV, 45-89; XVI, 103-28; (Innsbruck, 1951, 1952) (digests also the recent studies by Kolb, Mayer, Kuppelwieser, and Sinzinger); Adam Wolf, Geschichtsbilder aus Oesterreich I (Vienna, 1877); Zieglschmid, Chronik; Karl Kuppelwieser, "Die Wiedertäufer im Eisacktal" (unpublished doctoral dissertation at the Univ. of Innsbruck, 1949); Katharina Sinzinger, "Das Täuferum im Pustertal" (unpublished dissertation, Innsbruck, 1950); Franz Kolb, Die Wiedertäufer im Wipptal (Innsbruck, 1951); ML IV.

Tisen (Tyson), Reinert: see Teissen, Reinert.

Tiskilwa Mennonite Church (GCM), located in a historic village in the beautiful valley of Bureau County, Ill., was organized in 1911 to serve a small Mennonite group who had withdrawn from the Willow Springs Mennonite (MC) Church (q.v.). The town hall was used until early in 1913, when the present adequate building was erected. The following have served as resident pastors: Eugene Augspurger 1912-20, Ernest Bohn 1925-32, H. E. Nunemaker 1932-41, Henry Toews 1941-43, L. R. Amstutz 1943-47, Emil Sommer 1949-52, and Ben Esch 1952-. The membership in 1957 was 62.

BE.E.

Titelman(s), Pieter (Pierre, Petrus) (1501-72), Roman Catholic dean of Ronse (Renaix) in Flanders, Belgium, and from 1546 official inquisitor of the districts of Flanders and Artois. He was very capable and active and determined to eradicate all heresy: "he was the most hated of all inquisitors, because he was the most hardhearted of this kind of men. His notoriety was due to his intransigence" (Halkin). He was alternately a judge and police dog. Particularly the Mennonites of Flanders encountered his zeal and implacability. As in Halewijn (q.v.) in 1563 and Meenen (q.v.) 1567 he often appeared in various towns to surprise Mennonite meetings and to arrest the attendants. In many of the trials of the martyrs, e.g., those of Jooskint, Claes de Praet, Hans de Vette, and Peter van Wervik, he was the examiner. Claes de Praet frankly charged him with a spirit of persecution. In the discussion with this martyr Titelman admitted that the moral conduct of the Mennonites was irreproachable, and that they were justly praised because of their peace, love, and charity; "but," he said, "what is the good of it . . . if you have not the (right) faith?" This was his settled opinion and he ruthlessly acted in accord with this view.

Not all Catholics approved of Titelman's assiduity and practices. Especially certain magistrates lodged complaints with the governess at Brussels that his rigorous measures were severely injuring the prosperity of many towns. voZ.

E. Valvekens, De Inquisitie in de Nederlanden (1949); L. E. Halkin, La Réforme en Belgique sous Charles-Quint (Bruxelles, n.d.-1957) 58; Mart. Mir. D 299b, 167b-70a, 170b, et passim, E 665, 554-60; DB 1906, 68 f.

Tiverton, a town in England, where there was an "Anabaptist" (Baptist) congregation, which together with the other "Anabaptist" churches of London, Coventry, Sarum (Salisbury), and Lincoln, tried to form a union with the Dutch Waterlander (q.v.) Mennonites in 1625, which union, however, failed to come about. For details see Coventry and Tookey, Elias. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 1368-77.) voZ.

Tiziano (Titianus or Titiano, first name unknown), Italian "spiritual reformer" and "Anabaptist," appeared briefly upon the historical stage in the mid-16th century. The dates of his birth and death are unknown. He was at one time on the staff of a cardinal in Rome and there he first learned of Lutheran teachings. He then traveled to Geneva and other places where the Reformation had taken hold, including Graubünden (Grisons) and Chiavenna. He made contact with the radical circle surrounding Camillo Renato in 1547 or 1548 and soon became an active proponent of their spiritualizing tenets. His agitations brought him a sizable following and consequent official scrutiny by the authorities at Chur, who had him imprisoned and questioned about his beliefs. He answered in ambiguous language, claiming to be guided only by the Holy Spirit. Fear of capital punishment moved him, however, to sign a confession prepared by Philip Gallicius, pastor at Chur. This confession (which we must remember was intended by Gallicius to constitute a complete recantation and may therefore represent other heresies then current besides Tiziano's own beliefs) implies that Tiziano had denied the Trinity and the divine nature of Christ, had suspected the veracity of Scripture, had placed the authority of the Spirit above that of the Bible, had rejected infant baptism, and had claimed that Christians could not hold magistracies. Tiziano, after signing the statement, was flogged and expelled from Graubünden.

He now returned to Italy and continued to work for his special beliefs. In 1548 or 1549 he met the former priest and current Lutheran Pietro Manelfi (q.v.) in Florence and acquainted him with his own views. According to Manelfi's account these included adult baptism; Christians cannot hold magistracies; Scripture only is the basis of Christian doctrine; the Roman Catholic is no true church. There is no mention of anti-Trinitarian teachings. Some months later Tiziano baptized Manelfi at Ferrara. Soon afterwards at Vicenza anti-Trinitarian and Christological questions came to the fore, requiring the calling of a synod at Venice for the establishment of orthodoxy.

Manelfi clearly believed Tiziano responsible for the introduction of "Anabaptist" teachings into Italy and for much of their spread there. He also believed that Tiziano had absorbed the doctrines of the "old Anabaptists." It is at present impossible to disentangle the contributions of Servetus and Camillo Renato (through Tiziano) to the situation that then existed, or to determine what if any part was played by the northern Täufer. Careful study of Manelfi's testimony establishes only the likelihood that Manelfi was postulating connections, which probably did not exist, between the Täufer and his own sect.

Tiziano was present at the Venetian synod in the autumn of 1550, having himself summoned delegates thereto from Switzerland and Graubünden. Of his part in the deliberations we know nothing, but we may assume that he played a leading role, in view both of the anti-Trinitarian character of the conclusions of the synod and of his selection by the group to be an "apostolic bishop" entrusted with the task of carrying tidings of their conclusions to member congregations. Henceforth we lose sight of Tiziano, save for a reference by Manelfi to his apostatizing and subsequent flight from the designs of the podesta and bishop of Padua in Lenten season 1551. We may assume that he was a casualty of the persecution of his sect that followed upon Manelfi's revelations to the Inquisition in the autumn of 1551.

It is, however, possible that Tiziano is identical with one Lorenzo Tizzano (spelling variants are common in the documents) who was involved in the circle of radical reformers surrounding Juan Valdès at Naples. Tizzano recounted his life and activities in a confession prepared for the Inquisition at Venice late in 1553. From it we have the following information: At an early age he entered a monastery of the order of Monte Oliveto and after six years there left, with his superior's permission, to be a secular priest. He served as a chaplain in several localities for a number of years. About ten years after leaving the monastery Tizzano heard about Juan Valdès and his circle in Naples and came under its influence. Members of the circle, including Tizzano, had held opinions which he classified in 1553 as "Lutheran," "Anabaptist," and "diabolical" heresies. In the later 1540's Tizzano moved to Padua and took up the study of medicine while living with his father. Fearful that he might be exposed to the authorities by a man there who had known his views in Naples, Tizzano changed his name to Benedetto Florio. Four or five years after he had arrived in Padua (this would be around 1551) some Lutherans were arrested at the house in which he lived. Fearing a similar fate and troubled in conscience, he traveled to Venice, Ferrara, and Genoa, intending to take ship to Naples. Unable to arrange such passage, he returned to Padua and, overcome by restlessness of spirit, presented himself to the Inquisitor and confessed his identity and his heresies. The Inquisitor arranged for his transfer to Venice in October 1553. There he was imprisoned and ordered to prepare the confession from which we have drawn this information.

Unless Manelfi mistook Tizzano for Tiziano in describing the experience of the latter at Padua in 1551, it is tempting to see an identification between the two figures, for in 1553 Tizzano admitted having begun to doubt his beliefs at Padua two years earlier and having left to avoid arrest. Tizzano's chaplaincy may also have included service with a cardinal. In other respects, however, the two biographies fail to coincide sufficiently to permit a positive identification.

At the time Tizzano was imprisoned at Venice, a request for instructions was sent by the Venetian Inquisitor to Rome. Tizzano was questioned further in 1555 about topics mentioned in the long-delayed reply. They brought to light contacts Tizzano had had with various individuals connected with both the Neapolitan and northern radical-movements but they add nothing to our knowledge of his former views. His later fate is unknown.

DEWIND.

K. Benrath, "Wiedertäufer im Venetianischen um die Mitte des 16. Jahrhunderts," Theologische Studien und Kritiken LVIII (1885) 20 ff.; D. Berti, "Di Giovanni Valdè e di taluni suoi discepoli secondo nuovi documenti tolti dall' Archivio Veneto," Atti della R. Accademia dei Lincei: anno CCLXXV, serie terza, memorie della classe di scienze morali, storiche e filologiche II (1877-78) 61-81; Bullingers Korrespondenz mit den Graubündnern, ed. T. Schiess, Vol. XXIII of Quellen zur Schweizer Geschichte (Basel, 1904); E. Comba, I nostri protestanti II (Firenze, 1897); E. Comba, "Un sinodo anabattista a Venezia anno 1550," Rivista cristiana XIII (1885) 21-24, 83-87; P. D. Rosius de Porta, Historia Reformationis ecclesiarum Raeticarum, Vol. I, Part II (Curiae Raetorum, 1771); F. Trechsel, Die protestantische Antitrinitarier vor Faustus Socin, Book II, Relio Sozzini und die Antitrinitarier seiner Zeit (Heidelberg, 1844) 82-83; E. M. Wilbur, A History of Unitarianism: Socinianism and its Antecedents (Cambridge, Mass., 1947).

Tjaert Geerts, beheaded at Leeuwarden in Friesland, Netherlands, in February 1571 because he had protected some heretics and carried their letters, all contrary to the imperial mandates. Moreover he possessed forbidden heretical books, including twenty copies of Menno Simons. Tjaert probably was a Mennonite. vdZ.

J. Reitsma, Honderd jaren uit de Geschiedenis der Hervorming . . . in Friesland (Leeuwarden, 1876) 158.

Tjaert Renicx, an Anabaptist martyr beheaded with four others at Leeuwarden in Friesland, Netherlands, on Feb. 8, 1539. This martyr is found under different names: Tjaert, Thyaert, Tjard, Tjaar(d)t, Tj. van Kimsward, Tj. van Witmarsum, Tj. van Sneek (Tiardus Snekenensis), Tj. Renicx (Reynersz, Reynerts, Reincx, Reinders). About him there is much mystery. Menno Simons writes about him, "About 1539 a very pious and God-fearing farmer was arrested in the region where I had lived (at Kimsward near Witmarsum), called Tjard Reynerszoon, because in my misery he had hidden me (in his house), receiving me with pity and love, and was thrown on a wheel . . . a few days later, though he had a good reputation even among his enemies as a blameless and pious man." But Karel Vos, and following him A. F. Mellink, on the contrary state that Tjaert was an outstanding leader of the revolutionary Anabaptists, being identical with Tjaert van Sneek, whom Jan (q.v.) van Batenburg accused of persuading him to join the revolutionary movement. Vos and Mellink say that he was the man who set fire to a cloister in Friesland, who had been among the besiegers of the Oldeklooster (q.v.) in March 1535, thereupon fleeing to Groningen, and who in 1536 was present at the Bocholt (q.v.) dispute, where he vigorously defended the Münsterite doctrines of polygamy and the temporal kingdom of God.

It will be clear that we have to accept either the account of Menno and to consider Tjaert as a peaceful Anabaptist, or to give credence to the conception of Mellink, who states that Menno Simons perverted historical facts, or to that of Vos, suggesting that after his revolutionary views and practices Tjaert was possibly converted to a better life by Menno.

It is my opinion that Tjaert Renicx of Kimsward, Menno's friend, is not identical with the revolutionary leader Tjaert van Sneek (Tiardus Snekenensis). In the sentence of Tjaert Renicx, published in extenso by Vos, he is charged with rebaptism and a derogatory opinion of the Mass; no mention is made of revolutionary activity, and this is very strange if he (leaving other revolutionary practices out of consideration) was the man who had only a few years previously set fire to a cloister in Friesland. There was possibly also a revolutionary Anabaptist by the name of Tjaert van Sneek. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D. 50, E 454; Menno Simons, Opera Omnia 234; idem, Writings, 634; K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 41 f., 66, 230 f.; DB 1864, 140; 1906, 3; 1917, 120 (No. 119), 138; 1919, 193; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 201; Mellink, Wederdopers, 394 and passim; ML III, 486.

Tjaert van Sneek: see Tjaert Renicx.

Tjaert Tyercxz, of Dokkum, an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded on Feb. 8, 1539, at Leeuwarden in Friesland, Netherlands, with four other victims. Mellink's suggestion that he and his co-martyrs were revolutionary Anabaptists is without foundation. vdZ.

K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 230; Mellink, Wederdopers, 252.

Tjaert Tyerczoon, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on June 1, 1538, at Leeuwarden in Friesland, Netherlands. He had previously been banished from Friesland for six years because of heresy, his heresy consisting in owning forbidden books by Luther and others. After his return to Friesland he joined the Anabaptists, being baptized by a certain Bartholomeus (possibly Bartel, q.v., de Boeckbinder). vdZ.

J. Reitsma, Honderd jaren uit de Geschiedenis der Hervorming . . . in Friesland (Leeuwarden, 1876) 36, 63; Mellink, Wederdopers, 252.

Tjahrt (Tjart, Tjardt, Tiart, Tyart, Tgahrt, Tyahrt, Thjardh), a Mennonite family name in West Prussia, particularly in the congregations of Schweingrube, Culmsche Niederung, and Gruppe, after 1830 also found in South Russia, and from 1875 in America. Some of its members were preachers; the Dutch Naamlijst names for Prussia: Sievert Tjart until c1750, and Steffen Tjart 1781-after 1802, both at Schweingrube, Pieter (Peter) Tjart in the Stühmsche Niederung before 1734-65. Wilhelm Tyart, of Dragass, was a preacher of the Montau-Gruppe congregation 1897-1926. Johann Tiahrt was ordained as preacher of the Schönsee (q.v.) congregation near Culm, and Peter Tgahrt (q.v.) was an elder in Deutsch-Kazun. (Reimer, Familien-namen, 119; Dutch Naamlijst.) vDZ.

Tjalleberd, a village in the Dutch province of Friesland, where according to Blaupot ten Cate, Mennonites were found from the early 17th century, Jacob Theunis (q.v.), an elder of the Janjacobsgezinden (q.v.), baptizing here 14 persons in 1603-18. Of a Janjacobsgezinde congregation at Tjalleberd, however, nothing is known. If there was one, it had disappeared by 1700.

A new congregation was founded at Tjalleberd in 1817. Shortly after 1800 a number of Mennonite families from Giethoorn (q.v.) had moved to Tjalleberd to dig the peat moors here and in the neighboring hamlets of Gersloot and Luinjeberd. Gerrit Bakker, from 1811 pastor of the neighboring congregation of Oldeboorn, took care of the Mennonites in Tjalleberd and its environs; on Feb. 26, 1817, he conducted a service in a barn at Gersloot, which was the beginning of the Tjalleberd congregation. A meetinghouse was built, dedicated on Nov. 15, 1818. The membership then numbered 23; among these were fourteen persons who had moved in from Giethoorn, where they had been baptized. The first preacher of the congregation was Teunis Wolter Schreurs, an untrained minister, from Zwartsluis, who with great blessing served until his death in 1826. He was followed by Wiebe Gosses Hulsinga 1826-c29; U. H. Jeepsz, a learned man, Litt. D., though not trained for the ministry, 1830-33; Pieter Willem van Zutphen 1836-40, who was the first pastor of Tjalleberd, trained at the Amsterdam Mennonite seminary; Anthony Winkler Prins 1841-50; F. J. Klaasesz 1851-53; A. S. Hoitsema 1853-56; W. C. van Staveren 1857-d.65; J. U. Uiterwijk 1865-66; H. D. Tjeenk Willink 1868-71; J. Kops 1871-d.72; J. Schippers 1872-80; B. Haga 1881-82; L. van Cleeff IJzn 1882-87; A. van der Wissel 1889-90; F. van der Ploeg 1892-94; A. J. van Loghem Slaterus 1896-99; G. Heeringa 1900-2; U. Y. Veenland 1903-40; Miss C. Boerlage 1941-47; Miss T. van der Zwaag 1947-55; from 1955 Miss T. G. Siccama, then at Bovenknijpe, was temporarily in charge of the Tjalleberd congregation; in 1957 she moved to Wolvega and also serves at Tjalleberd in a more definite union.

The old meetinghouse and parsonage was remodeled in 1847, 1857, and 1867. The present church was built in 1867. A pipe organ was added in 1888.

Only once, in November 1832, the ban was applied and a member cut off from the church. The membership, 23 in 1818, increased to 104 in 1838, 130 in 1861; in 1901 it numbered 101, 115 in 1926, and 96 in 1958. Among the early members were found the following family names, which also are found in Giethoorn: Baas, Petter, Ruiter, Meester, Broers (Broer), Dam, Schreurs, Krikke, Simons, Klaren, and Otter. About 1838 some members of the Wuite (q.v.) family came to Tjalleberd from Giethoorn. Church activities are ladies' circle, youth group, and Sunday school for children. vDZ.

U. Y. Veenland, "Het 100-jarig bestaan der Gemeente te Tjalleberd," in DJ 1919, 62-81; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 2278 f.; II, 2, No. 493; Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 164, 245, 248; Naamlijst 1829, 52 f.; DB 1861, 143; 1872, 4, 191; 1873, 190; 1901, 17.

Tjallingii, Dutch Mennonite family formerly found at Harlingen in Friesland, where from the 17th century until 1910 its members were largely engaged in tileworks and occasionally in lumber and other business. The Tjallingii's brick and stone factory was dissolved in 1910. The Tjallingii were loyal members of the church, some of them being deacons, e.g., Pieter Tjallingii who was moderator of the church board until 1897. vDZ.

De Vrije Fries XVII (Leeuwarden, 1920) 22-27; church records of Harlingen.

Tjallingius, Tjalling, b. 1722, d. May 16, 1804, at Hoorn, was a lay Mennonite preacher at Koudum in Friesland, Netherlands, 1784-1803. Thereupon retiring and moving to Hoorn, he was called to serve the Hoorn congregation 1803, then aged 81, and served one year, until his death. (Naamlijst 1804, 67; 1806, 71 f.; DJ 1941, 49.) vDZ.

Tjallings, Binnert, a merchant at Grouw in Friesland, Netherlands, was a successful businessman, who, probably through Collegiant (q.v.) influence, came to believe that business practices are not compatible with the Christian faith. He gave up his business, studied languages (English, German), history, and theology, and then served the Mennonite congregation at Dokkum as minister 1788-d. 95. This is told by Joost Halbertsma (q.v.), whose mother was a sister of Binnert Tjallings. vDZ.

J. H. Halbertsma, De Doopsgezinden en hunne Herkomst (Deventer, 1843) 408; DJ 1912, 24.

Tjeenk Willink, a Dutch Mennonite family. Wolterus Everhardus Jonas Tjeenk Willink, b. 1816 at Zutphen, d. there 1885, bought the publishing house of H. Asszn Doyer (also a Mennonite) at Zwolle in 1838, which he raised to great prosperity. This publishing house still exists. It specializes in editions of scholarly works. His brother Anne Tjeenk Willink, b. 18. . at Zutphen, d. 1885 at Arnhem, founded a publishing house at Arnhem. His daughter Johanna Margaretha, b. 1883 at Zwolle, was married to Koenraad Kuiper (q.v.).

Herman Didericus Tjeenk Willink, b. July 21, 1843, at Zwolle, d. March 8, 1917, at Haarlem, married to Henrietta Berendina van der Goot, a son of the above Wolterus E. J. Tjeenk Willink, studied theology at the Amsterdam Mennonite seminary in 1861-66, obtained his Th.D. degree at the University of Leiden in 1867, and was pastor of the Mennonite congregations of Tjalleberd 1868-71 and Vlissingen 1871-74. In 1874 he retired and became a partner in the bookstore and publishing house of A. C. Kruseman at Haarlem; the firm was then called Kruseman and Tjeenk Willink. In 1878 Tjeenk Willink became the sole owner. His son Herman Didericus Tjeenk Willink (1872-1945) later became his father's partner and was also a trustee of the Haarlem Mennonite congregation 1899-d.1945 and a representative on the A.D.S. board 1927-41. The publishing house is now H. D. Tjeenk Willink and Son, Inc. The director since 1938 has been Ernest Lefebvre, b. 1905, a member and from 1949 a trustee of the congregation of Haarlem. This house has published Mennonite books, e.g., by C. B. Hylkema, W. J. Kühler, and H. W. Meihuizen. vdZ.

N.N.B.Wb. III, 1242 f.; Winkler Prins Encyclopedie, 6th ed., XVII (Amsterdam, 1953) 512.

Tjommies, Pieke (d. c1781), a Dutch Mennonite, was a merchant at Heerenveen and a preacher in the Heerenveen-Knippe Waterlander congregation from 1736. On the charge made by the Reformed pastor of Knippe, abetted by the Reformed classis of Zevenwolden, accusing him and his co-preachers Wytze Jeens Brouwer (q.v.) and Wybe Pieters Zee-man (q.v.) of teaching Socinian doctrines, all three had to answer before the district governor of Schoterland. They were asked whether they agreed with the formulary issued by the States of Friesland in 1722. Wybe Pieters declared that he agreed with the articles of the formulary, but Wytze Jeens and Pieke refused to express themselves on this point, because in matters of religion they were not inclined to use other terminology than that used in the Scriptures. Thereupon Wytze and Pieke were suspended (Aug. 23, 1738). Upon an appeal by the congregation to the States of Friesland, the two were examined by some Reformed pastors and judged to be unorthodox on four points (March 13, 1739). The suspension was not revoked and when H. Portier (q.v.) presented a petition on their behalf in which he used the term "inquisition" to describe the action of the States, both preachers were deposed (June 5, 1739). Thereupon the Mennonite conference of Friesland deeply concerned itself with the question, though in vain. (See Stinstra, Johannes.) Finally on April 15, 1743, Jeens and Tjommies were again permitted to preach and both continued their ministry, Pieke Tjommies however only until 1745, in which year he resigned. The reason is not clear. It may have been because the intolerance of the Frisian States discouraged him, or that his congregation disappointed him. But more likely it was because his religious views had changed. In 1747 he joined the Hernhutters (Mora-vian Brethren, q.v.) and occasionally participated in their communion services at Zeist. vdZ.

P. H. Veen, De Doopsgezinden in Schoterland (Leeuwarden, 1869) 35 f., 42, 65-75, 134, 164, 167-172; Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 208-10; W. Lütjeharms, Het Philadelphia-Oecumenisch streven der Hernhutters . . . (Zeist, 1935) 65.

Tjum: see Tzum.

Tjummarum, a village in the northwest part of the Dutch province of Friesland, where Elder Leenaert (q.v.) Bouwens baptized five persons in 1563-65. At least in 1610 and probably long before, there was a Mennonite congregation here, concerning which information is very scarce. It had a meetinghouse in town and in 1695 it joined the Conference of Friesland, then numbering about 40 members. Throughout the 18th century the pulpit was vacant, services mostly being conducted by the preachers of Harlingen. In 1762 the few remaining members joined the Franeker (q.v.) congregation. vdZ.

H. J. Busé, "De verdwenen Doopsgezinde gemeenten in Friesland," in De Vrije Fries XXII, repr. p. 16-18; Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 89, 189, 193.

Tobacco. Although the tobacco plant was brought to Europe from America early in the 16th century, it was used only as a medicinal plant throughout that century. Sir Walter Raleigh introduced the smoking of tobacco to England in 1586, from where it gradually spread to Holland and the rest of Europe, although with some initial government resistance. Rotterdam and Amsterdam became centers of the tobacco trade and the Dutch were early among the relatively largest users of tobacco and have remained so. Some Mennonites in Holland became tobacco merchants at an early date in the 17th century. In France and Spain the practice of taking snuff was the first form of using tobacco for pleasure. Pipe-smoking preceded the use of cigars, and the cigarette did not seriously compete with cigars until the beginning of the 20th century. The vast increase in the smoking habit, especially in the form of cigarettes, has been a prominent feature of American culture only since 1910 and is largely due to skillful advertising by cigarette manufacturers. The chewing of tobacco was more prominent in the 19th century, but has now almost disappeared. Antitobacco organizations arose in Europe and America in the latter half of the 19th century somewhat parallel to the temperance and abstinence movements (England 1853, France 1868, Sweden 1886, United States 1901 in the Anti-Cigaret League, Germany 1912).

The first recorded reaction of Mennonites against the use of tobacco was negative. John Horsch, in an article in the Herold der Wahrheit (1888, p. 148), quotes article 24 of the Ordnungsbrief of the Strasbourg Conference of 1607 as forbidding the use of snuff. "So far as snuff-taking is concerned, it is recognized that public snuff-taking is offensive, hence shall not be permitted. If someone needs it as a medicine he is to do it secretly." Among the articles drawn up in 1639 and read annually, at least until 1716, before the Frisian Conference in North Holland in the 17th-18th centuries, No. 9 is on tobacco; it reads: "No one shall use tobacco because of a bad habit, whereby one wastes time and money and whereby one becomes a burden to others who do not use it, because of a bad odor and spitting. Yea, this evil is becoming so great that instead of getting out the Bible or the hymnbook for mutual edification, the tobacco pipe is brought out for scandal." (The articles were published by Blaupot ten Cate, Holland II, 223-28.) Pieter Pietersz (q.v.) and other Dutch preachers in the 17th century vehemently opposed the growing use of tobacco (DB 1896, 24).

However, the use of tobacco became fairly common among Mennonites in general in Europe, although in recent decades its use has greatly declined in South Germany, Switzerland, and France, and is now almost unknown in some of these areas; this is, however, not the case in Holland.

In Russia smoking never became so widespread among the Mennonites, although there seems to have been no objection to it by the main body. A short-lived attempt by Cornies about 1845 to establish tobacco-raising in the Molotschna settlement failed because other crops were more profitable. The Kleine Gemeinde (founded 1814), the Mennonite Brethren (founded 1860), the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren (founded 1869), and probably the Hutterites, seem to have opposed the use of tobacco from the beginning.

The use of tobacco among the American Mennonites was quite common until the rise of the anti-alcohol and antitobacco movement in the country, which substantially influenced all groups except the Old Order Amish and Old Order Mennonites. Harley Stucky has shown that some of the Russian Mennonite immigrants of the 1870's who were opposed to the use of tobacco and who came into contact with the American Mennonites and especially John F. Funk of Elkhart, Ind., the publisher of the Herald of Truth and the Mennonitische Rundschau, probably exerted a wholesome influence against it. The evidence is clear that in the last half of the 19th century smoking and chewing were so common among all the Mennonite groups of Swiss-South German background as to be almost universal. There was also some use of snuff. Chewing was so common at home and even during the church services that spittoons were found behind the pulpits in some of the meetinghouses. A number of the older women smoked pipes (clay or corncob) in the home. An Amish bishop in Iowa complained that some of the ministers said "they cannot preach without a chew of tobacco in their mouths." Daniel Brenneman wrote in the Herald of Truth in September 1871, "Who can go into a house of worship and find in almost every nook and corner the filthy stains and noisome stench of tobacco as may be found in some places and feel like justifying the habit, and feel that those do wrong who protest against it?" John F. Funk, the editor, commented in the March 1878 issue, "Here among our American Mennonites the use of tobacco prevails to a very large extent. . . . Some have declared that they would no longer patronize the paper if we should continue to admit articles of this kind [against the use of tobacco]." But there was a growing minority against tobacco and gradually, by education (not legislation) they won the day; by the end of the first quarter of the 19th century its use had practically ceased in the more progressive sections of the Mennonite Church (MC); it went out more slowly in Eastern Pennsylvania and among some of the communities of Amish background in Iowa, Nebraska, and Ontario. The gradual change is well illustrated by tracing the record of antitobacco resolutions in the Virginia Conference. In 1894 the minutes say, "Whereas there is so much chewing tobacco and spitting on the floor in the house of God in time of service, is it not a duty for our members as well as the ministers to speak and protest against such a filthy habit as well as all other bad habits? Decided in the affirmative." Fifty years later (1941) the conference discipline said: "The use of tobacco in any form is not only a filthy habit but its use results in physical injury and is Scripturally inconsistent. Its use is hereby discouraged by both precept and example. Its use shall disqualify any member from ordination. No one shall be received into church membership who does not do all in his power to discontinue its use."

J. W. Fretz, who did careful research in the subject in 1949, summarizes his findings as follows: "(1) By and large, the custom of using tobacco among older Mennonite groups in Europe and America seems to have been similar to the customs of society in general on this point. The custom was at first seemingly opposed, then gradually accepted and finally adopted in a rather widespread fashion. Traditionally, there seems to have been no general conscience against its use. (2) Such groups as the Mennonite Brethren, the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren, the Kleine Gemeinde, the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren, and the Church of God in Christ Mennonite seem to have had a clear and consistent witness against this custom from their origin up to this time. (3) In recent decades there is evidence of a growing conscience against the production and use of tobacco among the Mennonites (MC), the Conservative Amish, and in some cases among the Old Order Amish. (4) An increase in the use of tobacco, especially cigarette smoking, is evident in General Conference and certain Mennonite (MC) churches where the subject is not considered a test of church membership or a matter for discipline. (5) The use of tobacco among Mennonites is definitely related to fashions and fads. Those who have adopted the custom have done so in imitation of those with whom they associated, desiring to conform to the prevailing pattern of social behavior. Those who adopt the cigarette smoking habit are the same ones who are freely adopting changes in society generally. It is an aspect of secularization in that it is a demonstration of individuals accepting for their standards of value and patterns of behavior criteria from secular society rather than from religious faith or the Scriptures. The seeming contradiction between the ethical and moral idealism of the Mennonites on the one hand and the custom of using tobacco on the other is explained in a large measure by the subtle secularization process going on in Mennonite groups."

The growing of tobacco is limited to certain areas where the proper combination of soil and climate makes it profitable. The only extensive tobacco growing areas in Mennonite settlements are in Lancaster County, Pa. (introduced after the middle of the 19th century), and Essex County, Ont. (settled by Mennonites from Russia 1922-25). A growing conscience against producing a crop whose use is prohibited or frowned upon has led to a strong decline in tobacco raising among Mennonites of the Lancaster Conference (MC). No such development has taken place among the Old Order Mennonites or Old Order Amish of this region.

A curiosity is the introduction of a criticism of smoking into the German edition of Menno Simons' works published at Elkhart in 1876. On page 376 in Part I Menno is made to advise parents as follows: "Gestattet ihnen keine Gemeinschaft mit den bösen unnützen Kindern, von denen sie nichts als lügen, fluchen, schwören, rauchen, und Bübereien lernen." The Dutch Opera Omnia of 1681 has "vechten" in place of "rauchen," and the German translations of this section usually have "schlagen," although the Peter van Riesen edition of 1834 (Danzig) omits the word. The English translation has "fighting." H.S.B.

J. W. Fretz, "The Growth and Use of Tobacco Among Mennonites," Proceedings of the Seventh Annual Conference on Mennonite Cultural Problems (n.p., 1949) 87-100; Harley J. Stucky, "Cultural Interaction Among Mennonites" (unpublished M.A. thesis, Northwestern University, 1947) 40-45.

Tobias Quintincxs (Questincx), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on March 20, 1549, at Amsterdam, Netherlands, with seven others. Tobias, a cobbler, was a citizen of Amsterdam (not a native of Linninkhausen as is reported in ML). He was charged with the crimes of rebaptism (baptized by Gillis, q.v., van Aken) and persisting in his heresy. On Feb. 14 he was severely tortured. Tobias and his fellow martyrs died valiantly. Van Braght published the sentence from the original records in the Martyrs' Mirror; the name of Questincx given here is garbled. Tobias's property was confiscated. He and his co-martyrs are commemorated in the hymn "Tis nu schier al Vervult ons broeders getal," found in Veelderhande Liedekens of 1556 and the following editions. (Mart. Mir. D 82, E 483; Groshede, Bijdrage, 155 f., 308; ML III, 418.) vDZ.

Toe Water, Willem Hendrik, b. May 22, 1885, at Diemen, d. Dec. 12, 1938, at Zwolle, a Dutch Mennonite pastor, who after finishing his theological studies at the university and Mennonite seminary at Amsterdam, served the congregations of Warns 1912-16, St-Anna-Parochie 1916-23, and Zwolle 1923-d.38. He was especially active in the Vereeniging voor Gemeentedagen (now Vereniging voor Doopsgezind Broederschapswerk, q.v.), and in 1929-36 served as editor of its periodical Brieven (q.v.). Toe Water was one of the first Dutch Mennonite ministers who thought it necessary to organize the youth in a special Youth Association (see Doopsgezinde Jongerenbond). For many years he was a trustee of the Elspeet (q.v.) Brotherhood Home. Toe Water was a pious, poetic, somewhat sensitive spirit; he was a gifted musician, composer of the melody of the Elspeet hymn, a master storyteller. He published a few sermons and a volume of poems, Kleine Geschenken. S. H. N. Gorter (q.v.), a close friend of Toe Water from 1902, preached his funeral sermon at Zwolle Dec. 15, 1938. vDZ.

Ned. Patriciaat XIII (1923) 415; Brieven XXI (1939) No. 12; De Zondagsboede LII (1938-39) No. 7; DJ 1940, 17-24 with portrait; S. H. N. Gorter, "Ter Herinnering," mimeographed funeral sermon.

Toengen Diruc Jansdochter, an Anabaptist martyr, a native of Breda, was drowned on Jan. 17, 1539, at Delft, Dutch province of South Holland, with four other women, all charged with the crime of rebaptism. Toengen was probably a follower of David (q.v.) Joris. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 749.) vDZ.

Toens, a Mennonite family living at Haarlem, Holland. Symon Eduards Toens, married to Geesje

Pieters Suiker, of Blokzijl, was from 1696 a preacher and from 1713 an elder of the Danzig Old Flemish congregation at Haarlem. He died there c1758. His son Eduard Toens, like his father the owner of a yarn spinnery, was a preacher of the same congregation 1740-c53. Another son of Symon Eduards was Pieter Toens (Haarlem 1724—Hoogezand shortly after 1800). He was first married to Cornelia Mabé (1716-57) and after her death to Anna Reckmann (1732-after 1800), both of Haarlem. At first he owned a weaving mill and ran a small shop; later he was a partner in a thread factory with his cousin Pieter Loos. About 1765 in a period of economic decline he left this business and started a florist business, which, however, he had to give up in 1776, because it did not pay. Since life was expensive in Haarlem he moved to Hoogezand in the province of Groningen in 1776. In 1753 Pieter Toens had been appointed preacher in the Danzig Old Flemish church of Haarlem, but after four or five years of serving he resigned, and joined the more liberal Peuzelaarsteeg congregation. The reason for this transfer is that he was more progressive than the Danzig Old Flemish Mennonites in general; Toens was particularly averse to banning because of outside marriage, as was still the practice in this group. He then also frequented Collegiant (q.v.) meetings and later became interested in politics as a warm Patriot (q.v.). At the end of his life he played an important political role: in 1795 he was elected to represent Groningen in the Dutch Second Chamber, of which, being the oldest member, he was the provisional president in 1798. Belonging to the radical Republican party, he was not re-elected in this year. His descendants during the 19th century were found at Hoogezand, some of them being members of the Sappemeer (q.v.) Mennonite congregation. (Diary of Pieter Toens, by the courtesy of Prof. Engelbrecht, Pretoria, South Africa; Dutch Naamlijst.) vDZ.

Toews (Töws, Toevs, Toeffs, Tewffs, Taevs, Taves), a common family name among Prussian Mennonites of probably Dutch background, derived from Matthew (Mattheus), was found in Tiegenhagen, Ladekopp, Rosenort, Fürstenwerder, Heubuden, Elbing, and Danzig. Isaac Toews and Johann Toews Jr. were preachers of the Ladekopp Old Flemish congregation, from 1762 and 1767 respectively, both serving until after 1802. Abraham Toews was a preacher at Heubuden from 1794, and Johann Toews of Fürstenwerder from 1796. Franz Toews served as preacher in the Fürstenwerder congregation 1822-c50 and Jakob Toews in the same congregation from 1846. Johann Toews was preacher of the Hochzeit congregation from 1796 for more than fifty years. Another Johann was a minister at Heubuden, preacher from 1832, elder 1853-78. Heinrich Toews served at Pordenau, Russia, as preacher 1839 and as an elder 1842-c79, and his grandson Johann Toews as preacher of the same church from 1876. B. H. Unruh lists fourteen bearers of the name among the immigrants to Russia. Johann Toews (q.v.) was elder of the Köppental Mennonite Church of Trakt. Johannes J. Toews, son of Johann Toews, of the Trakt settlement, was a minister of that settlement and died in exile. A. Töws was Oberschulze (1842-48) and co-worker of Johann Cornies. Aron A. Toews (Canada) is the author of Mennonitische Märtyrer; Gerhard Toews is the author of Heimat in Trümmern and other books; J. B. Toews is the field worker of the M.B. Board of Missions; John A. Toews is the president of the M.B. Bible College at Winnipeg, and Jacob A. Toews is pastor of the M.B. Church in Kitchener, Ont. David Toews (q.v.) was a prominent G.C. elder in Canada, with residence in Rosthern, Sask., and was founder and long-time chairman of the Mennonite Board of Colonization (q.v.). (See also Toews.) C.K., vöZ.

A. A. Toews, Mennonitische Märtyrer I (Clearbrook, 1949); H. R. Schröder, Russlanddeutsche Friesen; Reimer, Familiennamen; Dutch Naamlijst; B. H. Unruh, Hintergründe.

Toews, Cornelius J. (1852-1915), a leading agricultural expert of the Mennonites of Russia, was born in the village of Altenau in the Molotschna Mennonite settlement. In his youth he recognized the value of innovations by Johann Cornies (q.v.). As the owner of a large farm at Ebenfeld, near Genichesk, a port on the Sea of Asov, he practiced the culture of grain combined with summer fallow (Schwarzbrache), and was one of the pioneers in this profitable method of farming in the Ukraine. His prosperity enabled him both to acquire more and more land and also to give large sums to charitable purposes. He built privately the first telephone in the area of Melitopol (q.v.). J.Wi.

Toews, David (1870-1947), an elder (known generally as Bishop Toews in Canadian government and railway circles) and leader in the General Conference Mennonite Church, was born Feb. 9, 1870, at Lysanderhöf near the Volga in Russia, one of the 14 children of Jakob Töws, a minister, who had come to Russia in 1869. When David was 10 years old he accompanied his parents on the ill-fated trek to Turkestan (q.v.), experiencing hardships so severe that he later hesitated to talk about them. After four years of disappointment in Turkestan, the Töws family immigrated to Newton, Kan., where Jakob Töws served the Mennonite church as elder for about 30 years. David attended the public school to learn English, then the Zentralschule at Halstead, to prepare to teach. He then taught school at Whitewater, Elbing, and Newton, Kan. In 1888 he was baptized at Newton by his father.

H. H. Ewert, who had been the principal of the Halstead school while Toews attended it, persuaded Toews to accompany him to Gretna, Man., to teach there. In 1895-97 he attended school at Winnipeg. He taught one year in the village of Burwalde near Winkler, and then went to Tiefengrund, Sask., homesteading and teaching school. On Aug. 18, 1901, he was ordained as a minister. On Sept. 20, 1900, Toews married Margaret Friesen. They had one son and eight daughters.

In 1901-4 Toews taught school at Eigenheim, Sask., and then at the German-English Academy (q.v.) at Rosthern, which he had helped to establish. He served as principal until 1917, and also as president of the school corporation, which position he held until late in life. In 1913 he was ordained elder of the large Rosenort church, which, together with the chairmanship of the Conference of Mennonites in Canada, 1914-40, required a great deal of time and energy, particularly during World War I. For many years David Toews was a member of the Home Mission Board of the General Conference. In this capacity he was a real assistance particularly to the Mennonite immigrants who came to Canada since 1923.

As chairman of the Canadian Mennonite Board of Colonization 1922-46, David Toews was keenly interested in the well-being of the Mennonites in Russia, who suffered great hardships during the revolution following World War I, and worked unstintingly to aid the Mennonite immigration to Canada. In 1923-30 over 20,000 Mennonites were brought to Canada from Russia under the auspices of the Board.

On Feb. 25, 1947, David Toews died, and was buried in the Rosthern cemetery. J.G.R.

Toews, Henry F. (1879-1942), an M.B. minister, educator, and author, was born in South Russia Feb. 17, 1879, the son of Franz and Agnes (Klassen) Toews. Shortly after his birth the family emigrated to America, settling on a farm southwest of Moundridge, Kan. Toews was converted and baptized at the age of fifteen. After attending Bethel College one summer term, Toews taught in country schools for four years. Then he continued his studies at McPherson College, McPherson, Kan., where he received the A.B. degree. He received his theological training at the Baptist Theological Seminary, Rochester, N.Y., and at the Baptist Theological Seminary, Kansas City, Kan. The latter conferred upon him the B.D. degree. In 1918 McPherson College conferred upon him the D.D. degree.

Toews entered the ministry in 1905 and for several years did evangelistic work; he was ordained in 1914. Toews married Agnes Flaming on Aug. 9, 1908, and established his home at Hillsboro, Kan. Three children were born to them. From 1910 to 1940, except for a period of illness, he was engaged chiefly in teaching, for the greater part of this time at Tabor College in the department of Theology and Bible. One year he taught at the M.B. Bible School, Herbert, Sask.

Toews was very active in the M.B. Church conferences, serving as secretary of the General Conference 1924-27. For some time he edited the Sunday School Quarterly and wrote the Sunday-school lesson helps for the Zionsbote and the Hillsboro Journal. He was the author of the following books written in German: Handbuch für Sonntagsschularbeiter, Biblische Grundwahrheiten, and Jesus kommt wieder. He also wrote Topical Outline Studies of Bible Doctrines. He died in his home at Hillsboro on Jan. 15, 1942. Interment was in the local M.B. cemetery. J.H.L.

Toews, Jacob (1838-1923), an elder of the First Mennonite Church of Newton, Kan., was born at Wotzlaf, West Prussia, June 26, 1838. He attended school at Weissshof and was baptized in 1854. In 1858 he visited his relatives in Russia. On March 15, 1860, he married and in 1864 he was ordained minister by Johann Wiebe. In 1869 he migrated to Russia and took part in the establishment of the Trakt Mennonite settlement (q.v.) in Saratov. In 1880 he joined the group which moved to Central Asia (q.v.) to escape government service and to be prepared to meet the Lord. On Oct. 10, 1884, they arrived in Newton, Kan. In 1886 he was elected elder of the First Mennonite Church and installed by Leonhard Sudermann, which office he held for 31 years. In 1916 he resigned and moved to Aberdeen, Idaho, where he died Jan. 2, 1923. David Toews (q.v.) was his son. C.K.

"Aeltester Jacob Toews," Bundesbote-Kalender, 1923, p. 24; J. E. Entz, "First Mennonite Church—Newton," Menn. Life VIII (October 1953) 153.

Toews, Jakob (1825-1909), an elder of the congregation of Lichtenau, Petershagen, and Schönsee in the Molotschna Mennonite settlement in South Russia, was born in the village of Fürstenau, Molotschna, two years after his parents had arrived in Russia from Prussia. In 1862 he was elected minister and in 1869 elder of his home congregation. For almost 40 years Toews cared for his large church, which consisted of three subsidiary congregations, Lichtenau, Petershagen, and Schönsee, but which had been organized as a unit. The three meetinghouses of the congregation were located a considerable distance from each other. Godliness, simplicity, and a great firmness of conviction were outstanding features of his character. In 1908 Toews retired from his duties as elder and minister and died one year later. (Der Botschafter, 1909.) H.G.

Toews, Peter (1841-1922), first a Kleine Gemeinde elder, then a Church of God in Christ Mennonite elder, was born July 24, 1841, at Fischau, Molotschna, South Russia, the youngest son of Johann Töws (1793-1873) and Elizabeth Harder. He joined the Kleine Gemeinde in 1861. On Nov. 12, 1863, he was united in marriage with Anna Warkentin. He was ordained as a minister in 1866, and as elder in 1870. He was instrumental in unifying three factions of this denomination. In the early seventies he was sent to St. Petersburg and later to Yalta to interview the Czar, and was prominent in the emigration movement to Canada. With the last 30 families of his group he sailed from Nikopol on May 4, 1875, and on June 29 arrived near Niverville along the Red River in Manitoba. He then settled in Grünfeld.

Endowed with a keen craving for knowledge, Toews read and studied constantly and prayerfully, comparing the Scriptures with the works of earlier writers. With a large part of his flock he joined the Church of God in Christ, Mennonite, in 1882, and was ordained anew to the ministry on Jan. 11, 1882. His sermons were clear and sound, as were also his many articles of Scripture exposition published in the Botschafter der Wahrheit. For many years he was editor of this publication, the official German-language organ of the denomination.

Many of his numerous poems and pamphlet articles were published in periodicals. Many of his hymns are contained in the Liederbuch der Gemeinde Gottes, the first two editions of which he edited. He translated several works from the Dutch into the German language. He corresponded with a number of the leaders of his day. He was a moderator of the general conference.

In 1900-11 he lived at Hochstadt, Man., and on retiring from active service moved to Swalwell, Alberta. Although almost blind during the last years, he continued to study and write. He died on Nov. 2, 1922, at the age of 81 years, after 56 years of consecrated service. He was buried in the Linden cemetery at Swalwell. P.G.H.

Tofield, Alberta, is a town (pop. 800) located near the center of the province, 35 miles east and 12 miles south of Edmonton. Approximately 530 Mennonites live within shopping distance of the town. These are made up of three groups, including 363 M.C., 185 G.C.M., and 85 M.B. The M.C. Mennonites live in an arc from east around south to southwest, the G.C.M. and M.B. groups in a $\frac{3}{4}$ circle from east around south to north. About 4 per cent of the M.C., 12 per cent of the G.C.M., and 1 per cent of the M.B. live in Tofield. The M.C. group was first to arrive here, coming in 1910; the other two groups came in 1924. There are three Mennonite churches in the area. The only other institutions are mission Sunday schools and winter Bible schools. The larger part of the original Mennonite settlers came here from Nebraska and Iowa. The General Conference and Mennonite Brethren came from Russia. M.D.S.

Toger, Frederik, b. c1665 at Amsterdam, d. March 11, 1720, at Leiden, obtained his M.D. degree at the Leiden University in 1699 with a dissertation on "The Plague." He was then a practicing physician and in 1694-1717 also a Mennonite preacher at Leiden, Holland, 1694-1701 in the Waterlander congregation and, after the merger of this church with the Flemish, of the United congregation. Schijn's surmise that he had been a preacher at Brielle 1691-94 has not been substantiated. Toger published De lijdzaamheid en vergelding der Heiligen (Leiden, 1703), an address on I Pet. 3:6, in which he, in a learned manner, describes the meekness and the reward of the righteous; his Bondig Zamenstel der christelyke Godgeleerdheid was edited after his death by his friend Abraham van Loon (q.v.) and published in 1726 at Leiden; reprinted at Leiden in 1738 under the title Samenstel der christelyke godgeleerdheid. It contains six volumes. The first five volumes deal in several chapters with the doctrines of God, man, and Jesus Christ; the sixth in fourteen chapters discusses the Christian faith, regeneration, good works, conversion, justification, baptism, communion, the oath, government, war, death, the resurrection, judgment, bliss, and damnation. NEFF, vdZ.

Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis II, 628-46; Blaupot t. C., Holland II, 133 f.; L. G. le Poole, Bijdragen tot . . . het kerkelijk leven onder de Doopsgezinden te Leiden (Leiden, 1905) 64, 87, 99 f., 170, 197; Chr. Sepp, Johannes Stinstra en zijn tijd I (Amsterdam, 1865) 185-88; ML IV.

Tolenaar, Josef: see Zöllner.

Töllinger, Christine, of Penon in Tirol, Austria, an Anabaptist martyr, a widow, was seized with four brethren and three sisters at Fill in the Adige Valley (q.v.). They were taken to the castle and cross-examined. Christine confessed that she was baptized in her home by Georg Blaurock (q.v.); the bread of the Mass is merely bread; children are saved without rebaptism; with God's help she would die on the confession of her faith. They were all executed on Nov. 18, 1529, at Fill (q.v.).

Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 53 and 55; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 74, 76, 78; Mart. Mir. D 27, E 435 f.

Tomas, Jan: see Thomas, Jan.

Tomkins, David: see Le Heux, J. W. N.

Tonawanda, New York, an area on the east side of the Niagara River between Niagara Falls and Buffalo, was once the location of a small Mennonite settlement. The Ebersole name is one of the present indications that Mennonite families formerly lived in this area. The first Mennonites migrating to western New York in the early 1830's were mainly from Lancaster County, Pa. No organized congregation was formed at this place. A few families worshiped in a local church at LaSalle, now a part of the city of Niagara Falls. It was probably after the middle of the century that Jacob Krehbiel preached for these families. It is said that John S. Coffman visited the place while Krehbiel was still living. The work in this place, supported by Jacob Krehbiel, was identified with the conferences under which he served; i.e., M.C. under the Conference of Ontario, and later G.C.M. J.C.F.

Tongerren, Henric van: see Hendrik Slachtscaep.

Tongerloo, Van, a Dutch Mennonite family found at Amsterdam from the 16th until the 18th century, when it died out. They were nearly all members of the Flemish, from 1664 of the Lamist (q.v.) church. Jasper van Tongerloo was a deacon in the early 17th century and Evert van Tongerloo from 1709. Clara van Tongerloo was married in 1605 to Jacob Haesbaert, who also later was a deacon. Clara was the daughter of a neighbor of Joost van den Vondel (q.v.), the famous Dutch poet, who was at this time still a Mennonite and who celebrated her marriage in one of his first poems. The Tongerloo family was related to H. H. van Warendorp (q.v.), and from 1632 Jasper van Tongerloo was one of the managers of his estate which included the present Singel Church until 1740. There were at times difficulties between members of the Tongerloo family and the deacons of the Flemish congregation concerning this heritage. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 578; II, Nos. 91, 166, 171-73, 175, 180, 199-200, 209; DB 1863, 13, 14, 18, 32, 38, 40, 41.) vdZ.

Tonis Gerrits: see Thomas Gerritsz.

Tonniss, Jan: see Tempel, van den.

Tookey, Elias, about whose private life and fate there is only scarce information, belonged to a group of Independents at London, England, led by John Murton (q.v.). In 1624-25 Tookey and some other members of this church opposed their leader, apparently in part because Murton was rather imperious, and in part because they did not agree with Murton's Calvinistic views, particularly his defense of infant baptism. Tookey and his adherents stressed the freedom of the will and were inclined to believers' baptism. Thereupon Tookey and fifteen other members were banned. This group in March or April 1624 wrote a letter to Reynier Wybrands (q.v.), Hans de Ries (q.v.), and other Waterlander leaders in Holland. A correspondence followed (letters by Tookey of June 3, 1624, and March 17, 1625, and a letter Nov. 12, 1625, from five "Anabaptist" congregations as Tookey and his group were called). These five "Anabaptist" congregations were Sarum, Coventry, London, Lincoln, and Tyverton. In these letters gradually the idea was developed that the "Anabaptists" would merge with the Dutch Mennonites and particularly the Waterlanders. De Ries answered and sent them the Waterlander confession of faith (by himself and Lubbert Gerritsz, q.v.) of 1610 as a basis for negotiations. He wrote that he appreciated their doctrines and admonished them to patience and meekness, but he had scruples regarding some of their practices, e.g., that they had consented to take an oath of allegiance to the British king. Another difference was Tookey's idea that war as such is not a sin, that a righteous war is permissible and military service in special cases permitted to Christians. The negotiations lasted until the end of 1630. The merger did not come about, not only because the Dutch Mennonites did not agree with some of Tookey's ideas, but apparently particularly because de Ries did not wish to risk the adventure. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 1367-77; J. G. de Hoop Scheffer and W. E. Griffis, History of the Free Churchmen (Ithaca, n.d.-1922) 179 f.

Toorn, Hendrik: see Toren, Hendrik.

Toornburg(h) (Torenburg, Toornenburg, also Toorn), Klaas (Claes), a physician and preacher of the Waterlander Mennonites in the Netherlands. He is said to have been of delicate health. He was born at Alkmaar c1657, studied medicine at Leiden, and settled as a physician in his home town in 1688, where he also was chosen as preacher of the Mennonite Waterlander congregation. From 1696 until 1720, when he retired, he was preacher at De Rijk (q.v.), and also practiced medicine. His year of death is unknown. Toornburg published Schriftuurlijcke Verhandelinge tegens het Eed-zweeren en voor de wraak- en weerloose lijdzzaamheyt (Alkmaar, 1688); Schriftuurlijcke Verhandelinge van de Wraak- en Wereelose Lijdzzaamheyt en Volmaeckte Liefde . . . (Amsterdam, 1688); Concordantie van gelyk-luydende Plaatsen der Heylige Schrifture (Alkmaar, 1686); and Christelijke Overdenkingen des doods (Alkmaar, n.d., reprint Amsterdam, 1723). (N.N.B.Wb. III, 1244 f.; DB 1917, 43 f., 64.) vdZ.

Topeka, Ind., a town (pop. 550) located in the northeastern part of the state in Lagrange County. It is situated in what is familiarly known as the Hawpatch, so called because of the many black and red haw bushes that grew among the virgin hardwood timber in the early years. It is located 18 miles southeast of Goshen and 45 miles northwest of Fort Wayne.

Topeka is a thriving trading center for the many Mennonites and Old Order Amish living in this community. The first Mennonites settled in this area in 1846. There are two Mennonite churches in the town: Maple Grove (MC) and the Topeka Mennonite (GCM). The Emma Mennonite (MC) Church is located 5 miles north of Topeka. There are about 500 Mennonites living in and around the town, about 20 per cent of whom live in the town. There are 15 Old Order Amish congregations in the neighborhood of Topeka. The area is a fertile farming community. One of the Mennonite Central Committee cutting centers for the Women's Missionary and Service Auxiliary is operating here. E.J.Y.

Topeka Mennonite (GCM) Church, located in Topeka, Lagrange Co., Ind., a member of the Central District, began in 1893 when Silver Street (q.v.) members and others living near Topeka began to worship together. They purchased the Eden Chapel in 1897, moved it west of Topeka, and used it until the present building was completed in 1927. John Mehl was the first pastor. He was succeeded by John C. Lehman, Ernest Hostetler, Earl Salzman, Wilmer S. Shelly, Esko Loewen, and Orlin F. Frey. The charter membership in 1898 was 21; 90 were added in 1930 when a part of the Maple Grove (MC) congregation merged with this church. The membership in 1959 was 208, with Roy W. Henry as pastor. O.F.F.

Topeka (Ind.) Mennonite Church (MC): see Maple Grove.

Toren, a former meetinghouse at Amsterdam. About 1565 the Waterlander Mennonite church of Amsterdam obtained a warehouse on the Singel Canal between Bergstraat and Torensluis close to the Jan-Rodenburgstoren (dungeon). This building was remodeled and adapted as a meetinghouse and commonly called either "de groote Spijker" (warehouse) or the meetinghouse "by den Toren," also "van den Toren." In 1668, when the Waterlander congregation merged with the Lamists (q.v.), both meetinghouses henceforth were used by what was then called the United Flemish and Waterlander church. In 1801, when the Zonist (q.v.) congregation of Amsterdam merged with this United church, the Zonist meetinghouse was closed, its pulpit and pipe organ transferred to the Toren church (first used Jan. 17, 1802) from then mostly called the "kleine" (small) church, while the Lamist church, the present Singel church (q.v.), was called the "groote" (large) church.

In 1812 the church board resolved to give up the Toren meetinghouse. The last service in the Toren was led by Pastor A. H. van Gelder on April 26, 1812. The organ and pulpit were sold for 2500 Dutch guilders to the Mennonite congregation at Leeuwarden where they are still found in the church at Wirdumerdijk. After 1812 for a few years the former Toren church was used for various purposes until demolished in 1815. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 91-99, 265-81; Naamlijst 1815, 53 f.)

voZ.

Toren (Toorn), Hendrik, b. c1663 at Rotterdam, Holland, d. c1731 in England, married first to Anna Bredenburg (d. 1701) and after her death to Ursula van Alphen (d. 1708), was a Mennonite baker at Rotterdam. In 1687 he was chosen as preacher by the Rotterdam Waterlander congregation. Early in 1691, having given up his bakery, Toren together with Willem Suderman, a member of the same congregation, started an iron trade with England. This firm was dissolved in 1701; Toren, now being the sole owner, went bankrupt and in 1712 presented his bankruptcy petition. In 1713 he entered into a brief partnership with the ex-sheriff Pieter Verbeek. Toren now lived at Delfshaven near Rotterdam, and in 1714 at Delft, from where he moved to England in 1715. In 1716 (?) he settled on the Isle of Man, where he ran some business. In his last years (1720-30) he wrote in English a History of Holland, dedicated to the (Anglican) Bishop of Man.

As a preacher of the Rotterdam Mennonite Church he was very active and baptized many persons, among whom was Jan Bisschop (q.v.) in 1699, and in 1711-12 he also gave catechetical instruction. In 1696-99 he retired from his ministry, perhaps because he opposed the intended merger of the Waterlanders with the Flemish congregation of Rotterdam, which came about in 1700. When in this union the Waterlander views proved to be predominant, there was no longer any reason for Toren to oppose it, and so he served the united church. During his ministry he published Timotheus onderwezen in den Christelycken Godsdiens (Rotterdam, 1709) and Verdeedighing van Godts Regtveerdigheid (Rotterdam, 1710).

Toren had some rather liberal views, as is indicated by his interest in the Collegiants (q.v.). In 1693 Toren, Albert van Meurs, a Mennonite deacon, and Jan Suderman, also a Mennonite, had to answer to the magistrates of Rotterdam for Socinian views taught in the "colleges" (meetings of the Collegiants), in which these three men were apparently leaders. When Toren became bankrupt (1712), the preachers and deacons of the Mennonite congregation demanded that he avoid the communion service and "stand still" in his ministry. After this event he retired or was dismissed as a preacher. His name is no longer found in the church records. It is possible or even probable that he left the church.

Toren should be particularly mentioned for his activity in behalf of the persecuted Mennonites of Switzerland. He was a representative of the Rotterdam Mennonites in the Dutch Mennonite Committee of Foreign Needs at Amsterdam from 1709. The Amsterdam Mennonite archives have a copy book of Toren's (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1009) in which he copied a number of letters and gave historical particulars pertaining to the coming of the Swiss Mennonites to the Netherlands in 1710-11. This unique diary is of great value for the study of the Swiss-Palatine emigration.

Toren seems to have had great gifts, but to have been difficult to get along with; not only in 1695-99, but also in 1705 and again in 1711 he temporarily refused to exercise his ministry because he could not have his way. In the meeting of the Foreign Needs Committee at Amsterdam he also created difficulties.

Concerning his family there is little information. Jacob Toren, probably Hendrik's father, was a deacon of the church 1671-73. Some other Torens are mentioned.

H. C. Hazewinkel, "Hendrik Toren," in Rotterdamsch Jaarboekje 1949, 223-49; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1009 2251 f.; K. Vos. Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinde gemeente te Rotterdam (1907, repr.) 25, 28, 44, 47; DB 1908, 85-105, passim.

Toronto, Ont., the second largest city of Canada (1956 Greater Toronto population 1,358,028), is a manufacturing and export center on western Lake Ontario. It is known as "a city of churches." Five Mennonite churches and missions, with a total membership of 140, are located in the city. As early as 1907 the Mennonite Church (MC) began mission activity in the city, which resulted in the Danforth Mennonite Church (MC), with 25 members in 1958. Mennonite Brethren and General Conference Mennonites moved into the city later to work and to study. The Mennonite Brethren organized the Willowdale Christian Fellowship in 1957, which had 18 members in 1958. The Toronto United Mennonite Church (GCM), started in 1948, had a membership of 66 in 1958. Warden Park Mennonite Church (MC), organized in 1955, had a membership of 23. Morningside Mennonite Church (MC) was started as a mission in 1948. Ellesmere Mennonite Church (MC), started in 1946, was closed in 1958.

J.H.H.

Toronto United Mennonite Church (GCM), located at 1772 Queen Street East, Toronto, Ont., was organized in 1948 for Mennonites living and studying in the city since 1928. They worshiped in private homes until 1956, when they acquired a meetinghouse. In 1958 the membership was 66, with William Dick as pastor.

M.G.

Torsel, Cuntz, a miller at Bussbach near Bayreuth, Bavaria, Germany, confessed at his cross-examination that Fritz Weigel had convinced him of the truth of Anabaptist teaching. He knew nothing more about him. Further he said that one should believe in none but God and not any saint. He had preached that one should avoid worldly pleasures, not go to taverns, but believe in Christ and serve God. In 1545 he was in prison at Neustadtlein, Kulmbach district of Bavaria. (TA Bayern I, 57 ff.; ML IV.)

W.W.

Toul, a town in the province of Meurthe et Moselle, France, where there is a Mennonite congregation, organized c1885 as the result of a division in the Meuse (q.v.) congregation. The original membership consisted largely of Muller families, and the elders have always been Mullers. In 1957 the elders were Joseph Muller of Bois-la-Comte (ord. 1921) and J. B. Muller of Foug, with Raymond Muller and Arsène Zehr as ministers; the membership, including unbaptized children, was some 150. The chief meeting place for worship since about 1920 has been the Reformed church in Toul. Subsidiary meetings were long held at Vaucouleurs and Commercy, but in 1957 at Foug, Pont á Mousson, and Maucourt. The families live widely scattered, chiefly on farms. The membership in 1957 was about 120 souls. (P. Sommer, "Assemblée de Toul," Christ Seul, November 1930, 8 f.)

H.S.B.

Towamencin Mennonite (MC) Church, located in Montgomery County, Pa., a member of the Franconia Conference (q.v.). Jacob Godshalk, who served as the first bishop for the Mennonites of America from 1708, settled in the present Towamencin Twp., Montgomery Co., Pa., in 1713 or earlier. By 1728 the first Towamencin Mennonite meetinghouse had been built. About 1804 this building burned to the ground. In 1805 a stone building was erected, replaced about sixty years later. The present meetinghouse, the fourth, was built in 1925, 50 x 74 feet. The Towamencin pulpit seems to have been supplied by the Skippack preachers until 1876, when Christian Allebach (1841-1917) was ordained to the ministry. In 1958 the minister was Ellis L. Mack, with a membership of 219.

J.C.W.

J. C. Wenger, History of the Mennonites of the Franconia Conference (Telford, 1937) 148-53.

Townline Conservative Mennonite Church, located six miles southwest of Shipshewana, Lagrange Co., Ind., was organized March 25, 1876, with Joseph Yoder as bishop and Joseph Bontrager as minister, and with about 75 charter members, most of whom had belonged to the Forks (q.v.) Mennonite congregation (MC). John M. Hostetler was ordained minister in 1876. The church was built in 1877 and is still in use, although remodeled in 1923. Other ministers ordained were Jonathan Troyer 1873, Christian Yoder 1888, Jephtha Troyer 1913, Christian J. Miller 1918, and Noah S. Miller 1920. Jonathan J. Troyer was the most prominent figure in the history of this church, having served as bishop from 1895 until his death in 1930 at the age of 89 years. The Townline congregation in 1957 had a membership of 97, with Eli D. Miller, Calvin Bontrager, and John J. S. Yoder as ministers. The Griner and Pleasant Grove congregations of Elkhart County, Ind., branched off from Townline. S.T.E.

Töws, Aron P. (1887- ?), was born at Fürstenau in the Molotchna Mennonite settlement, Russia, on Jan. 28, 1887. He was graduated from the normal school and served as a teacher in the Nikopol district until 1914. In 1917 he became an enthusiastic co-worker in the establishment of a better Russia. He married Maria Sudermann. In 1923 he was active in the AMRA distributing American relief goods. In 1925 he was elected minister of the Chortitza Mennonite Church and ordained. During these critical years he helped the young men of military age and consequently endured many hardships. On Nov. 28, 1934 (1935), he was arrested and placed in the Zaporozhe prison. Later he was sent to Siberia and to various other places. The family last heard from him in 1941. (A. A. Toews, Mennonitische Märtyrer I, N. Clearbrook, 1949, 79-85.) C.K.

Töws, Heinrich (d. 1868), was elected minister of the Mennonite church of Lichtenau, Petershagen, Schönsee, Margenau, and Pordenau in 1839. When the Pordenau Mennonite Church (q.v.) was organized in 1842 as one of the three congregations emerging from the one church, Heinrich Töws was ordained as its first elder on Sept. 29, 1842. He died in 1868 and was succeeded by Isaak Peters, who migrated to America in 1874. Little else is known about Heinrich Töws and his work. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 706.) C.K.

Töws, Johann (1805-89), an elder of the Mennonite congregation at Brösckerfelde (q.v.), in West Prussia, then in Ladekopp and Pordenau, rendered his brotherhood meritorious services by his vigorous, sympathetic work. In 1836 he took part in the founding of a school (Vereinsschule) in Brösckerfelde, contributing the land for the building and grounds. He corresponded with brethren in other countries, especially in Russia. In the Mennonitische Blätter he repeatedly replied to the articles by Christian Schmutz of Rappenaу (q.v.) on mission work, the proposed ministerial training school, and the monument to Menno Simons. (Menn. Bl., 1866, 29; 1867, 46; 1889, 59; ML IV.) NEFF.

Töws, Johann, ordained minister (1832) and elder (1853) in Prussia, joined the immigrants who established the Köppental-Orloff (Trakt) settlement, Samara, Russia. Since the settlement had an elder in Johann Wall (q.v.), he functioned as an honorary coelder. He visited the Mennonites of the Molotschna settlement in the Ukraine repeatedly and advocated the founding of the General Mennonite Conference. (See Allgemeine Mennonitische Bundeskonferenz.) C.K.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 719; H. Ediger, Beschlüsse . . . der Konferenzen (Berdyansk, 1914) p. 1.

Trachselwald, a village and prefecture in the Emmental (q.v.), canton of Bern, Switzerland, was as early as 1534 a center of Anabaptist activity. In the fall of 1535 Moritz Rosenegger (q.v.) was baptized here, and in spite of the measures of the Bernese officials Anabaptism flourished. In 1551 the Anabaptists were threatened with confiscation of property and even capital punishment if they refused to renounce their faith; sheltering of Anabaptists was punishable by expulsion. In 1640 Trachselwald is named among the villages where there were many "Täufer." Even the Täuferjäger (q.v.) of the 1670's were unable to root out Anabaptism. Benedict Brechbühl (Brechbill, q.v.), preacher of the congregation from 1699, lived at Trachselwald. Twice he was banished, fled, and returned. In early January 1709 he was arrested at home, imprisoned at Bern, and on March 18, 1710, deported. This was a severe blow for the Trachselwald group, many of whom in the following years left their homeland, emigrating to the Netherlands or the Palatinate. Yet secretly some Anabaptists remained at Trachselwald. In the second half of the 18th century the Bernese government became more tolerant;

the Mennonites lived and worshiped rather freely; they were members of the Emmental (Langnau) congregation. At the census taken in 1823 the following Mennonite families were living in the prefecture of Trachselwald: Peter Kohler, Christian Kohler, Christen Bichsel, Ulrich Reist, Hans Steiner, Peter Steiner, and Peter Lanz; they numbered 25 persons. Ulrich Steiner (q.v.), a strong leader of Swiss Brethren in the 19th century, lived at the Hämliismatt near Trachselwald. vnz.

Delbert L. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottdale, 1953) passim.

Tracts. Small printed leaflets (Flugschriften) have often played an important role in the course of Christian history. They were much used by all parties in the Reformation from Luther to the Anabaptists. Many Anabaptist hymn pamphlets containing one or more martyr hymns were in effect tracts. Tracts used in modern times in England and America in religious work are however commonly very short leaflets, 2-4 pages in length, seldom longer, and small in format, for cheap production, easy distribution, and quick reading. Almost all types of religious denominations and movements in America have used and do use them. They have most widely been used for evangelistic purposes to reach the unchurched or to win adherents to a new cause.

Organizations have been set up for the specific and sole purpose of preparation and distribution of religious tracts, although these "tract societies" have not always limited themselves to the small tracts. The tract societies arose at the turn of the 18th century concomitantly with foreign mission work and Sunday schools and have been closely related to such enterprises. They also often represent lay interest and have flourished among the free churches in England and pietistic circles on the Continent and religiously aroused lay groups everywhere. Some societies only distribute tracts, while others both publish and distribute.

The first tract societies in Europe were the Tract and Colportage Society of Scotland (1793), the Edinburgh Tract Society (1796), the London Religious Tract Society (1799), the Christlicher Verein im Nördlichen Deutschland (1811), and the Wupperthaler Traktatgesellschaft (1814). The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge (S.P.C.K.), founded in England in 1698 as a Christian literature society, has also included an important tract department. In the United States the American Tract Society (1825), though preceded by several local tract societies (1808, 1812, 1814), was the first national agency. It has played a very great role in American religious life especially in the 19th century; much of its literature reached Mennonites, especially in the eastern half of the United States, in both the German and English languages, often largely through the Sunday school. This society and many other tract societies have used colporteurs on a large scale to distribute Christian literature, tracts, and booklets, even books and periodicals.

The only organized Mennonite venture in the tract field has been the Mennonite Book and Tract Society (q.v.), founded largely by a group of laymen in the M.C. group in 1892 and maintained for 16 years, until its work was taken over in 1908 by the newly organized Mennonite Publishing House at Scottdale. The Mennonite Publishing Company at Elkhart (J. F. Funk) also had a tract series, but its output did not match the (at least) 125-tract series put out by the MBTS. The MBTS attempted the publication of a paper called Book and Tract Messenger, but only one issue appeared (September 1899), which contained a history of the society and a list of tracts. The MBTS by no means limited itself to tracts, and was in a sense a competitive Mennonite publisher to the Elkhart Mennonite Publishing Company. Its headquarters were usually the office of the treasurer, which was at Elkhart 1892-99, Scottdale 1898-1902, Spring Grove, Pa., 1902-5, and Scottdale again 1905-8.

Tract publication has been an integral part of the work of the Mennonite Publishing House throughout its history. A total of over 500 tract titles have come from its press. All tracts were distributed free for the first 30 years, subsidized by other House operations and donations. In 1908 the Tract Committee was appointed to supervise and promote this work, which served to 1951. Since 1929 there has been a tract editor giving part time to the work. The Way, a 4-page (originally 8-page) monthly paper for free distribution, essentially a tract paper, has been published since 1913, with a very large edition (in 1957 at the average rate of 240,000 monthly). It is estimated that some 40 million copies of this paper have been distributed during its 45-year history. A corresponding paper in Spanish, El Heraldo Evangelico, has been published since 1941 (since 1946 by the Scottdale House, subsidized by the Elkhart Mission Board). The Colporteur, a promotional paper "to encourage and aid tract distributors," was published 1942-50 for a total of 17 issues. Total tract circulation by the House is vast, averaging more than 3 million copies yearly since 1954, with 6 million in 1953. Since about 1938 the tracts have no longer been given free but sold, although there is a free tract fund supported by donations. The House now has some 4,000 tract customers, most of whom are from non-Mennonite circles.

A number of unofficial private tract publishers (MC) have arisen; e.g., Amos Ogburn of Woodburn, Ore., and J. L. Stauffer of Harrisonburg, Va., the latter operating under the firm name of Tract Press.

Tract distribution is largely the work of individuals although it is promoted by a large number of congregations (MC) in addition to missions. Many Sunday-school classes, local Mennonite Youth Fellowships, and individuals regularly distribute tracts on Sunday afternoons and at other times, often on a house to house basis. Many congregations have racks of tracts on constant display in the lobby of the meetinghouse or elsewhere with a steady supply of current tracts. Ralph Palmer of Denbigh, Va., has devoted most of his time for some years to tract distribution, traveling about the country as a "tract missionary."

Until recently the content of the tracts was usually in the area of Christian nurture with major emphasis on social evils such as strong drink, tobacco, amusements, fashion, as well as distinctive Mennonite doctrines such as nonconformity and separation, although evangelistic materials giving the way of salvation were also included. More recently the emphasis is almost exclusively on evangelistic themes and Christian experience.

Tracts are also used in evangelistic and mission work of other American Mennonite groups, but no organized publication or distribution agencies have been established for this purpose. Many tracts are purchased from non-Mennonite agencies. H.S.B.

John A. Hostetler, God Uses Ink (Scottdale, 1958) 65-71, 147-49.

Trades and Trade Regulations of the Hutterian Brethren: see articles Gemeindeordnungen and Economic History of the Hutterian Brethren. Attention should also be called to a remarkable passage in Riedemann's Rechenschaft of 1541, dealing with "Traders" (English ed., 126 f.): "We allow none of our number to do the work of a trader or merchant, since this is a sinful business; as the wise man saith, 'It is almost impossible for a merchant and trader to keep himself from sin. And as a nail sticks fast between door and hinge, so does also sin stick close between buying and selling' (Ecclus. 26:29 and 27:1-2) . . . Therefore we permit this not amongst us, but say with Paul that they should work with their hands what is honest, that they may have to give to him that needs." R.F.

Peter Rideman, Account of Our Religion (Bridgnorth, 1950).

Tragheimerweide, a former Mennonite congregation and settlement in West Prussia, Germany, located between Marienburg and Marienwerder. The last great settlement of Mennonites in West Prussia was made in the Stuhm marshes in 1724. The land was chiefly meadow, which the Mennonites now began to cultivate and on which they lived on their scattered individual farms, with cattle and provisions under one roof with the residence. The occasion for the settlement of these marshes was the return of the Mennonites from Lithuania, who had lived there since 1713, but had to leave the Memel Lowlands in 1724 on account of military service.

On Nov. 10, 1724, representatives of the Grosswerder (q.v.) sold two thirds of Tragheimerweide to Salomon Becher and Jacob Jantzen for 2,200 Prussian guilders for the refugees. In the same year 14 hides of Rudnerweide (q.v.) were transferred to Mennonites coming from the Tilsit (q.v.) marshes who were trying to evade Frederick William's recruiters for the "regiment of giants." Other meadow lands (Schweingrube, Zwanzigerweide, Montauerweide, Zieglershuben, Klein-Schardau, and Gross-Schardau) were sold to Mennonites in these years, with the result that in the second quarter of the 18th century a closed Mennonite settlement came into being. The settlers for the most part came from the Montau (q.v.) and Schönsee (q.v.) congregations. In 1728 the Bishop of Culm permitted them to build a meetinghouse. This chapel was enlarged in 1763 and a cemetery laid out. Whereas this church was built in the style of Mennonite frame churches, the new church, built in 1866 on the site of the old one, was built on a Gothic plan in brick. In 1892 the church acquired a good organ. From 1762 the congregation kept records.

The young congregation, belonging to the Frisian (q.v.) branch (called Waterlander in the Dutch Naamlijst) and called the Stuhm (q.v.) Lowlands congregation or Schweingrube, went through a severe crisis in its first years (1733-79). When the Frisian congregations in West Prussia at that time wanted to abolish marriages with Catholics and Lutherans, three members of Tragheimerweide living at Rosenkranz set up violent opposition, and with their followers proceeded to choose their own ministers. A conference of Frisian elders meeting at Schweingrube in 1779 prevented a schism. The Rosenkranz group won; mixed marriages were again tolerated in all the Frisian congregations. The village of Tragheimerweide in 1744 was exclusively Mennonite; by 1772, when less farm lands were obtainable, a number of Mennonites earned their living as weavers. This shortage of farm lands also caused a considerable emigration to South Russia in the early 19th century.

The congregation had two subsidiaries—Marienwerder (q.v.) and Zandersfelde (q.v.). About 1820 the old name of the congregation was gradually replaced by "Tragheimerweide." In 1892-1929 it was called Zwanzigerweide because in 1892 the villages of Tragheimerweide and Zwanzigerweide were merged under the name of the latter; in 1929 the name Tragheimerweide was resumed, when for the purposes of incorporation it was necessary to define the geographic limits of the congregation.

In 1807-8 the Tragheimerweide congregation suffered losses by the emigration of several families to South Russia. In 1852 it had a baptized membership of 336; in 1888, 357; 1928, 550 souls; in 1940, 510 souls. The members, mostly farmers, were scattered over 27 villages and two towns in the areas of Stuhm, Marienwerder, and Mewe. It was served by an elder and five preachers and was a member of the Conference of the Mennonites of East and West Prussia. In 1945, as a result of the flight and expulsion of the Germans from this area, the congregation came to an end.

The Dutch Naamlijst records the following elders: Peter Tjart before 1740-c55, Hans Ewert 1750-76, Marten Albrecht 1776-c82, Jakob Ewert, preacher 1776, elder 1788-1800, Julius Adrian, preacher 1795, elder 1800-43. In the last 150 years the elders were Jonas Quiring, preacher 1808, elder 1843-60, David Ewert, preacher 1840, elder 1860-1903, David Pauls 1903-9, Franz Ewert of Marienwerder 1903-9, Gustav Wiebe of Marienwerder 1913-39, Albert Bartel of Unterberg near Rehhof 1940-45. Albert Bartel was in 1958 the elder of the refugee congregation at Bremen, but lived at Espelkamp.

H.P., vdZ.

Menn. Bl., 1866, 1892, 1928, 1929; B. Ewert, "Geschichtliches aus der Mennonitengemeinde Heubuden-Marien-burg," Gem.-Kal., 1940, 48 ff.; Herbert Wiebe, Das Siedlungswerk niederländischer Mennoniten im Weich-seltal . . . (Marburg, 1952) 40, 42, 85; Dutch Naamlijst; Namensverzeichnis (Elbing, 1843) 23; Namens-Verzeichnis 1857 (Danzig, 1857) 14; Mannhardt, Jahrbuch 1882, 17, 19; 1888, 14; ML IV.

Trail of the Conestoga. The (Toronto, 1924 and 1942), a novel written by B. Mabel Dunham, for many years librarian of the Kitchener (Ont.) Public Library and writer of historical fiction, who was of Mennonite descent. The novel sketches the pioneer trek of Mennonites from Pennsylvania to make the settlement in Waterloo County, Ont., and pictures the motives, the difficulties, and also the rewards of this Mennonite pioneering venture. The leading characters, Benjamin Eby, Joseph Sherk, and Sam Bricker, are well portrayed.

Miss Dunham wrote a sequel to The Trail of the Conestoga in Toward Sodom, which follows the religious careers of the children of the Horst family in the early Waterloo settlement, as they, all but one, leave the faith of their fathers to join other churches or none at all. All of them, however, make outstanding contributions to church and society. In both novels Mennonite life is sympathetically portrayed. (See Literature, ME III, 372.)

E.H.B.

J. Boyd Cressman, Review of The Trail of the Conestoga and Toward Sodom, MQR III (1930); Elizabeth H. Bender, "The Mennonite Theme in Contemporary American Fiction," Proceedings of the Fourth . . . Conference . . . on Cultural Problems (North Newton, 1945).

Trakt Mennonite Church, also known as the Köppental-Orloff Mennonite Church, was organized in the Trakt Mennonite settlement (q.v.) in 1853. The first elder was Johann Wall (q.v.), succeeded by David Hamm (q.v.) in 1858, and by Johannes Quiring (q.v.) in 1884. In 1905 the total number of souls in the church was 1,535, of whom 361 did not live within the settlement proper, with 775 baptized members, of whom 200 lived outside the settlement. In addition to the elder, the following served the congregation as ministers: Peter Wiens, Peter Bergmann, Hermann Neufeld, Jakob Bergmann, Johann Toews, and Heinrich Neufeld. P. M. Friesen lists also Cornelius Fröse, J. J. Epp, Isaac Epp, Johannes Janzen, Aron Wiebe, Jakob Quiring. In 1913 Peter J. Dyck was listed as leading minister. Another source states that Peter Wiens succeeded Johannes Quiring when he died in 1912. Elder Hamm was instrumental in organizing the Allgemeine Bundeskonferenz (q.v.).

While Hamm was elder (1880) the congregation went through a crisis caused by Claas Epp Jr. (q.v.), who, under the influence of some chiliastic writings and because of the introduction of universal military conscription, sought with a group of followers a place of refuge in Central Asia (q.v.). Particularly the village of Hahnsau (q.v.) was involved in this movement.

The congregation had two meetinghouses, one in Köppental (erected in 1866) and the other in Orloff. In 1900-12, under the eldership of P. Wiens, Mennonite Brethren evangelists visited the settlement and organized an M.B. congregation, about which little information is available. In the early days there was a Hahnsau and Popovka M.B. Church (q.v.), which was discontinued. Under the Soviet government the congregation went through a trying period similar to that of other settlements. During this time Cornelius Nikkel was elder, assisted by the ministers Julius Siebert, Jakob Penner, and Franz Quiring, who was especially successful with the young people. In 1927 Nikkel and Quiring were exiled. The leaders helped the young men of conscription age to be freed from military service. Religious activities were gradually made impossible, and in 1941 when Hitler invaded the Ukraine, all settlers were exiled, primarily to Asiatic Russia. C.K.

H. Dirks, Statistik, 1905, pp. 25, 63; Friesen, Brüderschaft, pp. 129-31, 719; Am Trakt. Eine mennonitische Kolonie im mittleren Wolgagebiet (North Kildonan, 1948).

Trakt Mennonite Settlement, formerly located in the province of Samara (q.v.) (now Kuibyshev) on the Volga River, Soviet Russia, was established by Mennonites from Prussia in 1853. When, in 1847, Prussia passed a conscription law, Claas Epp Sr. and Johann Wall (q.v.) were delegated to investigate settlement possibilities in Russia. The Russian government granted the application for 100 Mennonite families of Prussia to settle in Russia, under the condition that each family make a down payment of 350 talers to the Russian embassy in Berlin, which was to be repaid after settlement, deducting expenses incurred by the government in connection with it. The settlers were to be model farmers for the surrounding population, and were promised free exemption from military service for 20 years, after which time they were expected to pay taxes for the exemption. Every family received 160 acres of land.

The first 22 families under the leadership of Epp and Wall left Prussia in the fall of 1853. They spent some time in the Molotschna settlement until the delegates had located the land for settlement, which was located near the Tarlyka River and its tributary, the Malyshevka, on a tract of land used as a road to haul salt (Salztrakt) with sufficient pasture land. In the fall of 1853 the first nine families, coming directly from Prussia, arrived and stayed over winter in the village of Privolynaya. In the spring they established Hahnsau (q.v.). Köppental (q.v.) was founded in 1855. By 1880 all 10 villages had been established: Hahnsau, Köppental, Lindenau, Fresen-heim, Hohendorf, Lysanderhöh, Orloff, Valuyevka, Ostenfeld, and Medemtal.

TRAKT MENNONITE SETTLEMENT, 1897

Village	Year of Settlement	No. of Families	Population, 1897
1. Hahnsau	1854
Settlers moved to Central Asia in 1880-81.
2. Köppental	1855	36	201
3. Lindenau	1856-59	26	174
4. Fresenheim	1856-59	21	103
5. Hohendorf	1862	18	96
6. Lysanderhöh	1864	22	119
7. Orloff	1871	17	80
8. Valuyevka	1875	8	57
9. Ostenfeld	1872	19	127
10. Medemtal	1872	30	219
		197	1176

The settlement consisted of 37,800 acres. The settlers of Hahnsau and some of the other villages moved to Central Asia (q.v.) in 1880-81, under the leadership of Claas Epp Jr. (q.v.). The village pattern deviated somewhat from that of the Mennonite villages of the Ukraine. Because the farmers who settled here brought some money, the settlement prospered economically, although the soil was not quite as good as in the Ukraine and in spite of periods of drought. They raised primarily wheat and rye, although barley, oats, and other crops were common. Later they became expert in selecting the most suitable seeds for the territory. Studies of their achievements were made repeatedly by Russian writers even after the Revolution. Their agricultural machinery was in part imported and in part made in local Mennonite factories. Especially well known was the Epp factory of Köppental. The Mennonites also became known for their breeds of horses and cattle.

Culturally the Mennonites of the Trakt settlement developed rapidly. They established elementary schools, and many of their youth attended secondary schools in the Ukraine. Before World War I they established a secondary school at Köppental. They had a mutual aid treasury, fire and theft insurance, as well as accident insurance. The settlement had its own administration. The two outstanding Oberschulzen, Johann D. Dyck (1866-84) and Johann Bergmann (1884-96), made outstanding contributions to the economic and cultural progress, achieved particularly in 1900-14. In 1908 a cheese factory was established. In 1910 an agricultural association was founded which sponsored an agricultural fair in 1913, and the educational system was improved. Five thousand additional acres were purchased for young couples.

At the outbreak of World War I the young Mennonite men were drafted and served in the zemstvo organization in hospital work. The families who lost their breadwinners were remunerated by the settlement. When the Volga Autonomous Soviet Socialist Republic (q.v.) was organized in 1924, the Trakt Mennonite settlement became a part of this Republic. D. J. Klassen and J. J. Dyck represented the Mennonites for a time in the legislature. During the period of drought and starvation, the Mennonites of the settlement as well as the population in general were helped by the MCC, represented by C. F. Klassen (q.v.) and Peter Fröse (q.v.)

After the hardships of the trying years, the agricultural life of the Mennonite settlement was revived during 1923-27. The Malyshevka Agricultural Association was organized in 1923, which specialized in the selection of seeds and making them available far beyond the settlement. The land of the Mennonite settlement was distributed according to the size of the family and the available agricultural machinery. The settlement took an active part in the efforts of the Allrussischer Mennonitischer Landwirtschaftlicher Verein (q.v.). Johann L. Penner was the first chairman of the district council after the Revolution; he was succeeded by A. A. Fröse. The young men of military age were at this time freed from military service, after the sincerity of their religious conviction had been examined.

Some Mennonites emigrated to Canada. By 1927 there was a trend toward a more radical Communist program. Around 1929 the settlement had a Mennonite population of about 2,000. Many of the Mennonite leaders were exiled at this time and later just as in the other Mennonite settlements. When Hitler invaded Russia, the Volga Republic was automatically dissolved and most of the population exiled to Asiatic Russia, thus ending the Trakt Mennonite settlement. C.K.

Am Trakt. Eine mennonitische Kolonie im mittleren Wolgagebiet (North Kildonan, 1948); Lothar König, Die Deutschumsinel an der Wolga (Dülmen, 1938).

Transylvania (German, Siebenbürgen), a country in Eastern Europe, which from 1621 to 1767 gave asylum to the Hutterian Brethren. Two thirds of the country is surrounded by the crescent of the densely wooded Carpathian Mountains. During the 16th and 17th centuries it was a semi-independent principality, larger than today's Rumanian province of Transylvania, as it then included a large section of Hungary. The population is mainly Rumanian, in religion Greek Orthodox; in the South, however, where the Brethren settled, there existed until 1945 a large German minority, the Transylvanian Saxons, who had since the 16th century been staunch Lutherans. In the North the population is mainly Magyar (Hungarian), traditionally attached to the Calvinist faith, while a certain Hungarian minority, the Szeklers, adopted the strict Socinian (Unitarian) faith. Only after 1691, when the country became part of the Hapsburg empire, did those who were dependent on the Hapsburg dynasty embrace the Catholic faith. Thus there were five very different religions, to which as a sixth religion is to be added the Anabaptist faith of the Hutterites. Until 1919 it belonged to Hungary and thereafter to Rumania.

After 1550 (when the Turks undisputedly dominated Eastern Europe), Transylvania became a principality tributary to Turkey. Both Turks and Hapsburgs tried to have a hand in the politics of that country; only after 1691 Turkey lost its influence there. The Hutterite Chronicle shows a real interest in Transylvania, in the first place because its princes made war against Austria together with the Turks (c1600) and thus brought great misery to the Slovakian and Moravian Bruderhofs (see Böger). At that time Stephan Bocskay (q.v.) was the ruler. He was succeeded by the prince Bethlen Gabor (q.v., Gabriel Bethlen), 1613-29, who ended the war and brought glory and prosperity to his country. It was he—as the Chronicle reports in detail—who brought the Hutterites to Transylvania (to its southern part) to stimulate agriculture. He promised them full religious liberty besides many other privileges. In 1621 a group of 185 Brethren left Slovakia under the leadership of the preacher Franz Walter (see Walter family). This exodus is described in great detail in a song in the Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder 827-35, called a "Klagelied," of not less than 67 stanzas, the first word of each stanza together forming a remarkable acrostic. In 1622 Prince Bethlen gave the Brethren a charter and in 1625 an even more comprehensive Letter of Protection (or Privilege), published by Zieglschmid in 1940. Had it not been for exposure to a number of Turkish Wars, life would not have been too hard in Transylvania; the land was fertile and persecution was unknown until the time of the Empress Maria Theresa and the work of the Jesuits (after 1750).

The Hutterian Brethren settled first at Alwinz (q.v., Alwinc). The real difficulties there were the lack of effective leadership and their isolation from other Brethren (the Turks, ruling in Hungary, were a block interposed between Slovakia and Transylvania). Johannes Waldner in his Klein-Geschichtsbuch lists the Vorstehers of Alvinc in 1621-68 (p. 193); hereafter the community began to decline and by 1690 communal life was being abandoned. In 1694 one of the Hutterite preachers and elders, Georg Geissy, turned Unitarian, a unique case, which brought great distress to the group, for it was now leaderless. The Brethren in Slovakia thereupon dispatched Johann Roth to re-establish the old order, but the former prosperity was gone for good. By 1750 no more than 19 souls had survived (the Kuhr, Zeterle, Stahl, and Wipf families).

See the articles Carinthia and Alwinc for an account of the nearly miraculous revival of this brotherhood by the Carinthian transmigrants of 1756 ff. Two more Bruderhofs were established in Kreuz and in Stein, two villages not far from Alvinc (1761-67). But the relentless schemes of the Jesuits (above all of Father Delpini) ruined all these hopes. In 1767, when the Brethren could see no chance of living in peace, they risked their great exodus across the mountains into Rumanian Walachia. It was an epic in itself to cross the steep, wooded pass by night, with children, sick, and lame. (See description in the Klein-Geschichtsbuch, Waldner himself having been part of the group.) Twenty-two families, however, stayed behind, of which three are still living there today. When, in 1937, two American Hutterites visited the place, they met a certain Joseph Kuhr, who knew all about them by family tradition even though nothing of the old organization had remained. Until World War II certain common patterns had been preserved and the group lived segregated as a unit. The visitors saw also the old church-fortress (Lutheran) where the brethren used to seek refuge in times of war. Also old books were said to be around but could not be seen. As to pottery, some jars, etc., made by their forefathers, were even for sale.

In none of the literature is mention made of another Bruderhof in Transylvania, which existed scarcely more than 17 years, but whose influence was felt long after. This was the Hof in Saros-Patak in the northern Magyar section. Its lot was an unhappy one. After the death of Bethlen Gabor, George I Rakoczy, a Calvinist, became the Prince of Transylvania (1631-48). He also wanted some Hutterite Brethren in his country, and thus sent a message to Slovakia (then belonging to Hapsburg Hungary) demanding such an establishment near his estate and threatening to use force if the Brethren refused to come voluntarily. Then a group of Brethren from Tschäskowitz (Castkovec) very reluctantly moved to the new place (1645) which in the Chronicle is named Bodtok (q.v.; Magyar, Saros-Patak), situated on the river Theiss several miles north of the famous wine estate of Tokay. George II Rakoczy (1648-60) likewise patronized the Brethren, mainly because of their lovely fayence work (see Ceramics). The pottery produced in Patak was in great demand among the Hungarian nobles, and exquisite bowls, jars, plates, etc., of this shop are still to be seen in museums and private collections. The next Rakoczy, Francis I, turned Catholic in 1662, and the Bruderhof came to an abrupt end. He called in Jesuits, and most of the Brethren left the Hof, most likely for Slovakia. Some, however, remained and turned Catholic (now called Habaner), and continued their craft for perhaps another century. Some Magyarized their names; at least one former Hutterite by the name of Odler (once Adler) was knighted for his artistic work (see Habaner).

The Hutterites left Transylvania, but many of their most precious books had already been confiscated. Today these codices are found in two university libraries: Alba Iulia (formerly Weissenburg; library of the Batthyaneum), holding not less than 18 codices, and Cluj (formerly Klausenburg), with one codex. Two of these codices are extremely old, dated 1587 and 1596; the rest are of the 17th century. Four of these codices contain Hutterite chronicles of varying origin, four are collections of epistles and tracts, two are hymnals, four contain dogmatic tracts, two contain pedagogical writings, and two contain Bible exegesis, probably used for sermons. As far as is known these books have not been studied by any scholar. Nor did the two visiting Hutterites of 1937 succeed in seeing them.

In the 16th century some Transylvanian noblemen gave refuge to learned Unitarians, one of whom was Franz Davidis (d. 1579). He was the leader of a group of left-wing Unitarians called Non-Adorantes because they refused to adore Jesus Christ as God. Davidis found followers among the many dissidents, who were descendants of medieval heretics like the Bogomiles. Some of them rejected infant baptism and practiced adult baptism on confession of faith. In 1567 Fausto Sozzini (q.v.) came to Transylvania to fight the Davidist group, but was not very successful. In the 18th century Transylvanian Unitarianism was oppressed by the imperial magistrates, but did not disappear. R.F.

Zieglschmid, Chronik; idem, Klein-Geschichtsbuch; E. Nowotny, Die Transmigration ober- und inner-österreichischer Protestanten nach Siebenbürgen im 18. Jahrhundert (Schriften des Instituts für Grenz- und Auslandsdeutschtum an der Univ. Marburg VIII, Jena, 1931); R. Friedmann, "Hutterites Revisit Their Old Places in Europe; From the Travel Diary of David Hofer, 1937," MQR XXXIII (1959); idem, "Anabaptist Pottery Called Haban Fayences," Menn. Life XIII (1958); A. J. F. Zieglschmid, "Die ungarischen Wiedertäufer," Ztscht für Kirchengesch., 1940, 363, note 47 (Schutzbrief Bethlen Gabors, 1625); Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottsdale, 1914) 827-35. The Diaries of the Jesuit P. Delpini, which contain most valuable information about his work in Alvinc, are in the Studienbibliothek of Hermannstadt (Sibiu), but have not yet been published. They would greatly increase our knowledge of those critical years after 1760. For further literature see "Alwinz." The description of the Codices is to be found in remote specialized literature. A complete catalog is in preparation by Robert Friedmann.

Trappe, George von, a Russian government official who under Potemkin (q.v.) and Catherine II of Russia was charged with the responsibility of inviting German settlers to the Ukraine. He was particularly assigned the task of winning and helping the Mennonites of Danzig along these lines and became the director of the Mennonite settlement program. In August 1786 he contacted Peter Epp, elder of the Danzig Mennonite Church, who was very much interested in the invitation. Trappe prepared a leaflet for distribution among the Mennonites of the Danzig Mennonite Church. He was very successful in influencing prospective settlers and made arrangements for a delegation to inspect the Ukraine.

Trappe was interested in the religious unity of the settlers as a prerequisite for the success of his work as director of the Mennonite settlements. On his way to England he stopped in the Netherlands in the summer of 1788 where he visited the Mennonites of Amsterdam, Haarlem, and Harlingen, including H. Oosterbaan, moderator of the Friesland Mennonite Conference (Sociëit). He presented to them his concern pertaining to the divisions among the Mennonites of Danzig and Prussia into the Flemish and Frisian groups, including the problem of mixed marriages, and found that the Dutch Mennonites had overcome the negative results of this separation. They complied with his request and wrote to their brethren in Danzig, particularly those who were interested in settling in Russia. J. C. Sepp of the Old Flemish Mennonite Church of Amsterdam wrote a letter, dated May 15, 1788, in behalf of the church addressed to the elders and ministers of the Danzig churches. A similar longer letter was written and printed as a result of a conference of Mennonites in Leeuwarden on July 31, 1788, which was entitled Missive van de Sociëit der Doopsgezinde gemeenten in Vriesland en Groningen . . . (q.v.). The concern expressed was that there should be no banning of members marrying from the Frisian into the Flemish group or vice versa. It is an interesting note that von Trappe and the Russian government were vitally interested in the unity of the Mennonite settlers, and shows some of the great difficulties which the settlers would encounter. It is not clear what von Trappe's role was when the pioneer settlers of Chortitza later were actually torn by strife and lacked leadership. (See also Russia and Chortitza.) vDZ., C.K.

D. H. Epp, Die Chortitzer Mennoniten (Odessa, 1889) pp. 1-63; Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 354-63; see also 227 f. and DB 1862, 119 f.; Menn. Life VI (April 1951) 37.

Trappers, Adriaen Pier, an Anabaptist martyr: see Adriaen Pietersz.

Trappstadt, a rural Mennonite congregation located in the northern tip of Bavaria, Germany, near the East Zone border, founded c1800 by families coming from northern Baden, a member of the Verband (q.v.) conference. The ministers in 1957 were Emil Heer (ord. 1927), Heinrich Funck (1948), and Kurt Baer (1954); the baptized membership was 49. H.S.B.

Trechsel, Ulrich (Hans), an Anabaptist of Augsburg, was sent to the Palatinate with Peter Schepach (q.v.) by the Martyrs' Synod (q.v.) in 1527. In 1527-28 he was named among the Anabaptists in Strasbourg. HEGE, G.H.

TA Württemberg; Ludwig Keller, Die Reformation und die älteren Reformparteien (Leipzig, 1885); Friedrich Roth, Augsburger Reformationsgeschichte I (Munich, 1901) 263, note 70; ML IV.

Trementina (New Mexico) Church of God in Christ, Mennonite Spanish Mission, now extinct, was organized in 1944 through the efforts of the Western District Mission Board and other workers. In 1945 it became a General Mission project. Jake Dirksen was its first pastor and superintendent. In 1948 Jaun Estrada was ordained as minister and became the presiding pastor. At that time the membership was 14 and the Sunday-school enrollment 24. Both the Spanish and the English languages were used in the Sunday school and worship services. It became extinct in 1952 when the last members moved to Tucumcari, a city near by. E.F.H.

Trenque Lauquen (Argentina) Mennonite Church (MC). In August 1920 approximately a year and a half after the beginning of mission work in Pehuajó, Argentina, J. W. Shank and T. K. Hershey visited Trenque Lauquen, situated 50 miles southwest of Pehuajó, and about 300 miles southwest of Buenos Aires. The Shank family moved to Trenque Lauquen on Sept. 7, 1920, but illness in the family postponed the formal opening until November 27. At this time Albano Luayza, an experienced Argentine pastor, was secured for evangelistic meetings, and on May 19, 1921, the first four members were received into the church by baptism. By the end of the second year there were about 20 members in this congregation.

Anita Cavadore from Pehuajó arrived in Trenque Lauquen in 1921 as a worker and Bible reader. On Feb. 12-13, 1923, the first conference of the Mennonite Church in Argentina was held in Trenque Lauquen. This gathering, added to the coming of the Orphanage in 1927 and the Printery in 1928, lent stability to the work. Certainly the kindergarten played a major role in winning the sympathy and in some cases the active support of the business and professional classes of the city. The economic status of the members has risen; about 85 per cent of the 96 members now own their homes. Carmen Palomeque, a member of the congregation, translated the Bender-Horsch book on Menno Simons into Spanish, which has been published jointly by the Mennonite Printery and the Methodist publishing house at Buenos Aires (1943). This is still the only book in Spanish on Mennonite history.

The T. K. Hershey family was located in Trenque Lauquen 1928-46, followed by the William Hallman family 1946-53, and the Frank Byler family 1953-58.

In 1952 there were significant organizational changes, placing a large number of laymen in all departments of the church activity and the weekly appointments in the neighboring town of Paso. In 1954 the first deacon in the history of the Mennonite Church of Argentina, José Ibarzabal, was elected by the congregation and Pedro Strucchi was consecrated as the assistant pastor.

The institutions located in Trenque Lauquen have included (1) the orphanage 1927-34, with Selena Gamber, Vera Hallman, Elvin Snyder, and Mary F. Snyder; (2) the printery 1928-55, with Juan Battaglia in charge 1928-55; and (3) the campground 1945-. The significance of the campground to the local congregation cannot be overemphasized, since practically all the summer activities of the church as a whole, such as the Annual Conference and Young People's Retreat, are held there. In 1957 the membership was 86, and the pastor was Ernesto Suarez. W.E.H.A.

La Voz Menonita, February 1940; Shank, Hershey, et al., The Gospel Under the Southern Cross (Scottsdale, 1943).

Tres Lomas (Argentina) Mennonite Church (MC), located at Tres Lomas, F.C.O., province of Buenos Aires, about 325 miles west of the city of Buenos Aires. Work was started in Tres Lomas (pop. 4,000) on May 1, 1925, by Amos Swartzentruber and wife and a congregation was organized by the end of the same year. It was considered a rather receptive town from the very first, probably because there was no Catholic church here. During the first five years 47 were received into the church by baptism and the 1957 membership was 43. The Swartzentrubers lived here from April 1925 until June 1934. The first Roman Catholic church was built here in 1940. A.Sw.

Tressler Mennonite Church (MC) is located near Greenwood, Del. The settlement of Mennonites in this area was begun in 1914, when a number of Mennonite and Conservative Amish Mennonite families moved into this section from the region of Grantsville, Md. The two groups worshiped together for some time, meeting in homes and barns, under the leadership of the Amish. After some years the Mennonite group began to meet separately under lay leadership. In 1935 the group was organized into a congregation by J. A. Ressler, Scottsdale, Pa., a bishop of the Southwestern Pennsylvania (now Allegheny) Mennonite Conference. This seemed to be the logical connection, since most of the people came from this conference area. A school building and ground were donated to the church by the heirs of William Tressler. An addition to this building, bringing the size to 28 x 60 ft., was made in 1954. The first bishop in charge was J. A. Ressler, and the first minister to serve the congregation was W. C. Hersherberger, formerly of near Johnstown, Pa. The membership in 1957 was 30 with Walter Campbell as pastor and Paul M. Lederach as bishop.

J.L.H.

Trevose Heights Mennonite Church (MC), a member of the Franconia Conference, is an outpost of the Doylestown Mennonite Church. It is located about 17 miles east of Doylestown, Pa. The work was started with a summer Bible school in 1945; a church building to seat 150 was dedicated on June 16, 1946. Twelve members from the Doylestown congregation made up the worker force. The membership in 1957 was 40, 13 of whom were of non-Mennonite origin. Paul W. Histan was the first appointed superintendent, ordained as minister by lot on April 4, 1948. The next year the congregation was organized and has supported other mission work as well. In 1958 "Heights" was dropped from the name. The Trevose congregation has served as a center for young men in I-W service at the Philadelphia State Hospital; at its height (1957) the I-W group numbered 70. This is a rapidly growing urban area.

P.W.Hr.

Treyer: see also Dreier and Troyer.

Treyer, Jakob, an Anabaptist of Laufen, Switzerland, near Basel, was put in neck irons in Basel (torture) with Konrad Winkler (q.v.) of Zürich in 1529 because of their steadfastness in the faith. "In the consciousness that they were suffering as martyrs they endured the most degrading corporal punishments . . . cheerfully. Winkler and Treyer stood laughing in the market place in neck irons and one of them preached concerning repentance and the new life to the assembled crowd of spectators. When the executioner then whipped them out of the city, they challenged him to do his duty well, for they gladly suffered for Christ's sake" (Burkhardt).

Early in February 1530 Jakob Treyer was sentenced to death by beheading. But in the face of death his steadfastness forsook him; he cast himself at the feet of his judges and begged for mercy, promising to recant and submit to anything. Oecolampadius had assured him in prison that if he recanted he would be shown mercy and promised to intercede for him. He did so, and Treyer was pardoned.

S.G.

Paul Burkhardt, Die Basler Täufer (Basel, 1898); ML III.

Treytorrens, Nicolas Samuel de, of an outstanding French Swiss family, living in the early 18th century at Eudresin near Neuchâtel, Switzerland, was active in behalf of the oppressed Bernese Mennonites, particularly those who had been deported to serve on the Sicilian galleys (q.v.). The Amsterdam Mennonite archives contain two letters sent by him to the Dutch Mennonite Committee of Foreign Needs at Amsterdam, the first one undated, the other dated Nov. 15, 1715, and also copies of some of his letters to the preacher Goossen Goyen (q.v.) at Crefeld and to Colonel Hackbrett at Bern, giving information on his efforts to liberate the Mennonite prisoners who were at Palermo, Sicily. He succeeded in having them released and even made a trip to Nice in France to gather these galley slaves. He joyfully paid the considerable expense of their return to Switzerland.

With the Bernese authorities he was at first on good terms and they assisted him in this undertaking by sending letters to the King of Sicily; but in early November 1715, when de Treytorrens visited some 40 Mennonites in prison at Bern and pleaded with the Bernese officials for their release, he was himself arrested, and after a few days released upon paying of a considerable fine. Charged with heresy, he was banished forever from the territory of Bern. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1375-84; Müller, Berner Täufer, 228 f.)

vdZ.

Tricht, Jan van, an Anabaptist preacher and martyr: see Jan Smeitgen.

Trijn (Tryn), Harmen Thys huysvrouw, a Dutch Anabaptist arrested April 7, 1535, at the recapture of the Oldeklooster (q.v.). She was drowned at Leeuwarden, Friesland, on April 14, 1535. (K. Vos, Menno Simons, Leiden, 1914, 229.)

vdZ.

Trijn Jacobs, an Anabaptist martyr, a widow from Balk in Friesland, was drowned on Nov. 22, 1555, at Leeuwarden, Netherlands, because she "had a low estimation of the sacred sacraments."

vdZ.

J. Reitsma, Honderd jaren uit de Geschiedenis der Hervorming . . . in Friesland (Leeuwarden, 1876) 63.

Trijn Jans, an Anabaptist martyr, drowned at Amsterdam, Holland, on May 15, 1535, with nine other victims. She was native of Monnikendam in the Dutch province of North Holland. During the trial on March 1 she related that she had been baptized at Emden, East Friesland, by Melchior (probably Melchior Hofmann, q.v.) and that her husband was executed at Zwolle.

vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 413, E 764, where the full sentence pronounced on May 15 is found; Grosheide, Verhooren, 58; Mellink, Wederdopers, 39, 144, 163.

Trijn Jansdochter, an Anabaptist martyr, executed at Amsterdam on May 21, 1535. Trijn was the wife of Jan de Backer and lived on the Pijlsteeg at Amsterdam. In early November 1534 she had been baptized by Jan Matthijs van Middelburg. The rebel Anabaptists who besieged the Amsterdam town hall on May 10-11, 1535, had gathered in her house before going out to attack. Though it is not expressly stated, Trijn may have shared their revolutionary views. She was sentenced to be strangled and to be hanged before her own home.

vdZ.

Grosheide, Verhooren, 66; idem, Bijdrage, 61, 305; Mellink, Wederdopers, 144, 145, 149.

Trijn Pietersdochter, an Anabaptist martyr, drowned at The Hague, Holland, March 18, 1536. She belonged to the revolutionary wing of Anabaptism; on Dec. 31, 1535, she partook in a disturbance at Hazerswoude (q.v.) and during the riot of Poeldijk (q.v.) she was apprehended. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 745; Mellink, Wederdopers, 172.) vDZ.

Trijn(e) (Catharina) Amkers, an Anabaptist martyr, who was executed in 1534 (not 1542, as in van Braght, Mart. Mir.). Neither the exact date nor the place of execution could be ascertained. Trijn was a native of Krommeniedijk in the Dutch province of North Holland. (Mart. Mir. D 62, E 464; DB 1917, 170; ML I, 56 f.) vDZ.

Trijnken Keuts (Kuets), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on March 11, 1559, at Maastricht, Dutch province of Limburg. Her official name was Cathryn Kuesen, wife of Vaes (Servaes) van Kan. She was a God-fearing woman, one of the noblest of the Anabaptist martyrs. About Sept. 16, 1558, she was summoned to appear before the burgomasters of Maastricht. She did not know that a charge of heresy had been lodged against her. Of her own free will—she would probably have been able to escape and to save her life—she entered the Landscroon (seat of the justice of the town). After her frank confession there was no more hope for freedom. At first she was held in the Landscroon, but on Oct. 7 imprisoned in the official prison of Gevangenpoort. Several times she was tried and tortured. She confessed that she had come to the knowledge of truth, which she was eager to serve by a pious life. She had left "the idols of the pope" and thankfully received the baptism on her faith. She rejected the doctrines of the Catholic church: Christ is in heaven, "how could He come into the bread (host)?" The bailiff of the town, Van Eynatten, was unusually kind to her; probably she would have been less severely punished if the imperial chancellor had not insisted on her death.

Catholic priests and theologians tried to make her recant, but in vain. Even the pastor Chimarrheus of Sittard, renowned for his eloquence and especially invited to convert her, had no success. The priests threatened her with everlasting pains in hell. But Trijnken answered, "When you follow me before the judgment seat of God, you will find it to be otherwise!" For 155 days she had to stay in prison, the costs of each day being two pennies, to be paid to the warden for lodging and food. Pastor Chimarrheus received one and a half crowns and a good dinner; the prior of the Dominican cloister also received his remuneration.

On the evening before Palm Sunday Trijnken died. She was conducted to the execution place on the Vrijthof square by soldiers and monks and a large crowd. She was eager to give a testimony, but it was impossible; her mouth was stopped with a gag. Valiantly suffering she joyfully "put off her tabernacle," being burned to ashes.

In her trial she neither spoke of her family nor of the congregation. The sentence reveals that she was a widow. Bax relates that at the moment of her execution the town council deliberated on a boy of twelve years, "being the child of an Anabaptist," who was then imprisoned at the Landscroon. It was decided that the boy should receive ordinary baptism in a Catholic church and then be sent back to his relatives. Was this boy the son of Trijnken?

Bax thinks so. The torture Trijnken had to endure was obviously employed to get information concerning the Maastricht Mennonite congregation, but Trijnken neither named the man who had baptized her nor indicated the members of the church. The Maastricht (q.v.) congregation must then have been very small. Half a year after Trijnken's death another member of this congregation, the preacher Jan (q.v.) Bosch van (den) Bergehe, was put to death. vDZ.

Mart. Mir. D 244, E 617 f.; W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik . . . II (The Hague, 1941) 47-50, 52 note 1; idem, "Twee Doopersche Martelaren in Maastricht 1559," in DJ 1939, 53-62; ML II, 486.

Trijtngen, the wife of Huybert op der Straeten: see Huybert.

Trijtngen (Trijntje, Catharina), the daughter of Lyntgen Joris, an Anabaptist martyr, was one of the twelve persons, six men and six women, executed by the Spaniards in 1571 at Deventer in the Dutch province of Overijssel. They were arrested on March 3, 1571. After a period of imprisonment and trials, two men were executed on May 14, a few days later two men and four women were put to death, and finally on June 16 the remaining two men and Lyntgen and her daughter Trijntngen. They had told Trijntngen that her mother had recanted. Trijntngen had no opportunity to verify this information because in prison they were separated. Now seeing her mother on the scaffold to be burned at the stake, she knew they had told her a lie to make her forsake her faith. She was glad to see her mother firm in the faith and she herself too died faithful. While each was bound to a stake and the servants of the executioner were arranging the firewood around them Trijntngen and her mother cheerfully nodded each to another, and also to the bystanders, among whom there were probably many friends and members of the congregation. (Mart. Mir. D 552-54, E 885 ff.; DB 1919, 29-37; ML II, 435.) vDZ.

Trijntgen Jan Pannebackersdochter, an Anabaptist martyr, was drowned at Utrecht, Netherlands, on July 1, 1569. She was the wife of Lenart (q.v.) Kerstenzoon, who was executed on the same day by burning at the stake. vDZ.

I. M. J. Hoog, "Onze Martelaren," in Ned. Archief voor Kerkgeschiedenis I (1902) No. 174; DB 1903, 5.

Trijntje Dirx, of Dorsten, an Anabaptist martyr, sentenced at Amsterdam on Jan. 15, 1550, to death by drowning. She was the wife of Peter Jansen, and according to her confession had been (re)baptized by Elder Gillis (q.v.) van Aken. In the account of the city treasurer of Amsterdam there is the note that on Jan. 17, 1550, Anna van Dorsten and Anna Boens were "executed with water," and also that Floris Engelbrechts was paid 19 schellingen (about two dollars) for converting these two women and for confessing them. If Anna van Dorsten is an error for Trijntje van Dorsten, this woman and Anna Boens (in ME I, 125, listed as Anneken Boens) recanted. The matter is not quite clear, however, since it is also possible that the Anna van Dorsten of the treasurer's account is identical with

Anneken Gerytsdochter van Dordrecht, and Anna Boens with Leentgen (or Lysken) Boens who lost her mind in prison. (Grosheide, Bijdrage, 157 f., 308.)
vDZ.

Trijntje Jans(sen) van Dulmen, an Anabaptist martyr, drowned on July 7, 1539, at Alkmaar, Dutch province of North Holland, with two other women. She was a native of Dülmen in the bishopric of Münster, Germany. Mellink is of the opinion that she was a Davidjorist (q.v.). She was sentenced to death because she had been (re) baptized and rejected the Catholic doctrine of the Mass. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 748; DB 1909, 22 f.; Mellink, Wederdopers, 173.)
vDZ.

Trijnwouden (Frisian, Trynwalden), an area some 8 miles west of Leeuwarden in the Dutch province of Friesland, Netherlands, where there was a Mennonite congregation in the 17th century, and probably already in the 16th, which in 1695 joined the Friesland Sociëteit. After 1698 it is no longer listed in the records of this conference, having probably either died out or merged with a neighboring church.
vDZ.

H. J. Busé, "De verdwenen Doopsgezinde gemeenten in Friesland," in De Vrije Fries XXII, repr., p. 18; DB 1895, 20.

Trinity Christian Society, the nonsectarian church established in 1854 by the Hunsicker (q.v.) group at Freeland, now Collegeville, Pa. In 1888 it was received into the Reformed denomination. H.S.B.

Tripmaker (Trypmaker): see Jan Volkertsz.

Tripp (S.D.) Hutterite Bruderhof, the second Bruderhof of the Schmiedeleut group of the Hutterian Brethren, established in 1878 as a daughter of the Bon Homme Bruderhof near Yankton, located 36 miles northwest of Bon Homme, also called Neudorf and Neuhoof. It sold its land in 1883 and bought a tract of land from the Rappites (q.v.) or Harmonists at Tidioute, Pa., where a total of 22 families settled in 1883/4. After two years the group moved back to South Dakota in 1886. H.S.B.

Trissels Mennonite Church (MC), four miles southwest of Broadway, Rockingham Co., Va., is a member of the Virginia Conference. This perhaps was the location of the first Mennonite meetinghouse built in Virginia. The first building, of logs, was built in 1822, and enlarged in 1848. In 1900 it was replaced by a new frame church 40 x 50 ft., built on the opposite side of the cemetery. The third church was built of brick in 1950. Since January 1948 Sunday school and preaching services have been held every Sunday. The first ministers serving this church were Henry Rhodes, Henry Shank, and John Geil. The membership in 1957 was 123, with Norman Yutzy, a licensed minister, as pastor. T.S.

Tritzsche, Heinrich, an Anabaptist martyr in Saxony. (Theol. Jahresbericht XXVIII, 1909, 593.)
HEGE.

Troeltsch, Ernst (1865-1923), professor of church history and sociology of religion, first at the University of Heidelberg, later at the University of Berlin, one of the seminal minds of Germany at the turn of the century. His Social Teachings of the Christian Churches (German 1912, English 1930) has become a classic in the area of interpretative church history. Although not too familiar with the history of Anabaptism, Troeltsch was able to describe and evaluate this movement fairly, in fact profoundly. This treatment is particularly surprising in view of the traditional picture of "Old Lutheranism" then still prevalent which identified Anabaptism with Schwärmerium (enthusiasm, q.v.). The latter term does not appear at all in Troeltsch's writings, which approach the various phenomena exclusively from the point of view of a history of ideas.

Troeltsch dealt with Anabaptism in three of his works: (a) Protestantisches Christentum und Kirche in der Neuzeit in Hinnebergs Kultur der Gegenwart (Leipzig, 1909) 504-16; (b) Die Bedeutung des Protestantismus für die Entstehung der modernen Welt (1911; English edition, Protestantism and Progress, 1912; new edition in a Beacon Paperback #61, 1958); and (c) Soziallehren der christlichen Kirchen und Gruppen (Tübingen, 1912) 797-815 (English edition, Social Teachings of the Christian Churches, N.Y., 1930). In the first-named work Troeltsch used as his source material the writings of C. A. Cornelius (q.v.), William Bax, Adolf Hegler (q.v.), A. Hulshof (q.v.), and Karl Müller's Church History. In the Social Teachings Troeltsch widened his reading by consulting two of the best sources available: Gottfried Arnold's (q.v.) Kirchen- und Ketzerhistorie (1699) and Sebastian Franck's Geschichtsbibel of 1531 (see Chronica). It is mainly from Arnold that he received his basic impression and evaluation—very much in contradistinction to his contemporary Karl Holl, another noted Lutheran church historian of his time and also professor at the University of Berlin, who opposed and criticized Troeltsch, although he actually never studied the history of the evangelical Anabaptists.

Troeltsch facilitated his own evaluation by his well-known classification of church-historical phenomena into Kirche (i.e., ecclesiastical or institutional churches, usually state or territorial churches, also Volkskirchen or national churches) and Sekte (nonconformist free or gathered churches).

Troeltsch recognized in Anabaptism certain traits of the medieval Waldensian movement without, however, claiming direct dependency. The Anabaptists represent to him the best example of a Protestant sect. They find their foundation exclusively in the New Testament, emphasizing the ethical aspect of this book; they oppose the idea of a folk or national church with its uncommitted masses, and they require personal and voluntary decision for Christ. Anabaptism is (according to Troeltsch) a marginal branch of the great Reformation movement of the 16th century, closely connected with this movement's tendencies toward purification of Christendom on the ground of the Scriptures, and showing all the moral earnestness of that great spiritual upheaval. When sectarianism had died out in Catholicism (end of the Middle Ages), it started anew in Protestantism, with all its ethical radicalism and readiness to accept martyrdom. The principle of the Absolute Natural Law, to be obeyed (English ed., p. 696), is then the guiding principle which made Anabaptists stand out over against ecclesiastical Lutheranism and individualistic Spiritualism. As to the radically violent groups (Münsterites, for instance) Troeltsch prefers to use the term "Taboritism," reminiscent of the Hussite Wars in Bohemia. (F. H. Littell uses for this type the term "Maccabeanism.") In no way does Troeltsch lump together these manifold movements of the 16th century; he is most careful to differentiate them intellectually.

In the work Protestantism and Progress Anabaptism again receives a very friendly treatment; this time, however, this term means not so much the evangelical Anabaptists of the 16th century as English "Independency," today called Congregationalism, interpenetrated with Baptist elements, which group Troeltsch says "arose from the remnants of the earlier English Anabaptists" (see England). "It was now, at last," Troeltsch says in an often repeated statement, "the turn of the stepchildren of the Reformation to have their great hour in the history of the world" (Beacon ed., 124), meaning that in America (New England), where these Nonconformists found their great opportunity of practical demonstration, they carried out three basic Christian principles, namely (1) separation of church and state, (2) voluntarism in the formation of church-bodies, and (3) the inviolability of the inner personal life by the state (liberty of conscience). Even though the reference at this place is mainly to New England Puritanism, the picture itself is certainly even more true for continental Anabaptism. R.F.

Walther Köhler, Ernst Troeltsch (Tübingen, 1941); ML IV.

Tromp, a Mennonite family, formerly at Woudsend in Friesland, Netherlands, where Age Tromp was from c1760 a ship's carpenter and sailmaker. His son Hylke Ages Tromp founded an insurance business c1760 for bargees and shipowners, which undertaking developed into the "Woudsender Brand-assurantie Sociëteit" with Age Hylkes Tromp as secretary; this is now the Woudsend Fire and Life Insurance Company Inc. (headquarters at Sneek). The present director is Hylke Age Tromp, who in 1925-30 was a trustee of the A.D.S. vDZ.

G. A. Wumkes, Stads- en Dorpskroniek van Friesland I (Leeuwarden, 1930) 291, 411; II (1934) 74.

Troyer (Treyer, Treier, Dreier), a Mennonite family name of Swiss origin. Hans Treyer (see Dreier), an early Anabaptist leader and one of the first Anabaptists executed in Bern, died on July 8, 1529. Peachey also names a Hans Treyer, a peasant at Laufen, Baselland, active as an Anabaptist 1529-30, and an Anna Dreyer, the wife of a peasant, probably the wife of the former. Jakob Treyer (q.v.) was an early Anabaptist of Laufen, near Basel. The name was found among the refugees in the Palatinate after 1664 who later came to Pennsylvania. Beginning c1733 some Treyers (now Troyer) from the canton of Bern, Switzerland, moved to Pennsylvania, settling in Berks County. These were all Amish. By 1752 the brothers Michael and Andreas Troyer were listed as members in the Northkill Amish congregation in Berks County. The Troyer family spread westward to Somerset County, Pa., and to Ohio and Indiana, in which states by far the heaviest concentrations of the family name are found, although Amish and Mennonite members of the family are also represented in Illinois, Iowa, Nebraska, and Kansas, as well as in Mennonite communities in at least six other states and in Canada. In 1957 at least 53 men bearing the name of Troyer were serving as ministers in Mennonite churches. Of these, 39 were Old Order Amish preachers, 25 of whom were in Ohio. Jonas Troyer (1811-97) was a leading bishop in the Indiana-Michigan A.M. Conference. David A. Treyer (Treier) was an Amish bishop, whose Hinterlassene Schriften were published in 1923 (repr. 1925). He also left a manuscript on the dissensions among the Old Order Amish 1850-61 in Ohio. Amos P. Troyer (1856-1935; q.v.) was one of the leading Mennonite (MC) bishops in the Pacific Coast conference. D. D. Troyer (1870-1953) of Goshen, Ind., was a well-known bishop and served as president of the Mennonite Publication Board (MC). N. E. Troyer (1879-1954) of West Liberty, Ohio, was a bishop (MC) and an evangelist. Dr. George D. Troyer (1890-) served as a medical missionary in India and more recently has been serving in the Puerto Rico Mennonite Mission (MC). His son Dr. Dana Troyer also served as a medical missionary in India. Emanuel Troyer (1871-1942; q.v.) was for many years a leading bishop in the Central District Conference. His son Maurice Troyer is vice-president of International Christian University in Tokyo, Japan. Lotus Troyer is a Mennonite (GCM) minister at Meadows, Ill., and has served as president of the Central District Conference. Menno M. Troyer of Conway, Kan., is a minister in the West Liberty (MC) church and is secretary of the South Central Conference. M.G.

Kate Yoder, Descendants of Jephtha A. Troyer, 1825-1957 (Berlin, Ohio, 1957); Eli J. Troyer, Troyer Family Record. Genealogy of David Troyer (Howe, Ind., 1927); P. Peachey, Die soziale Herkunft (Karlsruhe, 1954) 45, 119 (No. 219), 140 (Nos. 707, 708); Samuel Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1932) 162, 170 f., 181; D. L. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottsdale, 1953) 8, 16, 20, 168; Bender, Two Centuries, 60, 84.

Troyer, Amos P. (1856-1935), a prominent Mennonite (MC) bishop of Hubbard, Ore., was born in Wayne County, Ohio, Oct. 23, 1856, the son of Peter and Elizabeth Troyer. He married Delilah Yoder on Jan. 1, 1878, shortly after his baptism in 1877. They had ten children. The family moved to Cass County, Mo., and from there in 1892 to Hubbard. He was ordained deacon in the newly organized Zion Amish Mennonite Church June 18, 1893, and bishop there June 18, 1895, where he served as an able and universally loved pastor until his death on Oct. 23, 1935. He was buried in the Zion Cemetery. He was the outstanding leader in the Amish Mennonite churches in Oregon throughout his 40-year career as bishop, and a leader in the Western District A.M. Conference until its dissolution in 1920. H.S.B.

Troyer, Emanuel (1871-1942), an outstanding leader in the Central Mennonite Conference, was born Dec. 31, 1871, near Hudson, Ill., son of Manasses and Catherine Salzman Troyer. Baptized in 1888, he was ordained minister in 1899 and bishop in 1911, both times in the East White Oak congregation where he served as assistant pastor and pastor 1892-1928. He served as pastor of the Normal, Ill., congregation 1928-36. He served as conference president for many years, also as conference field secretary 1936-42. He was widely used as an evangelist 1911-20. He was largely responsible for the establishment of the Mennonite Sanitarium (later Mennonite Hospital) at Bloomington, Ill., serving as president of the board from the beginning. He was a leading member of the Foreign Missions Committee of the Conference and the Congo Inland Mission Board. He married Ida Horst Jan. 23, 1895. Maurice Troyer, vice-president of International Christian University, Tokyo, Japan, is a son. He died on June 11, 1942. H.S.B.

W. B. Weaver, "Biographical and Character Sketch of Rev. E. Troyer," Central Conference Yearbook 1943, 3-8.

Trubetskoye, a Mennonite settlement consisting of two villages, Novo-Nikolayevka and Volodyevka, in the district and province of Kherson, established on the rented estate of Trubetskoye in 1904. The population consisted of about 80 families or 400 persons. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 680.) C.K.

True and Blessed Way, The, Which Leadeth Beneath the Cross to Heaven or a True Doctrine from the Word of God, for the Benefit of Every Lover of the Truth, and the Encouragement of Their Salvation (Harrisburg, 1816), pp. 314, a small book by John Herr. This is the English edition of Der wahre und selige Weg (Lancaster, 1815), the first and one of the most important works of John Herr, the founder of the Reformed Mennonite Church (1812). It is essentially a defense of the new group, a justification of their breach with the Mennonite Church (MC), and a statement of their principles. Its recurring theme is the apostasy of the Mennonite Church from the teachings of Menno Simons and Dirk Philips. Chapter V (199-284) is headed, "It is explained why we have separated ourselves from the Mennonist Society; and why we cannot find spiritual liberty to hear their teachers." In addition to the reprints in the two editions of Herr's Complete Works (1875 and 1890), separate reprints were made in 1874 (German) and 1887 (English). H.S.B.

Truitje (Truytgen) Gysbertsdochter, an Anabaptist martyr, who with her husband Claes (q.v.) Jansz van Oostzanen had joined the exodus of Dutch Anabaptists from Amsterdam to Münster (q.v.) in March 1534, sailing over the Zuiderzee. The group was arrested near Bergklooster (q.v.). On Aug. 27, 1534, Truitje was sentenced to death by drowning and her husband by beheading. They were probably executed at The Hague. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 744 f.; Mellink, Wederdopers, 160.) vbZ.

Trumbull County, Ohio, the next county north of Mahoning County, the location of the third Mennonite settlement in the state, in which the Bristol Mennonite Church was established in Bristol Township, perhaps the first Mennonite congregation in Ohio. William Sager (b. 1772), of Rockingham County, Va., visited Bristol Township in 1802 and purchased land there. In 1804 Sager's brother-in-law Abraham Baughman settled in the township, followed in 1805 by William Sager and William Barb and their families, all Mennonite. Sager's father, Gabriel (1734-1816), emigrated from Germany in 1756, settled first in New Jersey and then in Bucks County, Pa., from where he moved to Rockingham County, Va., and then to Bristol Township in 1808. His son Samuel came to Trumbull County in 1811. The first church in the township was the Mennonite church organized by Gabriel Sager in 1808 at his home. He was a minister, ordained perhaps in Pennsylvania. No meetinghouse was constructed and the church disbanded after Sager's death. Abraham Kagey, a son of the Mennonite minister Jacob Kagey (1760-1815) of New Market, Va., bought land in Bristol Township in 1810 and moved here in 1818 with three brothers and a sister. W.D.S.

Trustees, Congregational. From the very beginning of the settlement of Mennonites in America, as soon as land was secured for meetinghouses and for schoolhouses, trustees were appointed to hold title to the property of the congregation. Usually two or three trustees were named in the first deed as grantees to receive and hold the property, from whom the title automatically passed to their duly elected or appointed successors, mostly without any additional legal conveyance. However, at times a second conveyance was made, as was the case for the Salford (Pa.) Mennonite congregation in 1763. This conveyance is interesting because of a statement that the names of the trustees were used "by the special nomination and appointment of the Christian Congregation called Menonists (alias Monistoe) who assemble to perform divine worship at a meeting house by them erected on the above described piece of land and that the said Indentures were made for the uses, services, benefit and convenience of the said Congregation and fraternity to a meeting house and school house and a place for them to bury their dead" (Wenger, Franconia, 133). The term trustee is not found in the early deeds, but the concept of representatives of the congregation holding property in trust is often clearly stated and always implied. In Colonial America the ministers of the congregations were sometimes designated as the trustees in the property deeds. The congregations were not incorporated as legal entities, and in most cases to this date in North America have not been incorporated. The practice of using trustees is the common form of holding property.

Usually the trustees are also responsible for the maintenance, repair, and servicing of the meetinghouse and grounds. They hire the sexton or janitor, and receive and sometimes hold funds for these purposes, but often all funds are held by the church treasurer. They do not, however, in most congregations of the Mennonite Church (MC) and related groups, hold the alms fund or poor fund, which is received and administered by the deacon. H.S.B.

J. C. Wenger, History of the Mennonites of the Franconia Conference (Telford, 1937).

Tryuken (Tryutgen, also erroneously Ryntgen) Boens, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake with six others on March 20, 1549, at Amsterdam, Holland. She was a native of Antwerp, Belgium, a daughter of Willem Boens and a cousin of the martyr Anneken (q.v.) Boens. Elder Gillis (q.v.) van Aken had baptized her. This group of martyrs is commemorated in the hymn, "Tis nu schier al vervult ons broeders getal," found in the hymnal Veelderhande Liedekens of 1556 and following editions. (Mart. Mir. D 82, E 484; Grosheide, Bijdrage, 155, 308; ML I, 241.) vdZ.

Tryn Rieurtsdochter and Tryn Willemsdochter were arrested with many others when the Stadholder of Friesland recaptured the Oldeklooster (q.v.) near Bolsward on April 7, 1535. They were taken to Leeuwarden, the capital of Friesland, and executed there on April 14, 1535, by drowning. (K. Vos, Menno Simons, Leiden, 1914, 229.) vdZ.

Trynken van Spelle, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake on May 20, 1573, at Antwerp, Belgium, with three others, because she was rebaptized and frequented forbidden meetings. (Antw. Arch-Bl. XIII, 112, 113, 176; XIV, 90 f., No. 1022.) vdZ.

Tryntgen, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Maastricht, Dutch province of Limburg, on Jan. 24, 1570. She was a daughter of Neelken (q.v.), who suffered martyrdom with her, while Arent (q.v.) van Essen and his wife Ursel, also members of the Maastricht congregation, who had been arrested with Neelken and Tryntgen, were put to death two weeks earlier.

Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror relates that when the Duke of Alba (q.v.) came to the Netherlands most of the Maastricht congregation fled (probably to Aachen or Burtscheid). These four, however, remained in town. During the night of Nov. 24, 1569, they were arrested. Notwithstanding cruel tortures Tryntgen did not name other members of the church, and she died steadfast. The martyrdom of these four pious Christians is commemorated in the hymn "Nun hoert jhr Freundt ehnsamen" (Now listen, ye true friends), apparently composed immediately after their death, for it is found in the hymnal Ein schon Gesangbüchlein of 1570 or shortly after. This hymn is also found in the Ausbund (q.v.). vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 502, E 844; W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik . . . II (The Hague, 1941) 306-10; Wolkan, Lieder, 92, 101; Ausbund, No. 28.

Tryon, Pieter, a Mennonite of Gent, Belgium, was arrested on March 17, 1585, when he and other brethren were in the home of Jan de Cleercq to divide the money collected from the members for the poor of the church. After much correspondence between the city magistrates and Alexander Farnese, the Spanish governor of Belgium, the whole group was banished for 50 years on Sept. 20, 1585. This event took place during a period of relative toleration of the Mennonites at Gent (q.v.). The other persons arrested and banished were Pieter Haesbaert, Jacques de Cleercq, Jacob de Joncheere, Bauwens Tyncke, Joost Bouckaert, Jan de Backere, Manasses de Bats, and Jacques Houtermans. Some of these names probably are garbled. Jacques Houtermans may be identical with Jacques (q.v.) Outer-man, who was a Mennonite preacher at Franeker in the Netherlands in the next year, 1586. I venture to surmise that Tryon is a corruption of Tirion and that Pieter Tryon is an ancestor or a relative of the Dutch Mennonite Tirion (q.v.) family. (A. L. E. Verheyden, "Mennisme in Vlaanderen," Ms.) vdZ.

Trypmaker: see Jan Volkertsz.

Tschan(t)z, a family name found among the Mennonites in Switzerland. Hans Tschanz of Kiesen was in prison at Bern in May 1567; after much reluctance he was finally "converted" through torture, admitting that he had erred in rejecting arms-bearing and the oath, and was now willing "to go into the (State) church."

In the 18th century Mennonites by this name are found in the Bernese Jura, from where a certain Amish Tschanz moved to America as early as c1733, followed by other members of this family. In 1824 and 1835 members of the Tschantz family from the Sonnenberg (q.v.) congregation in the Bernese Jura settled in Wayne County, Ohio. In America the name is usually written Schantz, Schanz, or Shantz (q.v.). vdZ.

D. L. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottsdale, 1953); S. Geiser, Die Mennoniten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1932) 193 f.

Tschetter (Czeterle), a Hutterite family name. In 1760 Abraham Tschetter at Sobotiste (q.v.), Hungary, vigorously opposed a Jesuit who had been sent by the government to catholicize the Hutterian Brethren and who was preaching in their meeting-house. Tschetter was soon arrested and taken to Erlau, about 50 miles from the Bruderhof, and imprisoned in the Jesuit monastery prison. Here he gave up his faith and became Catholic. Lorenz Tschetter was imprisoned in 1766 at Alwinc (q.v.), Hungary, for his faith. Upon his release in 1767 he went to Walachia (q.v.) with the rest of the Bruderhof, and from there to Russia (q.v.), where the family increased. Paul and Lorentz Tschetter were among the twelve delegates from several Mennonite branches in Russia who came to the United States and Canada in 1873 to look for land and in 1874 led some 40 families to Dakota. Paul Tschetter (q.v.) became a leader of the group that joined the K.M.B. Church. His son J. W. Tschetter was long a K.M.B. city missionary in Chicago.

In 1957 five Tschetters were serving as head preachers in Hutterite Bruderhofs of the Dariusleut (q.v.), viz., Paul J. Tschetter of the Thompson Bruderhof, Christian Tschetter of the Husher (Rosebud) Bruderhof, Jacob Tschetter of the Howl Ranch (Tschetter) Bruderhof, Lorentz R. Tschetter of the Riverside Bruderhof, and Peter S. Tschetter of the Holt Bruderhof. There were also four Tschetter ministers in the G.C.M. group, among them P. P. Tschetter of Kingman, Kan. D.D., vdZ.

"The Diary of Paul Tschetter," MQR V (1931) 112-27 and 198-220; C. Henry Smith, The Coming of the Russian Mennonites (Berne, 1927) 52, 59, 64, 66, 72-74, 103; Zieglschmid, Klein-Geschichtsbuch, 234, 254-56.

Tschetter Hutterite Bruderhof, of the Schmiedeleut (q.v.) branch, located near Olivet, Hutchinson Co., S.D., was founded in 1890 by members of the Wolf Creek (q.v.) colony. In 1918 they sold the property and founded the Rosebud Bruderhof near Redland, Alberta. In 1941 the original (S.D.) site was bought and rebuilt by Brethren from the Barickman commune near Headingley, Man.; fourteen families and David Decker, who was chosen to the ministry in 1931 and confirmed on Dec. 27, 1936, formed the new Tschetter Bruderhof. Jacob Wipf was chosen preacher in 1948; he was the leader of a group of ten families from the Tschetter Bruderhof who established the Gracevale Bruderhof in Winfred, S.D., in 1950, where he was ordained. Paul Decker was chosen as preacher at Tschetter in 1952 and ordained in 1957. In 1958 the Tschetter Bruderhof had 40 baptized members in a population of 142. Gracevale had 30 baptized members. D.D.

Tschetter, Paul (1842-1919), was born in Blumenort, Molotschna, South Russia. He became a member of the Hutterian Brethren in 1860. In that year he was married to Maria Walter. Five sons and five daughters were born to this union, among whom was Joseph W. Tschetter, for many years a minister of the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren in Chicago. In 1866 he was ordained to the ministry and in 1883 to the office of elder. He is buried in the Neu-hutterthal cemetery, located 45 miles northwest of Yankton, S.D., on the homestead which he took when he came to America.

In 1873 Tschetter was a member of the delegation sent to St. Petersburg in the matter of continued exemption from military service. Because the answer was not satisfactory a delegation of twelve Mennonites and Hutterites visited the American frontier in 1873 to investigate the possibilities of emigration. Among the twelve were Paul Tschetter and his uncle Lorenz Tschetter, both of Hutterthal. Tschetter appeared before President Grant to plead for exemption from military service for his people who were to settle in America. The diary of his deputation journey to America in 1873 presents a keen analysis of the work and observations of the Russian delegation. In 1874 Tschetter brought his family to America and settled in South Dakota. He never lived in a Bruderhof and thus did not practice the Christian communism of the Hutterian Brethren. He was a leader in the group which joined the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Conference. ("The Diary of Paul Tschetter, 1873," MQR V, 1931, pp. 112-27, 198-220.) M.G.

Tsingfeng (China) Mennonite (GCM) mission. Tsingfeng is a county in southern Hopei Province, with an area of 580 square miles and a population estimated at 344,000. Mission work was begun by the General Conference Mennonite Board of Missions in 1920. A primary school was established and a church organized at the county seat. Later another organized church developed at Kao-Tsun, a market town in the country, and regular services were held in three other preaching places. The staff of nationals consisted of an evangelist at each organized church, a schoolteacher, and a Bible woman, with other itinerant workers. In 1941 the work was disrupted by the Japanese occupation. Missionary work was not resumed after the war because of Communist control, but the Chinese church continued active. S.F.P.

Tub Mennonite Church: see Springs Mennonite Church.

Tucher, Jörg, an Anabaptist from Wissemburg(?), was arrested at Strasbourg (q.v.) together with Jacob Gross (q.v.), Matthi(a)s Hiller (q.v.), Wilhelm Echsel (q.v.), and Jörg Ziegler (q.v.). They were among the first Anabaptists in Strasbourg; in August or September 1526 they were probably all banished from the town. vdZ.

Abr. Hulshof, Geschiedenis van de Doopsgezinden te Straatsburg (Amsterdam, 1905) 18-23.

Tuchmacher, Hans: see Amon, Hans.

Tuleta Mennonite Church (MC), a member of the South Central Conference located near Tuleta, Bee Co., in southern Texas, between San Antonio and Corpus Christi, was founded in 1905 by Peter Unzicker, a minister from Illinois, who acquired considerable property here and laid out the town site. A few years later other families moved in. Early ministers were J. M. R. Weaver, D. S. King, D. Y. Hooley, C. L. Ressler, and Adolph Nick 1923-25, Daniel Kauffman and Amos S. Horst 1928-29, and E. S. Hallman 1929-d.50. A severe drought in 1917 and other reasons caused most of the families to leave. The highest membership was 104, and the lowest 9, which was the membership in 1957. E.S.H.

Tulsa (Okla.) Mennonite Brethren Church was founded by some members of the Collinsville, Okla., M.B. Church who moved to Tulsa. In 1956 this group organized with Raymond Vogt as pastor. In 1957 the church was accepted into the Southern District Conference. A meetinghouse was built in 1958, when the membership was 25. M.A.K.

Tumbült, Georg, author of the interesting and valuable monograph, Die Wiedertäufer. Die sozialen und religiösen Bewegungen zur Zeit der Reformation (Bielefeld and Leipzig, 1899). It contains four art supplements (Kunstbeilagen) and 95 authentic illustrations and pictures. It appeared as No. VII in the series Monographien zur Weltgeschichte edited by Ed. Heyck and published by Velhagen & Klasing. H.S.B.

Tunes. Like most early Protestant hymnals (many European hymnals continued the pattern), Anabaptist hymnals contained no musical notation, printing the name of the tune to be used at the head of the hymn.

Old Dutch Mennonite hymnals like Veelderhande Liedekens (1556 and repr.), Een Nieu Liedeneboek (1562), Lietboeckken van den Offer des Heeren (1563), Hans de Ries' Lietboek (1582), Het Tweede Liedeneboek (1583), and many others of the 16th and 17th centuries follow this pattern; at the head of each hymn is found at least one and often two tunes of familiar songs, religious as well as secular. Mennonite hymnals outside Holland generally continued this practice until the middle of the 19th century or later. Tunes were in these cases handed down by memory, except when printed in separate books either for the accompanying organ or for voices. The first Palatinate Mennonite hymnal, the Christliches Gesangbuch of 1832, did contain many tunes, but Jacob Ellenberger, the editor, also prepared a lithographed book of tunes in four-part harmony for use with the hymnal. The first regularly printed tune book for Mennonites appeared in the mid-19th century. It was Vierstimmige Melodien (Dürkheim, 1856), which served the hymnal of the South German Mennonites. Franz's (q.v.) Choralbuch (Leipzig, 1860) served the hymnal of the Mennonites of South Russia with a four-part harmonized tune book. His 1865 Choralbuch was for only one part. A West Prussian Choralbuch appeared in 1898. All of these appeared in reprinted editions, the Franz Choralbuch of 1865 in the United States and Canada as well. Neither the Dutch nor the American Mennonites produced tune books of their own. An examination of the tunes in these books as well as the titles of the tunes used in all European Mennonite hymnals after the Anabaptist period reveals that they used the tunes prevailing in Protestant hymnals from which the hymns were borrowed.

There has been almost no composition of hymn tunes by European Mennonites. In the 20th century a few hymn compositions by American Mennonites have appeared in American Mennonite hymnals. In the Church Hymnal, Mennonite (MC 1927) 27 of the 645 tunes were by 12 different Mennonite composers, all members of the Mennonite Church (MC). Among them were J. D. Brunk, who had 12, A. B. Kolb 3, W. K. Jacobs 2, the rest one each. Since then Walter E. Yoder (MC) has composed a number of tunes, of which three have been used, two in Life Songs No. 2 and one in Songs of the Church. Four tunes by Thersa Hostetler (MC) were used in Songs of the Church. A total of 10 Mennonite (MC) tunes were used in this hymnal.

A thorough study of the hymn tunes used in the 52 English hymnals of American Mennonites published 1832-1956, made by Paul Wohlgemuth, revealed that of the 3,860 tunes used only 168 were composed by Mennonites. Wohlgemuth comments: "The Old Mennonites have produced the greatest number of composers and the greatest number of Mennonite hymn tunes. The only Mennonite outside of the Old Mennonite Church who has composed hymn tunes to any extent is Herbert C. Richert, a member of the Mennonite Brethren Church. In the opinion of the writer, Mennonite hymn tunes do not meet the standard of the English or German hymn tunes, yet they are generally better than the standard type of American gospel song. It appears that what is generally called 'Mennonite Hymnody' (the 'hymn tunes' appearing in Mennonite hymnals) is in essence a hymnody borrowed from many different sources." Wohlgemuth's statistics reveal further that only 191, or 5 per cent, of the total of 3,860 tunes used were by German composers, and another 57 from other European countries outside England (which furnished 10 per cent); America furnished 57 per cent, while 23 per cent were of unclassified origin. It is clear that modern American Mennonites are singing predominantly American and English tunes, although those groups using German hymnals such as the Amish, the Old Colony Mennonites, and the Canadian G.C.M. and M.B. groups, of course sing predominantly German tunes. Wohlgemuth makes the following general comment: "The publishing of Mennonite hymnals in the English language began during the birth of the gospel song movement in America. The influence of this movement upon Mennonite hymnals is seen in the use of many American hymn tunes of the refrain type. The gospel song movement has been the greatest single influence upon the Mennonite hymnals published in the English language. The one group of hymnals that has been least affected by this movement is that published by the General Conference Mennonites. In recent years the trend in the larger Mennonite branches has been to use more dignified and more highly qualified hymn tunes."

The first Mennonite hymnal to appear with notes giving the melodies was the 1648 edition of the Gesang-boeck by Hans de Ries, although in the 1618 Het Boeck der Gesangen the first part containing the Psalms had tunes. In the 18th century all new Mennonite hymnals published in the Netherlands were provided with notes, though many reprints of older hymnals as late as the 1814 reprint of the Kleyn Hoorns Liet-boeck were without notes. The first European Mennonite hymnal outside Holland to publish melodies (this time with four-part harmony but not for all hymns) was the 1910 edition of the South German Gesangbuch, although the 1832 Christliches Gesangbuch for the Palatine Mennonites printed one-part melodies with numerous hymns. No Mennonite hymnals printed in Prussia or Russia ever contained tunes, either four-part or one-part. The first official American Mennonite hymnals to contain tunes (four-part) were the G.C.M. Gesangbuch mit Noten (1890) and the M.C. Hymns and Tunes (1890), although the latter printed each tune only once accompanied by the several hymns appropriate to be used with it. The Philharmonia by M. D. Wenger, published at Elkhart in 1875, describes itself as follows: "A collection of Tunes, Adapted to public and private worship, containing tunes for all the hymns in the English Mennonite Hymn Book, the Gemeinschaftliche, Unparteiische und Allgemeine Liedersammlungen, the Unparteiische Gesangbuch, and the Mennonitische Gesangbuch, with Instructions and Explanations in English and German, also English and German Texts to most of the Tunes, Metrical Indexes, &c., including a greater variety of Metres of Church Music than any other Work of the Kind now Published."

After 1890 all the official hymnals of the major American Mennonite bodies appeared in modern form with tunes and hymns printed together page by page.

The Harmonia Sacra (q.v.), which contained tunes with hymns, although printed by a Mennonite (Joseph Funk) and edited or written by him (preceded by Die Allgemein Nützliche Choral Music of 1816, and called A Compilation of Genuine Church Music in its first four editions 1832-47), was intended for the general public including Mennonites, but was not used in the regular Mennonite worship service.

The sources of the hymn tunes used by the Anabaptists, as indicated in their five 16th-century hymnals, the South German-Swiss Ausbund (q.v.), the Lower Rhine Ein schon Gesangbüchlein (q.v.) and the four Dutch: Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren (q.v.), Veelderhande Liedekens (q.v.), Een nieu Liedeboeck (q.v.), and Het Tweede Liedeboeck (q.v.), together with the tunes in the Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder first published in 1914 from earlier manuscript materials of 16th-century origin, have been studied carefully by Rosella Duerksen. She had the benefit of George Jackson's study of the origins of the tunes of the Ausbund, the results of which appeared in 1945. Jackson concludes from his study of the 36 transcribed Ausbund tunes published by J. W. Yoder and a comparison with the tunes found in Erk and Böhme's Deutscher Liederhort (2nd ed., Leipzig, 1925) that the Ausbund tunes as sung today by the Amish are 16th-century tunes, many of them folk-tunes, some of them, such as the Hildebrand-ton, going back to medieval sources. Jackson published a table of "Amish Tunes and Old German Folk Melodies with Which They Show Greater or Lesser Kinship."

Mrs. Duerksen's conclusions are as follows: (1) No original tunes by Anabaptists are extant, and there is no evidence of any dependence upon original melodic compositions by Anabaptists. (2) The tunes in the Anabaptist hymnals were borrowed, chiefly from various Reformation era sources, both sacred and secular, including many folk-tunes, German and Dutch, but including a few French, and including a very few medieval liturgical tunes. Fortunately all hymns carry an indication of the tune to be used, either by a title or by the first line of the song most commonly sung to that tune in the source used. (3) The secular tunes chosen need not come out of secular sources but may come directly out of earlier Lutheran or Reformed [or even Moravian. H.S.B.] hymnals which borrowed secular tunes for sacred hymns. (4) On the whole the Anabaptist tunes were basically a folk-song art. (5) There was considerable duplication of tunes among the various hymnals, just as there was of the hymns.

The three German Anabaptist hymnals, according to Mrs. Duerksen, contained a total of 607 hymns, to which 347 tune indications were given. Of the 73 Ausbund tunes 45 were duplicates of the 179 Hutterite tunes, and of the 95 tunes of Ein schon Gesangbüchlein 38 were duplicated either in the Ausbund or in the Hutterite tune collection. Some tunes were used very often, e.g., in the Hutterite hymnal one was used 32 times, another 30 times. Detailed lists of tunes of various categories are found in Mrs. Duerksen's study. Much less attention is given by Mrs. Duerksen to the Dutch Anabaptist tunes, hence her results for the Dutch hymnals are meager but still worth while.

Transcriptions of a considerable number of Amish hymn tunes have been made. J. W. Yoder published his transcriptions in Amische Lieder. Arthur Roth's manuscript transcriptions are deposited in G.C.L. The Library of Congress has recordings of a number of these tunes made by Allen Lomax, and a copy of these is in GCL, besides some recordings by John Umble. H.S.B.

Rosella R. Duerksen, "Anabaptist Hymnody of the Sixteenth Century, a Study of Its Marked Individuality Coupled with a Dependence upon Contemporary Secular and Sacred Musical Style and Form" (unpublished doctoral dissertation at Union Theological Seminary, 1956); Paul W. Wohlgenuth, "Mennonite Hymnals Published in the English Language" (unpublished doctoral dissertation at the University of Southern California, Los Angeles, 1956); John Umble, "Recent Research in Amish Hymn Tunes," MQR XXIV (1950) 91-93; idem, "The Old Order Amish, Their Hymns and Hymn Tunes," Journal of American Folk-Lore LII (1939) 82-95; George P. Jackson, "The American Amish Sing Medieval Folk Tunes Today," Southern Folklore Quarterly X (1945) 151-57; idem, "The Strange Music of the Old Order Amish," Musical Quarterly XXXI (1945) 175-88; Charles Burkhardt, "The Church Music of the Old Order Amish and Old Colony Mennonites," MQR XXVII (1953) 34-54; J. W. Yoder, Amische Lieder (Huntingdon, 1942).

Tungming (Dung-ming), one of the southernmost counties of Hopei Province, China, with an area of 690 square miles and a population of about 278,000, formed part of the field of the General Conference Mennonite Mission. Work was begun here by 1911, and a missionary family was assigned for residence in 1915. A church building was erected in the city with workers' homes, and a compound with a primary school and a mission residence developed in the north suburb. Later, dropped as a place of missionary residence, work was continued with Chinese helpers, and an organized church was developed. During the Japanese occupation and the Communist struggle, Tungming, being to the south and separated by the Yellow River, retained missionary contact and freedom in Christian work later than most other parts of the field. Foreign contact with the work was closed by 1950 but the church has continued active. S.F.P.

Tunkers (English, Dippers), until 1933 the official name in Canada for the Brethren in Christ. "Dunkard," often used for the Church of the Brethren, is a corruption of "Tunker."

Turkestan (Turkistan), now divided into a number of republics in Soviet Central Asia, a former Russian gouvernement-general conquered by Russia in 1859-65, with the chief cities Tashkent (q.v.), Bukhara (q.v.), and Samarkand. In 1880 Mennonites from the Molotschna and Trakt Mennonite settlements came to Turkestan to establish settlements at Ak-Mechet (q.v.) in Khiva (q.v.) and Auli-Ata (q.v.), under the leadership of Klaas Epp (q.v.) and Abraham Peters (q.v.). Under the Soviet regime Turkestan was broken up into the Kazakh, Kirghiz, Uzbek, Tadzhik, and Turkmen Soviet Socialist Republics. During and after World War II the former Turkestan has received an influx of population from European Russia which includes many Mennonites. (See Soviet Central Asia.) C.K.

Turkey (Ottoman Empire): see Böger, Salomon, and Thessalonica.

Turkey Red Wheat: see Wheat.

Turkey Run Mennonite Church (MC), located south of Bremen, Ohio, a member of the Ohio and Eastern Conference, had its beginning in 1858, when a meetinghouse, 24 x 26 ft., was built to accommodate the members in the southern part of the Fairfield-Perry counties congregation. The building, erected after many had already moved to Allen County, never attracted a large membership. During the Civil War, controversy over the draft caused a further serious decline and toward the close of the century it approached extinction. By 1906 only 8 members remained. The present membership (1957) is 37, with Marion Good as pastor. J.S.U.

John Umble, "Extinct Ohio Mennonite Churches," MQR VI (1932) 23-29 et passim.

Turkmen SSR: see Soviet Central Asia.

Turmbücher, the records of the court proceedings against the prisoners in Bern, Switzerland, who were held in various prisons (towers). Numerous examinations of the Anabaptists were recorded in these Turmbücher. They contain material of primary importance to the history of the Swiss Mennonites of the 16th century. The trials were usually conducted by two members of the city council in the presence of a clergyman and the state's attorney (Staatsanwalt). The "obstinate" were examined in the "Marzili," the usual site of torture down on the Aar, used to force them to betray their leaders.

The oldest extant Turmbuch begins with 1545. The books containing the records of the executed Anabaptists have disappeared, not only those of the turbulent years before 1543, when so many Swiss Brethren were put to death for their faith, but also those of the time that saw the execution of Wäldi Gerber (1566) (q.v.) and Hans Haslibacher (1571) (q.v.). These gaps cannot be merely accidental. Were consciences burdened by these cruel Anabaptist persecutions? S.G.

Adolf Fluri, "Täuferhinrichtungen in Bern im 16. Jahrhundert," in Berner Heim, 1896; ML IV.

Turner's Creek Mennonite Mission (MC), located in Breathitt County, near Talbert, Kentucky, about 20 miles south and west of Jackson, was established in November 1946 under the Conservative (Amish) Mennonite Conference. Alvin Swartz, who opened the work, was ordained as pastor in 1947 and as bishop in 1948; he was still serving in 1958, assisted by Oakley Turner, ordained in 1954. Other workers in 1959 were Mrs. Alvin Swartz, Clara Swartz (on leave), and Mary Elizabeth Miller. The membership in 1959 was 31. A meetinghouse was completed and dedicated in November 1948.

E.R.Sw.

Tuscola County, Mich., the site of an extinct Mennonite settlement about 30 miles southwest of Pigeon in Huron County, where a permanent settlement was made. Among the settlers who moved from Ontario to Tuscola County about 1880 was Daniel Lehman (1834-1919), a preacher who had been ordained Sept. 22, 1861, in the Hay congregation in Ontario. Other settlers included Noah Bechtel, Israel Detweiler, and Abram Lehman. In the course of time most of the Mennonite families moved elsewhere, but Lehman lived at Fairgrove in Tuscola County until his death. Lehman seems not to have maintained any vital connection with any conference of Mennonites; it is likely that his attitudes resembled those of the Wisler (q.v.) body rather than either the Ontario or Indiana-Michigan conferences of the Mennonite Church (MC). Peter Ropp, minister at Imlay City, Mich., originally of Ontario, preached Lehman's funeral sermon in the local Presbyterian church in 1919, and his obituary was published in the Gospel Herald. J.C.W.

Tuttle Avenue Mennonite Church (MC), located in Sarasota, Fla., was organized in 1950 by the Virginia Conference with 15 charter members. Truman H. Brunk was appointed bishop, and Myron Augsburg pastor. During two years, while Augsburg was engaged in educational work and tent evangelism, Paul H. Martin served as pastor. The meetinghouse was dedicated on Dec. 31, 1950, and later enlarged. The attendance varies from 50 in summer to 600 or more in winter; the membership in 1957 was 93, with Michael Shenk as pastor. The congregation promotes a home mission outpost, a weekly radio program called "The Voice of Truth," and in co-operation with two other local congregations is promoting the Shekinah Bible School, a four-week school held at the Tuttle Avenue Church. M.S.A.

Tweede Liedeboeck, Het, van vele diverse Liedekens ghemaect wt den ouden ende nieuwen Testamente. Waer af sommige certijns in Druck zijn wtghegaen ende sommige noyt in Druck gheweest hebbende daer by ghevoecht, Tot Amsterdam. By Nicolaes Biestkens van Diest . . . Anno 1583, a Dutch Mennonite hymnbook, is an enlarged edition of the Nieu (q.v.) Lieddenboeck of 1562. Whereas the Nieu Lieddenboeck contained 257 hymns, this Tweede Liedeboeck has 294, all without notes. It was called Tweede (i.e., second) Liedeboeck because it was meant as a sequel and appendix to the hymnal Veelderhande (q.v.) Liedekens of 1582. vdZ.

F. C. Wieder, De Schriftuurlijke Liedekens (The Hague, 1900) 163, No. XCV; Wolkan, Lieder, 70.

Tweede Pruys Liedtboeksken (Second Prussian Hymnbook), a sequel or second part of the Pruys (q.v.) Liedtboeck, is mentioned in a list of Dutch Mennonite songbooks in DJ 1837, 65. It is also mentioned by Blaupot t. C., Holland II, 210. The author or editor was S. H. (?); it was printed in 1607 at Alkmaar, Netherlands. Of this hymnal, however, no copy seems to be extant and particulars are unknown. vdZ.

Twekkelo, a hamlet in the Dutch province of Overijssel a few miles from Hengelo (q.v.), where the Mennonites from the district of Twente (q.v.) probably already in the 16th century, but certainly in the 17th century, held their meetings on a farm called d'Erve'n Haimer. When after 1625 the Mennonites of Twente could meet more safely the meetings were held in Hengelo, but in 1672, in which year there was temporarily a period of commotion, the center of the congregation again became the barn of Tweekelo. In the early 18th century the records of the Groningen Old Flemish Mennonites still mention "the congregation in Twenthe at Tweekelo." On July 9, 1926, a memorial stone was placed on the wall of the old barn at Tweekelo where the Mennonites had met in times of danger.

vdZ.

Uit het verleden der Doopsgezinden in Twenthe (Borne, n.d.) 11-17; DJ 1929, 92 ff.

Twent(h)e, a district in the southeast of the Dutch province of Overijssel, close to the German border. Anabaptists were found here from the 16th century; in 1544 two noblewomen of Beckum (q.v.) suffered martyrdom at Delden in Twente. Until 1625 the Mennonites in this area could not live freely and worship without hindrance as they could elsewhere in the Netherlands, for the Spanish domination permitted only Catholicism. Before 1626 there were in Twente several secret Mennonite congregations. Enschedé (q.v.) is mentioned in 1580; Almelo (q.v.), though there is no literary information about this congregation before 1601, obviously also existed c1580; besides these there was the congregation meeting at Tweekelo (q.v.), and at Goor (q.v.) there were also Mennonites.

Most of the Mennonites in Twente earned their living by farming and weaving; they had probably mostly moved in from elsewhere; many old families in Twente are known to be of Westphalian origin. The idea found in old books and defended by P. Beets that in 1520-30 Anabaptist weavers immigrated from Flanders, Belgium, is not right, though occasionally in a later period of the 16th century a few weavers from Flanders may have settled in Twente. A number of the Mennonite weavers gradually achieved great prosperity and laid the foundations for the big textile industry for which Twente now is known. (Families of ten Cate, q.v., Blijdenstein, q.v., and others.)

Persecutions or at least suppression lasted as long as the Spaniards were in power in Twente. In 1612 a mandate was issued by the governor Unico Ripperda against the "wederdopers oft tibben" (q.v.), threatening the Mennonites with disturbing their meetings and arresting their preachers. Thereupon the Mennonites of Twente addressed the (Protestant) magistracy of Deventer (q.v.) asking their aid and intercession in the States of Overijssel (letter of Oct. 10, 1612). The difficulties with the governors in Twente, however, lasted until the Spanish troops were forced to leave in 1625. Originally all the Mennonites in Twente formed more or less one congregation, of which there were local groups in the different towns. So this letter to Deventer was a petition of "de gemeente, diemen Manisten noempt, residerende in desen lande van Twenthe."

In the 17th century most Mennonites of Twente belonged to the conservative Groningen Old Flemish branch; only Almelo took a somewhat different point of view, joining the Flemish and later on the Zonist (q.v.) conference. Among the Old Flemish leaders in this area are to be mentioned Hendrik Berents Hulshoff (q.v., 1664-1745) and Wolter ten Cate (q.v., 1701-96).

In the course of time independent congregations developed in Almelo, Borne, Enschedé, Goor, and Hengelo. Goor died out in the 18th century; the four others are still existing and together form the Ring (q.v.) of Twente. The number of baptized members in Twente stood at c350 in 1710, 258 in 1834, 548 in 1901, and 1,219 in 1958. Prominent Mennonite families found in Twente, some of which have died out, having moved elsewhere or having left the church, are Blijdenstein, Busschers, ten Cate, Coster, ter Horst, Jannink, van Lochem, Nieuwenhuis (and Nijhuis), Overbeek, Paschen, Schimmelpenninck, Stenvers, and Waraars. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 270, 1004; Blaupot t. C., Groningen I and II, passim (the letter to Deventer, II, 187-204); DJ 1929, 92-104; Uit het Verleden der Doopsgezinden in Twenthe (Borne, n.d.).

Twent(h)e, Ring of, a group of Mennonite congregations in the Dutch district of Twente (q.v.), founded July 27, 1856. Like other Rings its purpose was to establish closer contact between the four independent congregations in this area—Almelo, Borne, Enschedé, and Hengelo—and to organize mutual aid in case of vacant pulpits. The history of Ring Twente is found in an address by S. Gosses Gzn, read at the centennial meeting of the Ring on Sept. 14, 1956, which paper was published under the title De Geschiedenis van een Klavervier (1957, n.p.). vdZ.

Twijzel-Eestrum, two villages in the Dutch province of Friesland, where the Mennonites have organized a Kring (group). The Kring now (1958) numbers 31 members, partly belonging to the congregation of Veenwouden (q.v.), partly to the recently founded congregation of Buitenpost. vdZ.

Twin City Missions (MC), Kansas City, Kan., and Kansas City, Mo., was the name given to the Morris Gospel Hall, R. 2, Kansas City, Kan., and the Mennonite Gospel Center, 1238 Washington, Kansas City, Mo., from 1946 to 1951 when the Morris building was destroyed by the Kansas City flood. The missions were under the superintendency of Edward Yoder, and the membership in 1951 was 38. H.S.B.

Twisck, Pieter Jansz, b. 1565 at Hoorn, d. there Oct. 1, 1636, a Dutch Mennonite elder and prolific author, who lived at Hoorn in the Dutch province of North Holland, where he had a dry goods shop from about 1605 until his death. The belief that he received his family name from Twisk, a town not far from Hoorn, is not correct; the name is derived from a sign on his shop picturing the village of Twisk. Until c1609 he called himself simply Pieter Jansz; thereafter he regularly added the name Twisck.

Twisck became a preacher of the Old (or Hard) Frisian Mennonite church at Hoorn in 1592 and soon after an elder. He was a conservative Mennonite; against the Waterlander leader Hans de Ries (q.v.), who was more liberal in his views, he emphatically defended the doctrine of Incarnation of Christ as taught by Menno Simons and Dirk Philips. In 1615 de Ries published at Haarlem the Historie der Martelaren, with a preface in which he summoned the Dutch Mennonites, divided by schisms, to reunite. Twisck published a second edition of this book, now entitled Historie der Warachtighe Getuygen Jesu Christi (Hoorn, 1617), in which he omitted the preface by de Ries but added a confession of faith. Soon after this Twisck and his Old Frisians discovered that de Ries (intentionally, they thought) had omitted the views of the martyrs on the Incarnation, thus falsifying the history of the martyrs. To correct this, Twisck re-edited the martyr book, and thus Historie van de Vrome Getuygen Jesu Christi (Hoorn, 1626) appeared. (A new enlarged edition of the 1615 edition by de Ries appeared under the title Martelaers-Spiegel der Werelose Christenen at Haarlem, 1631.) For his corrections in the Historie van de Vrome Getuygen Twisck was severely attacked by the Waterlander preacher Hans Alenson in Tegen-Bericht (Haarlem, 1630).

Twisck as a strict Old Frisian unabatingly maintained the practice of banning, opposed marriage outside the church, and held the view that the other Mennonite groups did not have a good understanding of the church and its basic doctrines. Thus he looked askance at the endeavors for union and merger heard in his day. He declined the invitations of Hans de Ries and the Waterlander leaders in 1604-7, and that of the Flemish brethren of Amsterdam in 1626 (see Olijftacxken). In a meeting of different branches of the Dutch Mennonites held at Zaandam Nov. 13-15, 1628, Twisck uttered his grievances against the intended merger and on Jan. 27, 1629, the definite refusal of several Old Frisian churches was sent to the Flemish at Amsterdam. A debate held at Hoorn on April 13, 1622, between Twisck and Jan Luies (q.v.) the strong leader of the strictest Flemish, whose standpoint did not much differ from that of Twisck, had no success either.

Twisck was very active as elder. He regularly visited the congregations in North Holland and may have been the founder of the Old Frisian conference in this area. (See Noordholland, Vriesche Doopsgezinde Sociëteit in.) He also visited the Mennonites elsewhere; before 1620 he was in Holstein and Eiderstedt, and also stayed at Hamburg where there was a Frisian congregation which held the same doctrines as Twisck. His followers in Hamburg and elsewhere were commonly called the Jan-Pietersz-Twisckvolk, or the Twiscken (q.v.).

Twisck was a man of little education. He knew no foreign language except a little German. Nevertheless he was a well-read man, who wrote many books. Herman Schijn (Geschiedenis II) gives a long list of some 26 titles by him, and there were a few more. Some of Twisck's writings were circulated in manuscript copies during his lifetime; a few of these tracts were printed later. His grandson Pieter Jansz Twisck (q.v.) edited some of them.

The most important writings of Twisck are (a) his Confession of Faith of 1617. Twisck himself later denied that he was the author of this confession "first placed before the great martyrs book," claiming that it was drawn up by his co-preacher of Hoorn, Syvaert Pietersz (q.v.). Yet we may assume that Twisck had the major part in this confession, which is composed of sentences borrowed from the works of Menno Simons. (b) Concordantie der Heyligher Schrifturen (Leiden, 1614; Haarlem, 1648) and a sequel to this work, Bybelsch Naem en Chronyk-boeck (Hoorn, 1632). (c) Chroniik van den Ondergangh der Tyrannen, Ende de Jaerlijckse Geschiedenissen in Weereltlijcke ende Kercklijcke Saecten, 2 vv. (Hoorn, 1617 and 1620). This large book was very popular and much read, also by non-Mennonites. It is a kind of general history, for the first part is largely borrowed from the Chronica by Sebastian Franck (q.v.) and from many other books, giving a treasury of historical information, including Mennonite history.

Further publications are: Een Schriftelijck Tracktaet oft Verhandelinge van Twist (1604, n.p.; repr. 1626); Andtwoort ende Wederlegginge . . . op een vrage by Hans de Rijs; this was written in 1607 and circulated in manuscript copies, but not published until 1614. It appeared at Hoorn with the title Een corte ghestelijke verclaringhe van den hoge Priester Aaron (Hoorn, 1608), and a reprint entitled Aarons Priesterdom (Hoorn, 1627); Religions Vryheyt, 2 vv. (Hoorn, 1609); Schriftuereelijke Vereeniginghe (Hoorn, 1661), which was written by 1613; Namen ofte Benamingen Christi (Hoorn, 1615); Een corte Beschrijvinge van 80. Pausen (Hoorn, 1616; repr. 1654); Corte Vertooninghe van den teghen woordighen Staet des Aertbodems (Leiden, 1623, some reprints); Een Vaderlijck Geschenck (Hoorn, 1623; repr. ? and ibid., 1646, 1668, 1742); Ontdeckinge des Pausdoms (Hoorn, 1624; Haarlem, 1646); Een lieffelijcke Meditatie . . . op den 85. Psalm (Hoorn, 1624); Comeet-Boecxken (Hoorn, 1624; ibid., 1665); Rantsoen Christi (Hoorn, 1624); Corte Verdediginge (Hoorn, 1626; Haarlem, 1646); Schriftuurlijke Disputacie aengaende het wesen en de godheyt Christi tusschen S. D. Montanus en (date of writing unknown: first ed. as far as known at Danzig, 1650); Pascha of Paeschlam (Hoorn, 1627); Rijckdom ende Armoede (Amsterdam, 1627); Troost-Brief der Weduwen (ed. of 1626, at ?; Hoorn, 1630; idem, 1636); Oorloghs-Verstooninghe, ofte Teghen die Krijch en voor de Vrede (Hoorn, 1631; probably a first edition 1611); Catechismus (Haarlem, 1633); Van de Peste (. . . 1636; Hoorn, 1636; ibid., 1637); Tegen de Pauselijke Successie (Hoorn, 1636); Kort en Grondigh Bericht van den Val Adams (Hoorn, 1638); Tracktaet van den Houwelijcken Staet (Hoorn, 1682); Verscheide Artikulen des Geloofs (Hoorn, 1694; Franeker, 1700).

Twisck also composed a number of hymns, which like his early tracts usually were signed with the device "Na(e) Beter." The following hymnals, some of which were used in the Old Frisian congregations, were published by Twisck: Eenege Meditations Liedekens . . . genomen wt den XXV. LXXXV. en LXXXVI. Psalm . . . (n.p., 1603); Kleyn-Liedtboecxken (Hoorn, 1633; repr. ibid., 1640; containing 183 hymns); Fondament oft De Principaelste Liedekens . . . (Haarlem, 1633) which was added to his Catechismus. One of his tracts, which was probably never printed in Dutch, or of which the Dutch copies have been lost, still exists in a German translation, Das Friedensreich Christi oder Auslegung des 20. Capitels in Offenbarung St. Johannis (Odessa, 1875; repr. Elkhart, 1888 and 1915); and an English, The Peaceful Kingdom of Christ (Elkhart, 1913; n.p., 1940).

Twisck diligently studied the works of Menno Simons and Dirk Philips and was in sympathy with them; the influence of this study is found in many of his writings, particularly in his Confession of Faith and in his Catechism. Menno's autobiography on "Wtgangh ofte Bekeeringhe" (leaving or conversion) was inserted by Twisck in his Chronik van den Ondergangh der Tyrannen (II, 1067-73). Twisck was well instructed about Menno Simons, for Menno's daughter "more than once" told him personally about her father and how he died. She told him that Menno died "anno 1559, aged 66" (II, 1075); on the same page (also II, 1201) he mentions that, according to another tradition, Menno died on Jan. 13, 1561. These variant dates led historiography astray and for nearly three centuries it was generally accepted that 1559 was the death year of Menno Simons, until Karel Vos proved that it was probably 1561. Menno's letter to the widows, the original of which is now found in the Amsterdam Mennonite Archives, was published by Twisck in his Troost-Brief der Weduwen (1626). Of special interest for Mennonite history are the insertions which Twisck and his co-workers made in the martyr book Historie der Warachtighe Getuygen, of 1617, adding from the official records (Sententie-boeken), chronicles, and hymnals a number of accounts on martyrs, among which was the striking history of Dirk (q.v.) Willems van Asperen. vDZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 501-9, 521, 558-I, 566, 568, 570, 617; II, No. 83; Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis II, 516-34; BRN VII, 144, 155 f., 213-18, 234 f., 242, 251, 259; Kühler, Geschiedenis II, 107-14, 128 f., 134, 142, 191 f.; K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 4, 43 note 1, 68 f., 111, 164, 186 note 1; DJ 1837, 96, 97; DB 1864, 42 f., 54 f., 125, 127; 1865, 68, 119; 1867, 71; 1870, 69, 72 f.; 1872, 53, 94; 1876, 38 note; 1881, 34 f.; 1882, 41; 1887, 99; 1889, 76; 1892, 26; 1893, 11; 1899, 98 f., 144, 158; Robert Friedmann, Mennonite Piety Through the Centuries (Goshen, 1945) 262 f.

Twisck, Pieter Jansz (Pieter Jansz de Jonge), a Dutch Mennonite elder, grandson of the Pieter Jansz Twisck above, served the Old Frisian congregation in Hoorn 1649-after 1690. His stubbornness and strictness in the doctrines on the ban and the mixed marriages caused dissension between Twisck and some followers and the more progressive part of the congregation, of which the preacher Jan Willems Sleutel (q.v.) was the leader. When a certain proposal by Twisck was rejected by the church board in April 1688, Twisck protested by retiring from the board. Secretly his group tried to reduce the influence of Sleutel and the progressives; they even proposed to the city magistrates to have the preacher Gerrit Willems Seylemaker removed. Endeavors to heal the rupture failed, and Twisck with a number of adherents held a meeting in his home on Dec. 25, 1689, thus separating from the main body of the church. On Jan. 8, 1690, the schism was completed. With the aid of a gift of 32,000 Dutch guilders received from Immetje Pieters, the widow of the deacon Claes Reyders, Twisck bought a house "De Plemp," which was remodeled as a meeting place for his group, then usually called "Twiscken" or also "Plempsche Mennoniten." Twisck probably died soon after; the exact year of his death is unknown. In 1743 the "Twiscken" returned to the main body.

Twisck was a man of great power and dominance, not only in the home church, but also elsewhere and particularly in the Frisian conference of North Holland. It was Twisck, for example, who in 1682 dedicated the new meetinghouse of the Frisian congregation at Alkmaar.

As far as is known, Twisck did not publish any writings of his own; he edited a few writings, e.g., Schriftuurlijke Vereeniging (1661), of his grandfather's, with whom he was so congenial and whose nature seemed to have passed to his grandson, except his sharp intellect (DB 1867, 78-89; 1891, 9).

vDZ.

Twisck, Reyner Pietersz (d. 1613 at Hoorn, Holland), a relative, probably an uncle of Pieter Jansz Twisck (q.v.), was for many years a sailor and steersman. He invented a number of instruments, including a new kind of compass, which was patented in 1597 by the Dutch States General. (N.N.-B.Wb. II, 1458 f.)

vDZ.

Twis(c)ken (Twiskers, Pieter-Jansz-Twisckvolk) is a name formerly given to a group of the Dutch Mennonites. It was used (a) for the followers of Pieter Jansz Twisck (q.v.) Jr. in Hoorn after this elder had separated from the main body; and (b) in a more general sense for the Old Frisian (q.v.) branch, of which Pieter Jansz Twisck Sr. (q.v.) was a leader. In the latter sense the Twisken in Friesland numbered 137 brethren in 1666. The Old Frisian "Arke Noachs" congregation at Amsterdam was also commonly called the Twisck church, as was also at times the Frisian congregation in Hamburg, Germany.

vDZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 578; II, No. 83; DB 1870, 114; 1874, 114; Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 163; B. C. Roosen, Geschichte der Menn.-Gemeinde zu Hamburg und Altona I (Hamburg, 1886) 28 f.

Twisk, a village near Hoorn in the Dutch province of North Holland, the seat of a Mennonite congregation since early times. It formerly belonged to the strict branch of the Old Frisians (q.v.). Concerning its history there is not much information. It is a clear example of old Frisian strictness, that Jan Jacobsz of Twisk and Jacob Jansz of the neighboring village of Abbekerk refused appointments as magisterial officials. They were exempted on payment of a fine of 25 guilders each, which was given to the Reformed poor of their villages. The Mennonites of Twisk were rather well-to-do, for they made a considerable contribution (more than 4,000 guilders!) in 1672 to help the Netherlands, then at war. They also contributed to collections of money for the Prussian Mennonites. About 1725 the congregation of Abbekerk (q.v.) merged with Twisk. No membership figures are known for the early period. The baptized membership numbered 86 in 1793, 107 in 1834, 125 in 1861, 151 in 1901, and 72 in 1958. Since 1919 the pastor of Twisk also serves at Medemblik (q.v.).

Until the middle of the 18th century the congregation was served by ministers chosen from its members, the number of preachers usually being three or four. Cornelis de Bleyker (q.v.), serving 1770-96, was the first preacher called from outside. He was followed by Atze Wybes van der Hoek 1796-1835. The first minister trained at the Amsterdam Mennonite seminary serving at Twisk was Sjoerd Hoekstra 1835-80, followed by Jan Popko Bakker 1881-1908, D. Attema 1909-12, S. H. N. Gorter 1912-14, C. C. de Maar 1915-19, A. Keuter 1920-25, H. C. Barthel 1926-35, S. Gosses Gzn 1935-38, R. de Zeeuw 1938-41, Miss A. C. Büch 1941-42, J. Krijtenburg 1942-46, Miss T. G. Siccama 1949-51, and Miss M. G. Stubbe since 1954. There are at present two women's circles in this congregation.

vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 2280-82; Blaupot t. C., Holland I, 212, 251; II, 203, 204, 233; DB 1919, 222.

Typhus, a highly contagious and very frequently fatal fever, which often occurs epidemically. It is also called spotted fever or spotted typhus. Body and head lice are the common carriers of the disease. Spotted typhus generally breaks out in epidemic proportions after acute national emergencies such as famine, devastation, etc. The chief occurrence of this plague in the history of the Mennonites was among the Mennonites of the Ukraine in the winter of 1919-20, when the Machno (q.v.) hordes brought the epidemic directly into the homes of the Mennonites; they preferred to lodge in Mennonite dwellings. Since the Mennonites had been robbed of their linens and clothes it was impossible for them to observe necessary sanitation. Together with the spotted typhus appeared typhoid fever (paratyphus), which is also carried by lice and bedbugs, but is less serious than typhus.

Very severe suffering was endured from spotted typhus by the Chortitza Mennonite settlement. Several weeks before Christmas of 1919, great numbers began to die; the number gradually decreased toward the spring of 1920. The improvement was due in part to the immunity acquired by the survivors and in part to the possibility, owing to the warm spring weather, of removing the vermin from the houses and people. Of great assistance was also the aid which the villages of the Molotschna settlement rendered in 1920 in supplying linen and nurses to the Chortitza settlement.

The statistics from the village of Nieder-Chortitza (Old Colony) show the following:

	Male	Fem.	Tot.
Mennonite population of the village	441	458	894
Afflicted by illness in the winter of 1919-20	310	327	630
Afflicted by spotted fever	284	286	570
Afflicted by paratyphus	26	41	67
Total deaths	61	33	94

The total deaths amounted to just about 11 per cent of the population. These statistics would apply in the same ratio more or less to the sixteen villages (the island of Chortitza had at this time already been vacated by the Mennonite population) of the Chortitza settlement, bringing the total number of Mennonite deaths from typhus in that winter to c1500.

Many also died in the Nikolaipol settlement, and elsewhere wherever the Machno bandits remained for any period of time. As the statistics indicated, there were more deaths among the males than the females, and these were largely men of 40-60 years, the age from which the responsible personalities of society would be drawn. This resulted in great changes in many villages. Thanks to the tenacity and the deeply rooted traditions of the Mennonites (appointing the guardians for the many orphans, the administrators for the widows, regulating the estates through the "Waisenamt") this change was not as painful as it might have been. The villages of the Molotschna settlement also helped in giving many of the orphans homes in their families. The epidemic which afflicted the Menno Colony (q.v.) settlers at Puerto Casado, Paraguay, en route to the Chaco interior in 1927 (147 deaths) was typhoid fever and not typhus.

J.G.R.

Die Mennoniten-Gemeinden in Russland während der Kriegs- und Revolutionsjahre 1914 bis 1920 (Heilbronn, 1921); Dietrich Neufeld, Ein Tagebuch aus dem Reiche des Totentanzes (Emden, 1921).

Tyverton: see Tiverton.

Tzum (Tjum), a village in Friesland, Netherlands, where Elder Leenaert (q.v.) Bouwens baptized four persons in 1563-65, and another 15 persons c1570. A Mennonite congregation of Tzum is, however, not known; the newly baptized may have joined some neighboring congregations like Blessum or Arum.

vdZ.

Ubbens, a Mennonite family at Sappemeer, Netherlands, many of whom have served the local congregation as lay preachers; e.g., Meerten Ubbens (Obbes) (1676-1736), time of serving unknown, his son Ubbo Meertens (1703-82), serving 1733-79, his grandson Meerten Ubbens (Obbes) (1726-86), serving from 1784 until his death. In 1811 their descendants adopted the official family name of Ubbens. vdZ.

J. Huizinga, Stamboek . . . van Samuel Peter (Meihuizen) en Barbara Fry (Groningen, 1890) 151, 156; Dutch Naamlijst.

Ubbonites, a name sometimes given to the followers of the Anabaptist elder and leader Obbe (q.v.) Philips. More usual, however, is the name Obbiten (Dutch, Obbiten) or Obbenites. Ubbonite delegates were present at the meeting of Anabaptist leaders at Bockholt or Bocholt (q.v.) in Westphalia, Germany, in 1536. (DB 1864, 137.) vdZ.

Uble Claesz, an Anabaptist martyr beheaded at Leeuwarden, Netherlands, on May 8, 1538. He had left his child unbaptized and had a derogatory opinion of the doctrine of the Mass. Particulars are lacking. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 746; J. Reitsma, Honderd jaren uit de Geschiedenis der Hervorming . . . in Friesland (Leeuwarden, 1876) 63.

U(c)kwallists, followers of the Dutch Mennonite elder Uco Walles (q.v.), separating with him from the Flemish branch about 1634. At first they seem to have organized separate congregations, particularly in East Friesland, Germany, and in the Dutch provinces of Groningen and Friesland, sometimes calling themselves "t kleinste hoopjen" (the smallest heap). Concerning these Ukowallists there is not much information. In the first decades of their existence they had much trouble with the government, especially in the province of Groningen, where the magistrates on the advice and the insistence of the Reformed Church were very severe against them; their meetings were forbidden, and a few of their meetinghouses were torn down, in 1640 at Sappemeer, in 1643 at Visvliet. On Jan. 16, 1661, the States of Groningen issued a mandate against "Ucowallists and other new kinds of the Mennonites and 'bigotted fanatics'" (Swermeesten). On April 4, 1657, the city government of Groningen issued such a mandate, reverting to a mandate of Aug. 30, 1637. About 1665 the Ukowallists may have merged with the Groningen Old Flemish Mennonites, but particularly in East Friesland and Groningen the Groningen Old Flemish were sometimes still called Ukowallists in the 18th century. The statement of 1666 that there were 245 male members of the Ukowallists in Friesland refers to the Groningen Old Flemish. Likewise "the ceremony of baptism and communion of the Ukowallists" held at Norden in 1719, described by C. Jehring (mentioned in Blaupot t. C., Friesland), relates to the Groningen Old Flemish. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 448; Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 161-63, 223, 315-18, 381 f.; idem, Groningen I, 193, 210, 227 note 1, 285-87; II, 38, 43-47, 124, 149, 181 f.; G. A. Wumkes, De Gereformeerde kerk in de Ommelanden . . . (Groningen, 1904) 34-40; DB 1876, 39 note 2; 1879, 87 f.; 1898, 62.

Uco (Uko, Ucko) Walles: see Walles, Uco.

Udemans, Godefridus, a Reformed pastor at Zierikzee, Dutch province of Zeeland, attacked the Mennonite elder François de Knuyt (q.v.). In 1618 Udemans was directed, probably by the Reformed classis of Zierikzee, to inquire into the growth of the Mennonites and the "pestilential influence" of their elder de Knuyt in the province of Zeeland and especially on the island of Schouwen-Duiveland. Thereupon Udemans published Noodighe Verbeteringhe, dat is Schrijftmatighe Aenmerckingen op seker Boecxken van Fr. de Knuyt (Zierikzee, 1620), a volume of 350 pages. vdZ.

DB 1897, 106, 114 f.; H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamsz (Haarlem, 1954) 13.

Ueberlingen, a town (pop. c8,000) in Baden, Germany, located on the north shore of Lake Constance, is the seat of a Mennonite congregation founded c1840. The baptized membership in 1957 was 62, with Ludwig Moser as elder (since 1943). H.S.B.

Uelzen, Germany, the former center of the Hannover Mennonite Church (first called Soltau-Uelzen) composed of Mennonite refugees from the Danzig area, founded in 1948 and renamed Hannover in 1956 since the center of the congregation was moved from the city of Uelzen (21 miles southeast of Lüneburg) to the city of Hannover. Actually in 1955 the 380 registered members were scattered over a wide area. The elder has been Albert Goertz from the beginning, resident in Espelkamp-Mittwald. H.S.B.

Ufa, a province of Russia between the Volga and the Ural Mountains, where a daughter settlement was made about 1894 with its center in Davlekanovo (q.v.). Until the Revolution of 1917 the settlement made extraordinary economic and cultural progress. It maintained a secondary school in Davlekanovo (a seven-year course, and later nine) and periodically also a Bible school. In the village there were two small Mennonite congregations, and in the neighborhood there were a number more, among them Berezovka (q.v.), Gortchakovo, and Karanbash. Most of the settlers were farmers; in Davlekanovo there were several mill owners and merchants. G.H.

Ufa Mennonite Church: see Davlekanovo.

Uffhofen, a village in Rheinhessen, Germany, near Flonheim and Alzey, where there has been a Mennonite congregation since 1829. In the early years of the Anabaptist movement it had also spread into the region of Alzey (q.v.), and soon after the Thirty Years' War the first Swiss Mennonite refugees settled here, who met for worship in neighboring Erbesbüdesheim (q.v.) and on the Schniftenbergerhof about 1½ hours distant. In 1828-29 the congregation met in the "Geistermühle" near Uffhofen. In 1829 a handsome church was built in Uffhofen with financial assistance from other congregations. Shortly before this, the Wallertheim congregation had fully united with Uffhofen, and in the early 1830's the Spiesheim (q.v.) congregation did likewise. Following the death of the preacher Jakob Galle (q.v.) of the Geistermühle in 1835, the pastor of the Weierhof congregation looked after the spiritual needs of the congregation. This arrangement has persisted to the present. The membership was nearly 100 in 1850; in 1957 the number of baptized members was 48, and the minister was Paul Schowalter. Since 1890 the congregation has been incorporated. The congregation belongs to the Vereinigung of the German Mennonites, the South German Mennonite Conference, and the Palatine-Hessian Conference. It also contributes to the Mennonitische Hilfskasse (q.v.). NEFF.

J. Galle, "Zur Geschichte der Mennonitengemeinde Uffhofen," in Gem.-Kal., 1957, 52-59; Der Mennonit IX (1956) p. 170a; ML IV.

Uilke Reitses: see Dijkstra, Uilke Reitses.

Uiterdijk, Menzo, b. 1863 at Grijskerk, d. 1944(?) at Soestdijk, a Dutch Mennonite pastor, serving at Wolvega 1892-94 and Hoorn 1894-1932, wrote two papers on Mennonite history, one on Pieter Ris published in Doopsgezind Jaarboekje in 1940, and one on Jacob Spis in DJ 1941. vdZ.

Uitgeest, a village in the Dutch province of North Holland, formerly the seat of a Mennonite congregation, belonging to the Waterlander (q.v.) branch. There is only scarce information about this congregation, which in early times seems to have formed a kind of union with the neighboring churches of Knollendam, Krommeniedijk, and Marken-Binnen. About 1635 Abdias Widmarius (q.v.), the Reformed pastor of Uitgeest, was a bitter opponent of the Mennonites. A letter of July 1673 gives the information that the Uitgeest congregation belonged to the stricter wing of the Waterlanders, maintaining the authority of the Confession of Faith (by de Ries, q.v.) and opposing the Collegiant (q.v.) views and practices. In 1670 the congregation joined the Zonist (q.v.) conference. In 1678, 1690, and 1733 the congregation contributed to the needs of the Mennonites in the Palatinate and Prussia. After 1740 the pulpit remained vacant; the last (lay) preacher was Lambert Daniels. In 1787 the congregation united with the Knollendam and Marken-Binnen congregation and in 1813 it is said to have died out. Then the meetinghouse was sold and the funds of the congregation, only 34 Dutch guilders, were given to the Rijper (q.v.) Sociëteit, of which the congregation had been a member since c1640. Concerning the membership no figures are available. The elder Engel Arendsz van Dooregeest (q.v.) belonged to the Visser family of Uitgeest and was born there. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 892; DB 1907, 37, 43, 72-76; DJ 1942, 40.)

Uitgezochte Lieder en voor den openbaren en huiselijken Godsdienst (Selected Hymns for Public and Private Meetings) is a Dutch Mennonite hymnal composed of selections from Mennonite and non-Mennonite hymnbooks, containing 163 hymns with notes, published at West-Zaandam in 1809. The compilers were Jan van Geuns, Matthijs Siegenbeek, P. Beets Pzn, and Jeronimo de Vries. The expectation that this hymnal would be accepted as a general Mennonite hymnal in the Netherlands to be used in all congregations was not realized, though soon after the publication fourteen congregations introduced it in their services. It was also for more than 50 years popular for private use. (DB 1865, 76, 88-91; 1900, 110-15, 116, 121.) vdZ.

Uithoorn, a village near Aalsmeer (q.v.) in the Dutch province of North Holland, formerly the seat of a Mennonite congregation called "aan den Uit-hoorn." It belonged to the Waterlander (q.v.) branch, though in the 18th century it was usually called Flemish. The congregation of Uithoorn is first mentioned in 1647, but no doubt existed long before. Jan Gerrits Buyser (q.v.; d. 1697) was long its preacher. There is very little information on its history and size. It belonged to the Zonist (q.v.) Conference, and received regular support from the Amsterdam (de Zon) and Rotterdam congregations. Though small in membership and not very wealthy it contributed liberally to the needs of the Prussian Mennonites in 1733 and 1736. Pieter van Dam, a lay preacher, served here 1743-c76. After the old church had been destroyed by fire a small new meetinghouse was built in 1782; Jacob de Hoop was then its elder. From 1784 Uithoorn was served by the preacher of the Aalsmeer Zijdweg congregation and in 1787 it united with this church for the ministry, but the membership was so small that it was dissolved in 1804, and the meetinghouse sold to a Jewish congregation. The last preacher of Uithoorn was Cornelis Schermer, 1790-1804. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 2283 f.; Naamlijst 1806, 64, 76; Blaupot t. C., Holland I, 332; II, 45, 232; DB 1864, 121; 1907, 78; 1918, 3; De Zondagsbode XXIV (1910-11) No. 49, p. 195.

Uithuizen, a village in the Dutch province of Groningen, from the 16th century the seat of a Mennonite congregation, which had to endure many hardships in the last decades of this century after persecution had officially ended. In 1583 Johan Arents, the district governor of Uithuizen, fined all the Mennonites, prevented their meetings, and tried to compel them to attend the Reformed services and have their children baptized. In the 17th century it sided with the Groningen Old Flemish and joined the Old Flemish conference. Until c1820 it was served by lay preachers chosen from the membership; Tjaard Pieters served it 1725-78, more than half a century. An influential elder was Lubbert Egges, preacher from 1739, elder 1755, serving until his death in 1770. After his death the congregation steadily declined. The old doctrines were no longer maintained and the young people did not join the church. In 1710 the baptized membership numbered about 65, in 1733 58, in 1754 37 (a meeting held on June 19 of this year led by Lubbert Jans Kremer was, however, attended by more than 130 persons), in 1767 35, in 1798 25, in 1834 only 15.

The last preacher chosen from the congregation was Hendrik Pieters, serving 1789-1820. From then the pulpit was vacant until 1842. In 1835 the congregation numbered hardly a dozen members and dissolution seemed inevitable; but Simon Gorter (q.v.), pastor of neighboring Zijldijk, succeeded in infusing new life in the Laodiceanism of the Uithuizen church. By 1840 the membership had risen to nearly 30; in 1842-44 A. J. van Pesch, a retired minister of Rotterdam, served, followed by D. Plantinus 1845-47, H. C. Dronrijp 1847-56, L. van Cleeff 1857-94, M. Honigh 1896-1900, P. Oosterbaan 1901-7, H. Hooghiemster 1908-27; after six years of vacancy M. J. J. Gaaikema 1933-46, Dj. E. W. Siccama 1946-50, Miss N. Klaassen 1954-. The membership, 29 in 1840, was 53 in 1861, 98 in 1900, 102 in 1925, 101 in 1958. A parsonage was built in 1842 and a new meetinghouse in 1868, dedicated Aug. 30 (with organ of 1898). Church activities include a ladies' circle, youth group 18-25, youth group 12-18, and Sunday school for children.

vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 2285 f.; Blaupot t. C., Groningen I, 87, 127, 140, 142, 197 f., 238; DJ 1840, 43; 1850, 58 f.; DB 1868, 169; 1877, 108; 1879, 6; 1898, 240.

Ukowallisten: see U(c)kowallists.

Ukraine (Russian, Ukraina), today Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, a republic of the USSR located in the southwest, on the north shore of the Black Sea (Crimea not included), consisted of 171,770 square miles with a population of 30,960,221 (1939) which was increased during World War II to 213,473 square miles and a population of 40,600,000 (1950). The name Ukraine is popularly believed to mean "borderland," but Ukrainian nationalists interpret it to mean "cut off from something in one's possession" (Slavonic Encyclopedia, pp. 1, 325). The story of the Ukraine consists of chapters of nationalism, oppression, heroism, and victory. Kiev (q.v.), the capital of the Ukraine, played a significant role in the early history of Russia. The Cossacks became the protectors and defenders of the Ukraine against the Mongolian occupants and invaders.

In Mennonite history the final subjugation of the Ukraine by Catherine II (Empress 1762-96) played a significant role. She had Potemkin (q.v.) colonize and settle the Ukraine by a transfer of population from central Russia and the invitation of foreign settlers to Russia. This has been presented in greater detail in the article Russia (q.v.).

Before World War I the Ukraine had become the chief producer of grains, particularly wheat. The Mennonites of the Ukraine contributed to making the Ukraine the bread basket of Europe by introducing new methods of agriculture (q.v.) and by developing flour industries in various areas. In 1955, however, the Ukraine produced only 14 per cent of the total Soviet output of grain, having become more important in industrial pursuits. The iron located near Krivoi Rog, and manganese at Nikopol, which utilize the coal of the Don Region, are significant for industry. Hydroelectric power is produced at the great Dnieprostroy dam in the region of the former Mennonite settlement of Chortitza. Some of the major industrial centers and cities are Kiev (q.v.), Kharkov (q.v.), Odessa (q.v.), Dnepropetrovsk (formerly Ekaterinoslav, q.v.), Zaporozhe (formerly Alexandrovsk, q.v.), and Chortitza. The foundation for some of these industrial centers, e.g., the last two, was laid by Mennonites. The reason for the shift from agriculture to industry is the fact that the Soviet Union has opened up vast territories for agriculture east of the Ural Mountains and is industrializing the country rapidly, which results in a greater emphasis on the latter in the Ukraine.

Mennonite Settlements. The Ukraine was a major attraction in 1789-1840 not only for the Mennonites, but also for other foreign settlers, particularly from Germany. Two of the major German settlements were those located in the region of Odessa (q.v.), and in the Molotschna with a center named Prischib (q.v.). The Mennonites were in touch with these settlements and this interchange of cultural ideas and stimulation was of mutual benefit.

The most significant provinces of the Ukraine for the Mennonites were Ekaterinoslav (q.v.), Taurida (q.v.), Kherson (q.v.), and Kharkov (q.v.). In Ekaterinoslav and Taurida the two mother settlements of Chortitza (q.v.) and Molotschna (q.v.) were located. Of the 50 or more Mennonite daughter settlements established in Russia 20 were located in Ekaterinoslav, six in Taurida, four in Kherson, and two in Kharkov, making a total of 32 in the Ukraine, not counting the many large private estates. Of the approximately 120,000 Mennonites located in Russia before World War I, about 75,000 lived in the Ukraine (Ehrt, 153); and of the approximately 3,000,000 acres (see ME I, 25) of land owned by the Mennonites of Russia at that time, approximately half (Ehrt, 83) was located in the Ukraine. This does not include the Mennonite population and land located in the Crimea, the Caucasus, the Don Region, along the Volga River, or in central Russia. The major Mennonite industrial and business centers in Russia were located in the Ukraine. This was also true of educational institutions and religious and cultural centers.

As long as there was land available in the Ukraine, the Mennonites aimed to establish daughter settlements in the proximity of the two mother settlements of Chortitza and Molotschna. However, some settlers soon moved beyond the Ukraine. Around 1862 Mennonites of the Ukraine found their way to the Crimea (q.v.), which remained a center of attraction. Here the Mennonites acquired more than 100,000 acres of land located in villages and large estates. Another early settlement was in the Kuban (q.v.) at the foothills of the Caucasian Mountains where the Mennonite Brethren (q.v.) and the Templers (q.v.) received special permission for settlement. Molotschna chiliasts under the leadership of A. Peters (q.v.) went to Central Asia to meet the Lord and established the settlement of Auli-Ata (q.v.) in 1882. Toward the end of the century Mennonites of the Ukraine established themselves at Neu-Samara in 1890; Davlekanovo (q.v.) in 1894; Orenburg (q.v.) in 1894; and Siberia (q.v.) in 1898.

MENNONITE SETTLEMENTS IN the Ukraine, Russia

(According to K. Beil in: Die Mennoniten-Gemeinden in Russland, Heilbronn, 1921)

Shaded area and underscored name are Monrovia Settlements

Province boundaries

Towns and cities

RAILROADS

Scale of Miles

In this program of expansion the mother settlements of the Ukraine, particularly their respective centers, such as Chortitza (q.v.), Halbstadt (q.v.), Orloff (q.v.), and Gnadenfeld (q.v.), maintained their importance as economic, cultural, and religious centers. The churches established in many of the new settlements remained subsidiaries of the mother churches in the Ukraine for a generation. In spite of the distance, cultural and religious ties kept the daughter settlements attached to their mother settlements. In many instances the mother settlement financed and supervised the settlement of its landless (q.v.) population. As a rule in the layout of the villages, the construction of the homes, and the organization of cultural and religious life in the new settlements, they closely resembled the mother settlement, although an adjustment to geographic, climatic, and other local conditions was noticeable.

The spread of large estate owners, who were particularly numerous in the Ukraine, is a chapter in itself. Johann Cornies (q.v.) in the early days, and the Sudermann, Schmidt, and Dyck families in the later days, owned large estates. A total of 384 large estates comprised three tenths of the land owned by Mennonites in Russia. The largest estate in the Ukraine was a ranch of 50,000 acres (ME I, 25).

The following is a table of the two mother settlements of the Ukraine, Chortitza and Molotschna, and the daughter settlements of these two which were established in the Ukraine. (For a complete list of all settlements, see the article Russia.)

A. Mother Settlements
Name	Province	Founded	Villages	Acreage	Population
1. Chortitza	Ekaterinoslav	1789 ff.	19	1789: 89,100 1917: 405,000	1819: 2,888 1941: 13,965
2. Molotschna	Taurida	1804 ff.	60	1835: 324,000	1835: 6,000 1926: 17,347
B. Daughter Settlements
Name	Province	Mother Settlement	Founded	Villages	Acreage	Population
1. Bergthal	Ekaterinoslav	Chortitza	1836-52	5	30,000	1874: 3,000
2. Hutterthal	Taurida	Radichev	1843	1
3. Jewish Settlement (Judenplan)	Kherson	Chortitza	1847	6	5-6 families in each village
4. Johannesruh	Taurida	Hutterthal	1853	1
5. Hutterdorf	Taurida	Hutterthal	1857	1
6. Neu-Hutterthal	Taurida		1857	1
7. Tchernoglaz	Ekaterinoslav	Chortitza	1860	1	2,700	100
8. Crimea	Taurida	Molotschna	1862 ff.	25 & estates	1929: 108,000	1926: 4,817
9. Fürstenland	Taurida	Chortitza	1864-70	7	19,000	1874: 1,100
10. Borozenko	Ekaterinoslav	Chortitza	1865-66	6	18,000	1910: 600
11. Friedensfeld (Miropol)	Ekaterinoslav	Molotschna	1867	1	5,400
12. Brazol (Schönfeld)	Ekaterinoslav	Molotschna	1868	4 & estates	1868: 14,000 1910: 187,000	1917: 2,000
13. Neu-Schönwiese (Dmitrovka)	Ekaterinoslav	Schönwiese-Chortitza	1868	1	3,788
14. Yazykovo (Nikolaifeld)	Ekaterinoslav	Chortitza	1869	6	23,315	1930: 2,200
15. Nepluyevka	Ekaterinoslav	Chortitza	1870	2	10,800	1910: 550
16. Andreasfeld	Ekaterinoslav	Chortitza	1870	3	10,620
17. Baratov	Ekaterinoslav	Chortitza	1872	2(4)	1872: 9,800	1905: 2,569
18. Zagradovka	Kherson	Molotschna	1871	16	57,445	1922: 5,429
19. Schlachtin	Ekaterinoslav	Chortitza	1874	2	10,800	1910: 1,000
20. Neu-Rosengart	Ekaterinoslav	Chortitza	1878	2	1,800 23,306	1910: 250
21. Wiesenfeld	Ekaterinoslav	Chortitza	1880	1
22. Memrik	Ekaterinoslav	Molotschna	1885	10	32,400	1,367
23. Alexandropol	Ekaterinoslav	Molotschna	1888	1		15 families
24. Samoylovka	Kharkov	Molotschna	1888	2		1905: 239
25. Miloradovka	Ekaterinoslav	Chortitza	1889	2	5,670	1910: 200
26. Ignatyev	Ekaterinoslav	Chortitza	1889-90	7	38,132	1910: 1,400
27. Naumenko	Kharkov	Chortitza	1890	4(3)	14,350	1905: 700
		Molotschna
28. Borissovo	Ekaterinoslav	Chortitza	1892	2	13,770	1910: 400
29. Trubetskoye	Kherson	Molotschna	1904	2	118,800(?)	400
30. Kuzmitsky (Alexandrovka)	Ekaterinoslav	Chortitza		1	1910: 4,860	1910: 200
31. Eugenfeld	Ekaterinoslav	Chortitza		1
32. Alexeyfeld	Kherson	Molotschna		1

(Sources: Friesen, Brüderschaft; Dirks, Statistik; Die Mennoniten-Gemeinden in Russland; J. Quiring, Die Mundart von Chortitza.)

Cultural Achievements. The contributions which the Mennonites made in Russia, and their cultural achievement, had their foundation in the settlements of the Ukraine. Here the village settlement and administration as well as the cultural and religious life were developed and transplanted to other areas. The Chortitza and Molotschna settlements developed a pattern of education which spread over Russia and exerted a strong influence on some of the Mennonites in North and South America (see Education among the Mennonites of Russia). The agricultural and industrial developments of the Mennonites of the Ukraine were also decisive for all the daughter settlements in the rest of Russia. Outposts of industries such as factories and flour mills were established in Mennonite and non-Mennonite communities, many of which became the attraction of businessmen and workers seeking employment (see articles Millerovo, New York). The Ukraine with its fertile black soil (chernozem) gave the Mennonites the extraordinary opportunity of experimenting in agriculture and contributing to the development of hard winter wheat (q.v.), one of the most desirable export items. In the 1870's this wheat was transplanted from the steppes of the Ukraine to the prairies of Kansas (q.v.). The fact that the Ukraine was agriculturally and industrially an undeveloped territory at the time the Mennonites settled there gave them an excellent opportunity to fulfill a service in this area which they discharged with great success. Again it must be pointed out that they were only a minority among the numerous German settlers of the Ukraine who helped to develop this country in the realm of agriculture and industry. (See also articles Industry, Business, and Agriculture.)

Religious Life and Migrations. The years 1860-80 were significant and crucial for the Mennonites of the Ukraine. Religious life underwent great changes. A certain integration of the Mennonites coming from various backgrounds had taken place, and the later immigrant groups had transplanted from Germany to the Ukraine elements of Pietism which penetrated the whole like a leaven. The separation of the Kleine Gemeinde, led by Klaas Reimer (q.v.) early in the 19th century in the Molotschna settlement, resulted from a protest toward certain adjustments and progress. Gradually, however, pietistic influences such as the support of the St. Petersburg Bible Society, evangelistic efforts, mission festivals, abstinence, got a foothold in the brotherhood although they were promoted only by a minority. The South German Pietist Eduard Wüst (q.v.), serving an independent pietistic congregation next to the Molotschna settlement, made a great impact on the Mennonites of the Molotschna. A somewhat similar influence was exerted in the Chortitza settlement by the Baptist J. G. Oncken of Hamburg, Germany. All this not only influenced a large segment of the Mennonites of the Ukraine, but also led to schisms culminating in the establishment of the Mennonite Brethren (q.v.), Krimmer Mennonite Brethren (q.v.), Templers (q.v.) or Friends of Jerusalem, Hermann Peters group (Apostolische Brüdergemeinde, q.v.), and the movement of A. Peters (q.v.), who led a group to Central Asia

(q.v.) to meet the Lord at a specifically designated place. Among these separating groups only the Mennonite Brethren (q.v.) secured a significant number of followers among the Mennonites and made an outstanding impact on the total Mennonite brotherhood of Russia and later in South and North America. Only this group spread to nearly all daughter settlements of Russia beyond the Ukraine, while the others remained restricted to certain settlements. The Mennonite Brethren strongly emphasized evangelism, missions, abstinence, and baptism by immersion. Particularly through the former two aspects they served as a leaven in the total brotherhood, while through the last point they established a sharp demarcation line which limited contact with the mother group and others primarily to converts to the Mennonite Brethren. The influence of Pietism, although it caused some schisms, also wholesomely leavened the Mennonite brotherhood. Wüst and other evangelistic and pietistic leaders had many friends and followers among the Mennonite brotherhood of Russia around 1860, some of whom were Johann Harder (q.v.), Bernhard Harder (q.v.), August Lenzmann (q.v.), and Cornelius Jansen (q.v.). These felt it to be their duty to remain within the brotherhood and revive and strengthen its spiritual life. An outstanding evangelist, educator, and pioneer writer was Bernhard Harder.

Another significant development among the Mennonites of the Ukraine was the new universal conscription law which became known to the Mennonites around 1870, and resulted in a large emigration to North America 1873-80. One of the chief promoters of this emigration for conscience' sake was Cornelius Jansen (q.v.), supported by men like Jacob Buller and Dietrich Gaeddert of Alexanderwohl (q.v.), Gerhard Wiebe and Johann Wiebe of Bergthal (q.v.) and Fürstenland (q.v.), both daughter settlements of Chortitza, and Mennonite representatives from Russian Poland and Prussia. This resulted in the first and up to that time the largest Mennonite migration on record. Some 10,000 Mennonites primarily of the Molotschna settlement, Russian Poland, Galicia, and Prussia, settled in the prairie states of the United States, while some 8,000 Mennonites of Chortitza and its two daughter settlements founded a new home in the East and West Reserves of Manitoba (q.v.). Those remaining in Russia accepted the responsibility of doing work in forestry service (q.v.) beginning in 1880 and in World War I in hospital service. Once again the threat to the principle of nonresistance had alarmed the Mennonites and caused some to leave the country and others to grow into a more active participation and sense of responsibility in the affairs of the country in which they lived. The challenging alternative service program of the Mennonites of Russia had a wholesome influence on the total brotherhood and also caused a closer co-operation between the main groups which had drifted apart since 1860. Again it was the Ukraine which furnished leadership in this significant program in which Mennonite settlements of the remotest areas benefited.

The Revolution and After (1917-43). With the outbreak of World War I the decline and the ultimate destruction of Mennonite settlements of the Ukraine was ushered in. A severe anti-German feeling which had been previously active in the Russianization policy of the foreign settlers of Russian now sought to destroy the prosperous settlements by confiscating their property and removing them to uninhabited areas. Only the outbreak of the Revolution in 1917 prevented this act. In a way the Mennonites greeted the new day in which the liberal and democratic government under Kerensky was to establish an era of justice for all. However, the Revolution proved to be another and a more radical step toward the annihilation of all that had been achieved by the Mennonites in more than 100 years. First a civil war, typhoid fever, confiscation of property, starvation, and plundering by irregulars at times led by men like Machno (q.v.) or individual bandits caused almost unbearable hardships to the settlements of the Ukraine which suffered much more under them than those located in other parts of Russia. Many of the owners of industries and large estates were put to death by bandits after radical Marxian ideas became prevalent, which ideas were often reinforced by a lingering anti-German feeling.

In March 1917 the Revolution began which was to end World War I for Russia. From March until November of that year the Ukraine was under the temporary government of Kerensky, after which the radical Bolsheviks took over the government, remaining in power in the Ukraine from November 1917 to April 1918 when the German army occupied the Ukraine. In November 1918 the German army withdrew and many of the Mennonite settlements were occupied by Machno's bands (q.v.) until July 1919, at which time the army of Denikin took over and occupied the territory until October 1919. From October 1919 until January 1920 Machno and his bands reigned again until the Bolsheviks returned. In June 1920 General Peter Wrangel tried once more, as Denikin had before him, to restore the Czarist government. In the fall of 1920 this dream was shattered forever and the Communist regime took over.

All Ukrainian Mennonite settlements and estates suffered severely during these trying years. Several whole villages were slaughtered by Machno's bandits. Among them were Eichenfeld (q.v.) and certain villages of Zagradovka (q.v.). In some instances Mennonite young men under the guidance of officers of the German occupation army which withdrew, had organized a "Selbstschutz" (q.v.) to protect their settlements and particularly the lives of their family members, during the time when there was no established government and there was imminent danger that roving bandits would molest the settlements. A number of young men also joined the forces of the White army (q.v.), which was defeated by the Red army. Some 62 of the surviving young men came to America via Constantinople (q.v.). As a rule this self-defense of the Mennonites of the Ukraine was not approved of by the Mennonite authorities of the settlements, and in some cases may have provoked action by the Machno irregulars.

Significant during these years of hardship and trial was the help given to the Mennonites of the Ukraine by the American Mennonites administered through the American Mennonite Relief (q.v.), and the Dutch Mennonites through their relief agency. Both agencies sent representatives to Russia. The food and clothing supplied distributed and the agricultural machinery which was made available, as well as the spiritual and moral support, were of great help. The U.S. government relief program, the American Relief Administration (ARA) (q.v.) also helped much.

Immediately after the establishment of order by the Communist regime, some hopeful Mennonites anticipated a more or less normal although modified economic and cultural life in the settlements. A gradual adjustment to the new regime became noticeable on the one hand, but also a realization on the other hand that the Communist program was too radical. Hence in 1923-27 and again in 1929-30 many thousands left the Ukraine via Moscow and Riga in order to establish new homes in Canada. Those who were more optimistic formed organizations in order to represent their rights and interests under the new Soviet government. One of the most outstanding organizations was the Verband Bürger Holländischer Herkunft (q.v.) (Union of Citizens of Dutch Ancestry). A conference called in Orloff in 1917 during the reign of Kerensky, the Allgemeiner Mennonitischer Kongress (q.v.), was designed to regulate the total cultural life of the Mennonites of the Ukraine. However, only two sessions could be held. The last Bundeskonferenz met as an All-Ukrainian Conference at Melitopol (q.v.) in 1926. At the risk of imprisonment and loss of life the leaders aimed to find a common platform to solve the problems facing them. Under the NEP (New Economic Policy) this was still possible. After Lenin's death in 1926, Stalin inaugurated a radical program of collectivization (q.v.) of all land by exiling the formerly more prosperous farmers (Kulaks, q.v.), which affected the Mennonites deeply and caused the disruption and final annihilation of most of their cultural values in the Ukraine. Two main waves of exile, one in 1929-30 and the second in 1937-38, reduced the Mennonite population of the Ukraine considerably, especially the male part. Another wave of evacuation occurred when the German army invaded the Ukraine in 1941. Chortitza is an illustration of what happened to the Mennonite population in 1929-38, when 1,456 people out of a total population of 11,666 (1918) were exiled and 1,281 were evacuated by the Russians eastward when the Germans approached in 1941. This evacuation of the German population was much more successful in the settlements east of the Dniepr, such as the Molotschna and many of the daughter settlements, than those west. The Dniepr formed a natural barrier for the invading German army which prevented the removal of the Chortitza Mennonites and gave the Russians enough time to remove a large portion of the Russo-German population east of the Dniepr. All men between the ages of 16 and 65 had been evacuated previously. However, some of the population of Halbstadt and Stulnevo fell into the hands of the approaching German army. The Soviet authorities still succeeded in evacuating one third of the remaining Molotschna population to Siberia before the German army reached the villages (G. Fast).

Further statistics of the Chortitza settlement acquired during the German occupation of the Ukraine during World War II reveal that of the Chortitza settlement, 245 individuals were killed by Machno's irregulars, and 30 died of starvation in 1921-22 and 1932-33. About one third of the land formerly owned and farmed by the Mennonites of Chortitza was turned over to the neighboring Russian population. All farming was done collectively. All churches were closed by 1935 and used as theaters, clubhouses, stables, or granaries. Conditions in other settlements were very similar.

During the German occupation of large parts of Russia in 1941-43, the Mennonite settlements of the Ukraine and many others were in the hands of the occupational authorities. Although a large percentage of the population had been evacuated before this to Asiatic and Northern Russia, for those who remained in the Ukraine a revival of some aspects of the cultural and religious life took place for a time. Religious services were introduced, ministers were elected, and baptismal services took place. The old school system was revived. But all of this was of short duration. The German authorities themselves began repressive measures against the church parallel to what was going on in Germany at the time under Hitler.

In the fall of 1943 Germany began to evacuate westward the remaining German, including Mennonite, population of the Ukraine. During the middle of September the Halbstadt district of the Molotschna settlement was evacuated by wagons. In October the Chortitza settlement followed by trains, and in November Zagradovka. The population of other settlements was similarly evacuated. The railroad transports consisted as a rule of 50 freight cars each occupied by approximately 1,200 persons. Many of the evacuees, particularly those traveling by wagons, suffered severely from the attacking Russian army and the partisans. The German government planned to settle the Russo-German population, including the Mennonites, in East Germany, some of them in the Warthegau (q.v.), the territory annexed from Poland along the Vistula River, south of the general area from which the Mennonites had left for Russia 150 years earlier. But many were still in camps, not yet in the area, when the advancing Russian army blasted all such plans. It is estimated that the remaining Mennonite population of the Ukraine transported to Germany was about 35,000. In the Warthegau most Mennonites were made German citizens by a mass decree, and most surviving Mennonite men were drafted into the German army.

When, in January 1945, the Russian army entered this territory on its march westward, the Mennonites tried to flee westward toward the provinces of Saxony, Thuringia, Mecklenburg, Hannover, and Bavaria. Most of those who found themselves in the Russian occupied zone of Germany at the end of the war were forcibly repatriated or sent back to Russia. It has been estimated that this must have been nearly two thirds of the 35,000 Mennonites who had been transported to Germany, which would be over 20,000. Many family members were again separated. The 12,000-14,000 who escaped to Western Germany found new homes in Canada (q.v.) and South America, with the help of the Mennonite Central Committee, the International Refugee Organization (q.v., IRO), and the Canadian Mennonite Board of Colonization. The full story of those who were sent back is not yet known. Most of them, however, were sent to northern and Asiatic Russia. Recently it has become easier for citizens of the Soviet Union to move about. Some family members from various settlements of the Ukraine scattered during the waves of exile, evacuation, and repatriation have found each other. Some have even visited their home communities in the Ukraine and reported the devastation caused by the scorched earth policy of World War II.

The following information indicates that since the beginning of 1956, a few Mennonites have returned to their home communities in the Ukraine. Marie Schellenberg from Siberia writes, "Since Jan. 13, 1956, we are free to travel" (Bote, Oct. 3, 1956, p. 7). In the same issue of Der Bote, D. and N. Vogt report that they were exiled to the Vologda Region in 1945 and that they returned to their own village of Schönhorst in the Chortitza settlement on April 20, 1956, where they were accepted in the Russian collective farm, although Vogt was 70 years old. They report further that the members of the collective farm were prosperous and that the children of the Vogts also plan to return. Mrs. Paul Neufeld reports that her daughter Marus lives in their home village of Nieder-Chortitza, Chortitza settlement, and that she and her daughter Hilda were also planning to return (Bote, Aug. 29, 1956, p. 7).

More Mennonites may find their way back to the Ukraine and even to their former homes, although a mass reoccupation of Mennonite villages is impossible since the land is all collectivized and the villages resettled. It is also possible that a few families, particularly where one spouse was Russian, remained in the Ukraine when the German army evacuated the Mennonite population in 1943. News has been received that in 1955 a congregation had been begun in the former Memrik colony, with regular services. In spite of this it is very doubtful that there will be a general large-scale return of Mennonite families to their former homes in the Ukraine. Many of the older generation have passed from the scene or do not have the possibility of returning, and for the younger generation the Ukraine is no longer "home."

The former Mennonite population of the Ukraine is today dispersed to many parts of the earth. It found its way to the prairie states and provinces of the United States and Canada in 1874-80 when some 18,000 migrated because of the principle of non-resistance. In 1923-30 some 25,000 left the Soviet Ukraine to find new homes in Canada and South America, and after World War II some 14,000 joined their brethren in Canada and in South America. The remaining former Mennonite population of the Ukraine is today found scattered in Northern

European Russia—Vologda Region (q.v.) and Arkhangelsk Region, and particularly in the northeast regions of Molotov, Tyumen, Sverdlovsk, and Chelyabinsk; also the Kazakh SSR in Soviet Central Asia (q.v.), Semipalatinsk, Karaganda, and Akmolinsk, and the areas of the older Mennonite settlements and regions of Omsk (q.v.), Tomsk (q.v.), Novosibirsk (q.v.), and Slavgorod (q.v.), but also in the far southern area of Tadzhikistan. Many were also sent to the various parts of Eastern Siberia. (See also Soviet Central Asia.)

The Ukraine was the cradle of the Mennonite settlements and culture in Russia. For 150 years the Mennonites had a unique opportunity to realize their vision and the contribution they could make in an environment which offered unusual opportunities for economic and cultural pioneering. Slavic and nomadic neighbors learned much through the advanced agricultural methods of the Mennonites. Many thousands of Russian young men and women were trained by working and living with the Mennonites in their homes and villages. The Evangelical movement resulting in the founding of the Evangelical Christians and Baptists (q.v.) was greatly influenced by the Mennonites of the Ukraine, which is illustrated by the fact that there is co-operation between the two at this time and that the Mennonites are being paid back in the form of being taken into the congregations and fellowship of these groups wherever they are located close to Baptist churches. C.K.

Clarence Manning, The Story of the Ukraine (New York, 1947); N. D. Polonska-Vasylenko, "The Settlement of the Southern Ukraine (1750-1775)," The Annals of the Ukrainian Academy of Arts and Sciences in the U.S. (New York, 1955); John A. Armstrong, Ukrainian Nationalism 1939-1945 (New York, 1955); B. Yakovlev, Concentration Camps in the USSR (Russian) (Münich, 1955); E. Glowinskyj, "Agriculture in the Ukraine"; O. Arkhymovych, "Grain Crops in the Ukraine," Ukrainian Review II (Munich, 1956); Shankowsky, "Nazi Occupation in Ukraine," Ukrainian Review II (London, 1955); W. C. Wiseley, "The German Settlement of the 'incorporated territory' of the Wartheland and Danzig-West Prussia, 1939-1945" (Ph.D. dissertation, London, 1955).

Mennonites: Franz Isaac, Die Molotschnaer Mennoniten (Halbstadt, 1908); Alexander Petzholdt, Reise im westlichen und südlichen europäischen Russland im Jahre 1855 (Leipzig, 1864); D. H. Epp, Johann Cornies (Rosthern, 1946); Jacob Quiring, Die Mundart von Chortitza in Süd-Russland (Munich, 1928); Adolf Ehrh, Das Mennonitentum in Russland (Berlin, 1932); Gerhard Töws, Schönfeld (Winnipeg, 1939); Friesen, Brüderschaft; D. H. Epp, Die Chortitza Mennoniten (Odessa, 1889); Gerhard Lohrenz, Sagradovka (Rosthern, 1947); H. Goerz, Memrik (Rosthern, 1954); H. Goerz, Die Molotschnaer Ansiedlung (Steinbach, 1950-51); C. Henry Smith, The Story of the Mennonites (Newton, 1957); idem, The Coming of the Russian Mennonites (Berne, 1927); Gustav Reimer and G. R. Gaeddert, Exiled by the Czar (Newton, 1956); D. G. Rempel, "The Mennonite Colonies in New Russia . . ." (unpubl. doctoral dissertation at Stanford Univ., 1933); P. Hildebrandt, Erste Auswanderung der Mennoniten aus dem Danziger Gebiet nach Südrussland (Halbstadt, 1888); A. Klaus, Unsere Kolonien (Odessa, 1887); Unruh, Hintergründe; Leonhard Froese, Das pädagogische Kultursystem der mennonitischen Siedlungsgruppe in Russland (Göttingen, 1949); George J. Eisenach, Pietism and the Russian Germans in the United States (Berne, 1948); D. Neufeld, Mennonitentum in der Ukraine Schicksalgeschichte Sagradowkas (Emden, 1922); Die Mennoniten-Gemeinden in Russland während der Kriege- und Revolutionsjahre 1914-1920 (Heilbronn, 1921); A. H. Unruh, Die Geschichte der Mennoniten-

Brüdergemeinde 1860-1954 (Winnipeg, 1954); K. Stumpp, Bericht über das Gebiet Chortitza . . . (Berlin, 1943); idem, Bericht über das Gebiet Kronau-Orloff . . . (Berlin, 1943); Der Bote (Rosthern); Mennonitische Rundschau (Winnipeg); Mennonite Life (North Newton); Mennonitisches Jahrbuch, ed. Heinrich Dirks (Gross-Tokmak, 1901-14); Cornelius Krahn, "Russian Baptists and Mennonites," Menn. Life XI (July 1956) 99.

Ukrainian Mennonite General Conference was held Oct. 5-8, 1926, in the town of Melitopol, Ukraine, Russia, with 84 representatives from the USSR (Ukrainian Soviet Republic), 64 of these from the Mennonite Church and 19 from the Mennonite Brethren and Alliance groups. The total membership of the churches represented was 18,356 in the Mennonite Church and 4,025 in other groups. From other parts of Soviet Russia 14 representatives came, who were given an advisory voice in the conference; of these, two came from the Volga-Trakt area, two from the Caucasus, two from the Crimea, three from Siberia, one from Neu-Samara, two from Orenburg, one from Ufa, and one from Turkestan. This conference was a successor to the General Conference of Mennonites (see Allgemeine Bundeskonferenz). The proceedings were conducted in the German language. The sessions were also attended by two representatives of the Ukrainian Soviet government, which had given permission for the meeting. The central business of the conference was establishing an organization for the Mennonite churches in the Ukraine. The organization was built on four levels: first, the autonomous individual congregations; second, the local district union; third, the All-Ukrainian Union; and fourth, the union in the framework of the entire Soviet Union. The projected constitution was accepted by a committee with small changes, to be presented at once for ratification. The first executive committee for the republic was chosen at once, consisting of 11 persons. The second point on the agenda was the Bible school. Not much time was devoted to this subject, since the conference was permitted to deal only with the principle of the question. The vote showed that it was the wish of the meeting to have a general Bible school for all the Mennonite branches, to be under the management of the conference.

The improvement of religious and moral conditions in the congregations was discussed, together with suggested means toward achieving this end. Work for the young people was the last matter discussed.

This conference holds an important place in the history of the Russian Mennonite churches in that it was the first conference in the framework of the Ukraine. Unfortunately no further meetings were permitted by the government. (ML IV.) D.H.E.

Ulcke Ricoltswiif, a Dutch Anabaptist martyr, drowned on Feb. 4, 1557, at Leeuwarden in Friesland, because "she had received rebaptism and harbored derogatory ideas concerning the sacred sacrament of the mass." Particulars are lacking. vdZ.

Inu. Arch. Amst. I, No. 746; J. Reitsma, Honderd jaren uit de Geschiedenis der Hervorming . . . in Friesland (Leeuwarden, 1876) 63.

Uliman, Wolfgang: see Uolimann, Wolfgang.

Ulm, a city (pop. 69,941) in Württemberg, Germany, located on the Danube, until 1803 a free city of the empire. Here the Reformation was introduced about 1524-26 by Konrad Sam, and continued by Bucer (q.v.), Oecolampadius (q.v.), Blaurer (q.v.), and Rabus (q.v.). During the first 20 years it was Zwinglian in character, but after a bitter struggle Lutheranism took the upper hand. In consequence of this unpleasant strife, serious, peaceful citizens turned away from the church of Luther and Zwingli and joined the Anabaptists. It may have been Simon Stumpf (q.v.) who transplanted Anabaptist ideas into Ulm, on which Hans Hut (q.v.) built in 1527 and Wilhelm Reublin (q.v.) in 1528. It is reported that Reublin was for a time the leader (Vorsteher) of the congregation. According to the report of the magistrate on Sept. 16, 1527, Hans Denk (q.v.), Ludwig Haetzer (q.v.), and B. Beckenknecht (see Beck, Hans) lived here for a while too. They probably came from Augsburg, where they had attended the Martyrs' Synod (q.v.) on Aug. 20, 1527. But the council saw to it that they soon left the city. Among the prominent converts were the councillors and master goldsmiths Hans Müller and Daniel Hochweher.

On Feb. 14, 1528, the severe imperial mandate (see Mandates) was read to the populace as a deterrent to the movement. From this time on many Anabaptists were called to give an account of themselves before the privy council; among them were Daniel Hochweher and his wife and sister, and also Claus Sporer on July 13. Sporer declared that he was not an Anabaptist (i.e., rebaptizer), for "his first baptism had not been anything; it had given nothing and taken nothing; therefore it was without value." He made a sharp distinction between those who held their wives and all things in common and rejected authority (the Münsterites) and the group in Ulm.

Expulsions from the city now were ordered, especially because Diepold von Stein, the captain of the Swabian League, earnestly admonished the Ulm commander, Philipp von Wenckheim, to pursue the Anabaptists with more rigor. Von Wenckheim replied that he had orders to act rigorously only in case of sedition. In Ulm they were trying to meet the situation first by indoctrination; if this was fruitless, they expelled the obstinate from the city; if they returned, they were put into the tower.

In the villages round about Ulm there were also many Anabaptists. Again and again they were summoned to answer to the religious authorities. In Böhningen they had free entry to the home of the pastor, Martin Karter, since "they liked to hear his sermons." The parson was said to have stated that if he were the ruler of the land he would not expel any Anabaptists.

A courageous, steadfast Anabaptist was Abraham Schneider, also called Brendlin. He defended himself with great ability. He said that if the children had a hidden faith, as was claimed, then they should also have a hidden baptism; an oath was permissible to a Christian in case it was not contrary to God, contrary to the love of one's neighbor, or contrary to the conscience of the person rendering the oath. It is thus evident that the Ulm Anabaptists were Swiss Brethren. Because they would not accept instruction they had to leave the city territory. Other leading Anabaptists were the physician Nicolas Lauer, Jörg Wernlin (q.v.), and Hans Glaser.

Even if the Ulm congregation never attained the importance of the Augsburg congregation, Ulm was nevertheless an important point on the route of Anabaptist leaders who led to Moravia the converts they had won in Switzerland or along the Rhine. The Anabaptists lodged in the inn "To the Sun" near the bridge over the Danube until the boatmen of Ulm took them further on the Danube. The council decided that it would have to comply with the order of Duke Ernest not to aid the Anabaptists in this way any longer. Thereupon in 1587 the two Anabaptist leaders, Jörg Gutter and Christoph Hirzel, the latter a native of Zürich, were arrested in Ulm. By threats of the rack, the authorities vainly tried to force admissions about their brethren. But the severer measures were not applied; instead, the men were expelled from Ulm and its territory. Although the council of Ulm was relatively lenient in its treatment of the Anabaptists, never for instance confiscating their property, nevertheless under the decisive action of the church superintendent Ludwig Rabus (q.v.; 1556-92) the Anabaptist movement in Ulm died out.

Fritz Friedrich thinks it must be assumed that many of those with Anabaptist inclinations united with the Schwenckfelders (q.v.) in order to avoid persecution, for the latter group was tolerated for a long time in Ulm; and also that Helene Streicher (q.v.), the widow of a merchant, and her daughter Agathe, who later became Schwenckfelders, must originally have been Anabaptists. The latter was a widely known physician; the bishops of Mainz and even Maximilian demanded her services. Friedrich also thinks that in all probability Schwenckfeld (q.v.) spent the last period of his life in the Streicher home on the square in Ulm on Agathe's invitation; he died there on Dec. 10, 1561, and was secretly buried in the basement. After 1589 nothing more is heard of Anabaptists in Ulm. W.W.

TA Württemberg; H. Dietrich, D. Konrad Dietrich und sein Briefwechsel (Ulm, 1938) 42; Gottlob Egelhaar, "Geschichte der Reichsstadt Ulm," in Beschreibung des Oberamts Ulm II (Ulm, 1897) 32 ff.; Fritz Friedrich, "Ulmische Kirchengesch. vom Interim bis zum 30-jährigen Krieg 1548-1612," in Blätter für Württemb. Kirchengesch., n.s. I (1933) No. 3-4; Fr. Keidel, "Ulmische Religionsakten 1531-1552," in Württemberg. Vierteljahreshefte (1896) 255; K. Th. Keim, Ref.-Gesch. der Reichsstadt Ulm (1851); Fr. Thudichum, Die Deutsche Reformation II (Leipzig, 1909); ML IV.

Ulrich, Duke of Württemberg (1487-1550), was badly reared, became independent too soon, was unhappily married to Sabine of Bavaria, compensated himself by living in splendor, fell into debt that required increased taxes, against which Poor Conrad in the Remstal revolted, and was compelled to accept the terms of the very humiliating treaty of Tübingen. The murder of Hans von Hutten in the forest, the flight of his wife, the violence with which he attached the imperial city of Reutlingen to Württemberg, stirred up the nobility, the dukes of Bavaria, and the Swabian League against him. In 1519 he was driven from his domain by the Swabian League, who sold it to Charles V, who in turn gave it to his brother Ferdinand. While in Switzerland Ulrich was won to the Reformation by Hartnut von Kronberg and Oecolampadius.

After several attempts to regain his lands, completely impoverished, Ulrich fled to Philip of Hesse, who in the victory of Lauffen on May 13, 1534, restored to him his hereditary lands. But in the treaty of Kaaden, Ulrich had to acknowledge Austria's sovereignty. In gratitude to God Ulrich introduced the Reformation, and to that end called Erhard Schnepf for the region below the Staig, and Ambrose Blarer (q.v.) for the region above the Staig.

The treaty of Kaaden compelled the duke to adopt measures against the Anabaptists. On June 18, 1535, he issued the first Anabaptist decree concerning persons who recanted, and on May 22 a mandate ordering the arrest of native Anabaptists as well as those who came in from the outside. In 1536 he demanded an official opinion of the Tübingen jurists and theologians. The jurists replied that according to canonical law death was the penalty for rebaptism; nevertheless the duke had the right to exercise lenience. The theologians, recognizing the unfeigned simplicity, the zeal, the good appearance of the life of the Anabaptists in contrast to the wild, bold, and wicked life of the populace, earnestly opposed the death penalty and all corporal punishment, and recommended for the leaders and dangerous persons a term in the tower, and after release the wearing of a wooden placard depicting a wolf, a snake, or some other obnoxious beast, exclusion from all meetings, inns, weddings, and as a final punishment, expulsion from the country. Thereupon the duke issued a new regulation requiring the arrest of all Anabaptists and a close cross-examination, and defining the treatment of those who were pardoned. On the whole the Anabaptists were treated with lenience under Ulrich.

Following his defeat in the Smalkaldic War, Ulrich was compelled to humiliate himself before the emperor, pay a severe indemnity, permit his fortress Asperg, Schorndorf, and Kirchheim to be occupied by Spanish troops, and to submit to the Interim, while Ferdinand threatened him with a court action on a charge of disloyalty as a subject; his death circumvented this misfortune. His difficulties and his return to Protestantism moderated the character of the prince and made him popular. G.Bos.

H. Hermelink, Gesch. der Evangelischen Kirche in Württemberg bis zur Gegenwart (Tübingen, 1949) 60 ff.; L. F. Heyd, Ulrich, Herzog zu Württemberg I-III (Tübingen, 1841-44); B. Kugler, Ulrich, Herzog zu Württemberg (Stuttgart, 1865); D. I. Rauscher, Württembergische Ref.-Gesch. (Stuttgart, 1934) III f.; Ch. F. von Stälin, Württembergische Geschichte IV (Stuttgart, 1873); ML IV.

Ulrich II, Count of East Friesland 1628-47, brother of Rudolf Christian (q.v.), a weak ruler of vacillating character. This trait was evident in his treatment of the Mennonites. He did not renew the letter of protection given by his brother, but continued to collect the protection fee. On Aug. 30, 1631, he issued a new regulation which released the Mennonites from the oath, permitting in its stead the Mennisten. Eid, the formula of which included a statement that untruthfulness would carry the same penalty as perjury.

Quite suddenly the count issued an edict on March 10, 1641, which on the basis of complaints raised against the Mennonites (though they were not specifically mentioned), forbade their holding private meetings in which unauthorized persons preached. The edict was enforced. On Feb. 1, 1644, a religious meeting of the Mennonites in Oldeborg was broken up and Johann Siewerds, the preacher, was imprisoned. It was obviously a matter of extorting money from the Mennonites in order to mend Ulrich's financial status, for a note signed by the count on Aug. 23, 1644, shows that the Mennonites gave him 6,000 Reichstaler in exchange for a certain degree of security. This event marked a change in the count's attitude.

Ulrich showed personal favor to Uco Walles (q.v.), granting him and his party a letter of protection made out by him personally on Nov. 26, 1645. About two years later the other Mennonites also received the assurance that the count would henceforth treat them with favor, in return for their making a four-year prepayment of their protection fee of 880 talers, whereas the Ukowallists paid 120 talers.

NEFF.

P. Müller, Die Mennoniten in Ostfriesland vom 16. bis zum 18. Jahrhundert (Emden and Borkum, 1887) 60, note 35; ML IV.

Ulrich, an Anabaptist martyr executed at Bern, Switzerland, in late 1537 or early 1538. He was a farmer of Rüksau in the canton of Bern. Particulars are lacking. Wolkan mentions an Anabaptist elder Ulrich who about 1535 baptized at Urban in Moravia. This may have been the same person. (Mart. Mir. E 1129; Wolkan, Lieder, 32.) vdZ.

Ulrich Foundation, Inc., Roanoke, Ill., was incorporated in 1949 as a nonprofit corporation for religious, charitable, and educational work, and scientific and agricultural service and research. In 1958 its officers were R. M. Ulrich, president; Verda Ulrich, vice-president; and Harold A. Zehr, executive secretary. Its planning committee consisted of R. M. Ulrich, Harold A. Zehr, John D. Hartzler, N. D. Kennell, Ivan R. Bachman, and John P. Ulrich. The major activity of the Foundation is the operation of a program near Aibonito, Puerto Rico, which included experimentation in dairying, poultry production, artificial breeding, horticulture, and the operation of a dental service. The program supplements the work of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (q.v.) in the area. The local director was Lawrence Greaser. The organ of the Foundation is The Foundation Echo. H.A.Z.

Ulrurum, a small village in the northeast of the Dutch province of Groningen, formerly the seat of a Mennonite congregation existing already in the 16th century and later belonging to the Groningen, Old Flemish branch. Concerning its history there is little information. At the Old Flemish conference meetings it was represented only in the 18th century. In 1686 and again in 1717 Ulrurum was severely struck by a flood of the North Sea; on Nov. 12, 1686, the church lost a member by drowning, and some cattle; much more severe were the losses on Christmas Day of 1717; besides large numbers of cattle (275 cows, 72 horses, 120 sheep, owned by Mennonites), the small congregation of Ulrum lost two men, nine women, and seventeen children. This was the heaviest flood known in history to strike the province of Groningen; it killed no fewer than 2300 persons. According to a circular of the Groningen Old Flemish conference (Sociëteit), which started a relief action in behalf of the Mennonite victims of the flood, Ulrum was the worst hit congregation.

The baptized membership of Ulrum, numbering 80 in 1710, rapidly decreased in the 18th century to 45 in 1733, 34 in 1754, and only 8 in 1767, but in the following years there was a considerable increase; in 1792 Ulrum and Houwerzijl (q.v.), with which Ulrum united in 1773, together numbered about 60 members. Ulrum was always served by lay preachers chosen from the congregation. From 1783 the pulpit was vacant; an attempt made in 1785 to merge with the Flemish congregation of neighboring den Hoorn failed. In 1791 both Ulrum and Houwerzijl joined the Mennonite conference of Friesland, but this lasted only two years, for in 1793 both were dissolved. Some of the remaining (about 15) members merged with the Den Hoorn (q.v.) congregation, but most of them joined the Reformed Church. The meetinghouse was sold. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 2287; Blaupot t. C., Groningen I, 127, 140, 142, 202; Naamlijst 1792, 59; 1793, 58; old Archives of the congregation of Groningen, No. 146; DJ 1840, 43; DB 1879, 6; 1906, 46.

Ulus, a pagan tribe in Sumatra (q.v.), among whom the Dutch Mennonite missionaries worked. N. D. Schuurmans (q.v.) published a thorough report about them in Mennonitische Blätter (1891, supplement to No. 11).

Umbitter was a name applied to a deacon (q.v.) by the Mennonites of Prussia when he performed special duties in regard to betrothals. Only few references can be found. Mannhardt states (p. 112) that it was the duty of the Umbitter or the minister to go and ask the parents of a girl whether she would be willing to marry a certain young man. He states that on May 5, 1765, it was reported at the brotherhood meeting that the honored tradition that two Umbitters take the marriage proposal to the parents of the girl was falling into disrepute and that some young men were beginning to make their own proposals, even without the knowledge of the parents. It is likely that the Umbitter was also a handy man in taking notices and invitations from home to home or announcing in writing the approaching marriages and funerals. This tradition, no doubt, was transplanted from Holland to Prussia and was perpetuated in Russia and among the Prussian Mennonites of America. Most traces of this practice disappeared during the 19th century. No detailed study of the duties and the practices in connection with the Umbitter has been made. The counterpart of the Umbitter in the Amish congregations was the Stecklieman. C.K.

H. G. Mannhardt, Die Danziger Mennonitengemeinde (Danzig, 1919) 112-13.

Ummel (in America also Umble), a Mennonite family, whose members originally lived in the Emmental (q.v.) area of the Swiss canton of Bern. In 1569 a Barbly (Ummel) Rüsser was examined, and afterwards tortured because of her Anabaptist views. Her daughter Anni Ummel was also tried. On July 23 both women, after recanting, had to confess publicly in the church of Wichtrach, but in 1574 Barbly Ummel was again in prison at Bern because of Anabaptism and again promised henceforth to be a loyal member of the Reformed Church. In the 17th century some of the Ummel family moved to the Bernese Jura; among its descendants was David Ummel (q.v.), a prominent elder at La Chaux de Fonds. Other Ummels fled to the Palatinate (q.v.) in 1670-71, among whom was Christian Ummel aged 39, with his wife and five children. About the same time or shortly after some Ummels emigrated to Alsace (q.v.).

Probably the Ummels were not very numerous in the Palatinate. In Alsace they were found in the early 18th century in the Montbéliard congregation. The first Ummel who emigrated to America was Christian Ummel, an Amishman, who arrived at Philadelphia Oct. 5, 1767, and settled in Lancaster County, Pa. Among the American Umbles are John Umble (b. 1881) and his son Roy Umble, professors at Goshen College.

The family tradition that the Ummels stem from Ireland is not probable. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1248; S. Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, n.d.) 201 f., 203, 478; Müller, Berner Täufer, 201; D. L. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottsdale, 1953) 38, 48, 68, 118, 191, 197; C. Henry Smith, Mennonite Immigration to Pennsylvania (Norristown, 1929) 239, note 75.

Ummel, David (1797-1896), elder of the Chaux d'Abel (q.v.) Mennonite congregation in the Bernese Jura, Switzerland. The patriarch David Ummel was born at Chaux d'Abel on Sept. 14, 1797. He originally belonged to the Amish wing, and was ordained as minister and elder by that group. He was zealously concerned for union between the Amish and the Mennonites in his locality. Though he was zealous "for the law of the fathers," he preached that salvation in Christ is nothing but free grace even for a virtuous Mennonite. He was seriously concerned for the education of the young people, and at considerable sacrifice founded a German school in his village, which later received state recognition. At the age of 90 he made a six-week tour of the Swiss congregations. He died in 1896 at the advanced age of 98 years. S.G.

Samuel Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931) 464, with photograph, and 478; Menn. Bl., 1871, 2; 1872, 21-68; 1878, 75; ML IV.

Umstatt, Hans Peter, moved from Crefeld, Germany, to Germantown, Pa., in 1685. His daughter Eva married the immigrant Hendrick (Heinrich) Pannabecker (q.v.). His son Johannes (John) Umstatt moved in 1702 or shortly after to Perkiomen Township along the Skippack (q.v.). C. Henry Smith assumes that the Umstats were Mennonites, and this is probable since later descendants called Umstead were to be found in the Mennonite church in Montgomery County, Pa. vdZ.

C. Henry Smith, The Menn. Immigration to Pennsylvania (Norristown, 1929) 94, 106, 114, 121, 139 note 23; MQR VII (1933) 234 f.

Unger, a Mennonite family found in West Prussia, Germany, from the 17th century until 1945, in the congregations of Thiensdorf, Orloffersfelde (Tiegenhof), Tragheimerweide, Danzig-Neugarten. In 1793 Peter Unger was the first member of this family to emigrate to Russia, settling at Chortitza; after 1800 a number of other Ungers followed. (Reimer, Familiennamen, 119; Unruh, Hintergründe, 211 et passim.)
vbZ.

Unger, Abraham (1820-80), elder of the Einlage (q.v.) Mennonite congregation, in the Chortitza settlement, Ukraine, in the forefront of the great movement among the Russian Mennonites which led to the formation of the Mennonite Brethren. On March 4, 1862, he was baptized by immersion. On March 11 others followed his example; hence March 11, 1862, is considered the date of the founding of the Einlage Mennonite Brethren Church. Unger was chosen as minister of the congregation. In 1859-60 he corresponded with J. G. Oncken (q.v.), the Baptist preacher in Hamburg, and leaned strongly toward Baptist ideas. In 1868 he was chosen elder at a members' meeting conducted by Benzien (q.v.), a Baptist preacher; he was ordained Oct. 18, 1869, by Oncken, who made the trip to Russia for the purpose at Unger's request. Under Unger's influence the Mennonite Brethren made baptism by immersion obligatory for their members, refusing to admit anyone to communion who had not thus been baptized. The entire period of his work was a stormy one. The opposing parties were very rigid toward each other. It was impossible to effect a union among the ministers. In the middle 1860's, when it seemed that the "overly-happy" (Ueberfröhlichen) would gain the upper hand, they excommunicated him, but were unable to eliminate his influence. He succeeded in averting the danger threatening the brotherhood on the part of this group. In 1876 he resigned his position as elder, but was to the end of his life, in 1880, one of the most influential men of the brotherhood.
A.Br.

Union Chapel, located in the northern part of the Middle River District of Augusta County, Va., was built by United Brethren and Mennonites (MC) in the 1870's. Mennonite ministers of the Southern and Middle Districts of the Virginia Conference held services here once a month for many years. No services have been held here by the Mennonites since 1948.
H.A.B.

Union County (Pa.) Amish congregation, founded in the Buffalo Valley west of Lewisburg in 1837 by Samuel Lantz and six of his sons-in-law, of Leacock Twp., Lancaster Co., Pa. Several settlers with Amish names had acquired land there fifteen to twenty years earlier. Joining the Lantz family were Hannes and Jacob Beiler, brothers, Solomon Yoder, bishop, and John and Jacob Riehl of Mifflin County, Pa., and several other families from Lancaster and Mifflin counties and from Maryland. Two sons-in-law of Samuel Lantz, Elias Riehl, nephew of Solomon Yoder, and Christian Stoltzfus, were ordained bishop and deacon respectively and worked together harmoniously for many years. During the late 1870's when trouble developed between the bishop's and the deacon's sons, a ministers' committee from Mifflin County silenced the bishop and excommunicated the only two families who supported him. The bishop then united with the Juniata Mennonite congregation. After the death of Christian Stoltzfus in 1883 his sons and daughters and their families moved to Lyon County, Kan., and Lancaster County, Pa. A few of the young people organized a Sunday school but the congregation had suffered a deathblow. The few remaining members who did not move away united with other denominations. Three cemeteries remain: Stoltzfus near Kelley Point, Lantz several miles south, and Beiler at the southern limits of the settlement. Within recent years several reunions of the descendants of the early settlers have aroused interest in caring for the cemeteries. Mennonite families from the Lancaster Mennonite Conference began moving into the valley and in 1948 organized the Buffalo congregation. The membership in 1956 was 85, with Jacob J. Brubaker and John H. Erb as ministers. J.S.U.

John Umble, "The Amish Mennonites of Union County, Pennsylvania," MQR VII (July 1933) 162-90.

Union Gospel Printing Company, Cleveland, Ohio (now Union Gospel Press, 2000 Broad Park Road), was established in 1903 by W. B. Musselman, a minister in the Pennsylvania Conference of the M.B.C. Church, who bought the printing plant of the Light and Hope Publishing Co. (q.v.) in Cleveland. It has published the Gospel Herald for many years, and 1909-16 was the officially authorized publisher of the Gospel Banner, the organ of the M.B.C. Church.
H.S.B.

Union Mennonite Church, former name of the White Cloud (Mich.) Mennonite Church (MC) (q.v.).

Union Mennonite Church (MC), located in Orange County, Va., now extinct. In the 1910's two Shenandoah Valley Mennonite families, Charles Good and John Good, moved east of the Blue Ridge, locating 5 miles east of Gordonsville, in Orange County. There was a union or community church near by which Mennonite ministers of the Middle District of the Virginia Conference were permitted to use when they held monthly services for these families. Several native families united with the church. Later Mennonites withdrew from the community and services were discontinued about 1930. H.A.B.

Union Township Mennonite Church: see Logan County, Ohio.

Unitarianism. The charge of Unitarianism laid at the door of early Anabaptism by a number of writers is discussed by Robert Friedmann in the article Anti-Trinitarianism (q.v.), where the later contacts between Hutterites and Dutch Mennonites with the Socinians (q.v.), are also discussed. The outstanding cases charged with Unitarianism were Ludwig Haetzer (q.v.), Hans Denk (q.v.), and Adam Pastor (q.v.), although certain writers have attempted to show a wider spread. The latest study on Haetzer (Goeters, 1957) proves that he was not a regular Anabaptist but only a fringe figure in the movement, but that he was a Unitarian in his Christology. The latest study on Hans Denk (Kiwiet, 1957) proves that Denk was not a Unitarian even though Weis and Wilbur, the Unitarian historians, claim him as a forerunner of modern Unitarianism (Wilbur with some limitations). Adam Pastor was, however, an open Unitarian, and as such was excommunicated at the elders' conference at Goch in 1547, a few short years after his ordination as elder by Menno, a sufficient proof that the Anabaptist movement in Holland and Northwest Germany was solidly Trinitarian. Dosker's contention, "There is no question whatever but from the very beginning the Anabaptists had very cloudy ideas concerning the trinity. Menno's view looks strangely like Modalism. And in this connection, it is very significant that Socinianism flourished largely in states like Poland, where the Anabaptists had settled down in force; and also that this same Socinianism, once it was fully established and defined, had a disastrous effect on the later development of the Dutch Anabaptists," is extreme and in error. That the largely untrained and simply Biblicistic early Anabaptists did not formulate precise and refined theological views on the trinity is not to be interpreted as anti-Trinitarianism. The views of the leading Anabaptist writers such as Pilgram Marpeck (q.v.), Peter Riedemann (q.v.), Menno Simons (q.v.), and Dirk Philips (q.v.) are clearly Trinitarian.

Most of the discussions of the question of Trinitarianism and anti-Trinitarianism have to do with the question of the relation of Christ the Son to God the Father. The matter of the personality of the Holy Spirit (q.v.) is seldom discussed. Here again Dosker's assertions are extreme. He quotes (158) Schijn (giving an incorrect location), "As to the Holy Ghost, He is the power, wisdom, breath of God, but His personality is left in doubt." But again the four major writers mentioned above are completely clear on the personality and deity of the Holy Spirit. Dosker's attempt to taint the whole early Anabaptist movement with at least uncertainty on Trinitarianism if not outright anti-Trinitarianism (q.v.) does not stand the test of objective scholarship.

In the 19th century Modernism captured much of Dutch Mennonitism with the result that for some decades in the latter part of the 19th century and on into the early 20th century most Dutch Mennonite ministers were Unitarian in theology. But by mid-century this was largely overcome. H.S.B.

H. E. Dosker, The Dutch Anabaptists (Philadelphia, 1921); Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis III; Jan J. Kiwiet, "The Life of Hans Denk," MQR XXXI (1957) 227-59; idem, "The Theology of Hans Denk," MQR XXXII (1958) 3-27; J. F. Goeters, Ludwig Hätzler (ca. 1500 bis 1529), Spiritualist und Antitrinitarier, eine Randfigur der frühen Täuferbewegung (Gütersloh, 1957); E. M. Wilbur, A History of Unitarianism: Socinianism and its Antecedents (Cambridge, 1946); F. L. Weis, The Life and Teachings of Ludwig Hetzer (n.p., n.d.-1939); idem, The Life, Teachings and Works of Johannes Denck, 1495-1527 (n.p., n.d.-1925).

United Bethel Conservative Mennonite Church, located near Plain City, in Madison Co., Ohio, a member of the Conservative (Amish) Mennonite Conference, was started by a few Amish families who met for Sunday school, beginning in 1938. Andrew Farmwald was ordained as minister, and Harry Stutzman, of Holmes County, Ohio, was given bishop oversight of the church. Enos Yoder was ordained to the ministry on Jan. 26, 1948, and was still the minister in charge in 1957. The meeting-house, built in 1948, is a frame structure seating 300 persons. In 1957 the membership was 164, with Ray F. Miller as bishop in charge. A.D.F.

United Mennonite Bible School, St. Catharines, Ont., of the Canadian Mennonite Conference (GCM), was founded in 1950 and conducted a five-month term each year. In 1955-56, the last year of operation, the enrollment was 17; John W. Neufeld was principal. M.G.

United Mennonite Educational Institute (GCM), Route 3, Wheatley, Ont., was established in 1944. The 1957-58 enrollment was 86, and its faculty numbered four, with Peter C. Sawatzky as principal. Eleven men were on its board of directors, whose chairman was Ewald Wiebe Staples. The institution has two buildings, a classroom building and an auditorium. With a term of 8½ months the school offers the usual academic subjects but also attempts "to teach and cultivate . . . the fundamentals in Church and Mennonite History and also the German language" for the purpose of "retaining and cultivating" the religious life of the Mennonite congregations of Ontario. M.G.

United Mennonite Home for the Aged (GCM), Vineland, Ont., was founded Sept. 1, 1955, and serves the United Mennonite churches (GCM) of the Niagara, St. Catharines, Vineland, Waterloo-Kitchener, and Toronto areas. It is financed by gifts and charity collections. A $12,000 grant was received from the Ontario government. Its controlling board is chosen by the constituent churches. In 1958 the home had 47 guests, with John P. Penner as superintendent. J.P.P.E.

United Missionary Church, the new name chosen on Nov. 3, 1947, by the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church (q.v.). At this same time the Pennsylvania Conference withdrew from the main body continuing the former name for itself. Before this withdrawal the church had a total membership of 13,313. Of this number, 4,136 withdrew, leaving 9,177, distributed in seven district conferences as follows: Ontario 2,293, Indiana 2,077, Michigan 2,003, Ohio 1,073, Nebraska 788, Canadian Northwest 513, and Washington 430. In 1955 the total membership of the group was 10,233, in 188 organized congregations and 18 additional "appointments," with 213 ordained ministers. The total value of church property was $5,072,000, and annual per capita giving was $142.07. For the history of the group before 1947 see Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church.

The government of the United Missionary

Church functions on three levels, namely, the general conference which meets annually representing the entire denomination, the annual conference which represents a limited area, and the local conference which represents only one congregation. The local conference carries on the work of the local congregation by which it is constituted, and makes recommendations to the annual conference. Its presiding officer is the District Superintendent. The membership of the Annual Conference is made up of "all ordained ministers in good standing, and one lay delegate from each field or local congregation. Probationers who have been assigned work, either by the Annual Conference or by the District Superintendent, are also members of this body. This body appoints pastors, devises means and methods of promoting the general welfare of the church within given areas, and is responsible to the General Conference. The members of the General Conference are the District Superintendents, Editor, Agent of the Bethel Publishing Company, one delegate from every three hundred members and an additional one in case the fraction is two hundred or more." This conference makes rules relative to changes in discipline, procedure of organizations directly responsible to it, and delegates authority to proper personnel, viz., the editor, the agent of the Bethel Publishing Company, and other special representatives. At the general conference session held in Kitchener, Ont., in 1955 certain changes were made in the government and program of the church. The term of members which had been four years was shortened to three years, and provisions were made for the election of a General Superintendent with a term of three years. Kenneth Geiger was elected as the first incumbent of this office.

The headquarters office of the church is at Elkhart, Ind. In Elkhart is also the Bethel Publishing Co. (q.v.), which has been the denominational publishing agency since 1920. The Gospel Banner (q.v.) is the denominational organ.

The Ministry. The term of appointment to a pastorate is one year and this may be extended each year by the stationing committee composed of the delegates and the district superintendent. With the election of a general superintendent it is expected that he too will be a member of the stationing group.

Sunday Schools. "Sunday Schools were not general among Mennonites in the days of the organization of the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church, but began early to be looked upon as an important factor in advancing the Lord's work" (Huffman, 150). Now they are a definite part of the whole church organization.

Camp Meetings. "One of the earliest innovations on Mennonite practice was the institution of the camp meeting" (Huffman, 148). The first one was held in Fetter's Grove, Elkhart Co., Ind., beginning July 30, 1880. These meetings have become permanent fixtures in the denomination, at least one a year being held by each conference.

Youth Work. For a number of years little was done in this area but in the last two decades this aspect of the work has been developed at a rapid pace. The orders from the general conference are now:

"Since the future of the church depends upon the conversion of the rising generation and the enlisting and establishing of these young people in the work of the Lord and the service of the church, young people's work shall be promoted in every church and wherever practicable the work shall be organized. Each conference shall draw up its own plan of organization and give proper supervision to the work" (Discipline 1954). Every conference has a youth director or similar officer. The youth work is not as yet integrated with the general conference program.

Foreign Missions. The earliest missionary from the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church was Eusebius Hershey, who in 1880 heard the call to foreign service and gave up his life in Liberia, East Africa. Others have heard the call and the fields of China, Africa, India, French Indo-China, Turkey, Palestine, and South America have seen United Missionary Church workers. The United Missionary Society (q.v.), organized in 1920 for the purpose of integrating the work of the whole church in the missionary effort, became an official part of the general conference program. Also the Nigeria and India conferences have been given full status in the general conference setup, and will be represented at the next general conference sessions. The missionary effort has grown until now the church has some 99 missionaries working either under its own or other boards. It supports 17 mission stations, operates 7 day schools, 5 Bible schools, and one teacher training school, 12 medical dispensaries, and one 60-bed hospital. The foreign work sponsors 71 church organizations, supervises 90 national workers, and publishes a paper, The Missionary Banner.

Publishing. The United Missionary Church publishes as its official organ the Gospel Banner. This is a weekly paper with a departmentalized setup. The editor is elected by the general conference for a term of three years. Besides the Gospel Banner the church publishes the Bethel series of Sunday-school literature and a missionary paper, the Missionary Banner. The recent general conference created a board of publications, giving it power to enlarge this aspect of the work by installing printing equipment in the headquarters building which houses the Bethel Publishing Company.

Education. The U.M.C. general conference of 1882 entertained a resolution presented by the Ontario group. It read as follows: "We recommend to the General Conference that there be a course of reading adopted for the ministry" (Huffman, 214). From this meager beginning the church has followed the challenge through various Bible school, correspondence school, and evening class efforts, until today there are three established schools in the seven conferences. The Canadian Northwest Conference operates Mountain View Bible School in Didsbury, Alberta. At Kitchener, Ont., the Ontario Conference has Emanuel Bible College; and the Indiana, Michigan, Nebraska, and Ohio conferences together support Bethel College in Mishawaka, Ind., as a four-year coeducational, liberal arts college.

Faith and Practice. The U.M.C. has a definite, evangelical theology of Arminian and Wesleyan character which is officially set forth in Doctrines and Discipline of the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church (1951). In addition to the standard evangelical doctrines it teaches entire sanctification as a second work of grace after justification and regeneration, but also growth in grace and the possibility of sin and restoration after justification. As to ordinances, baptism is by immersion only; open communion is practiced, also washing of the saints' feet. Nonresistance, nonconformity in dress, and the laying aside of needless indulgences are also a part of the teaching. The premillennial position in eschatology is held. In general the church has been much influenced by the Wesleyan type of church polity, doctrinal emphasis, and piety. It belongs to the National Association of Evangelicals. C.A.N.

J. A. Huffman, History of the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church (New Carlisle, Ohio, 1920); Doctrine and Discipline of the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church (Elkhart, 1951); The Test of Time, 75th Anniversary of the Indiana Conference (Elkhart, 1953); Gospel Banner containing various reports from year to year; E. R. Storms, History of the United Missionary Church (Elkhart, 1958).

United Missionary Society, an organization effected in 1921 by action of the General Conference of 1920. It is composed of representatives of all the annual conferences of the United Missionary Church of the United States and Canada. J. A. Huffman was the first president of the United Missionary Society. The foreign mission work of the church dates back to 1890. It has grown rapidly under the direction of the United Missionary Society. In 1955 there were missions in Africa, India, the Near East, Japan, South America, and Mexico, with about 100 missionaries under this Society. By 1959 the annual budget had reached over $300,000. In 1940 the women's Auxiliary Society of the organization was founded, with organizations in all the annual conferences of the United Missionary Church, and with local organizations in many of the churches, which promote various projects, including hospitals, and maintain a budget of above $50,000. The United Missionary Society is definitely committed to evangelization. It seeks to carry on its work through trained native converts and is developing indigenous churches. The headquarters are at Elkhart, Ind.

J.A.Hu.

United Orphanage and Mission was organized in 1901, for the purpose of promoting and supporting the orphanage work which had been begun among the Armenians in Turkey in 1898 by Rose Lambert of Indiana and Anna Gerber of Ohio. By 1901 scores of Armenian orphans were being supported by friends from America and Europe. In 1911 there were two orphanage institutions, one for boys at Everek and one for girls at Hadjin, Turkey, with 306 orphans.

During World War I the orphanage buildings were burned by the Moslem Turks, and the Armenians scattered, but the successors of the mission continued until 1938 to minister to the Armenian remnant which migrated to Syria. What remains of this good work is now in the charge of the Spiritual Brotherhood, an indigenous Armenian organization whose head is Abraham Sefarian, with headquarters in Aleppo, Syria, and Beirut, Lebanon, but with groups scattered into various countries, including Africa, Cyprus, the United States, and South America. This movement was really interdenominational, but the board members as well as the missionaries were chiefly of the United Missionary Church from the United States and Canada. In 1932 the United Orphanage was disbanded, and the work was transferred to the United Missionary Society (q.v.). J.A.Hu.

United States of America—General Groups. With a total of c152,000 baptized members in all groups, the Mennonites of the United States in 1957 constituted by far the largest national body of Mennonites in the world, the next largest being Canada with 51,000, followed by the Netherlands with 39,000. Of the twelve distinct bodies in the United States (plus several fragmented groups totaling less than 100 members), four are major: the Mennonite Church (MC) with 71,000 (this was the sole body in America until 1812 except for a small group of Amish); the General Conference Mennonite Church with 35,400 (org. in 1860, one section having started by a schism from the MC group in 1847); the Old Order Amish Mennonites with 17,000 (unorganized, but separated from the total Amish Mennonite group in c1855-80); and the Mennonite Brethren with 11,600 (est. in Russia by schism in 1860, est. in the United States by immigration 1874-76). Six of the remaining 8 smaller bodies range in size from 4,300 to 1,600; these are (1) the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren with 1,600 (est. in Russia by schism in 1869, immigrated to Kansas in 1874), and five others, all established in the United States by schism, three from the Mennonite Church (MC)—(2) the Church of God in Christ Mennonite (1859) with 4,300, (3) the Evangelical Mennonites (1864) with 2,300, (4) the Old Order or Wisler Mennonites (1871-93) with 4,000—(5) the Beachy Amish by schism from the Old Order Amish (1927 ff.) with 2,400, and (6) the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren by schism from the G.C.M. group in 1889 with 1,600. The two remaining groups, both very small in number and declining in size, originated by schism from the Mennonite Church (MC) in Lancaster County, Pa., i.e., the Reformed Mennonites (1812) with 600, and the Stauffer Mennonites (1845) with 360. Beyond the 12 organized bodies are a number of scattered unaffiliated congregations, most of which are in close relationship with other organized groups, and which for statistical purposes are counted with them. Since the Mennonite Brethren in Christ have changed their name (1947), and wish not to be considered Mennonites, although they had a Mennonite origin (1875 schism from MC), they are omitted from this discussion.

Immigration. The Mennonites of the United States, all of course deriving from Europe by immigration at various times, represent basically two ethnic-culture groups, the Swiss-South German and the Prusso-Russian (largely direct from Russia). The former constitute roughly two thirds, the latter one third, of the total immigrant number. The Swiss-South Germans constitute the entire membership of the Mennonite (MC) and Amish bodies and all branches formed from them (except the CGC group), and about one half of the G.C.M. group.

The Prusso-Russians constitute the entire membership of the M.B., K.M.B., and E.M.B. groups, almost all of the C.G.C. group, and about one half of the G.C.M. group. Geographically, all the Mennonites living east of the prairie states except Minnesota are of Swiss-South German stock, while the Mennonites of the prairie states (North and South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma, and Minnesota) are 85 per cent Prusso-Russian, and those in the Mountain and Pacific states are about 60 per cent Prusso-Russian.

Finally it should be noted that of the Swiss-South German group, less than half (c50,000) represent descendants of the 18th-century immigrants from Switzerland and the Palatinate, while the remaining half represent descendants of the 19th-century (first half) largely Amish immigrants from Switzerland, Alsace-Lorraine, Palatinate, Bavaria, and Hesse, plus a substantial group of Swiss background who came in 1874-75 from Volhynia (western Russia) and Galicia (Austria). The Prusso-Russian immigrants practically all came in 1874-80; a very small late arrival group came in 1930 from eastern Russia via Manchuria. The G.C.M. Church is the only group composed of mixed ethnic strains from all European backgrounds and immigration periods.

A very small Lower Rhine element (of Dutch type and connection) constituted the first Mennonite immigration to America in 1683-1702; they have been assimilated completely into the M.C. and G.C.M. Swiss-German groups in the Franconia area.

Although comprehensive immigration statistics were not kept and can be only roughly reconstituted from the available records, the following table of the successive waves of Mennonite immigration to America is approximately correct.

1. Lower Rhine to Germantown 1683-1702	200
2. Swiss and Palatine Mennonites to Eastern Penna. 1707-56	4,000
3. Swiss and Palatine Amish to Eastern Penna. 1738-56	200
4. Alsace-Lorraine, Hessian and Bavarian Amish to Western Penna., Ohio, Illinois, Iowa 1815-60	2,700
5. Swiss Mennonites to Ohio and Indiana 1817-60	500
6. Palatine Mennonites to Ohio, Illinois, and Iowa 1825-60	200
7. Prussian Mennonites to Nebraska and Kansas 1874-80	300
8. Russian Mennonites to the prairie states 1874-80	10,000
9. Russian Mennonites to Reedley, Cal. 1930	200
10. Scattered individuals (second half of 19th century) from Germany, Switzer- land, France, and Russia to states west of the Mississippi	200
Total immigrants	18,500

Since the total immigrant group, except for a few in the late 19th century from France, was German-speaking, the Mennonites of the United States long remained German in language and in cultural orientation. The major transition to English began about 1890 east of the Mississippi, but not until after 1900 in the Russian group in the prairie states. By the end of World War I, due in part to repressive measures in many local communities against the German language during the war, the transition was relatively complete. However, the Old Order Amish have never surrendered the German, either in their worship, or in the Pennsylvania-German dialect in their homes.

By internal migration the eastern Pennsylvania Mennonites spread west to Ontario, Ohio, and Indiana, and southward to Maryland and Virginia in the first half of the 19th century. A smaller stream of migrants continued westward to Missouri and Kansas, and finally reached the Pacific Coast in Oregon by the turn of the 20th century. Amish from eastern Pennsylvania moved westward about the same time to central Pennsylvania (Mifflin Co.) and Ohio, with a few going further west. The newer 19th-century Alsatian Amish immigration settled in western Pennsylvania (Somerset Co.), Ontario, Ohio, and Illinois, and moved on in part to Iowa and Nebraska about the middle of the 19th century and later. However, not more than a fifth of the Swiss-South German Mennonite and Amish stock from the Eastern and North Central states finally landed west of the Mississippi. The Swiss and South German Mennonites who came to Ohio in the first half of the 19th century did not join substantially in the westward migration. A small movement to Florida from the Eastern and North Central states developed after World War I but especially after World War II.

The Russian group also joined in the internal westward migration, but not till the 20th century, some going south to Oklahoma when it was opened for settlement in 1892, but many more going to the Pacific Coast, particularly to California (1897 ff.) but also to Oregon, Washington, and Idaho, with a few going north into Montana. None went to Florida.

Thus by immigration from Europe at different times to different areas of the country, and by later internal migration westward, Mennonites have spread across the country from coast to coast, and are now located in 25 states, the only major areas missed being New England and the South and Southwest. Mission expansion has led to a light occupation of even these areas, chiefly by the M.C. group, so that in 1957 forty states out of the 48 (missing Maine, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Hampshire, and Utah, Nevada, and Wyoming) and Washington, D.C., had a Mennonite population. The following table lists the distribution of baptized membership throughout the country by states and groups.

MENNONITE MEMBERSHIP IN THE UNITED STATES BY GROUPS AND STATES

	Mennonite Church (MC)	General Conference Mennonite (GCM)	Mennonite Brethren (MB)	Old Order Amish (OOA)	Beachy Amish	Evangelical Mennonite Brethren (EMB)	Krimmer Mennonite Brethren (KMB)	Church of God in Christ, Mennonite (CGC)	Evangelical Mennonite (EM)	Reformed Mennonite	Old Order Mennonite
Alabama	87	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	87
Arizona	163	—	—	—	—	—	—	20	—	—	—	183
Arkansas	85	—	67	12	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	164
California	274	1,385	4,376	—	—	142	238	521	—	—	—	6,936
Colorado	708	7	153	—	—	—	—	34	—	—	—	902
Delaware	408	—	—	240	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	648
Florida	528	—	—	—	—	—	—	95	—	—	—	623
Georgia	13	—	—	—	105	—	—	97	—	—	—	215
Idaho	293	384	—	—	—	—	—	109	—	—	—	786
Illinois	3,443	2,157	—	730	408	76	—	434	52	—	—	7,300
Indiana	7,905	2,260	—	3,195	448	—	—	739	24	302	—	14,873
Iowa	3,289	830	—	794	52	38	—	—	—	—	—	5,003
Kansas	1,631	11,141	2,068	350	—	279	411	2,322	145	—	—	18,347
Kentucky	123	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	123
Louisiana	81	—	—	—	—	—	—	122	—	—	—	203
Maryland	1,793	—	—	178	27	—	—	—	—	—	—	1,998
Michigan	2,413	180	—	244	32	20	—	347	64	52	—	3,352
Minnesota	364	1,783	465	—	—	306	—	—	—	—	—	2,918
Mississippi	87	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	87
Missouri	514	127	—	200	—	—	—	96	—	—	—	937
Montana	220	529	203	—	—	98	—	—	—	—	—	1,050
Nebraska	1,370	1,731	335	—	—	157	—	—	—	—	—	3,593
New Jersey	15	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	15
New Mexico	14	—	—	—	—	—	—	13	—	—	—	27
New York	1,332	—	—	113	—	—	—	—	—	29	—	1,474
North Carolina	44	—	—	—	—	—	170	—	—	—	—	214
North Dakota	251	313	525	4	—	—	—	25	—	—	—	1,118
Ohio	9,808	2,591	—	6,586	225	—	—	58	853	150	341	20,612
Oklahoma	257	1,857	2,287	160	—	—	—	424	—	—	—	4,985
Oregon	1,860	909	507	28	119	368	—	13	—	—	—	3,804
Pennsylvania	26,580	4,061	—	4,168	692	—	—	—	—	309	3,272	39,082
South Carolina	—	—	—	—	13	—	—	—	—	—	—	13
South Dakota	26	2,438	140	—	—	141	778	33	—	—	—	3,556
Tennessee	48	—	—	61	—	—	—	34	—	—	—	143
Texas	151	18	331	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	500
Vermont	43	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	43
Virginia	3,820	—	—	160	259	—	—	—	—	—	225	4,464
Washington	—	614	187	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	801
West Virginia	673	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	673
Wisconsin	130	—	—	50	—	—	—	60	—	—	—	240
Wash., D.C.	40	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	40
Total	70,884	35,315	11,644	17,273	2,380	1,625	1,597	4,389	2,269	616	4,140	152,132

Spiritual Development. In the United States the oppressed Mennonites of Central Europe for the first time had the privilege of full liberty of conscience and unrestricted cultural and economic development, guaranteed first of all by William Penn's Quaker Pennsylvania, to which the 18th-century emigration was exclusively directed. Moreover, the nonresistant Mennonites found in Pennsylvania full sympathy for their position on rejection of warfare and the oath, since the Quakers held the same basic position on these points. Later by constitutional provision in the federal constitution and in most state constitutions these privileges were firmly anchored. The unlimited resources of the new world in fertile land, forests, and minerals, were almost literally free for the taking by the pioneers, and these great economic opportunities continued for two centuries as the frontier moved westward; hence Mennonites of all later immigrant groups also had equal rights to them.

Since all Mennonite immigrants to America were farmers, except the small early Lower Rhine group, and since unoccupied land was plentiful, the typical Mennonite pattern of settlement in America was in fairly compact groups of single farmsteads, though not in exclusive colonies nor in villages. Practically no Mennonite city settlements nor city congregations were founded until the 20th century, with a few exceptions, such as Philadelphia (GCM) in 1865, Elkhart, Ind. (MC) in 1871, Lancaster, Pa. (MC) in 1879. Accordingly the American Mennonites long remained an exclusively rural group, stable, conservative, prosperous; only in the second quarter of the 20th century has any really substantial urbanization set in. Now many have established small businesses and even industries, have entered the professions, or have become laborers. By 1955 the proportion of urban population had passed 50 per cent in practically the entire area east of the Mississippi, and reached 85 per cent in the Franconia area of eastern Pennsylvania. The typical German virtues of thrift, hard work, sobriety, and community solidarity, reinforced by the Mennonite emphasis on nonconformity to the world, mutual aid, simplicity, love, quietness, united in creating a typical American Mennonite character, with a strongly conservative social and religious bent, and a strong group loyalty. This character, coupled with a strong emphasis on tradition, resulted in a notable emphasis on simplicity and nonworldliness which not only developed into a traditional pattern of simplicity in costume, form of worship, and general way of life, but made possible a relative insulation from the surrounding American culture. The absence of a trained ministry, and the general negative attitude toward higher education, meant further that few influences toward change in the traditional pattern entered the group by the educational route. This contributed to a relative stagnation in church life.

As a result of these several factors the great opportunity in America for a free unfolding of the Anabaptist genius was partly lost, and the heritage lay relatively dormant and unfruitful. The carry-over from the long time of persecution in Europe, reinforced by preoccupation with the hardships of pioneering, and by cultural isolation through the retention of the German language in an English environment, contributed much to the loss of a sense of mission. The basic Mennonite heritage of doctrinal and ethical principles was, however, maintained. All Mennonite immigrants of whatever period brought with them a strong commitment to nonresistance, the greater proportion having left Europe to a large extent because of pressure on this very point by the governments and the cultures from which they came. This was particularly true of the 19th-century movements from France, South Germany, Prussia, and Russia, but also to some extent for the earlier 18th-century emigration.

In the second half of the 19th century new influences came to bear on the established Mennonite communities in the East, while the newer immigrants to the midwest from Russia and South Germany brought with them a more vigorous piety and a more aggressive spirit. American revivalism of the Moody type, the Sunday school, outside Protestant literature, the influences from the growing general Protestant emphasis on missions, evangelism, temperance, etc., played their part in breaking through the barriers of isolation and opening up Mennonites in many places to change and progress. But this was not without stress and strain. Formerly large numbers were simply lost to the church, to join other Protestant denominations. Now new life and progress retained many more, but also led to serious divisions in the second half of the 19th century; e.g., Old Order Amish (q.v.), Old Order Mennonite (q.v.), M.B.C. (q.v.), Defenseless Mennonite (q.v.), and Oberholtzer-G.C.M. (q.v.—earlier in the century).

By the beginning of the 20th century a genuine awakening and revival was occurring, with a warmer type of piety, emphasis on Christian experience, activity in evangelism (q.v.), missions (q.v.), education (q.v.), and publication (q.v.), better ministerial service (trained ministry came later), and a recovering sense of mission. This revival has affected all the groups, except the Old Order Amish and Old Order Mennonite, who have resisted all change and remained traditional, a block of at least one eighth of the total United States Mennonite membership. The second quarter of the 20th century has added to the revival a remarkable development in relief work and social service, at first largely under the Mennonite Central Committee, but now spreading into most of the larger groups directly.

Missions have had a remarkable development in all the American Mennonite groups (except the two Old Order groups) in spite of a late start at the turn of the 20th century. By 1957 a total of 638 Mennonite missionaries were at work in 27 foreign countries and Puerto Rico and Alaska, with a total of over 50,000 baptized members on all fields. China, India, East Africa, and the African Congo were the oldest and strongest fields.

Foreign relief work under the Mennonite Central Committee (q.v., org. 1920) had also reached striking proportions, largely after World War II, with operations in a maximum of 20 different countries by over 350 workers at one time in 1948-50, although the famine relief program in Russia in 1920-22 was itself a major effort. The operation of Civilian Public Service by united Mennonite effort under the MCC during World War II reached a maximum of over 4,000 Mennonite conscientious objectors in 1944. After World War II the movement for mental health work resulted in the establishment of three mental hospitals under MCC, and one under the Lancaster Conference (MC). A further outgrowth of the World War II experience was the Voluntary Service program, partly under MCC and partly under the major conferences (MC, GCM, and MB), in which hundreds of Mennonite youth served in a variety of social service and mission-related projects in short summer terms and longer terms of one or two years. Pax Service abroad for conscientious objector men resulted in over 200 serving in reconstruction and other service in Germany, Greece, Korea, and elsewhere, under MCC direction.

Another prominent and highly important development in American Mennonitism in the 20th century has been the forward movement in higher education, with the establishment of colleges and seminaries. Full four-year college programs were established in the three major groups as follows with the year of granting the first B.A. degree: M.C.—Goshen 1910, E.M.C. 1948; G.C.M.—Bethel 1912, Bluffton 1915; M.B.—Tabor 1922. Junior Colleges were also established at Hesston (MC, 1915) and Freeman (GCM, 1923). The following seminaries have been established: Witmarsum (called Mennonite Seminary as part of Bluffton College 1915-21, independent at Bluffton, Ohio 1921-36); Tabor College of Theology (M.B., as part of Tabor College 1924-1955) at Hillsboro, Kan.; Goshen College Biblical Seminary (M.C., as part of Goshen College at Goshen, Ind., 1933-); Mennonite Biblical Seminary (G.C.M., in affiliation with Bethany Biblical Seminary in Chicago 1945-1958, in Elkhart, Ind., 1958-); and Mennonite Brethren Biblical Seminary at Fresno, Cal., in 1955- . The M.B. Bible College (1944-) and the Canadian Mennonite Bible College (G.C.M., 1947-), both Winnipeg, offer theological curriculums, the former Th.B., the latter B.C.E. At least 15 church high schools and 80 elementary schools have also been established, largely since 1945 and chiefly in the MC group, in addition to a number of Bible schools and two Bible Institutes (Grace at Omaha, inter-Mennonite; Fresno, M.B., 1955). These schools, particularly the colleges, have become very influential in the Mennonite brotherhood in the United States, and have contributed much to the strength of church life, witness, and service.

In publication the three major groups have developed publishing houses (MC—Scottsdale, Pa., 1908; GCM—Berne, 1884; Newton, 1949; MB—Medford, Okla., 1904, Hillsboro, Kan., 1913); although the Scottsdale House with its larger constituency has developed the only major American Mennonite publishing enterprise with substantial books by Mennonite authors. A majority of literary production by American Mennonite writers has been by authors from the Mennonite Church (MC). Outstanding American Mennonite authors have been C. H. Wedel (GCM, d. 1913), Daniel Kauffman (MC, 1865-1944), C. Henry Smith (GCM, 1875-1948), John Horsch (MC, 1867-1941), J. C. Wenger (MC, 1906-), G. F. Herschberger (MC, 1897-). The various Mennonite bodies large and small have almost all established their own periodical organs, of which the chief are the following: M.C.—Gospel Herald (circulation 18,500); G.C.M.—The Mennonite (circulation 15,000); M.B.—The Christian Leader 1937 (circulation 2,500) and Zionsbote 1884 (circulation 2,000). Noteworthy other periodicals are the inter-Mennonite Mennonite Weekly Review 1923 (circulation 21,000), Mennonite Life 1946 (GCM, circulation 2,500), and the Mennonite Quarterly Review 1927 (MC, 750).

The growth of awareness of the historic Anabaptist heritage and the attempt to work out its implications theologically and practically, which marked the American Mennonites generally in the second quarter of the 20th century, has helped to awaken most of the groups to the danger of pure traditionalism on the one side, and on the other side the danger of undue influence from outside movements in theology and piety. This has also contributed to the building of a solid foundation for better mutual understanding and co-operation among the various American Mennonite groups.

The striking growth in the number, quality, and significance of inter-Mennonite relationships and co-operative activities, is a marked feature of the mid-20th century in American Mennonitism (see Inter-Mennonite Relations). One result of the general drawing together has been a series of group reunions or mergers, including Mennonite-Amish Mennonite (MC, 1915-25), Mennonite-Conservative Amish (MC, 1955), General Conference-Central Conference (GCM, 1945), Evangelical Mennonite-

E.M.B. (only partially completed) (1953), Mennonite Brethren-Krimmer Mennonite Brethren (MB, 1959).

The Mennonites of the United States in 1957 were basically conservative—evangelical in theology (with some fundamentalist areas), evangelistic, and mission-minded with a strong outreach program, well organized, engaged in many activities of practical and service character, with a vigorous denominational consciousness, a strong program of Christian education in the local congregations and in church colleges, high schools, and seminaries, manifesting a vital piety and sense of mission. The basic historic Anabaptist heritage had been preserved, although the effort to maintain a deep Christian commitment in full discipleship had not been uniformly successful, and the constant battle against worldliness was sometimes lost to looseness and sometimes to legalism.

By virtue of numbers, maintenance of historic heritage, vigor of group life, vitality, and strong participation of the lay membership in the total program of the church, the American Mennonites came to occupy a major place in world Mennonitism. Helped by their size and resources in men and money, and their growing sense of sharing in the life of the Mennonite brotherhood round the world, they were able to render valuable assistance to Mennonites elsewhere, especially in Europe where the suffering and losses due to two world wars have been much more severely felt. (For further information on American Mennonitism, see the articles on the several American bodies, also the several states in which American Mennonites live and treatments of major doctrinal, practical, ecclesiastical, and institutional topics.) H.S.B.

Baptized Membership of Mennonites in the United States by Bodies—1957

Mennonite Church	70,884
General Conference Mennonite Church	35,315
Old Order Amish Mennonite	17,273
Mennonite Brethren	11,644
Church of God in Christ, Mennonite	4,389
Old Order (Wisler) Mennonite	4,140
Beachy Amish Mennonite	2,380
Evangelical Mennonite	2,269
Evangelical Mennonite Brethren	1,625
Evangelical Mennonite (Kleine Gemeinde)	25
Krimmer Mennonite Brethren	1,597
Reformed Mennonite	616
Stauffer Mennonite	362
Weaver Mennonite	60
Total	152,579
Hutterian Brethren	2,720

(Source: Mennonite Yearbook and Directory 1958)

C. Henry Smith, Mennonites of America (Goshen, 1909); idem, The Story of the Mennonites (Berne, 1941, 4th edition revised by C. Krahn, 1957); idem, The Coming of the Russian Mennonites . . . 1874-1884 (Berne, 1927); idem, The Mennonite Immigration to Pennsylvania in the Eighteenth Century (Norristown, 1929); idem, Mennonites in America (Akron, 1942); Proceedings of the Conference on Mennonite Educational and Cultural Problems I-XI (1942-57); H. S. Bender, "The Mennonites of the United States," MQR XI (1937) 68-82; idem, "Outside Influences on Mennonite Religious Thought," Proceedings of the Ninth Conference on Mennonite Educational and Cultural Problems (1953) 33-41; Don. E. Smucker, "A Critique of Mennonites at Mid-Century," ibid., 99-113.

Universalism, the doctrine that God will ultimately save all men. The adherents of universalism use as a major support Acts 3:21, "Whom the heaven must receive until the times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." In this passage they find the assertion that everything that God has created will once again be restored to its original state in the creation, whereas most exegetes construe it to refer only to the things foretold by the prophets.

The first proponent of the restoration of all things was Origen. The most important champion of this doctrine in the period of the Reformation was Hans Denck. In his booklet, Wer die Wahrheit wahrlich lieb hat, he makes the reference to it in Gegenschrift 16, 17, and 28. He mentions it also in other writings, as in Vom Gesetz Gottes. His premise is the idea that the nature of God is love and mercy, and that He can therefore not keep His anger forever. His support he took from passages like Isa. 28:21; Jer. 3:21; Rom. 5:18; 11:32; I Cor. 15:22; Eph. 1:10; Col. 1:20; and I Tim. 2:4.

Article 17 of the Augsburg Confession (1530-Lutheran) assumes that all Anabaptists held this doctrine, when it says, "Therefore the Anabaptists are condemned, who teach that the devil and damned persons will not have eternal pain and suffering." But this belief of Denck's was never really accepted in Anabaptist circles. It is found nowhere else except perhaps in Jakob Kautz and Hans Hut. In more recent times, however, some Mennonites in Baden and Württemberg, under the influence of the theologians C. F. Oetinger and Michael Hahn (q.v.), accepted the doctrine of the restitution of all things and organized a separate church group, the "Hahnische" Mennonites. But even this movement did not reach any considerable proportions. However, a few Mennonite preachers in the German Verband and in Switzerland have occasionally leaned toward this view. (See the polemic written against it by Jakob Vetter, Warum ich die Wiederbringung aller Dinge ablehne, 1911.)

In Russia and America, Mennonite bodies have stood firmly against universalism, and the doctrine is practically unknown, although disciplinary action was taken against an elder on this ground in a Canadian conference (GCM) in 1950. A curiosity is the fact that the refusal of Joseph Stucky to discipline a member in his central Illinois congregation in 1871 for propagating this view was the occasion for the schism which led to the formation of the Central Illinois Conference (q.v.). NEFF, H.S.B.

Unpartheiische biblische Fragenbuch, Das, zum Gebrauch in Sonntagschulen und Familien für Kinder-Unterricht, 1st part (Milford Square, 1859). This 121-page booklet is the first known piece of Sunday-school literature produced by the Mennonites, probably written by John H. Oberholtzer (q.v.). It was used in General Conference Mennonite congregations. (Bender, Two Centuries, 92.) vDZ.

Unpartheiische Kirchen- und Ketzer-Historie by Gottfried Arnold: see Arnold, Gottfried and Ketzer-Historie.

Unpartheiische Liedersammlung, Eine, Zum Gebrauch beim Oeffentlichen Gottesdienst und der Häuslichen Erbauung, the only hymnal except the Ausbund used by the Old Order Amish (not for regular Sunday morning worship but only for evening singings and special occasions), and also used by the Old Order Mennonites, first edition 1860 at Lancaster, reprinted there 8 times, twice at Elkhart in 1911 and 1929, and 8 times at Scottdale 1917-54. It is a condensation of 152 hymns from the Lancaster Unpartheyisches Gesangbuch (q.v.). It is familiarly called by the Amish "das dünne Büchli" (the thin book) in contrast to "das dicke Büchli" (the thick book, i.e., the Ausbund). It was published in an enlarged and much revised edition under the same name in 1892 by S. D. Guengerich, an Old Order Amish layman of Amish, Iowa (printed at Elkhart), and reprinted 5 times since (1907-54).

H.S.B.

Unpartheyisches Gesangbuch, Ein (Ein was dropped after the second edition), first published at Lancaster, Pa., in 1804 as the hymnbook of the Lancaster Mennonite (MC) Conference, the second Mennonite hymnbook to be compiled in America, was long used in this conference (15 editions 1804-87), also in the Ontario, Virginia, and Southwestern Pennsylvania Mennonite (MC) conferences and in the Old Order Mennonite bodies at various places. It is still used in Lancaster County by certain conservative groups (reprints at Lancaster 1923 and 1941 for the Amish congregations). It is noteworthy as the only Mennonite hymnal to borrow substantially from the Ausbund; it contains 64 Ausbund hymns, which is 45 per cent of the Ausbund total, and 17 per cent of the 390 basic hymns in the Gesangbuch. The first edition contained 511 pages. (See Hymnology for a detailed discussion of the book and the several other hymnals derived from it.)

H.S.B.

Unrau: see also Unruh.

Unrau, Abram Abram, a Mennonite leader in the Chortitza settlement of South Russia, was born June 14, 1856, the oldest of the six children of Abram Unrau and Agatha Heese. He married Gertrude Thiessen in August 1876; they had 16 children. His second wife was Maria Hildebrand. He was educated at the Chortitza Zentralschule, ordained as minister on June 8, 1890, and as elder on June 16, 1900. He lived at Chortitza until 1878, Roppow-Gauchur 1878-89, New York (Bachmut district) and Ekaterinovka (near New York village) 1889-1920. He was a wise leader and was well read. He died Aug. 30, 1930, at New York. D.Pa.

UNRRA. The United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration was an international organization made up of 47 member governments for the purpose of giving relief and rehabilitation to people in liberated countries in Europe and the Far East. UNRRA was organized in Washington, D.C., on Nov. 9, 1943. Representatives from 44 nations signed the agreement. General councils met in Atlantic City, N.J., on Nov. 11, 1943; Montreal, Quebec, September 1944; and in London, England, in August 1945. The first Director General was Herbert H.

Lehman, former governor of New York. The general headquarters were in Washington, D.C., with regional offices in London, Shanghai, Sydney, and Cairo. Relief and rehabilitation under UNRRA consisted of food, clothing, fuel, medicines, household supplies, seeds, fertilizers, raw materials, machinery, transportation, and public utilities, as well as technical assistance. There were also health and welfare services as well as repatriation of displaced persons. The UNRRA staff was highly specialized and consisted of some 10,000 persons recruited from at least 43 nations. These employees took an oath to adhere to the ideal of international service and agreed to abstain from any act of discrimination on account of race, nationality, creed, or political belief. The purpose of UNRRA was to create a reservoir of emergency supplies and services from which nations could draw who requested assistance and proved their need. Assistance was given only after a thorough investigation by representatives of member nations. The nations given aid were those who did not have adequate foreign exchange to do the relief and rehabilitation job themselves. The original UNRRA budget was over 1¼ billion dollars. Each member nation not occupied by the enemy was asked to contribute at least one per cent of its national income.

In 1943-45 the Mennonite Central Committee, with headquarters at Akron, Pa., loaned a total of 15 workers to UNRRA refugee camps in Egypt. These representatives consisted of five nurses, one doctor, one laboratory technician, one dietitian, and seven welfare workers. In 1945 five of these workers were transferred from Egypt to Italy, where they continued their service in UNRRA-administered refugee camps. From 1944 to 1949 the MCC loaned personnel to UNRRA projects in China. UNRRA furnished tractors and Chinese farmers gave seed and tilled the soil and a number of MCC workers served as field men and mechanics. These men taught the Chinese farmers how to operate the tractors and were charged with the responsibility of keeping the tractors in working order. A third area of co-operation between the MCC and UNRRA was in Poland. UNRRA had shipped to Poland 10,000 American-made farm tractors. These were distributed to 250 tractor stations. In 1947 MCC furnished 23 men to train Polish farmers to operate tractors. These farm-trained technicians served in Poland for a period of 8 months. MCC also co-operated with UNRRA in shipping livestock to European liberated countries. In all a total of over 500 Mennonites served as "seagoing cowboys" (q.v.) who cared for livestock on ships. J.N.B.

Unruh (Unru, Unrau, Onrouw), a widespread family name among the Mennonites of Prussia, Danzig, Russia, and America. Herbert Wiebe found the name first recorded in 1568. It was found in the communities of Schöensee, Przechowka, Jeziorka, Konopath, Kazun, Tragheimerweide, and Thienisdorf. Whether all Unruhs found among Mennonites today have the same ancestor is not known. Some sources trace the first Unruh back to Saxony when a high-ranking military officer joined the Mennonites and became nonresistant. Hendrik Berents Hulshoff, who visited the Mennonites at Wintersdorf near Culm in 1719, reported that Abram Unrau was elected to the ministry. Among the 35 families who established Brenkenhoffswalde and Franzthal in Mark Brandenburg in 1765 the Unruh family was represented. From here the family was transplanted to Poland, the Molotschna settlement in Russia, and elsewhere. Particularly the Unruhs in Poland spread widely; many migrated to Kansas and Dakota in 1874-75, led by Tobias A. Unruh (q.v.). Many of this group joined the Church of God in Christ, Mennonite. Among the Alexanderwohl Mennonites settling near Goessel, Kan., there were also many Unruhs; from here they have spread into many communities. After World War I many Unruhs in Russia migrated to Canada and South America. Heinrich P. Unruh (q.v., d. 1927) was a prominent elder of the Halbstadt Mennonite Church, Molotschna, Russia.

A number of Unruhs served as deacons and preachers in the Prussian churches. Preachers at Montau have been Andreas Unruh (Unrau) of Dragass 1739-d.74; Heinrich Unruh (Unrau) (1740-74) of Montau serving only June-Nov. 23, 1774; Peter Unruh of Dragass 1776-c88. The Dutch Naamlijst mentions besides these Abraham Unruh, preacher of the Schweingrube Old Flemish congregation c1730-c65; Heinrich Unruh serving at Konopat-Przechowka c1779-c1800; Heinrich Unruh serving at Brenkenhoffswalde-Franzthal c1782-88.

J. A. Boese, who traced to 1930 the lines of two Unruhs born c1740, found that they had 6,500 descendants. The genealogy of the Alexanderwohl Unruh family by P. U. Schmidt lists 251 names.

Outstanding representatives of the family were, in addition to those listed below, Tobias A. Unruh (q.v.), P. H. Unruh, late pastor of the Alexanderwohl Mennonite Church, who was an MCC representative during the famine in Russia in 1922; B. H. Unruh, educator and minister who was a member of the Studienkommission (q.v.) and traveled in Germany and in America in behalf of the Mennonites of Russia and was instrumental in helping them find new homes in Canada and South America. He is the author of Die niederländisch-niederdeutschen Hintergründe der mennonitischen Ostwanderungen im 16., 18. und 19. Jahrhundert (1955) and resides in Karlsruhe, Germany. His brother A. H. Unruh (MB) of Winnipeg is an educator and minister who taught in Russia, Winkler, and Winnipeg and wrote Die Geschichte der Mennoniten-Brüdergemeinde 1860-1954 (1954). The father of Benjamin and Abraham, Heinrich B. Unruh (q.v.), was a prominent elder of the Karassan Mennonite Church in the Crimea, Russia. Heinrich's brother K. B. Unruh (q.v.) was a prominent educator in Russia. John D. Unruh, former president of Freeman College, is the author of In the Name of Christ (1952). H. T. Unruh (GCM) was a minister at Halstead, Bluffton, and Hillsboro. W. F. Unruh was a missionary in India and secretary of the G.C. Western District Conference. Verney Unruh is a missionary in Japan. Walter F. Unruh was long pastor of the First Mennonite Church in Newton, Kan. In 1957 there were 21 ordained men of the family in U.S. and Canada, 5 Unraus (2 MB, 2 GCM, and an EMB), and 16 Unruhs (5 MB, 5 CGC, and 6 GCM). Of these, 11 were serving in Canada, and 10 in the United States. A.J.U., vDZ.

B. H. Unruh, "Die Mennoniten in der Neumark," Gem.-Kal. 1941, 64; Reimer, Familiennamen, 119; P. U. Schmidt, The Peter Unruh Genealogy (Goessel, 1941); V. Unruh and A. J. Unruh, The Tobias A. Unruh Biography, Diary and Family Record, 1819-1950 (Ottumwa, Iowa, 1950); H. B. Koehn, "Minister Tobias A. Unruh Family Relation" (unpublished); Dutch Naamlijst 1773 ff.; Inv. Arch. Amst. I. Nos. 1678, 1732, 2102, 2134, 2194, 2211, 2216, 2220 f.; II, 2, Nos. 740, 763; L. Stobbe, Montau-Gruppe, ein Gedenkbuch (Montau, 1918) 84, 85; Herbert Wiebe, Das Siedlungswerk niederl. Mennoniten im Weichseltal (Marburg, 1952) 74-86 passim, 95, 97; H. Ch. Hulshoff, "Bezoekreis van Hendrik Berents," in Bijdragen en Mededeelingen v. h. Hist. Genootschap LIX (1738) 67 and 74-79; Unruh, Hintergründe, 211, 214.

Unruh, Heinrich Benjamin (1845-82), a Mennonite elder in the Karassan Mennonite Church, Crimea, Russia, was born at Waldheim in the Berdyansk area, on May 24, 1845, the son of Benjamin and Maria Kunkel Unruh. As a child he moved with his parents to the Crimea, settling in the village of Schwestertal. He married Elisabeth Wall, of Schönwiese in the Molotschna settlement, and went to Timir-Bulat in the Eupatoria (Yevpatoriya) district. They raised a family of five sons and four daughters. All of the sons were engaged in religious work. Heinrich and Kornelius Unruh were missionaries in India, Gerhard Unruh a preacher, Abraham Unruh a preacher and teacher (Winnipeg), and Benjamin Unruh a teacher and leader (Karlsruhe).

Heinrich Benjamin Unruh was chosen as minister by the Karassan congregation in 1874, and as elder three years before his death. P. M. Friesen says that he was the first minister in the Crimea to preach without using the traditional written sermons. He stressed personal conversion before baptism. He died in 1882 at the age of 37 years, and was buried at Timir-Bulat. A.H.U.

H. Goertz, Die mennonitischen Siedlungen der Krim (Winnipeg, 1957) 541; Friesen, Brüderschaft, 709.

Unruh, Heinrich Peter (1845-1927), a prominent Mennonite educational and church leader in Russia, was born March 23, 1845, in the village of Alexanderwohl, Molotschna settlement, South Russia, the oldest of the seven children of Peter and Sara Schroeder Unruh. Soon the family took up a homestead in the newly founded village of Nicolaidorf, a few miles from Alexanderwohl. He was married twice—first to Helena Löwen (d. 1885), then to Maria Löwen. In school he had an outstanding teacher, H. Richert, who later became a leader in the Alexanderwohl congregation in Kansas. His mastery of German, a good knowledge of Russian, his theology, and a wide range of information Unruh acquired through reading and study. Still quite young, he became a teacher in the village of Muntau near Halbstadt. In 1870 he was elected minister, first of Alexanderwohl, then of the Halbstadt-Ohrloff congregation. In 1885 he gave up teaching and went to America to visit his parents and other close relatives, all of whom had come to Kansas in the 1870's. In 1896 Unruh became elder of the Halbstadt congregation, which at that time separated from Ohrloff and became independent, and from that time he occupied an increasingly important position in school and church affairs, primarily in the Molotschna settlement, although his influence was felt also in other Mennonite settlements in Russia. For 31 years he was a leading member of the Molotschna School Board (Schulrat), whose function it was to supervise the teaching of religion and German in the schools, and almost as long he served as chairman of the Molotschna Church Conference (Kirchenkonvent). Several times Unruh participated in delegations to St. Petersburg to the highest government officials and also had an audience with the czar.

In all these positions Unruh served his church with great devotion. He was loved and esteemed by all. In 1916, because of age and ill health, he retired as elder of the Halbstadt congregation. Soon after he suffered a stroke which made him an invalid for the rest of his life. He died Nov. 3, 1927, at Muntau, just before religious persecution began in Russia.

Four of H. P. Unruh's children left Russia for Canada in 1924; the widow with some of the other children tried to escape from Russia in 1929, but they were forcibly returned, not to their former home, but to Central Asia. H.G.

Friesen, Brüderschaft; P. U. Schmidt, The Peter Unruh Genealogy (Goessel, 1941); H. Goertz, Die Molotschnaer Ansiedlung (Steinbach, 1950).

Unruh, Kornelius Benjamin (1849-1910), an educator of the Mennonites of Russia, was born in the village of Waldheim, Molotschna settlement, Russia. His grandfather was a minister of the Brenkenhoffswalde (q.v.) church in West Prussia. He received his training in the Halbstadt Zentralschule under Gustav Rempel. At seventeen he started teaching on an estate and later at Blumenort, Molotschna. He had an unusual thirst for knowledge. During his free time and in summer he read and studied privately in Ekaterinoslav, Kiev, and Odessa. He mastered the Russian and French languages and was thoroughly acquainted with modern methods of education. He introduced Russian into the Blumenort elementary school.

In 1870 Unruh accepted the position as teacher at the Halbstadt Zentralschule. After one year he spent three years in Switzerland and Moscow. He studied at the Muristalden (Bern) Protestant normal school and numerous other schools. After his return to Russia he spent one winter in Moscow in private study. In the summer of 1873 he married Maria Epp and became principal of the Ohrloff Zentralschule (q.v.), where he taught for 32 years. He was also elected minister of the Orloff Mennonite Church in 1883. In co-operation with others he helped to produce a number of textbooks for Mennonite schools, including the following: Biblische Geschichten für mennonitische Elementarschulen. Oberstufe (Halbstadt, 1902); Leitfaden zur Kirchengeschichte für mennonitische Centralschulen in Russland (Neuhalsstadt, 1890); Leitfaden für den Religionsunterricht in den mennonitischen Centralschulen Russlands (Halbstadt, 1906); Kratkaya Nemetskaya Grammatika . . . (a brief German grammar for elementary schools in Russia) (Berdyansk, 1898).

In 1905 Unruh resigned from his position and established a secondary school near Novo-Poltavka in the province of Kherson. After two years he established a Bible school in Friedensfeld, Zagradovka settlement. In addition to this he taught Bible and German at the Zagradovka Zentralschule. Because of his extraordinary weight (c400 pounds), his heart suffered severely during the last years of his life. On Aug. 17, 1910, he died. His son, K. K. Unruh, was a lawyer in Ekaterinoslav. B. H. Unruh and A. H. Unruh are his nephews. K. B. Unruh possessed an unusual capacity for work and was an outstanding educator. P. M. Friesen, who was his friend and colleague, ranks him next to Tobias Voth, Hesse, and Franz. C.K.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 590, 600; H. Götz, Die Molotschnaer Ansiedlung (Steinbach, 1951) 162.

Unruh, Peter H. (1881-1943), son of Peter P. and Anna Klassen Unruh, was born in McPherson Co., Kan., Jan. 23, 1881. He was ordained minister of the Alexanderwohl (GCM) congregation in 1900 and elder in 1915. He served as a relief worker in Russia under the MCC 1922-23 and was for some years a member of the MCC and its vice-chairman. He also served for a time on the Conference Peace Committee and as treasurer of the Emergency Relief Board. He was married on Aug. 31, 1905, to Susie Warkentin. He died at Goessel, Kan., July 20, 1943. H.S.B.

Unruh, Tobias A. (1819-75), a son of Andrew G. and Anna Koehn Unruh, was born at Karolswalde, Polish Russia, May 28, 1819. His schooling was meager, but he had a broad knowledge and a deep understanding of the Bible. He was married to Helena Thomas. On Sept. 27, 1853, he was chosen to the ministry and ordained as elder at Karolswalde on Dec. 15 of the same year. He had oversight of eight villages with two church parishes, Karolswalde (q.v.) and Antonofka.

Unruh was sent to St. Petersburg in 1871 to ascertain facts about rumors which reached the villages regarding the Mennonites being placed in the military ranks of Russia. In 1873 he was chosen to accompany the deputies from Russia, Prussia, and Poland sent to locate favorable territory for settling in America. Upon his return after touring the United States and Canada for several months, he worked under many trials and difficulties, remaining in Russia until those of the church who so desired, both with means and without means, were brought to America. He arrived in Philadelphia with the last transport on Jan. 28, 1875. The following spring he settled in Turner County, S.D. He died July 24, 1875, after suffering several weeks from typhoid fever. A.J.U.

Abe J. Unruh and Verney Unruh, The Tobias A. Unruh Biography, Diary and Family Record, 1819-1950 (Pulaski, Iowa, 1950).

Unruh, Tobias A. (1851-1947), a minister of the Church of God in Christ, Mennonite, was born on June 18, 1851, at Karolswalde, Poland. He married Elizabeth Jantz on Sept. 27, 1870. They were the parents of five sons and four daughters. In 1876, with several young children, they emigrated to America, settling in McPherson County, Kan. The severe trials of pioneer life in America caused him to search the Scriptures for comfort, and because of his added knowledge of the Word he was chosen for the ministry. Nevertheless his severe spiritual struggles found no release until he acknowledged Christ and experienced the new birth. He was baptized in 1881 by Benjamin Schmidt and became a member of the Church of God in Christ, Mennonite. In 1882, a year later, he was ordained to the ministry by John Holdeman, thus becoming one of the early ministers of the denomination. The glow and fervor of his new experience remained with him throughout his life and ministry. Much of his time was spent in itinerant preaching and intensive evangelism. For many years he served as an elder, and often officiated at ordinations. On Sept. 6, 1947, at the age of 96 years, he was laid to rest in the Lone Tree cemetery, near his home church, the place of his baptism, ordination, and most of his work. J.J.Ko.

Unschuld und Gegen-Bericht der Evangelischen Tauff-gesinneten Christen, so Mennonisten genannt werden, über die unverschuldete Beschuldigung, als ob sie von der aufrührerischen Münsterischen Rotte entsprossen, und derselben Grund und Lehre föhreten, Nebst Des Menno Simonis Ausgang aus dem Pabstthum, Lebens-Lauff, wie auch Glaubens-Bekänntniss von der heiligen Dreyeinigkeit, Sampt Der also genannten Mennonisten Glaubens-Bekänntniss und Lehre, Wie auch eine Predigt, gehalten in derselben Gemeine, Ausgegeben durch Gerh. Roosen. Hamburg in Verlegung desselben. Ratzeburg, Gedruckt bei Sigismund Hoffmann, 1702. This important booklet by the pastor of the Hamburg-Altona (Germany) Mennonite Church, Gerrit Roosen (q.v., 1612-1711), published by the author in 1702, was reprinted in a second edition in 1753. The Unschuld und Gegen-Bericht section, the first part actually written by the author, covers the first 29 pages, the remaining pages 29-76 constituting translations of three short tracts or sections from Menno Simons' writings. Pages 77-104 contain a brief biography of Menno by Roosen. Two remaining sections of the book, each with separate title page and pagination, contain a confession of faith (40 pp.) written by Roosen, and a sermon (46 pp.) by Roosen. All sections are covered by the general title page and were printed together. The purpose of the book as a whole was to defend the Mennonites from false accusations of Münsterism and heresy, and to prove that the Mennonites are good, pious, and evangelical. The first section, a sketch of the origin of Anabaptism, corrects the history by Sleidanus (Beschreibung geistlicher und weltlicher Sachen, 1547 and many later editions), which asserted that Anabaptism was of Münsterite origin. H.S.B.

Robert Friedmann, Mennonite Piety Through the Centuries (Goshen, 1949) 148-51, presents a full discussion of Roosen's volume.

Unser Blatt was published by the KfK (Kommission für Kirchenangelegenheiten) of the Allgemeine Bundeskonferenz der Mennonitengemeinden (q.v.) of Russia as its monthly organ from November 1925 to June 1928, when it was forbidden by the government. Unser Blatt was the first official organ of the conference and made a very significant contribution at a time when there was little contact among the various Mennonite settlements and congregations and when they were going through a severe crisis because of the antireligious propaganda. The paper is today one of the best sources of information on the religious and cultural life of the Mennonites of Russia during that period. It published reports from the various settlements and congregations, statistics, biographies, and Russian laws pertaining to the religious groups and conscientious objectors to war. The editor was Alexander H. Ediger (q.v.) and the managing editor K. K. Martens (q.v.). Among its regular contributors were David H. Epp and Johann Rempel. The size of the magazine was $9\frac{3}{4} \times 6\frac{1}{2}$ in. and the number of pages 16 and later 24. Very few sets of the paper have been preserved in America, but sets are in BeCL and GCL. An almost parallel paper was Der Praktische Landwirt (q.v.), the organ of the All-Russian Mennonite Agricultural Association (q.v.), which appeared monthly from May 1925 to December 1926. C.K.

Unser Blatt, a four-page semimonthly $8 \times 11\frac{1}{2}$ in. (since December 1949, monthly of variable size), published by the MCC through its Gronau (Westphalia), Germany, refugee service headquarters, specifically for the refugees from Russia (and West Prussia) temporarily in Germany en route to North and South America. The first issue was dated Oct. 8, 1947, the last June 15, 1950, when it was merged with Der Mennonit (q.v.). After Nov. 15, 1949, the appearance and size were irregular; only nine numbers were issued, but several were double numbers. It was named after the Unser Blatt published by the Mennonites in South Russia 1925-28. The editor throughout was Siegfried Janzen. The journal was distributed free to refugees, with a circulation of about 1,000. It contained much valuable historical and statistical material on the refugees in Germany, but also several good historical articles on Mennonites in Russia and Poland and numerous illustrations. (Complete file in GCL.) H.S.B.

Unser Missionsblatt, a German language mission paper published ten times annually by the Mission Sewing Societies of the Canadian Conference of Mennonites since 1946. The first editor was Helena H. Siemens, Altona, Man. Since April 1955 Mrs. Susie Harms, Snowflake, Man., has been the editor. C.K.

Untere Mennoniten, a name formerly given to a group of Mennonites in Switzerland, Alsace, and the Palatinate who were followers of Hans Reist (q.v.), while the Amish (q.v.) were sometimes called "Obere Mennoniten." The name was used here and there in Alsace until the middle of the 19th century. (DB 1868, 11 f.) vdZ.

Unzi(c)ker (Hunziker, Huntzicker), a Mennonite family name: see Hunsicker.

Unzicker, Christian, an Amish Mennonite preacher in Upper Hesse, Germany, who wrote articles in the Mennonitische Blätter sponsoring the training of Mennonite preachers and promoting Mennonite principles, and who with Joseph Unzicker of Henttenthal, elder of the Nassau congregation, favored a union of all the Mennonites. On May 20 and 21, 1867, a meeting for the purpose of uniting was held in Offenthal (q.v.).

Menn. Bl., 1861, 32; 1862, 52; 1863, 8; 1866, 50 and 77; 1867, 38 and 44; 1868, 7; ML IV.

Uolimann (Ullmann, Ulmann, Ulimann), Wolfgang, a Swiss Brethren leader in St. Gall (q.v.) and Appenzell (q.v.). His real name was Wolfgang Schorant. His father, a respected citizen, was a guild master in St. Gall. Uolimann had been a monk in the monastery of St. Lucius in Chur. Obviously the Reformation made a powerful appeal to his religious sensibilities. The evangelical sermons of Johannes Kessler (q.v.), though they were private, profoundly affected the populace. In 1524 Uolimann also openly espoused and preached the Gospel in the open air near the Mängen church in St. Gall.

Soon differences of opinion became apparent within the Protestant circles. Lorenz Hochrüttiner (q.v.) who had been baptized in Zürich by Conrad Grebel (q.v.), sponsored a discussion of baptism on the death of Jesus (Rom. 6) and took a position against infant baptism. Soon afterward, Uolimann met Grebel in Schaffhausen, and was baptized by him by immersion in the Rhine. The founding of the Swiss Brethren congregation in St. Gall followed naturally, and at the same time the break with Zwingli's church occurred. On March 18, Uolimann proclaimed to a large company assembled in the weaver hall (Weberstube) that the heavenly Father had revealed to him that he should avoid the church as a place of lies, where the truth had never been proclaimed nor was being proclaimed now.

The two evangelical parties were now clearly defined: the representatives of the Reformed Church with infant baptism, and the representatives of the Brethren with believers' baptism. In the end, however, under the powerful intervention of Vadian (q.v.), the Anabaptist movement was suppressed. In April 1525 the Brethren were summoned to the council to answer for their teachings on baptism. Uolimann skillfully defended the Anabaptist position saying that infant baptism was a later institution of the church without Scriptural foundation; that adult baptism implied the obligation to die to vices, live to Christ, and be obedient; their rejection of infant baptism he based on Jesus' command to the disciples to teach, believe, and baptize. This order was maintained about two hundred years, until the time of Cyprian and Tertullian. Formerly baptism had been performed at Easter or Pentecost, then later entirely according to human understanding and not according to the Scripture. Uolimann was at first requested "for the sake of brotherly love to wait with the deed." When he refused, the request was changed to a command with the threat of expulsion in case he did not comply.

The tension continued to mount, leading to two further debates. When the opponents sought to justify infant baptism by reading Zwingli's Taufbüchlein (Vom Tauff, vom Wiedertauff und vom Kindertauff), Uolimann countered by saying, "If you have Zwingli's word, we want to have God's Word." In June 1525 the Brethren were forbidden to hold any more meetings in or around the town. Since Uolimann did not comply he was sentenced to banishment on July 17, but was later pardoned upon his oath. His activity in the brotherhood was several times punished by sentence of imprisonment. Although he was a radical innovator, he cannot be held responsible for the excesses that made their appearance in the Anabaptist group at St. Gall.

Little is known of Uolimann's further career. In 1528 he went to Basel in the Anabaptist cause, but was ejected from the city. He led a group of Anabaptists to Moravia, and was leading a second group from Appenzell to Moravia in 1528, when they were seized in Waldsee in Swabia. Uolimann and ten other men were beheaded and the women drowned. Those who recanted were sent home. The chronicle of the Hutterian Brethren records of them, "They testified thus manly and valiantly with their bodies unto death, that their faith and baptism were founded upon divine truth." S.G.

Emil Egli, Die St. Galler Täufer (Zürich, 1887); S. Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931); Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 48; Mart. Mir. D 17, E. 427; Peachey, Die soziale Herkunft der Schweizer Täufer (Karlsruhe, 1954) 25 f., 37, 75, 109, No. 19; BRN VII, 26, 516; ML IV.

Upckes, Hendri(c)k, d. 1731 at Workum in Friesland, Netherlands, a wool carder by trade, was from 1708 until his death an untrained and unsalaried Mennonite preacher in his home town, where he served with much blessing. He is said to have written a book on the origin of the Mennonites, but this book is unknown and all information about it is lacking. (DB 1903, 86, 88.) vdZ.

Upland First Mennonite Church (GCM), located in Upland, Cal., in the citrus district of southern California, is affiliated with the Pacific District Conference. The first Mennonite settlers arrived in the early 1890's, attracted for reasons of health. In 1903 they organized a congregation with 18 charter members, with J. J. Voth as the first minister. In 1906 a church was built on Sixth Avenue, replaced in 1925 by a larger one on North Campus Avenue. In 1935 an organ was installed, the gift of Mr. and Mrs. L. M. Ledig. The parsonage was completed in 1940. M. M. Horsch served the congregation 1903-26, except for an interim of three years, 1915-18, when A. S. Shelley served while Horsch filled a term as district evangelist. Albert A. Penner served as pastor in the summers of 1926 and 1927. The ministers thereafter were Lester Hostetler 1927-29, A. J. Neuenschwander 1929-33, Lester Hostetler 1933-41, Earl Salzman 1941-51, Reynold Weinbrenner 1952-53, and Paul L. Goering 1953-. In 1958 the membership was 210. L.Ho.

Upper Austria: see Austria.

Upper Deer Creek Conservative (Amish) Mennonite Church, located in Iowa County, Iowa, six miles north of Wellman, is a part of the original settlement of Amish Mennonites in this area in 1846. The Upper Deer Creek meetinghouse was built by the Old Order Amish in 1890. Twenty-five years later, in 1915, this congregation was reorganized under the Conservative Amish Mennonite (now called Conservative Mennonite) Conference, by S. J. Swartzendruber of Bay Port, Mich., and Samuel T. Yoder of Belleville, Pa. Gideon A. Yoder, a son of Bishop Abner Yoder, was the only preacher at that time. Other ministers who have served were Elmer G. Swartzendruber (ord. 1917) and Amos C. Swartzendruber (ord. 1917), Gideon A. Yoder, bishop 1919-31, Elmer G. Swartzendruber, bishop 1931-. In 1917 the meetinghouse was moved about 75 feet southeast and enlarged. The services were usually conducted in German until the transition period of 1925-45; in 1957 possibly 90 per cent of all services were conducted in English. In 1920 evening meetings were started. Sunday school has been held since 1870, although in the earlier years it was discontinued during the winter months. Women's sewing circle, meeting somewhat irregularly since 1918, at present convenes monthly. Midweek prayer meeting is observed. In the molding of policy for the congregation, probably three men stand out most prominently; viz., the first three bishops, Jacob J. Swartzendruber, Abner Yoder, and Joseph J. Swartzendruber. Among the laity Samuel D. Guengerich was outstanding. The total membership of the congregation worshipping in the Upper Deer Creek and the Fairview (q.v.) meetinghouses in 1957 was 505. The ministers are Elmer G. Swartzendruber, bishop, Albert S. Miller, Jacob J. Miller, Moses Gingerich, and Morris E. Swartzendruber. E.G.S.

Upper German Mennonites: see High German Mennonites.

Upper Milford Mennonite Church (GCM), located near Zionsville, 5 miles southwest of Emmaus, Upper Milford Twp., Lehigh Co., Pa., was first affiliated with the Franconia Conference (MC), but since 1847 has been in the Eastern District Conference (GCM). The congregation was established about 1735, and a meetinghouse was built in 1740. In 1816 the original log building, which had been used for both church and school purposes, was displaced by a stone meetinghouse, which was in turn enlarged and renovated in 1843. In the division of 1847 the minister, Joseph Schantz, and almost all the members followed John H. Oberholtzer (q.v.) into the new conference. In 1876 the congregation razed the stone building and built a new brick church. William Gehman (q.v.), ordained by lot as minister here in 1849, led a division in 1857 and became the founder of the Evangelical Mennonites (q.v.). In 1895 the membership was 96; in 1936 it was 164; in 1958 it was 168, with Burton G. Yost as pastor. Other ministers who have served were Uriah Shelly, C. H. A. van der Smissen, A. S. Shelly, W. S. Gottschall, E. S. Shelly, V. B. Boyer, and H. G. Nyce. B.G.Y.

J. C. Wenger, History of the Mennonites of the Franconia Conference (Telford, 1937) 221, 222, 369.

Upper Palatinate (Oberpfalz), one of eight districts of the former kingdom of East Bavaria, Germany, included the river territory of the Regen and the Naab, parts of the Franconian Jura, the several districts south of the Danube near Regensburg. The area of the Upper Palatinate is 3,724 sq. miles, and its population in 1950, 896,520. It is a hilly region, containing the Bohemian Forest and the Fichtelgebirge. Regensburg, its capital, is a historic city and is today an important communication center. With the exception of the section south of the Danube the land of the Upper Palatinate is not very fertile.

For the history of Mennonitism the Upper Palatinate never reached the significance of the Palatinate proper. To be sure, there was in Regensburg (q.v.) an Anabaptist congregation as early as 1527, which reached its peak in 1539. Hermann Nestler gives the number of members as several hundred. But during the period of persecution it disappeared. Not until 260 years later, when the Wittelsbachs inherited the Bavarian lands at the turn of the 18th century, and Maximilian Josef (q.v.), who knew the Mennonites to be competent farmers, called them into the country, was another congregation organized. Some from the region of Zweibrücken and Lorraine settled in the Upper Palatinate, chiefly as renters of the estates of noble landowners. The congregation, belonging to the Amish wing, called its preachers and elders from its own ranks and held its meetings in rotation in the homes of the widely scattered members. About 1890 a minister was employed by the congregation. Since that time the meetings have been held in the Lutheran Bruderkirche in Regensburg. They were joined in the course of time by brethren coming from Baden, Württemberg, and the Rheinpfalz. Census figures state the Mennonite population of the Upper Palatinate as 128 in 1875, 178 in 1885, 134 in 1900, and 95 in 1910. A.S.

Hermann Nestler, Die Wiedertäuferbewegung in Regensburg (Regensburg, 1926); ML III, 288.

Ureterp, a village in the Dutch province of Friesland. The Mennonites living here were at least from 1695 members of the Drachten (q.v.) congregation, which was officially called the Drachten and Ureterp congregation. Until 1690 Drachten was probably independent, being the nucleus and oldest center from which the present Drachten-Ureterp congregation has developed. The suggestion by Blaupot ten Cate that the Ureterp congregation was founded before 1580 or between 1580 and 1600 is unfounded. The origin of this church is unknown. It existed in the early 17th century, when meetings were held in a barn, probably at Selmien, a hamlet near Ureterp. In November 1661 Michiel Wymmers promised to bequeath a plot of ground "forever" to "the true poor Mennonite followers of Lammert Gaukes" at Ureterp. As late as 1860 the Drachten and Ureterp parts of the congregation were more or less independent of each other, particularly in the care of the poor, for which they each had separate funds. Apparently after the early 18th century (a new meetinghouse was built at Drachten shortly after 1690) no meetings were held at Ureterp. Concerning the meetinghouse in Ureterp there is no information at all. vdZ.

Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 166, 306; G. ten Cate, Geschiedk. Overzicht van de Doopsgez. gemeente te D. en U. (Drachten, 1890) 1-17; DB 1861, 132; 1890, 93; DJ 1942, 45.

Urfehde: see Oath.

Urschitz (Uhrschitz), Hutterite Bruderhof, located near Austerlitz, Moravia, founded about the middle of the 16th century by Hutterites brought in by Ulrich von Kaunitz. The commune was forcibly evacuated, rebuilt in 1569, plundered in 1618. In October 1622 the Brethren had to abandon Urschitz with empty hands; they settled in Hungary (q.v.). This Bruderhof was commonly called Taufarsky. (Zieglschmid, Chronik; ML IV.)

Ursel, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on Jan. 10, 1570, at Maastricht, Netherlands, together with her husband Arent van Essen. (For particulars, see Trijntgen.) vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 502, E 842 f.; W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik . . . II (The Hague, 1941) 306-10.

Ursel (Ursula), an Anabaptist martyr: see Beckum, Ursula Van.

Ursenbacherhof in Baden, Germany, former Mennonite congregation: see Dühren.

Ursprung, Entwicklung und Schicksale der alt-evangelischen Taufgesinnten oder Mennoniten in kurzen Zügen übersichtlich dargestellt, by Anna Brons (q.v.), was a book of 447 pages, published by the author at Emden in 1884 and in a second edition at the same place in 1891 without changes. The third edition was revised slightly by E. M. ten Cate and published by Johannes Müller at Amsterdam in 1912, with 403 pages. How this book came into being has been related in the article Anna Brons. The significance of the book lies in the fact that it was the first detailed German history of the Mennonites of Europe and America. It consists of ten parts. The author treats the Mennonites of Switzerland, South Germany, the Netherlands, Moravia, Prussia, Russia, and North America, and the influence of the Mennonites on other groups. Anna Brons has a pleasant and appealing style without burdening her text with scholarly problems. Her basic convictions were those of the enlightened liberal 19th-century North German and Dutch Mennonites, and she accordingly did not have much interest in the theological problems of the preceding centuries. The book has served as a valuable source of information. C.K.

Ursula, the title of a Novelle written about the Anabaptists of Zürich, Switzerland, by Gottfried Keller (q.v.).

Ursula, an Anabaptist, probably a martyr. She was the wife of Valentin von Sternenfels, and was one of the Anabaptists imprisoned at Passau (q.v.) in 1535. In her trial she declared that she had been baptized five years previously in the Palatinate by Andreas von Weiss, who had been put to death at Neuburg on the Danube, and that she intended to persist in her faith. W.W.

Ursula of Kunzensee on the Kocher in Württemberg, Germany, a girl of fifteen who was imprisoned with about 25 other Anabaptists in the castle of Passau in 1535. She confessed that she had been baptized by Blasy (Khumauf) in Auspitz. She also remained loyal to her faith and presumably died a martyr's death. W.W.

Ursula (Ursel), an Anabaptist martyr, is identical with Ursula Ochsentreiberin.

Ursula, the wife of Lienhard Jost (q.v.) at Strasbourg, a "prophetess" and like her husband devoted follower of Melchior Hofmann (q.v.), who was greatly influenced by her and ranked her prophecies with those of Isaiah and Jeremiah. vdZ.

BRN VII, 125 f.; A. Hulshof, Gesch. van de Doopsgezinden te Straatsburg . . . (Amsterdam, 1905) 117-23.

Ursula von Werdum: see Beckum, Ursula van.

Ursula Corffis (Korffis), of Vuchtenburch(?), an Anabaptist martyr, was drowned at Haarlem, Holland, May 29, 1539. On May 23, 1539, she was apprehended with a number of Anabaptists meeting in the house of Lambrecht Duppijns (q.v.). Twice she was tortured on the rack; she confessed that she had been a nun before she joined the Anabaptists. The entire group were followers of David (q.v.) Joris. vdZ.

Uruguay is the smallest independent country in South America. Its 72,000 sq. mi., extending about 350 miles both east to west and north to south, is wedged between the two giants of Latin America, Brazil to the north and Argentina to the west and south. Culturally Uruguay is the most progressive of all South American countries. Its two and one-third million people are mostly of early Spanish and Italian descent, although there are people of German and French immigrant extraction. Montevideo (pop. 700,000), the capital city, is one of the cultural centers of South America. The country's educational program is one of the most progressive and democratic in the world. Attendance is compulsory at its 1500 free public schools. All citizens 18 years old and over are compelled to vote. Although most Uruguayans are Roman Catholic, there is complete religious freedom for all.

The settlement of Mennonites in Uruguay began in 1948 after the Mennonites from West Prussia had been displaced during the gigantic population upheaval there during and following World War II. Most of these Mennonites, who were temporarily stationed in displaced persons camps in Denmark (q.v.), were unable to enter Canada and the United States because of their German citizenship. Settlement possibilities in such countries as Brazil, Argentina, and Mexico did not seem favorable, and most of the Danzig Mennonites were opposed to settling in Paraguay. As a last resort they agreed to settle in Eastern Paraguay, in case no other possibilities were open to them. The Mennonite Central Committee, in close touch with these refugees, explored possibilities in Uruguay. Rather unexpectedly opportunity presented itself for entrance and permanent settlement in this country, and on Oct. 27, 1948, the first contingent of 690 Mennonites from Danzig and 60 from Poland arrived in Uruguay. These 20th-century pilgrims had the unusual experience of embarking from Europe for South America without knowing whether they were headed for Paraguay or Uruguay since they had not received official government permission from Uruguay when the ship left Europe. The official assurance was then wired to them on board ship.

With help from the Uruguayan Institute of Colonization and the MCC they were settled in Uruguay. The first contingent was temporarily quartered near the city of Paysandu along the Argentinian border, 250 of them in old army barracks and a vacant warehouse at Colonia, and the remaining 500 in old army barracks at Arapey. Being eager to work, individuals and small groups immediately took whatever jobs they could find—as skilled laborers and factory and farm hands, while others rented small acreages. Many widows and girls found employment as domestics in the cities, especially in Montevideo.

The first permanent settlement was made in April 1950 on a 2,900-acre ranch known locally as El Ombu (q.v.), located about 180 miles northwest of Montevideo near the town of Young. This tract was large enough for only about half the total group. The rest continued to find work over widely scattered areas. Some of these were not able to get on land of their own until after the second large land purchase in 1951. The El Ombu ranch was divided into 75 homesteads of varying sizes. The farmers organized an agricultural co-operative in September 1950. The land is owned by the co-operative and cannot be sold without colony permission. The major portion of the credit for the corporate purchase of the land was advanced by the Uruguayan Institute of Colonization. Repayment is arranged over a 30-year period at 5½ per cent interest. Chief crops produced are wheat, peanuts, sunflowers, corn, kafir, oats, and Sudan grass. Cream and butter also yield substantial cash income.

In October 1951 a second contingent of 431 Danzig refugees landed at Montevideo to boost the total Mennonite population in Uruguay to almost 1,200. Under the leadership of the MCC a subsidiary non-profit corporation known as Uruguay Land Associates was organized by a group of Mennonites, mostly in Kansas and Nebraska, and a sum of $65,000 was raised as a loan to help the new arrivals settle on land. Again with the help of the Uruguayan Institute of Colonization a tract of land was purchased. It was a 4,500-acre ranch known as Brabancia and located near Tres Bocas and now known as the Gartental (q.v.) settlement. The land was divided into 139 homesteads of varying size, of which 100 were assigned to the newly arrived settlers, and the rest to the Mennonite settlers of 1948 who, because of lack of land, had not been able to settle at El Ombu.

The third colony in Uruguay, named Delta (q.v.) after the Vistula Delta homeland, was established in 1955 on a tract of c3,600 acres in the San José Department about 60 miles northwest of Montevideo, some 150 miles southwest of El Ombu and Gartental. Part of the funds for the land purchased were again furnished by North American Mennonites. The tract was divided into farms of 75 acres, and occupied initially by 40 families, all part of the previously immigrated groups.

Culturally in some respects the Uruguay Mennonites hold more liberal views than other South American Mennonites, especially than those in Paraguay. The main body has organized itself in the Conference of Mennonite churches in Uruguay, and is affiliated with the General Conference Mennonite Church in North America and the Vereinigung der deutschen Mennoniten-Gemeinden in Germany. It had four congregations in 1957: El Ombu 255, Garental 249, Montevideo 200, and Colonia Delta 120, a total of 809 baptized members. A group of 38 organized a Mennonite Brethren congregation on board ship en route to Uruguay in 1948. All of these came from the Wymysle area in Central Poland. Its total membership in 1957 was 91. The colonies have established their own elementary schools, but teach the nationally approved curriculum.

Because of the generally favorable economic, social, and cultural conditions in Uruguay the Mennonites are rapidly becoming established. It is likely that those who immigrated there will remain permanently, and it is entirely possible that Mennonites from other South American countries may in small groups migrate there too. Generally the colonists are well satisfied with their new home. By comparison with their coreligionists in Brazil and Paraguay their early years have been considerably less difficult.

The MCC has since 1948 maintained a center in Montevideo as a co-ordinating and contact agency with North America, now at Vilardebo 964. In 1956, at the same address, the Mennonite Biblical Seminary (q.v.) was established as a bilingual training school operated by a board composed of representatives of all the groups in South America desiring to co-operate (all do except the M.B.), supported by the G.C.M. and M.C. mission boards of North America. The attendance in 1957 was about 36 students.

The Mennonite Church (MC) of North America established a mission in Montevideo in 1954 with two couples, who in 1957 had established a small congregation. The total baptized Mennonite membership in Uruguay in 1957 was about 910, with a total population of some 1300. J.W.F.

J. W. Fretz, Pilgrims in Paraguay (Scottsdale, 1953); H. J. Andres, "Colonia Menonite in Uruguay," Menn. Life IV (July 1949) 15; Gustav E. Reimer, "Von Danzig nach Uruguay," Menn. Life IV (July 1949) 12-14; W. Dück, "Neue Heimat in Uruguay," Gem.-Kal. 1952, 56-65; H. Wall, "Drei Jahre in Uruguay," Gesch.-Bl. IX (1952) 18-26; Gem.-Kal., 1953, 63-66; 1955, 73-78; 1957, 30-35.

Usquert, a village in the Dutch province of Groningen, in which Anabaptism was found as early as 1533; later there was a Mennonite congregation here belonging to the Flemish branch, not Old Flemish as were most congregations in this province. Of its history there are only a few traces: it was in the 18th century a member of the Humsterlandsche (q.v.) Sociëteit; the Naamlijst issues of 1731 and 1743 name Jan Jansz as the preacher; he was apparently the last preacher here; according to the issues of 1755-65 the pulpit was vacant, and in those of 1766 ff. the congregation is not named. Yet it seems to have existed until 1784, in which year its property was divided. (Blauptot t. C., Groningen I, 15, 149, 201.) vöZ.

Usury. As used in the Scriptures the term means any kind of interest on money loaned, although in the English language it has come to mean an exorbitant rate of interest, or interest in excess of the legal rate.

The Mosaic code forbade the taking of interest from brethren in the faith, although it might be received from strangers. The prohibition grew out of the agricultural economy of the time when there was little need for productive capital loans for business purposes. The chief purpose of loans was for the assistance of a friend or brother in need. To receive interest under such circumstances was a violation of the law of love which required the Israelite to care for his own. "If you lend money to any of my people with you who is poor, you shall not be to him as a creditor, and you shall not exact interest from him. If ever you take your neighbor's garment in pledge, you shall restore it to him before the sun goes down; for that is his only covering, it is his mantle for his body; in what else shall he sleep" (Ex. 22:25-27, RSV)? This command as well as that of Jesus. "Give to him who begs from you, and do not refuse him who would borrow from you" (Matt. 5:42), are not to be thought of as economic principles or as business procedures. They have to do with the Christian's social responsibility to the poor; they are a statement of the law of love which extends mercy to the brother in need.

In the Middle Ages and the Reformation, as in Biblical times, money was regarded primarily as a medium of exchange, not as productive capital; and money loaned was for the purpose of helping the brother in need, not for investment purposes. For this reason the medieval church, and to some extent Luther, as well as the Anabaptists, opposed the use of interest. This was entirely consistent with the principle of brotherhood espoused by the Anabaptists, as well as with the simple economy of the handicrafts and noncommercial agriculture which characterized their economic life.

The economy of Geneva, on the other hand, was characterized by industry, commerce, and banking in which the borrowing and lending of productive capital and its accompanying payment of interest played an important role. In this setting John Calvin approved the use of interest as an instrument of the business economy, suggesting 5 per cent as a reasonable rate. In the case of noncommercial loans, however, for the aid of the brother in need, he agreed with the Anabaptists that no interest should be paid. Interest in such a case, as well as excessive rates for business loans, he condemned as "usury."

In their later history Mennonites have generally come to accept the practice approved by Calvin, a reasonable rate of interest on business loans, with a low rate or none at all for cases where brother is helping brother in need. Mennonite history reveals many cases where loans with little interest, or none at all, have been made to tide families over difficult financial situations; or where in case the need continued even the payment of the principal was canceled. There have been many cases where loans requiring little or no interest have been extended to assist a poor but worthy young family in getting a start in the purchase of a home or means of livelihood, especially if this could be the means of helping the family to relate its life more constructively to the life and work of the brotherhood.

A recent case was called to the writer's attention where a Mennonite student received a loan to continue his education, with the understanding that upon completion of his education, if he entered into direct church service no interest would be required, and perhaps even part of the loan canceled. But if he entered a business or professional career promising normal financial returns, the normal rate of interest would apply.

During those years of American history when money and credit were scarce and when unscrupulous moneylenders reaped huge profits, Mennonite (MC) conference regulations recognized the temptation of covetousness facing some of the members. The Ohio Conference in 1866 declared the "established rule of the Church" to be "that the brethren should not take more than six per cent interest on money loaned, for the reason that it is unchristian and oppressive. It was further recommended to lend to the honest poor and needy without any interest, yea to lend to the upright in heart, hoping for nothing." Eight years later the Indiana Conference agreed that "In regard to interest it was considered that members of our church should not take more than legal interest and the penalty if a brother transgress in this point shall be he shall pay back the amount exceeding the legal rate and confess his fault." In 1884 the Ohio Conference declared that the "Brethren shall not exact more than legal interest," which position was taken also by the Kansas-Nebraska Conference in 1888 and by the Western District A.M. Conference in 1891.

It was formerly standard practice among the Old Order Amish to make loans for necessary purposes without interest and without notes or mortgages. In recent times this practice has not been fully maintained everywhere. G.F.H., M.G.

Utenhove, Jan Nicolaesz, a Reformed clergyman, originally from Gent, Belgium, who lived in England for some time and from 1554 at Emden in East Friesland, Germany. In 1556 he moved to Poland to assist John à Lasco (q.v.) in promoting the Reformation in the country. He made a new Dutch translation of the New Testament, published at Emden in 1556, reprinted in 1559. Utenhove's hope that this translation would be generally accepted by the Dutch Protestants was not fulfilled; the Calvinists objected to the dialect used by Utenhove, and the Mennonites held to Mattheus Jacobszoon's New Testament and the Liesveldt editions, and from 1560 to the Biestkens (q.v.) Bibles. vdZ.

F. Pijper, Jan Utenhove (Leiden, 1883); H. van Druten, Geschiedenis der Nederl. Bijbelvertaling (Leiden, 1895) 544-49; DB 1879, 16 f.

Utikon, Hans von: see Müller, Hans.

Utrecht, a province of the Netherlands. In this province early Anabaptism had a smaller following than in some other Dutch provinces like North Holland and Friesland. In the southwest part of the province around IJsselstein (q.v.) and Benschop (q.v.) there was in 1534-44 a live movement of more or less Münsterite character, which was permitted to develop by the tolerant attitude of Ghysbrecht van Baeck (q.v.), district governor of IJsselstein, whose wife Elsa van Lostadt (q.v.) even belonged to the Anabaptists. In the cities of Utrecht (q.v.) and Amersfoort (q.v.) Anabaptist activity during the 16th century was not very strong. The puzzling information by V. P. in Successio Anabaptistica that about 1535 the Anabaptists of Utrecht set up "a king" obviously does not refer to the town of Utrecht but rather to Benschop.

The present province of Utrecht belonged to the territory of the Catholic bishop of Utrecht until 1528, when Emperor Charles V attached it to his dominions. In 1577 Utrecht broke away from Spanish tyranny and joined the United Provinces of the Netherlands, then governed by William (q.v.) of Orange. About this time Calvinism became predominant in the province and the Mennonites were no longer persecuted. The relative smallness of the Mennonite congregations in this province may have made the Calvinists of Utrecht more tolerant than they were elsewhere.

In the early 17th century there were in the province, besides Utrecht city, Mennonite congregations at Amersfoort, Bunschoten, Spakenburg, Maarseeveen, and Veenendaal, all of which died out in the 17th-18th centuries; from 1754 to 1923 the congregation in the city of Utrecht was the only one in this province.

New congregations arose in the 20th century at Amersfoort in 1923 (circle in 1903) and Zeist in 1931 (circle in 1929); a circle (kring) was formed at Bilthoven in 1932.

According to the official census there were in this province 340 Mennonites in 1859, 1,088 in 1899, and 2,912 in 1947. The total number of baptized members of the Mennonite church in the province of Utrecht was 100 in 1847, 553 in 1900, and 1,337 in 1958. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 263, 269, 402, 402a, 408; Mellink, Wederdopers, 231-41; DB 1863, 94-103.

Utrecht, a city in the Netherlands, capital of the province of Utrecht (q.v.), population (1958) 200,150, with 1,056 Mennonites. In 1568 the States of Utrecht and the magistrates of the city wrote to the Spanish governor Alba (q.v.) that until 1566 heresy was unknown in Utrecht and Catholicism flourished. This, however, is not true either of the city or the province.

In the city of Utrecht Anabaptist views were found by 1530, when some persons had to answer for heretical views, among whom was Dirk Weyman who harbored doubt as to the legality of infant baptism. But probably these views were Sacramentist (q.v.) rather than Anabaptist. In 1535 a few revolutionary Anabaptists from outside were executed at Utrecht, among whom was Walraven (q.v.) Herberts of Middelie, who had been sent to this town to propagate the Münsterite doctrines. Jacob (q.v.) Claesz and Govert (q.v.) Aertsz, citizens of Utrecht, also executed in 1535, seem to have been peaceful Anabaptists. In 1539 fifteen Anabaptists, probably all followers of David (q.v.) Joris and none of them a citizen of Utrecht, were put to death; a number of church robbers executed here in 1540, called Anabaptists in the records, had hardly anything to do with Anabaptism, and the same can be said of a number of followers of Jan Batenburg (q.v.) excuted at Utrecht in 1544-45, one of whom was the notorious Appelman (q.v.).

In general it is true that the early Anabaptist movement had little following in Utrecht before 1550. Yet there was a Mennonite congregation dating from about 1554 which was visited by the elders Leenaert (q.v.) Bouwens, Joost (q.v.) Verbeek, and Dirk (q.v.) Philips. Leenaert stayed at Utrecht several times, baptizing 14 persons in 1554-57, six (or nine) in 1557-61, and 28 in 1563-65. Joost Verbeek administered baptism here in the spring of 1561; among the persons baptized by him were Jan (q.v.) Hendriks, Hendrik (q.v.) Eemkens, who died as a martyr at Utrecht in 1562, and Willem (q.v.) Willemsz. Dirk Philips visited Utrecht about Christmas 1561. In the home of Cornelis van Voordt (q.v.) he administered baptism and the Lord's Supper. Shortly after his visit, in early February 1562, a meeting held in this home was surprised by police; some of those present escaped, but others were seized. Their trials give valuable information about the Utrecht congregation: meetings were held in the home of Aeltgen (q.v.) van Gent, where Joost Verbeek had baptized in early 1561, or in the stately patrician home of Cornelis van Voordt, who was not a Mennonite, but sympathized with the Mennonites, and whose wife and son Jan had been baptized into the church. Also other members received the congregation in their homes. For the sake of safety they assembled at four in the morning and remained until seven in the evening after night had fallen. The membership is said to have been rather small, not exceeding 30 or 40, including some members living in other towns of the province, e.g., at Vreeland (q.v.). A meeting held in 1560 was attended by 14 or 15 persons. In these meetings they read the Scriptures, particularly the New Testament. One of their members possessed a copy of the martyr book Offer (q.v.) des Heeren, which he had bought at Utrecht. A number of those arrested were tortured. The sentences pronounced were rather mild; only Hendrik Eemkens was sentenced to death and executed on June 10, 1562. Others recanted and were banished or sentenced to public penitence. Cornelis van Voordt and his wife Anna were banished forever from the territory of Utrecht, Holland, and Zeeland, and their property was confiscated for the benefit of Philip II.

After this occurrence there is for a long time no clear information about the Mennonites at Utrecht. In 1568-70 six Mennonites were executed at Utrecht but none of them was a native of Utrecht. The congregation persisted in secrecy until the Reformed Church became dominant in Utrecht (1579) and the Mennonites were tolerated and exempted from strict military service (city decrees of May 9, 1581, May 14 and Aug. 14, 1582). In 1592 mention is made of a Mennonite congregation "in which no person is admitted unless baptized by adult baptism, whose behavior is known [to the members] and of whom it is known that he does not use bad language and is not given to drinking, and who does not wrong anybody."

In the early 17th century Utrecht had at least three Mennonite congregations, due to the deplorable schisms among the Dutch Mennonites—Flemish, Frisian, and High German. Among the Flemish, who then seem to have been the largest group, Jan van der Voort (q.v.) was ordained as an elder in 1606 by Jacques Oouterman (q.v.) and Simon (q.v.) Fijts. In 1611 van der Voort was still elder, Hans Wijtses the preacher, and Jan Joostes the deacon. The male membership then numbered 73 and the total baptized membership probably some 150. A house in the Jufferstraat (now Springweg) was bought in 1618; it was remodeled into a meeting-house.

Concerning the Frisians and High Germans nothing is known but that they had united before 1630; on May 19, 1639, this united church merged with the Flemish congregation, which before in 1632 had participated in the general merger of the Flemish and Old Flemish in the Netherlands, accepting the Dordrecht Confession of Faith; Herman Segers, Jan Hendricksen Hooghvelt, and Daniel Lhorens (probably Hovens) signed for the Utrecht congregation.

After the merger of 1632 the Utrecht Mennonite congregation increased in membership; in 1649 it numbered 292 baptized members. It developed in peace until the quarrels of 1661-62. The elders were Abr. Spronck 1639-52, Harmen Segers 1639-63, Daniel Hovens 1640-52, Arent van Heuven 1646-74, Robert J. van Hooghveldt 1646-63, Goris van Aldendorp 1649-72, Jan Andriesz van Aken 1652-1706, Willem van Maurik 1658-73, and Frans Andries 1660-82.

In 1659-64 severe controversies between a conservative part of the congregation led by the preacher van Hooghveldt (q.v.) and a more progressive faction led by the preachers van Maurik, van Aldendorp, van Heuven, and van Aken caused unpleasant strife. This conflict described by W. J. Kühler in DB 1916, which ran parallel with the dissension at Amsterdam (see Lammerenkrijgh), resulted in an initial victory for the conservatives; van Maurik and his group were suspended on July 31, 1661, by 17 elders from outside, among whom were T. J. van Braght (q.v.) and Bastiaan van Weenighem (q.v.); for nearly three years they abstained from serving. Gradually the authority of the conservative leaders declined, particularly after the death of van Hooghveldt (1663). New preachers chosen after his death were not as aggressive as van Hooghveldt had been. Moreover the majority of the members favored the progressive views. For a number of years the progressives had held separate meetings, but finally peace was restored in 1675. In the meantime van Maurik (q.v.) had moved to Amsterdam. During the first years of this conflict a number of writings were published concerning the controversy, including a confession by van Maurik and his friends.

In 1674 the Utrecht congregation joined the Zonist (q.v.) Sociëteit, but a number of most strict conservatives left the church and joined the Reformed. The Utrecht congregation was now led by Jacobus van Griethuysen, a rather conservative man, who however was able to satisfy the moderate progressives. Van Griethuysen served 1674-1713. A period of peace and prosperity had dawned, though throughout the 18th century some friction persisted between the more liberal and the more conservative elements of the congregation. The ministers then were A. van Dulken 1681-88, Pieter Noordijk 1685-1704, Christoffel Tirion 1704-10, Teyme van Hilten 1711-15, Isaak Franken 1713-38, G. de Wit 1714-29, Gerardus van Heyningen 1739-58, Marten Schagen 1741-70, Joannes Cuperus 1758-77, Cornelis de Vries 1771-86, Abr. Wijnands 1777-85, and J. A. Hoekstra 1786-1803.

Only half of these men had received a special training for the ministry; Tirion and Franken were trained by Galenus (q.v.) Abrahamsz, whereas van Heyningen, Cuperus, and Wijnands studied at the Amsterdam Lamist seminary, and Hoekstra at the Zonist seminary. Since then the Utrecht congregation has been served only by ministers trained at Amsterdam Theological Seminary: Petrus Brouwer 1786-1827, Jan Kops 1816-43 (part-time; he was also a professor of agriculture at the Utrecht University), Wopco Cnoop Koopmans 1823-27, Jan Visscher 1828-61, Jan Hartog 1861-94, Sytze de Waard 1894-1911, P. J. Glasz 1911-34, J. J. G. Wuite 1934- , and C. F. Brüsewitz 1946- .

In the 18th century, doubtless through the influence of liberal ministers like van Heyningen and Cuperus, the congregation began to admit nonmembers to the Lord's Supper and to accept persons into the congregation without (re)baptism. Baptism was then often administered privately in the homes of the candidates.

The old (originally Flemish) meetinghouse on Jufferstraat, a simple building, was equipped with a pipe organ in 1765 (dedicated Aug. 4); this was the first organ placed in a Mennonite church in Holland. This valuable instrument was the gift of four members of the congregation. A new church, still in use, was dedicated on Nov. 7, 1773, by Pastor Cuperus. This was once a beautiful building; some of its beautiful rococo style can still be seen in the interior (pulpit and benches for the church board). The organ from the old meetinghouse was installed in the new one and used until 1870, when a new one was built. The church was remodeled in 1867 and 1922, and enlarged for church activities in 1922.

It is not known which hymnal was first used by the congregation; in 1684 the Psalms Laus Deo (q.v.) were introduced and used until 1896. Until then the congregation also sang from the Groote and Kleine Bundel (q.v.), introduced in the early 18th century. These hymnals were replaced in 1896 by the Protestantenbond-bundel, whereas also the Leidsch (q.v.) Bundel was used. In 1944 these hymnals were replaced by the new Mennonite hymnal.

As to the membership, in 1649 the congregation numbered 292 baptized members, in 1700 about 270; in the 18th-19th centuries the number decreased considerably, in 1836 reaching its lowest point with only 80 members; from then there was a steady and even rapid growth: 102 in 1847, 110 in 1861, 450 in 1895, 553 in 1901, 875 in 1926, reaching its peak with 1,064 in 1941, then decreasing to 752 in 1958. Many old family names found among the membership in former centuries like van (der) Voort, Broekhuizen, van Geleyn, Boogaert, Blank(a)ert, van Heuven, van Aken, Hovens, van Oosterwijk, van Maarseveen, Spronck, Fremery, van Dul(c)ken, van Hengelaar, van Pesch, van Singel, van Swigten-heuvel, Verbeek, Wijlik, van Arkel, Oortman, van Maurik, etc., are no longer here.

In the 17th-18th centuries the Utrecht church generously supported, both financially and with the service of its ministers, a number of small congregations in the neighborhood like Bunschoten, Spakenburg, Huizen, Veenendaal, Vianen, Gorinchem, Schoonhoven, and Asperen, all now extinct except Huizen (at present called the Hilversum congregation). Liberal help was given not only to its own needy members but also to other Mennonite churches; in 1702, when the Bunschoten meetinghouse was badly damaged by a flood, the Mennonites of Utrecht had it restored, and in the same year gave 832 guilders to the Krommenie congregation, whose meetinghouse had burned down in 1701. To the Prussian Mennonites Utrecht contributed 885 guilders in 1733 and 800 guilders in 1736.

Formerly the Utrecht congregation owned a considerable library of Mennonite books, the gift of its minister Marten Schagen (q.v.) in 1777; in 1834 this library was sold for 250 guilders to the A.D.S. to be placed in the Mennonite library of Amsterdam.

Since 1936 the Utrecht and Amsterdam congregations have operated the Brotherhood Home (Broederschapshuis) at Bilthoven (q.v.). The Mennonite circle (kring) of Bilthoven is in the care of the pastors of Utrecht; this circle organizes religious services every two weeks in the Broederschapshuis as well as other activities. The church activities at Utrecht now (1958) include two ladies' circles, a youth group, and a Sunday school for children.

vdZ.

H. B. Berghuys, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinde Gemeente te Utrecht (n.p., n.d.-1926); Mellink, Wederdopers, 231, 232, 234 f., 236 f., 238-40; S. Cramer, "De Doopsgezinde gemeente te Utrecht van 1560 tot 1562," DB 1903, 1-53; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 33 f., 102-4, 106 f., 128, 209 f., 212, 237a, 238, 265, 269, 279, 327, 329, 366, 398a, 402a, 403, 408, 559, 594, 786, 788, 1025, 1071, 1790; II, Nos. 2288-99; II, 2, Nos. 494-96, 645; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 270; II, 199; Blaupot t. C., Holland I and II, passim; DB 1863, 78, 80 f., 83-94, 96-98, 100, 102; 1868, 100-5; 1881, 107 f.; 1888, 124; 1897, 166; 1916, 145-95; 1917, 140.

Utrecht-Gooi, Ring, a Ring (q.v., i.e., district organization) of the Mennonite congregations in the province of Utrecht (q.v.) and also those of Het Gooi, the adjacent part of the province of North Holland. This Ring split off from Ring Arnhem (q.v.) in 1947. The Ring Utrecht-Gooi embraces the congregations of Utrecht, Amersfoort, Zeist, Baarn, Hilversum, and Bussum.

vdZ.

Utrechtsche Vragen (Utrecht Questions), the twelve questions drawn up at Utrecht, probably by the Reformed pastor Cornelis Gentman (q.v.), for the examination of Mennonites by the magistrates to establish whether they were orthodox, especially with regard to Socinian (q.v.) views, and to be tolerated. These "questions," sometimes cynically called "Geuzenvragen" by the Mennonites, were applied at Utrecht in 1661, Middleburg 1665, Deventer 1669, and a few other places. They are printed in Blaupot ten Cate, Groningen II, 205-13.

vdZ.

Utt, Michael, an Anabaptist preacher, a tailor of Stams near Innsbruck, who took part in the disputation of Zofingen (q.v.) in 1532. (Gbl., 1913, 50.)

Uutenhove (Utenhove, Wttenhoven), Anneken, an Anabaptist martyr: see Anneken van den Hove.

Uylenburch (Van), a Dutch family of which there was both a Reformed branch, to which Saskia van Uylenburgh belonged, who was the wife of Rembrandt (q.v.), and also a Mennonite branch. Mennonites were (1) Gerrit Uylenburch, who moved from the Netherlands, probably from Leeuwarden in Friesland, to Krakow, Poland, where he was a cabinetmaker for the King of Poland. His son (2) Hendrick Uylenburch, b. at Krakow c1587, d. 1661 at Amsterdam, lived at Danzig c1612-25 and thereafter at Amsterdam, where he founded an Academy of Art, lodging and stimulating young artists, among whom were Rembrandt, Flinck, and Jacob Backer (q.v.). At the same time he operated an art store. A son of (2) Hendrick was (3) Gerrit Uylenburch, b. c1625 at Amsterdam, d. c1690 in England. He married Elisabeth Just, a Mennonite of Königsberg, and continued his farther's art business, which under his leading became known at home and abroad. Gerrit Uylenburch, who was also an artist and made a self-portrait, was considered the best art connoisseur of his time. In 1645 he was baptized into the Amsterdam Waterlander Mennonite congregation. In 1681 he became bankrupt and moved to England. His brother (4) Abraham Uylenburch, who died at Dublin, Ireland, in 1688 where he was a court painter, was probably not a Mennonite. Another son of (1) Gerrit's was the painter (5) Rombout van Uylenburch, b. c1590 at Krakow, d. c1628 at ?. From about 1610 he lived at Danzig, Prussia; one of his paintings was a portrait of the Mennonite elder Jan Gerrits (q.v.) van Emden.

vdZ.

Thieme-Becker, Allg. Lexikon der bildenden Künstler XXXIV (Leipzig, 1940) 16 f.; Winkler Prins Encyclopedie, 6th ed., Vol. XVII (Amsterdam, 1953) 810 f.; H. F. Wijman, "Rembrandt en Hendrik Uylenburgh," Amstelodamum, June 1956; ML III, 242.

Uzbek SSR: see Soviet Central Asia.

Vaals, a town in the southeast of the Dutch province of Limburg, close to the German border. Mennonites from Burtscheid (q.v.) and Aachen (q.v.), Germany, who could not meet there freely, used to meet at Vaals and built a meetinghouse there in the early 17th century. In the 18th century Burtscheid, Vaals, and Aachen formed one single congregation, whose preacher lived at Burtscheid until 1768; he also had charge of the Maastricht congregation. In 1768 Pastor Pieter Staal moved to Maastricht (q.v.); the Burtscheid and Vaals sections did not agree with this change and separated from Maastricht, forming the independent congregation of Vaals and Burtscheid, which, however, never had a preacher of its own, died out by c1793; it had probably dissolved in 1785. vdZ.

Gedenboek der Nederl. Herv. Gemeente van Maastricht (Maastricht, 1932) 380-82; Inw. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 2079 f.

Vadian(us) (von Watt), Joachim (1484-1551), humanist scholar, professor, and one-year rector of the University of Vienna 1516-17, physician, burgomaster, and reformer of his home city of St. Gall, Switzerland, some 50 miles east of Zürich in eastern Switzerland, staunch friend and supporter of Ulrich Zwingli, was the friend, teacher, and finally brother-in-law of Conrad Grebel, whose sister Dorothea he married in 1519. He took a strong stand against the emerging Anabaptist movement in St. Gall in 1525 and succeeded in suppressing it in a short time. He was chosen burgomaster first in 1526 and nine times thereafter, but was the real leader of the city continuously from 1526 to his death. Fourteen of the 69 extant personal letters of Conrad Grebel were written to Vadian 1518-25. They have been preserved in the Vadian Letter Collection in the St. Gall City Library, and were published by Arbenz and Wartmann in the Vadianische Briefsammlung I-VII (St. Gall, 1888-1913). The very important letter of Grebel and his friends to Thomas Müntzer of September 1524 has miraculously been preserved in the collection, though not published in the VB. One letter of Vadian to Grebel, dated Dec. 28, 1524, has been preserved. H.S.B.

H. S. Bender, Conrad Grebel (Goshen, 1950); Werner Näf, Vadian und seine Stadt St. Gallen, 2 vv. (St. Gall, 1944, 1957); E. Egli, Die St. Galler Täufer (Zürich, 1887); ML IV.

Vaertgen van Krommenierdyck: see Dirk Vredrick.

Vaille, Anthony del (de la Faille), was a councillor of the court of Friesland, Netherlands, c1550. A zealous Roman Catholic, he was a collaborator of the Inquisition in hunting heretics. In September 1557 he sent a friendly invitation to the Mennonite Jacques d'Auchy (q.v.) of Harlingen, whom he had met at an earlier date. As soon as Jacques, unaware of danger, arrived he was apprehended, put in prison, tried, and executed on March 14, 1559. Later a few members of the de la Faille family were Mennonites. vdZ.

J. Reitsma, Honderd jaren uit de Geschiedenis der Hervorming . . . in Friesland (Leeuwarden, 1876) 89, 96.

Val de Ville, Alsace, formerly called Weilertal (q.v.).

Valagin, a village in the Swiss canton of Neuchâtel (q.v.), 5 miles north of the town of Neuchâtel, situated on the cantonal highway to Chaux de Fonds (q.v.). It is today an ordinary village. Of historical interest is its castle that belonged to the French Counts of Nemours. This family, descended from the house of Savoy, died out in 1659. Duchess Maria Johanna Baptista, the widow of the last Duke of Savoy, inherited the castle as well as the duchy of Valagin. After her death, the graviate passed to the principality of Neuchâtel and in 1707 it became a Prussian province under Frederick I (q.v.).

At this point Valagin touches the history of the Mennonites of Bern. The continued oppression by the Bernese government, especially in the mandates of 1693, 1695, 1707, and 1709, caused many Mennonite families to flee from the Jura (q.v.), which was a prince-bishopric of Basel (q.v.), to the neighboring Neuchâtel (Neuenburg). The Amnesty Proclamation of the Bernese government, Feb. 11, 1711, which permitted the Mennonites to leave with all their possessions, induced many to emigrate. By 1724 seventeen Bernese Mennonite families with 71 persons had settled in the graviate of Valagin, which then belonged to Neuchâtel. Since Neuchâtel and Valagin had made certain agreements with Bern, the mayor of Valagin complained to Bern about this settlement and about the increasing penetration of "sectarians and Anabaptists" from the canton of Bern, on the ground that the religious unity of the canton was threatened; in 1707 Protestantism was made the only legal religion. Bern supported the request of the mayor of Valagin, and both he and the Council of Bern wrote letters to that effect to Frederick William I (q.v.) of Prussia on April 17, April 26, May 27, and July 6, 1734, and June 4, 1735. The king replied, "These good people must be tolerated as before, both on account of the good testimonial you give them and also because I consider it wrong to persecute for their religion those who otherwise live as good citizens of their rulers." . . . "All persecution is abhorrent to me, and I do not see why these poor people should be driven from the country, since they do no harm to anyone and commit no acts that could disturb the peace of the state. They seem to me deserving of sympathy, and it would always be more valuable to draw them with kindness and evangelical love besides a good example than to deprive them of a home that they have sought in your land. Therefore it is my will that they should be tolerated until I find it good and necessary to command otherwise." Unfortunately the king found it good in 1735 to command otherwise. On July 16 he ordered that those sectarians who had immigrated into Neuchâtel and Valagin after 1724 should leave the land, but all the others should be tolerated as heretofore. He was obviously politically motivated to take this step, for he wished to win the favor of Neuchâtel and Valagin. But Bern continued to support the mayor of Valagin in trying to have the Swiss Brethren expelled. The governor of Valagin, however, refused point-blank to interfere, because the expulsion was based on private interests rather than religious motivations; indeed, sincere thanks were due the Mennonites in view of their industry and good characteristics. In 1739 the agitation against the Brethren set in anew, with the support of Bern. Apparently none were expelled from Valagin.

NEFF, S.G.

Anna Brons, Ursprung, Entwicklung und Schicksale der . . . Mennoniten (Emden, 1912) 251; Samuel Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931); Johann Hübner, Conversations-Lexikon (Leipzig, 1715); Müller, Berner Täufer, 329-33; ML IV.

Valckenier, Johan (1617-70), a Reformed theologian in the Netherlands, professor at the universities of Harderwijk 1645-54, Franeker 1654-68, and Leiden 1668-70, among whose theological writings is a book Anabaptismus confutatus sive controversiarum de religione adversus Anabaptistas succinctum et methodicum syntagma (Harderwijk, 1652); Chr. Sepp (q.v.) wrote a critique of this book (copy in AML).
vdZ.

Chr. Sepp, Het Godgeleerd Onderwijs in Nederland gedurende de 16e en 17e eeuw II (Amsterdam, 1874) 91 f. and passim.

Valdoie, a suburb (pop. 4,000) of the crossroads city of Belfort in eastern France, is the location of the headquarters of the Association Fraternelle Mennonite (q.v.) and of the "Villa des Sapins," a Mennonite children's home.

The Valdoie center, a 10.4-acre property overlooking the north end of Valdoie, was acquired in 1950 by the Association Fraternelle Mennonite (AFM), with the help of a loan from the Mennonite Central Committee, for 4,250,000 French francs (approximately $12,150) plus a 25 per cent sales tax. The postwar MCC children's home at Nancy ("Chalet aux Fleurs") was transferred to the large house on the Valdoie site (the "Villa des Sapins") in the same year. The Villa also became the headquarters of the MCC in France.

In 1950-59 the Villa served as a home for underprivileged children under the direction of Mary Ellen Shoup of the MCC and with the support of both French and American Mennonites. About 35 children between the ages of four and twenty-three could be kept in the home at one time; they were kept for an indefinite period of time until a home in a family could be found for them or until they were old enough to find work. During this eight-year period more than 100 children found a home in the Villa. Contacts have been maintained with most of these through regular visits and a small bi-monthly paper, and many of these return to the Villa occasionally for vacations. Since its purchase, the Villa has been used for many meetings of French Mennonite ministers, church workers, and young people.

A second large building on the site, which was remodeled for use as a center for youth camps and other meetings, and has served as headquarters for the AFM, was transferred from John Yoder, the MCC director in France at that time, to a French Mennonite leader. This second building has been the normal meeting place for the spring sessions of the Conference of French-speaking Mennonites (q.v.), and on one recent occasion it was used for a regular session of the Conference of the Mennonites of Alsace.

In 1953, a third and smaller building on the site was opened as a home for the aged. This home, with rooms for about twenty elderly people, has always been operated by the AFM.

The responsibility for the management of the children's home was transferred from the MCC to the AFM on Jan. 1, 1959. At present, Ernest Hege is executive secretary of the AFM and director of the home for the aged. Mme. Christiane Gaudry is the present directress of the children's home.
A.J.M.

Valebs, Katharina, an Anabaptist martyr, who sealed her loyalty to her faith with a martyr's death at Frankenhausen, Thuringia, in 1530. (Wappler, Thüringen; ML IV.)

Valentyne Ryckele, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, in 1568. She was the wife of the martyr Maillart de Grave (q.v.).
vdZ.

Valerius Schoolmeester, an Anabaptist martyr, executed in 1568 at Brouwershaven on the island of Schouwen, Dutch province of Zeeland. The account on Valerius by van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror is rather brief; a number of additional particulars have been published by K. R. Pekelharing. In 1562 Valerius was a teacher at Middelburg, Zeeland, and with some witnesses traveled to Gent, Belgium, "where with the bent knees of my heart I gave myself up to my God," i.e., where he was baptized and accepted into the church. In 1563 he was married. When his school declined he opened a cloth and yarn shop at Middelburg besides his teaching. In October 1564, after two Mennonites had been executed, he fled to Zierikzee where he lived for half a year, thereupon moving to Hoorn (q.v.), North Holland, where he earned his living with some business; here he became deathly ill, but recovered. In 1566 he was back in Zeeland, probably at Middelburg; he preached at several places, was arrested at Goes but released on Sept. 5, 1566, without recanting; shortly after this a meeting on the dike near Veere, where he was preaching, was dispersed by the magistrates. Concerning the last eighteen months of his life, his arrest, and execution there is no information except that he was arrested about September 1567 and held in prison for more than 60 weeks. Even the exact date and the manner of his execution are unknown. His widow was remarried to Michiel (q.v.) Gerritsz, who died as a martyr at Breda in 1572. The idea (Bibliographie des Martyrologes) that he was a relative of the well-known Adriaen Valerius, the author of the Dutch national songbook Gedenck-clanc (1626), is probably incorrect.

During his imprisonment Valerius wrote two booklets, (a) Van't afnemen ende 't vervallen der apostelsche ghemeente (Decline and Decay of the Apostolic Church), in the 60th week of his imprisonment. Of this writing no copy is extant any more. (b) A booklet, written in the 14th week of his captivity, entitled Proba Fidei oft de Proeve des ghe-loofs, waerinne een iegelijk mensche . . . hem proeven mach of hy int ghelove recht staet of niet (Proof of Faith, . . .). Of this book four editions are known—1569; n.d., n.p.; 1590 and 1595 by Biestkens at Amsterdam; and 1634 by Zacharias Cornelisz at Hoorn (printed at Haarlem). The 1634 edition is followed by an autobiographical letter by Valerius, published by Pekelharing. This Proba Fidei, the first part of which is reproduced by van Braght in his Martyrs' Mirror, is a book of pure and deep piety, an admonition to forsake the world, to bear the cross of Christ, and to practice Christian love. He emphasized personal piety and expected the return of the Lord in the immediate future, i.e., 1568. Would the Lord find faith upon earth? Valerius, who was troubled by the little love of many members of the Hoorn congregation for the church, vigorously refused to take sides in the Frisian-Flemish quarrels which arose in 1565 and which disturbed the Hoorn congregation. His aversion to dogmatic dissensions may have influenced the Zierik-zee (q.v.) congregation to take their neutralist position in the schism (see Stilstanders). vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 371-77, E 726-31; Bibliographie I, 427-46, 673 f.; K. R. Pekelharing, "Bijdragen voor de Geschiedenis der Hervorming in Zeeland," in Archief uitg. door het Zeeuwsch Genootschap der Wetenschappen VI (Middelburg, 1866) 60-66; BRN VII, 521; DB 1870, 51; 1908, 11-14, 62; Blaupot t. C., Holland I, 74, 146; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 246, 330, 453; H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamz (Haarlem, 1954) 6-12, 127.

Valkkooog: see Koog.

Valley View Hospital, Glenwood Springs, Col., administered by the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (MC), was dedicated in 1955. It is a $500,000, 36-bed hospital, with 10 bassinets, serving a large mountain region on the western slope of the Colorado Rocky Mountains, including rural ranching areas as well as a number of small towns. During the 1957-58 fiscal year the hospital had a total of 1,681 inpatients and 2,908 outpatients, with a daily inpatient average of 23 adults. A voluntary service unit has been serving in the hospital as well as in the near-by Mountain View Nursing Home. A Mennonite (MC) congregation was organized in Glenwood Springs in 1956, and its meetinghouse was dedicated in July 1958. Samuel Janzen is administrator of the hospital and Orpha Zimmerman director of nursing service. The hospital was built and is owned by the city. M.G.

Valley View Mennonite (MC) Church, located 20 miles west of Broadway, Rockingham County, Va., is a member of the Northern District of the Virginia Conference. Rural work was begun in this community about 1880-85 by the Northern District ministers, in schoolhouses and in the Caplingers Chapel (United Brethren) near by. In 1922 a frame church was built to accommodate the growing congregation. Preaching services are held twice a month and Sunday school every Sunday. The 1957 membership was 92. Ray Emswiler was pastor. T.S.

Valley View Mennonite Church (MC), of the Southern District of the Virginia Conference, is located near Stuarts Draft, 8 miles southwest of Waynesboro, Va. Services were held in a home and then in a store building in 1923; a frame church was built in 1926, replaced in 1955 by a brick structure. Jason Weaver served here first as a deacon, and then as minister. He is assisted by Paul Barnhart. The membership in 1958 was 109. H.A.B.

Valparaiso (Ind.) Reformed Mennonite Church was founded c1860. In 1957 it had 24 members.

Valter, Gerbrand, b. 1740 at Amsterdam (?), d. Dec. 8, 1818, at Purmerend, married to Maria Houttuyn, was a Dutch Mennonite preacher, serving at Langedijk-Koedijk 1771-?, Hoorn until 1778, Edam 1778-80, and Oostzaan-Zuid 1780-1809. Though he did not receive a theological training for the ministry, he was a man of wide knowledge and trained other young men for the ministry. Among his pupils was Nicolaas Messchaert (q.v.). Valter published Vraagen over de Voornaamste Waarheden van den Christelyken Godsdienst (Amsterdam, 1784). The well-known elder Cornelis Ris (q.v.) of Hoorn was his uncle. (Naamlijst 1810, 75 f.; 1829, 30; DB 1887, 128.) vdZ.

Vancouver, the great Canadian seaport (1950 pop. 344,833; 1958 metropolitan area c500,000) on the Pacific coast, is situated at the southwest corner of the province of British Columbia. Mennonites have been living in Vancouver since 1930. At present their number is about 3,000, including Vancouver's smaller twin city, New Westminster. Most of the Mennonites live in South Vancouver, where the four churches are located—two G.C.M. and two M.B. There is also a small G.C.M. congregation at New Westminster with a church building. There are 5 Mennonite physicians practicing in Vancouver. Two girls' homes, one G.C.M. and one M.B., care for the girls working in the city. The Mennonite population of Vancouver is rapidly growing. H.G.

Vancouver First United Mennonite Church (GCM), located at Vancouver, B.C., had its origin in October 1936. Today it is the second largest G.C.M. church in the province of British Columbia, with (December 1957) 353 members. The first meetinghouse, located on 49th Ave., purchased in 1937, was replaced in 1954 by a new spacious church on 52nd Ave., with a seating capacity of 500. Most of the members live in the city and are employed there. About three fourths of the members are immigrants from Europe, mostly Russia, since World War II. The elder (1957) is J. B. Wiens; the ministers are B. B. Friesen, P. Loetkemann, and H. Goerz. Services are conducted in German. H.G.

Vancouver Mennonite Brethren Church, located at Prince Edward and 43d Ave., B.C., in the city of Vancouver, a member of the M.B. Conference of Canada, was organized on April 25, 1937, with a few dozen members under John Peters. The first meetinghouse was a rented hall. In 1941 the basement of the present church was built. In 1945 the building was completed to accommodate 500 members. The total baptized membership in 1957 was 470, with D. B. Wiens as pastor. In 1952-54 a new church was erected on 59th and Culloden, known as the Frasersview M.B. Church; its membership in 1957 was 449, with P. R. Toews as pastor, assisted by David Vogt. J.F.R.

Varcken, Hendrik Busch, an Anabaptist jurist of Brussels, Belgium, was betrayed by the Davidjorist (q.v.) Reynier Willems and beheaded at Alkmaar on Jan. 23, 1541, although he confessed that he repented having accepted rebaptism. (DB 1909, 26; ML IV.)

Vaser, Jurriaen: see Fasser, Georg.

Vaucouleurs, department of Meuse, France, birthplace of Joan of Arc, the seat of a Mennonite congregation, of which Ligny (q.v.) was the center in 1933. (See also Toul.) vdZ.

Vaughans Schoolhouse Mennonite (MC) Church is a rural mission under the Virginia Conference, located 3 miles west of Lost River, a post office in Hardy County, W. Va. Services were held here for a number of years, probably 1875-1925. At present services are held twice a month in a Brethren church near by. This congregation is a part of the Salem (q.v.) congregation, which is located three miles to the north. T.S.

Vauxhall, Alberta, Mennonite settlement, about 60 miles northeast of Coaldale. In accord with the decision of the Mennonite civic meeting of Coaldale, P. H. Regehr was appointed on Oct. 23, 1929, to investigate possible sites for the settlement of landless persons living in Coaldale. On Nov. 8, 1930, Regehr reported large areas of suitable land available for Mennonite settlement at Medicine Hat and in the Vauxhall district, which would be fertile with irrigation. In 1933-34 both Mennonites (GCM) and Mennonite Brethren from other parts of Alberta moved in. On April 15, 1934, the Vauxhall M.B. Church (q.v.) was organized, which had 86 members in 1959. The Vauxhall-Grantham Mennonite Church (GCM) had 41 members in 1959. In the summer of 1940 of these churches were burned down because of the war spirit, but have been rebuilt. D.J.Th.

Vauxhall (Alta.) Mennonite Brethren Church was organized in 1934 with a membership of 44 when Mennonite settlers came to this area. In 1936 the congregation built a church, which was destroyed by fire in 1940 as a result of arson. In 1941 the basement for a new church building was constructed and used for meetings. The church was completed in January 1949. Peter Langemann was the first presiding minister. In 1959 Henry A. Unruh was pastor of the congregation, and the membership was 86. A.A.T.

Vauxhall-Grantham Mennonite Church (GCM), Grantham, Alberta, had a membership of 41 in 1959. It had no regular pastor. It began c1934. M.G.

Veelderhande Gheestelicke Liedekens, a Dutch hymnbook, first edition 1558, is a Reformed version of the Veelderhande Liedekens (q.v.). vdZ.

Veelderhande Liedekens (Various Songs), ghe-maeckt wyt den Ouden ende Nieuwen Testamente . . . ende op den A.B.C. by den anderen ghevoecht, is a Dutch hymnal. The following editions are known: (1) first, probably 1554, of which no copy is extant; (2) second c1555; (3) third, printed in 1556, probably at Cologne, Germany. The hymns are arranged in alphabetical order. This third edition, which according to Wieder was not printed for the Mennonites but for the Sacramentists (q.v.), includes some hymns by Anabaptist martyrs like Frans (q.v.) van Bolsward. Of this edition a new enlarged edition (4) entitled Veelderhande Liedekens . . . appeared about 1559. The following editions, all containing a number of Mennonite hymns and probably all much used by the Dutch Mennonites, are (5) Veelderhande Liedekens published by Nicolaes Biestkens, n.p., 1560; (6) same title, same publisher, n.p., 1562; (7) same title, 1566, n.p., probably printed by Nicolaes Biestkens at Emden (a specifically Mennonite edition with 257 hymns); (8) an edition of c1566; (9) same title, 1569, n.p.; (10) same title, n.p., 1569, apparently printed by Biestkens at Emden (a somewhat modified reprint of the Nieu, q.v., Liedensboek of 1562); (11), a reprint of 10, published 1575 under the same title; (12) same title, 1577, n.p.; (13) same title, enlarged edition with an appendix, printed in 1579, n.p., probably by Biestkens, now at Amsterdam; (14) same title, 1570, n.p., exact reprint of 12; (15) same title, 1580, n.p., exact reprint of 13; (16) same title, 1582, n.p., probably printed by Gillis Rومان (q.v.) at Haarlem; (17) same title, 1582; (18) same title, Amsterdam, 1582, containing 321 hymns (according to Wieder this was the first complete Mennonite edition); (19) same title, printed by Rومان at Haarlem, 1589; exact reprint of 17; (20) same title, printed by Rومان, Haarlem, published by Cornelis Claesz at Amsterdam, 1593 (this edition and also Nos. 21, 26, and 28-34 consist of three parts); (21) Amsterdam, 1596, reprint of 20; (22) 1598, n.p., reprint of 4; (23) Amsterdam, 1599; (24) Amsterdam, 1608; (25) Amsterdam, 1608; (26) Amsterdam, 1611; (27) Amsterdam, 1624; (28) Amsterdam, 1630; (29) Amsterdam, 1632; (30) a modified edition printed 1664 for Arent Jansz (q.v.) at Groningen, to be used in the Old Flemish Mennonite congregation on this town (332 hymns on 708 pages), contains an appendix called Sommige Nieuwe Schrijftuerlijcke Liedekens, containing 50 hymns on 146 pages; (31) an edition under the modified title Veelderhande Schrijftuerlijcke Liedekens (Groningen, 1700) in which some of the hymns are slightly changed and the subdivision into three parts has been dropped; (32) reprint of 31 under the same title, Amsterdam, 1724; (33) same title, Amsterdam, 1752. This edition shows considerable modifications as compared with previous editions; it contains 301 hymns. It is also entitled Geestelyke (q.v.) ofte Nieuwe Herpe Davidts and was printed for the Flemish congregations in Prussia.

All editions are without notes. The numerous editions of this hymnal clearly show that it was much used, in the Groningen Old Flemish congregations as late as c1750.

Copies of 4, 10, 20, 24, 27, 30, and 33 are found in the Amsterdam Mennonite Library.

Non-Mennonite editions of Veelderhande Liedekens (besides the above Nos. 1-4) are (34) Veelderhande Gheestelicke Liedekens, n.p., 1558, a greatly modified issue of the (3) 1556 edition, a number of hymns by Mennonites being omitted; (35) a reprint of 34, published in 1563, n.p., with a new heading, Gheestelycke Liedekens; this edition was reprinted (36) under the title Veelderhande Gheestelyke Liedekens in 1580 at ? and (37) under the title Schriftuerlicke Liedekens (Dordrecht, 1595).

vdZ.

F. C. Wieder, De Schriftuurlijke Liedekens (The Hague, 1900) 135 f., Nos. XXIX and XXXI; 139 f., No. XXXIX; 142, No. XLVI; 145 f., No. XLVII; 149, No. LV; 155, Nos. LXXII-LXVIII; 157 f., Nos. LXXVI-LXXXVII; 158 f., Nos. LXXX-LXXXI; 159 f., Nos. LXXXIV-LXXXV; 160, No. LXXXVIII; 161 f., Nos. XC-XCII; 164, No. XCVIII; 168, No. CV; 170, No. CX; 170 f., Nos. CXIII-CXIV; 171 f., Nos. CXIX-CXX; 172, Nos. CXXXII and CXXXV; 176 f., Nos. CXXXVII-CXXXVIII; Catalogus Amst., 260 f., 276; H. Dassel, Menno's Volk in Groningen (Groningen, n.d.) 32; Wackernagel, Lieder; Rosella Duerksen, "Anabaptist Hymnody of the Sixteenth Century" (Ph.D. thesis, Union Theological Seminary).

Veelderhande Schriftuerlijcke Nieuwe Liedekens by L. K. (i.e., Leenaert Clock, q.v.), a Dutch hymnal, was published at Utrecht in 1593 and contains 168 hymns without notes on 514 pages. These Liedekens were inserted in an enlarged edition called the Groote (q.v.) Liedeboeck by L. C. (1626). The Veelderhande Schriftuerlijcke Nieuwe Liedekens of L. K. was also called the Cleyn Liedeboeck. (This statement supplements the article Groote Liedeboeck.)

vdZ.

Veelderhande Schriftuurlijke Liedekens is the name of a Dutch hymnal which was an edition of Veelderhande Liedekens (No. 31). The 1752 edition of this hymnbook (No. 32) was made for the Flemish congregations in Prussia. This hymnal, also called Geestelyke (q.v.) ofte Nieuwe Herpe Davidts, contains 284 hymns on 554 pages.

vdZ.

Veen, a Dutch Mennonite family, which had its origin in Zuidveen (q.v.) between Steenwijk and Giethoorn in the province of Overijssel. Its ancestor as far as known was a certain Luitjen (Luutgen), who came here to dig peat. His son Hendrik Luitjens (Lutes) was a lay preacher c1730-d.57 of the Zuidveen congregation of Danzig Old Flemish Mennonites, as were his relatives Wicher Egberts serving until c1767 and Reinder Pieters 1764-d.1802. In the 18th century some members of this family moved to Zaandam. This branch adopted Veen as its family name. Willem Veen (1716-95) left Zuidveen and settled at Purmerend. His son Hendrik (1763-1846) moved to Sneek, where he was a tanner. This Hendrik had four sons: Anthony (1792-1872) was the founder of a large grocery store at Sneek; Willem (1795-1851), who accompanied the Napoleon as a "garde d'honneur" in his campaign to Russia in 1812-13, was later a wine merchant at Sneek, as was his brother Lambertus (1809-99). The other son was Pastor Pieter Hendricz Veen (q.v.).

To this family also belong Lambertus Jacobus Veen (Sneek, 1863-Amsterdam, 1919), a publisher at Amsterdam, Egbertus Veen (Sneek, 1853-Baarn, 1944), a banker at Sneek and for many years a deacon of the Mennonite congregation, and Egbert A. Veen (Sneek, 1870-Zaandam, 1952), a director of the Verkade factories at Zaandam, deacon of the Westzaandam congregation and trustee of the Schoorl Brotherhood Home. Wicher Veen, b. 1920, pastor of IJmuiden 1949-55 and Amsterdam-den IJp since 1955, also descends from this family. vdZ.

E. A. Veen, Een Friesch Koopmangeslacht: het geslacht Veen (Amsterdam, 1947); Naamlijst 1806, 82; DB 1878, 17-33.

Veen, Pieter Hendriksz, b. April 22, 1804, at Sneek, d. Feb. 19, 1896, at Bovenknijpe, a member of the foregoing Veen family, was trained for the ministry at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary and served the congregations of Warns 1832-37 and Bovenknijpe 1832-77. He published De Doopsgezinden in Schoterland (Leeuwarden, 1869). His son was Hendrik Veen (1834-1904), a baker at Bolsward, whose son Pieter Veen (1867-1933) was a Mennonite pastor at Bovenknijpe 1893-1907, Middelburg 1907-19, and Monnikendam 1919-33.

vdZ.

Veendam-Wildervank, two villages situated close together, both prosperous industrial centers in the Dutch province of Groningen (combined pop. c26,000; 273 Mennonites in 1947), is also the name of a Mennonite congregation. The exact date of the founding is not known, but it may be assumed that a congregation arose soon after the peat moors in this area were broken up and Mennonites settled here, c1640. The first Mennonites to settle here are thought to have come from the province of Overijssel. At any rate there was a Mennonite congregation here by 1647. In that year the magistrates of Groningen, to which city the peat moors then belonged, watched carefully that no persons "of Uko Walles' opinion" (see Ukwallists) settled here. In 1661 all Mennonite meetings were forbidden by the magistrates. Nevertheless the Mennonite congregation developed rather undisturbed. Its first preacher is mentioned in 1672. Meetings were held then and long after in a home, the group being rather small. In 1711 a private room on a farm at the Westerdiep was bought for a meeting place. Whether there were originally two more or less independent churches, one at Veendam and one at Wildervank, could not be ascertained. Originally the congregation was mostly called Wildervank, later Wildervank-Veendam, at present Veendam-Wildervank. In the 17th century the congregation belonged to the progressive Flemish branch. It was also called Waterlander.

About 1752 the preacher Willem Schut bequeathed to the congregation his house, a barn, and some land on the Oosterdiep. Meetings were henceforth held in this house. On this spot a simple meetinghouse was built in 1771, which was used until it burned down in 1849. A new meetinghouse erected on the same place, dedicated Oct. 28, 1849, is still in use, though it was extensively remodeled in 1906, having been seriously damaged by a fire which destroyed eight homes in the neighborhood. The present parsonage was built in 1905.

In the early 19th century the financial situation of the congregation was deplorable and in 1825 even the dissolution of the congregation seemed imminent. Until this time regular subsidies had been received from the congregations of Amsterdam, Rotterdam, Haarlem, Almelo, Hoorn, and Giethoorn and even from Hamburg-Altona in Germany. But in 1825 almost all these churches stopped their subsidies, and a group of prosperous members living at Borger Compagnie left the Veendam-Wildervank congregation to join that of Sappemeer (q.v.). The congregation, which in the 17th and 18th centuries had been served by untrained ministers, was unable to pay the salary of its minister. But in this emergency the members banded together and by considerable financial sacrifice saved the situation. In 1840 a house was bought, which was remodeled as an old people's home, and a pastor was called who was trained at the Amsterdam Seminary. This was P. W. van Zutphen, serving here 1840-50. He was followed by A. Winkler Prins 1850-82, J. van der Ploeg 1883-98, F. van der Ploeg 1898-1906, D. Pottinga 1906-8, B. H. Rudolphi 1908-21, M. A. Hijlkema 1922-26, J. J. G. Wuite 1927-32, S. M. A. Daalder 1933-36, H. W. Meihuizen 1936-38, and Th. van der Veer 1939-42. After a few years of vacancy during which the retired minister M. Onnes Mz 1946-50 acted as pastor, the congregation was served by Miss J. M. Luyt 1950-54 and since 1954 by Miss J. W. Zuidema.

The baptized membership, which in the 17th and 18th centuries never surpassed 50 and in 1808 had dropped to 39, from then increased rapidly: 90 in 1830, 142 in 1850, 160 in 1861, 240 in 1900. Then a sharp decline began: 150 in 1926, 116 in 1958. In 1850 the 13 members then living at Stads-kanaal (q.v.) decided to found an independent church. The congregation of Pekela (q.v.), which had merged with Veendam with its few members in 1808, acquired a degree of independence in 1851. A meetinghouse was built at Nieuwe Pekela in 1852, but Veendam-Wildervank and Pekela have always been served by the same preacher.

At first most of the Mennonites of Veendam-Wildervank were peat miners. After the peat had been removed their descendants became farmers; in the 19th and 20th centuries a number of them went into business. Outstanding Mennonite families here are Panman and Nieboer, and formerly also Boer, Boon, and ter Borg.

From 1755 until 1805 the congregation was a member of the Humsterland (q.v.) conference; in 1826 it joined the Groningen Conference. Church activities are now a ladies' circle and Sunday school for children. vdZ.

M. A. Hijlkema, "Uit de Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinde gemeente te Veendam-Wildervank," in De Zondagsbode XXXVIII (1925-26) No. 52; XXXIX (1926-27) Nos. 1, 4, 8, 17, 53; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 2300-9; Blaupot t. C., Groningen I, 149, 209-12, 238; II, 46; DJ 1850, 56; DB 1861, 154; 1903, 191.

Veenendaal, a town in the Dutch province of Utrecht, formerly the seat of a Mennonite congregation, which is found under different names: Veenendaal, Rijns(s)e Veen, Rhenensche Veen, Rijnse (Reense) Veer.

Concerning the founding of this congregation there is no information. It arose in the early 17th century, when the peat moors in this district were opened; many of the miners are said to have been Mennonites. The congregation, which belonged to the Flemish branch and in 1674 joined the Zonist (q.v.) conference, is first mentioned in 1629. Its membership was probably always very small. It was financially supported by the congregations of Utrecht, Amsterdam, Haarlem, Rotterdam, and Leiden. In the 17th century Marten Geurts (q.v.), d. 1685, was its elder. After his death it was served by the preachers of Utrecht and Amersfoort. In 1708-14 Claas Jacobsz was its preacher, and Petrus van Loon 1719-53. In 1754 the congregation ceased holding meetings for lack of members, most of whom had joined the Reformed Church. But though the congregation is not found in the Naamlijst from 1766 on, it was not until May 1802 that the congregation was actually dissolved. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 571, 1071, 1953, 1971, 1975, 1982-85; II, Nos. 1619, 2310-36, II, 2, No. 487; DB 1863, 60, 98-101; 1916, 161; 1918, 126.

Veenland, a Dutch Mennonite family of Lippenhuizen in Friesland, Netherlands. Ubele Ymes Veenland (1873-1941), trained at the University of Amsterdam and the Mennonite Seminary, was pastor of the Tjalleberd congregation 1903-40. He published a historical paper about this church in Doopsgezind Jaarboekje 1919. Ubele Veenland served the congregation of Gorredijk-Lippenhuizen as a treasurer 1827-d.67. His son Eesge Ubeles Veenland (b. 1827) was treasurer of the same church 1867-d.1914. Yme Ubeles Veenland, a brother of Eesge, the father of Pastor U. Y. Veenland, also served this congregation as a deacon for a number of years. His son Pieter Ymes Veenland (b. 1875) has been treasurer of the Gorredijk-Lippenhuizen church since 1915.

The tradition that Pieter Ymes, who in 1815 assumed the family name of Van der Woude and was a preacher of the Gorredijk-Lippenhuizen congregation 1782-1805 and of the Oldeboorn Oude Huis congregation 1805-33, and his son Yme Pieters van der Woude, who served at Nes, Ameland, 1821-33 and Oldeboorn Oude Huis 1833-d.36, were members of this family, is doubtful. vdZ.

Veenstra, a Dutch Mennonite family originating in Veenwouden, Friesland, where (1) Pieter Cornelis was a member and probably a preacher of the Mennonite congregation 1730. His son (2) Fokke Pieters was a preacher at Nieuwe Niedorp 1767-84. Another son of (1) Pieter was (3) Cornelis Pieters Veenstra (1731-77), who was a preacher of the Oude-Sluis congregation 1763 (or 1767)-77. His son (4) Hendrik Cornelis Veenstra served at Helder Huisduinen 1799-1804, Middellie 1804-6, Ouddorp 1806-14, and Den Burg 1814-43. They were all lay preachers. Only (4) Hendrik had received some theological training from Pastor Sytze H. Hoekstra (q.v.). (5) Fokke Veenstra (1812-34), a son of (4) Hendrik, studied at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary, but died during his studies.

There have been a number of other Mennonite preachers by this name who were probably not related to this family: Jacob Ruurds Veenstra served at Blokzijl 1786-d.93 and Djurre Sakes Veenstra was a lay preacher at Akkrum 1789-d.1826, "a man of great ability" (Blaupt ten Cate). Neither had theological training. vdZ.

A. H. Stikker, Een familie van Galjootschippers, Commandeurs op Groenland en Friese Vermaners: Baske-Hoekstra-Veenstra (mimeographed, n.d., 1953); Naamlijst 1794, 63; 1804, 66; 1806, 79; 1808, 88; 1829, 57; DJ 1850, 32; DB 1873, 153-55; Blaupt t. C., Friesland, 250.

Veenwouden, a village in the Dutch province of Friesland, the seat of a Mennonite congregation of whose early history nothing is known, church records having been preserved only since 1790. Unlike most congregations in Friesland it did not join the Conference of Friesland when this was founded in 1695, but much later. It contributed a small amount to the needs of the Prussian Mennonites in 1738. Until 1829 it was served by lay preachers chosen from the membership, among whom were Wybe Aukes 1732-70 and Gosse Hulsinga 1781-1829, who was the last lay preacher here. After four years of vacancy U. H. Jeeps was called from outside in 1833, but he died after only a few months. The first minister educated at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary to serve here was Hermannus Lambertus Bouman, pastor of Veenwouden 1834-64, followed by H. van Calcar 1865-80, W. I. Leendertz 1881-88, K. R. Schuiling 1889-97, S. D. A. Wartena 1897-1902, G. Heeringa 1902-12, C. Nijdam 1912-26 A. A. Sepp 1926-30, B. H. Rudolphi 1930-35, P. van der Meulen 1935-38, A. J. van der Sluis 1939-46, J. Krijtenburg 1946-51, and J. W. Hilverda 1952- .

The baptized membership numbered 25 in 1829, 49 in 1861, 136 in 1900, 160 in 1926, 185 in 1958. About 1866 some members left the church because they were dissatisfied with the modernistic (liberal) preaching of Pastor van Calcar. A few of them returned to the church c1880.

Blaupt ten Cate's view that the congregation was founded between 1600 and 1620 is without solid basis. Until 1860 it was usually called Veenwoudsterwal, because its old meetinghouse was found at "de Wal" somewhat east of the present village of Veenwouden. This meetinghouse was remodeled in 1806, but abandoned in 1816, when a new church, still in use, together with a parsonage, was built in town. This church was provided with an organ in 1895.

The pastor of Veenwouden is also in charge of the Kringen (groups) at Bergum, Giekerk, and Twijzel-Eestrum.

Present church activities are a ladies' circle, a youth group 12-18 (Menniste Bouwers Federatie), youth group 18-25, and a Sunday school for children. vdZ.

Blaupt t. C., Friesland, 189, 248, 306; DB 1909, 61 f.; C. Nijdam, Het Nieuwe Huis (Bergum, 1916).

Veenwoudsterwal, a former name of the present Veenwouden (q.v.) Mennonite congregation. vdZ.

Veer, de (De Fehr, Fehr, Defehr, Devehr, Dever, Devaehr, Du Verre), a widely ramified Mennonite family of Dutch origin found in the Netherlands, Prussia, Russia, and America. The first member of this family of whom there is exact information was (1) Gysbert Jansz de Veer, b. May 14, 1556, at Schiedam, South Holland. He was a grain merchant, who about 1580 may have settled at Danzig, Prussia, thereupon at Amsterdam, where he obtained citizenship in 1601, and finally at Danzig again, where he died on May 17, 1615. One of his sons was (2) Nicolaes (Claes) de Veer (1583-c1650), married to Margaretha Looten, who was a merchant at Amsterdam. Other sons of (1) Gysbert were (3) Abraham de Veer, who lived at Danzig, and (4) Gysbert de Veer (Amsterdam 1600-Danzig 1646), married first to Anna van Buygen (Bergen?), then to Maria van Dijck. (5) Gysbert de Veer, a son of (3) Abraham, was a cloth merchant at Danzig. (6) Cornelis de Veer (Danzig 1636-Neugarten 1699), a son of (4) Gysbert, had a lace business at Danzig. His brother (7) Gysbert is the ancestor of a Mennonite branch in Prussia, Canada, and Mexico. A son of (6) Cornelis was the Mennonite elder of Danzig, Isaac de Veer (q.v.). Abraham Gustaf de Veer, b. Aug. 28, 1815, at Danzig, who was a preacher of the Neuwied Mennonite congregation 1843-58, also was a member of this family.

In Amsterdam the de Veer family came to great wealth. Some of its members were deacons of the church and a few served as preachers, e.g. (2) Claes Gysberts de Veer, who from 1632 was a minister of the Danzig Old Flemish congregation at Amsterdam, as was Cornelis Abrahamz de Veer (d. 1777), who served this church 1737-75. Cornelis de Veer Jr. and Johannes de Veer, both of whom served the Amsterdam congregation as deacons, in 1850-54 and 1855-59, 1865-69 respectively, were among the last male Mennonite members of this family. Of the branch which left the Mennonite Church in the 18th century there are still some descendants living at Amsterdam.

In Prussia the de Veers were found particularly at Danzig, but also at Elbing, Rosenort, and Königsberg. Among the first emigrants from Prussia to Russia was Benjamin de Veer in 1793. He settled at Neuendorf in the Chortitza settlement. An Isaak de Veer is found in 1802 in the village of Chortitz. Members of this family emigrated from Russia to America after 1874. (This article supplements De-Veer.) vdZ.

Nederl. Patriciaat XXV (1939) 270-313; Dutch Naamlijst; church records of Amsterdam; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1615; II, 118-21, 128; II, 2, No. 450; Reimer, Familiennamen, 119 f.; B. Unruh, Hintergründe, 211, 247, 252; Gesch.-Bl., 1956, 29, Nos. 113-15; Who's Who Among the Mennonites (North Newton, 1943) 43; ME II, 320.

Veer, Isaac de, a descendant of the Dutch de Veer (q.v.) family, b. 1673 at Danzig-Neugarten, d. 1745 at Danzig-Alt Schottland, was a lace manufacturer and merchant at Danzig. He was married five times—in 1696 to Sara Siemens (1671-99), in 1700 to Magdalena Suderman (1677-1710), in 1710 to Maria Klemperer (1686-1716), in 1716 to Sara Jantzen (d. 1718), and in 1718 to Maria Danielsens (1697-1756).

After serving as deacon of the Flemish Schladal congregation in Danzig for some years, he was chosen preacher in 1726, and elder in 1737, serving until his death. He was an inspiring leader of the church in a difficult period (Polish civil war, church badly damaged, controversies among the members). He corresponded with the Mennonite leaders at Amsterdam, who at his request contributed financially to the restoration of the church and the old people's home.

Among Isaac's children were Cornelis de Veer (1702-60), who settled at Amsterdam, and Isaac de Veer, many of whose descendants were deacons of the Danzig congregation. Jacob de Veer (b. 1739), Isaac's grandson, was a preacher of the Danzig Flemish congregation 1774 and elder 1790-d. 93. He drew up a new catechism for his church, which was used until 1825. vdZ.

Veere, an old town on the island of Walcheren, Dutch province of Zeeland (pop. c1100), was in the 15th and 16th centuries an important seaport. Anabaptism is found here as early as 1534, in which year some Anabaptists fled from the town to evade persecution. A few of them are said to have gone to Münster (q.v.) in Westphalia. In 1537 a number of Münsterite Anabaptists, whose names are unknown, were executed at Veere. Adriaen Wouters, of Schiedam, after recanting was executed here in 1539 because of his "bad Anabaptist ideas." In 1561 Mennonites are said to have lived in Veere, but it could not be ascertained for lack of documents whether there was a congregation here at that early date. In 1569 the Mennonite Jan Ysbrants was banished by the magistrates. About 1600 a small Mennonite congregation existed at Veere, of which Laurens Adriaensz de Brie was a preacher in 1614 and Adriaen Vervondel and Maerten Roelants preachers or deacons in 1665. It belonged to the Flemish branch and died out shortly after 1671, the few remaining members joining the neighboring church of Middelburg. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 20, 197, 199; II, No. 1267; DB 1876, 86; 1883, 89; 1917, 140; Blaupot t. C., Holland II, 40 f.; Mellink, Wederders, 319, 324.

Veerom, Jan Gerritse, of Rotterdam, Netherlands, was a preacher of the Flemish Mennonite congregation here 1641-d. 52. His son Gerrit Jansz Veerom was a preacher of the same church 1653-55, but in 1655, having more liberal convictions than his congregation, he joined the Rotterdam Waterlander congregation. Shortly after he moved to Amsterdam and became a preacher of the Waterlander (Toren) congregation there, and after the merger with the Lamist (q.v.) church he served the united congregation until 1671, in which year he was censured for frequenting taverns. With Michiel Co-mans (q.v.) he published a booklet in which he attacked the Flemish elder of Rotterdam, Bastiaen van Weenighem (q.v.). Gerrit Jansz Veerom, who was a Collegiant (q.v.), died at Amsterdam in 1680.

vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 1181, 1184; church records of Rotterdam; DB 1891, 4 f.; H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamz (Haarlem, 1954) 109, 113.

Veh, Cornelius, an Anabaptist leader concerning whose life few facts are known. His name indicates that he hails from Switzerland, but the circumstances of his affiliation with the Anabaptist movement remain obscure.

The Hutterian Chronicle reports on his activity in connection with its report of Marpeck's attempt to unify the Moravian Anabaptists, 1541, describing Veh's arrival as a threat to the solidarity of the community at Schäckowitz, although he did not win any followers there.

The Kunstbuch contains a letter from Veh to the Anabaptist congregation "at Appenzell and around Zürich" (No. 24, fol. 215-27b), dated March 8, 1543, which indicates that Veh was in substantial agreement with the congregation but was critical of the scrupulosity of the Hutterites in certain regulations about work, and especially of their insistence on community of goods. The two major sects, he felt, the Hutterites and the Swiss, were a real danger, both practicing community of goods, the Hutterites more than the Swiss. The tone of the epistle is cordial and warns the readers against giving up their Christian freedom and becoming acclimated to their environment. He mentions false Anabaptists but does not clearly define them.

Another reference to Veh in the Kunstbuch indicates an intimate relationship with Pilgram Marpeck. In a letter by Marpeck to the brethren in Moravia and Alsace (No. 3, dated Augsburg, 1544) he calls Cornelius "his beloved son given to him through faith," and admonishes him to watch over the flock of God "and to pay particular heed to freedom among them that all things may be well considered, so that everything may be conducted according to the true redemption of Christ in the church, as God demands it of me and of others" (fol. 8).

The presence of the "Cornelians" on the lists of sects in Moravia compiled by Varotto (1567) and Stredovsky (1600) indicates that the followers of Veh were a separate group of Anabaptists not related to either the Swiss Brethren or the Hutterian Brethren. That they were a part of the Pilgram Marpeck Brotherhood is clear from the absence of their name on Erhard's list, where the Pilgram Brothers are mentioned, as well as from the evidence in the Kunstbuch. Veh's group was probably never very large. W.K.L.

Heinhold Fast, "Pilgram Marbeck und das oberdeutsche Täuferium," ARG 47 (1956) 212-42; Henry A. DeWind, "A Sixteenth Century Description of Religious Sects in Austerlitz, Moravia," MQR XXIX (1955) 44-53; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 224.

Veit, Melchior, an Anabaptist martyr: see Vet Melchior.

Veit tho Pilgrams: see Fijt Pilgrims.

Velde, van de (van den Velde, van den Velden, van der Velde), a Dutch family name found among the Mennonites, particularly at Amsterdam. Jan Jansz van de Velde, whose daughter Cathalijne was married to Christiaan van Eeghen (q.v.), lived at Cortemarck in Flanders, Belgium, as early as 1550. Karel (q.v.) van de(n) Velde, of Gent, died as a Mennonite martyr in 1562 at Hondshoote, Flanders; Raphael (q.v.) van de Velde was put to death at Gent in 1576, and Janneken van den Velde(n) (see Janneken Munstorp) suffered martyrdom at Antwerp in 1573.

In Amsterdam Josua van de Velde was appointed as preacher of the Danzig Old Flemish congregation in 1767, but died the same year. Jan van de Velde, of Amsterdam, was trained for the ministry at the Zonist (q.v.) seminary at Amsterdam and served as pastor at Wormerveer (Waterlander congregation) 1743-66 and at Ouddorp 1766-d.77. At Amsterdam there were Van de Veldes in both the Zonist and the Lamist congregations. Some of them served as deacons, the last of whom was Lucas Cornelis van de Velde, serving 1908-13, 1919-23, and 1929-34.

Jan van (de) Velde, of Haarlem, made portraits of Menno Simons and Dirk Philips c1630, but it is uncertain whether this van de Velde was a Mennonite.

A Mennonite van der Velde family was formerly found at Terhorne, Friesland. Here H. W. van der Velde presented the church with a new parsonage in 1855.

Certainly all these van de Veldes were not related, though there may have been family relations between the martyrs of Flanders and the Amsterdam branch. (Church records of Amsterdam; Verheyden, Gent, 65 f.; DB 1890, 69-71; 1916, 38 f., 60-66.)
vdZ.

Veldthaler, Michael (d. 1587), a Hutterite Anabaptist, perhaps the only brother coming from the ranks of the South German nobility. He descended from an old Bavarian baronial family, had formerly been a Pfleger (i.e., administrator of a county), and was converted to Anabaptism on a visit at Falkenstein (q.v.), castle or village, in Austria near the Moravian border, in 1547. Now he cut all his former ties, joined the brotherhood in Moravia, and learned the trade of joinery at Neumühl Bruderhof. Twice thereafter, in 1555 and 1557, he faced grave dangers in work for the brotherhood in South Germany. In 1560 he was made Diener des Wortes (minister), and in 1587 he died at an advanced age in the Bruderhof of Tracht in Moravia.

Veldthaler's first encounter with hostile forces in Bavaria (1555) is related in detail in the Chronicle. A nobleman by the name of Taufkircher of Schloss Gutenberg (Upper Bavaria), who knew Veldthaler from earlier times and apparently wanted to win him back to the Lutheran faith, asked the Brethren to dispatch this brother to him for conversation and counsel. After much hesitation a meeting was arranged in a peasant's house in Bavaria at night. The situation was most unpleasant and aggressive, with the consequence that the authorities were out to catch Veldthaler and his co-workers. It was wintertime and bitter cold; Veldthaler suffered much from lack of shelter, since no one was willing to let him in. Yet he worked on with some success, even though one of his recently won converts had to give his life for this faith. Eventually he returned to the brotherhood.

Two years later, in 1557, he was sent abroad again to visit Brethren in the Rhenish Palatinate. In Swabia, while walking along the road, he met Count Wolf von Oettingen, an old acquaintance, who had learned about the affair with Baron Taufkircher, and who had both Veldthaler and his companion brother arrested. (As a nobleman he could not allow another nobleman to fall so far away from the accepted standards of this rank.) The two men were now put into a dungeon so deep that they could be reached only by a long rope (with knots to hold on) and lighted by a small hole high up. The Brethren suffered much but remained loyal to their faith, not yielding to overtures by former friends. Eventually, out of regard for Veldthaler's father, the two were released and after finishing their assignment returned safely. The story of this Swabian experience is told in an old hymn of 33 stanzas of unknown authorship; the Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, pp. 545-51, prints it after a late copy of 1791, and the Chronicle used it apparently as its only source. The story was not known to Beck. R.F.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 216; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 378; Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, 545-51.

Velikoknyazheskoye, a Mennonite settlement in the Kuban, Russia, which in 1926 had 5 villages with 1,374 Mennonites and 1,514 non-Mennonites on 16,700 acres of land. Praktischer Landwirt, 1926, No. 5, p. 2; ML IV.

Velius: see Seylemaker.

Velke Levary (German, Gross-Schützen), a village (pop. 2800) in Slovakia on the bank of the Rudava, a tributary on the left side of the March River. The Hutterian Brethren of Moravia were invited to settle here in 1588 by the imperial cupbearer Hans Bernhard von Lembach, who leased them land in return for certain services and payments, and a Bruderhof was established. The Bruderhof at Velke Levary suffered great hardship in the Turkish war of 1605. The troops of General Basta attacked it May 4. Although most of the inhabitants had fled in time, several brothers and sisters were wounded, some of them fatally, and 42, including the housemaster Matthes Pühler, were taken by the Heiducks. Fortunately Hans Zwinkeberger, the barber-surgeon, who had been summoned by the baron, succeeded with the baron's help in releasing the prisoners without paying ransom. But not until 1609 was the new lord, Seifried von Kollonitsch, able to persuade the Brethren to rebuild and resettle the Bruderhof at Velke Levary.

The Thirty Years' War drew Levary into further suffering. On Oct. 23, 1619, the household was robbed twice by the army, and the inmates who fled to the woods were robbed and stripped by the Hussars; on Nov. 3, desperate peasants broke in and carried away all they could find. Scarcely had they set themselves up again, when on July 17, 1620, Polish auxiliaries plundered the brotherhood anew with senseless brutality. On Feb. 6, 1621, the same thing happened again.

When the Anabaptists were expelled from Moravia in 1622 the Slovak Bruderhofs became the places of refuge, although these were also constantly threatened in those restless times. On Oct. 19, 1623, robbers hiding in the ruins of Levary damaged the Bruderhof, and two days later Czober auf Schossberg made a predatory march to Levary and robbed and murdered, until he was prevented by Bethlen's men from worse deeds. Four days later neighbors plundered the Anabaptists and hauled away five wagonloads of booty. On Nov. 9, 1626, about 300 Croats, Walloons, and French broke into the Levary household and plundered, tortured, and raped just as in the neighboring household at St. Johann. Levary fared somewhat better in 1642, when the imperial troops retreating from the Swedish General Torstenson took quarters here, without deeds of violence. On the other hand, three years later in 1645 the Croats fleeing from the Swedes plundered the household in April, and robber peasants plundered it in June, searching for weeks for the supplies buried by the brethren and carrying away what they found.

Scarcely had the brethren with unprecedented energy overcome the consequences of these numerous robberies together with several poor harvests and famine, when another Hungarian war brought new misfortune. In September 1663 Turks and Tatars broke into Protška (q.v.), and the Levary Bruderhof had to be evacuated. The inmates moved into the peasant quarters below the fortress of Blasenstein and remained there nearly nine weeks. On the flight they lost a large part of their goods and cattle, and all their sheep and hogs. On Oct. 11, 1664, German auxiliaries were quartered in the house for a week with 55 horses, and a week later the French, causing several hundred guilders' worth of damage.

The bitterest experience of the Hutterites at Levary occurred in 1685, when their own baron, Ulrich von Kollonitsch, took their goods by violence. He had the wine taken from their cellars, and their plows, harrows, and wagons, and compelled them to do military service. The subordinate authorities exploited this want of order, and took away the products of their crafts. The situation became so unpleasant that no one came to them, and a shortage of working forces ensued, aggravated by excessive forced labor for the landowners. Finally they had to offer cattle in lieu of money, damaging their economy still further.

The Levary brethren abandoned communistic living in 1685, and each one leased his land individually from the barons. They decided that "each should pay for himself." This decision struck the fatal blow to communal living, which had for some time been showing signs of decay in the Hungarian Bruderhofs.

Then there was the additional danger of Catholicization, which had long been looming. Intervention by baronial patrons softened the demand in 1733 to having at least the infants baptized. Since some of the Hutterites had ever since 1688 been complying with this request—not yet compulsory—without being expelled from the brotherhood (a mere reprimand was the penalty), a meeting at Sobotiste (q.v.) decided to obey the command. Also the principle of avoiding the bearing of arms and shedding of blood was violated when in 1741 the Brethren obeyed government orders to furnish two men to serve as Hussars.

The isolation of the Slovakian brotherhoods, who for many years had no contact with their brethren in Transylvania, became their destruction. The barons who had protected the brotherhoods as long as the communal enterprise brought them gain, now treated them like any other taxable subjects, and had no interest in opposing an intolerant government and clergy by defending the Hutterite faith. And finally the pleasure of the brethren in owning personal property and the desire to see it increase overpowered the love for the faith of the fathers; they adapted themselves.

In 1760 came the strict order that they be converted to the Catholic faith, and the Jesuits received the mission to carry it out. Where persuasion was not sufficient, blows and imprisonment helped. A few fled to find their way to the brotherhood in Transylvania; the majority had turned Catholic by 1764. When the Edict of Toleration was passed in 1781, excluding the Anabaptists, about 70 apparent Catholic converts from Sobotiste and Levary emigrated to Russia to join their brethren.

The modern Catholic descendants of the Hutterian Brethren in Levary, Sobotiste, and St. Johann, now called Habaner (q.v.) or Neuhöfler, were living before 1945 in the same places and in the same households, which in Levary comprised forty cabins. They continued to choose an elder and a leader by lot, who managed the (small) capital and the treasury and kept the church records, until recently in German. The ancient handicrafts are forgotten, their books were taken from them, and the memory of the past passed into oblivion. (See Habaner.) After 1945 those who had not turned Slovakian but spoke German were summarily expelled. P.DE.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 302; R. Wolkan, Die Hutterer (Vienna, 1918); idem, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik (552 note 2, with further details); Lydia Müller, Kommunismus; Robert Friedmann, "Habaner in der Slowakei," Wiener Zisch f. Volkskunde, 1927 (illustrated); A. J. F. Zieglschmid, "An Unpublished Hausbrief, . . ." in Germanic Review XV (1940) 81-97; ML II, 44 f.

Vellenberg, a castle four miles southwest of Innsbruck, Austria, today a significant ruin; in the 16th century it had a tower in which Anabaptists were imprisoned. Hans Mädel (q.v.), who lay there in 1561, described it thus: "It is rather deep, I have heard six fathoms; but it has a small window at the top and the sun shines in a while, so that it is light." It was then full of vermin and especially bats. Jörg (Georg) Liebich (q.v.) lay in this dungeon for years (1538-42). Ursula Hellrigl (q.v.), who was arrested for her faith at the age of 18 and spent 5 years in three dungeons, was in the Vellenberg tower for 1½ years. (Zieglschmid, Chronik; ML IV.)

HEGE.

Velsius, Justus (c1505-after 81), a Dutch scholar of The Hague, of whose many-sided life Christian Sepp wrote a long and thorough account, including his relations to Anabaptism. vdZ.

Chr. Sepp, Kerkhistorische Studiën (Leiden, 1885) 91-179; ML IV.

Veluanus: see Anastasius Veluanus.

Velzen, Gerard van (1697- ?), a Reformed minister at Waaxens in Friesland, Netherlands, in 1741 anonymously published a booklet, Noodtwendige Voorzorg der Edele mogende Heren Staten der Provincie van Vriesland tegen de inkruipende Socinianerje . . ., attacking the Deductie drawn up by J. Stinstra (q.v.). Van Velzen exhorted his "brethren in Christ, preachers and members of the Mennonite congregations in Friesland, by whatever names they may be called," to hold to "the God of their fathers, the Trinitarian God, Father, Son and Holy Ghost." vdZ.

Chr. Sepp, Johannes Stinstra en zijn tijd I (Amsterdam, 1865) 231-35; II (1866) 90.

Venatorius, Thomas V. (d. 1551), a Protestant theologian and pastor, a friend of Willibald Pirckheimer and Albrecht Dürer, published a booklet against the Anabaptists in 1527.

Kolde, "Thomas Venatorius," in Beiträge zur bayrischen Kirchengesch. III (1907) 100 ff.; Ernst Heidrich, Dürer und die Reformation (Leipzig, 1909) 29; ML IV.

Venema, a Dutch Mennonite family particularly found in Friesland, both Mennonite and non-Mennonite. Arnoldus (Nolle) Abelsz Venema, b. c1739 at Buitenpost, d. 1801 at Ameland, married to Sientje Kramer, at first a peddler, later a shopkeeper, was a preacher of the Mennonite congregation of Rottevalle c1761-62, the Flemish (Foppe Ones) church on the island of Ameland 1762-68, at Norden in East Friesland, Germany, 1768-74, Aalsmeer 1774-83, Rottevalle 1783-89, Ameland again 1789-d.1801. Returning from Nes, where he had preached on a winter night, he vanished without trace; he probably drowned in the sea in the darkness. Being a self-made man, he was one of those untrained preachers who with great love and no less ability served the church with much blessing. His brother Aldert Abelsz Venema was a preacher at Rottevalle c1774-d.88. Another member of this family was Tjebbe Wiegers Venema, b. 1789 at ?, d. Feb. 29, 1856, at Aalsmeer. In 1818 he was appointed ministerial candidate by the Conference of Friesland, serving 1819-d.56 in the Aalsmeer Zijdweg congregation. He was a man of little education; by private study he learned some German, French, and English. But under his leading the congregation flourished. In Gorter's Doopsgezinde Lectuur of 1856 he published a paper, "Overzicht van alle Doopsgezinden op aarde."

A Venema was for many years a secretary-treasurer of the Dantumawoude congregation in the early 20th century.

De Zondagsbode XXIV (1910-11) Nos. 49, 51, and 52; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 1441, 1451, 1486-89, 2214-16, 2265, 2846; Naamlijst 1829, 25; Gorter's Doopsgez. Lectuur (Kerknieuws) 1856, 29 f.; 1858, 3 f.; DB 1872, 38 f.; 1889, 17, 18, 25; 1890, 26; 1895, 81 f., 84; Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 233.

Venhuizen, a small village between Hoorn and Enkhuizen in the Dutch province of North Holland, formerly the seat of a Mennonite congregation. Elder Leenaert (q.v.) Bouwens baptized five persons here in 1551-54. Probably a congregation was founded soon after, which existed at least in 1567, then belonging to the Old Frisian branch. About this congregation, always small in membership, there is only scant information. It was served by untrained preachers chosen from the membership. In the early 18th century the preachers of Enkhuizen (q.v.) usually served at Venhuizen, but from 1740 it again had a preacher of its own, Klaas Jansz Bakker serving from 1740, and Arent Pietersz Fijn 1775-c1810.

In the Naamlijst of 1829 this congregation is no longer listed, though it still existed, for its last member did not die until 1848; thereupon the meeting-house was sold for 493 Dutch guilders and its property, about 6400 guilders, passed to the Rijper Sociëteit (q.v.). vdZ.

De Zondagsbode XLVI (1932-33) Nos. 3-5, 11; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 411, 1180; Naamlijst; DJ 1943, 44, 45.

Venice. Through a confusion which was finally cleared up by the work of the American scholar H. A. DeWind, it was long thought that there was an Anabaptist movement in Northern Italy which centered in Venice and flourished about the middle of the 16th century. There was even a report of an "Anabaptist Synod" held at Venice in 1550. DeWind has shown that the group thought to be Anabaptist and even labeled as such by its enemies was a radical evangelical, and finally anti-Trinitarian group, which had nothing to do with true Anabaptism (see Italy). This invalidates much of the work of Karl Benrath (see bibliography).

Antonio Rizzetto (q.v.), Giulio Gherlandi (q.v.), and Francesco della Saga (q.v.), fleeing from Italy, reached Moravia, where they became Hutterite converts, the latter two joining the Hutterite group at Pausram (q.v.). Returning to Italy as Anabaptist missionaries, all three were finally imprisoned and executed at Venice, Gherlandi in October 1562, Rizzetto and della Saga in February 1565. The Venetian Archives contain valuable materials on these three Anabaptists and others as well as on the anti-Trinitarian movement as a whole. H.S.B.

"Wiedertäufer im Venetianischen um die Mitte des 16. Jahrhunderts," Theol. Studien und Kritiken LVIII (1885) 9-67; Henry A. DeWind, "Italian Hutterite Martyrs," MQR XXVIII (1954) 163-85.

Verantwortung, a very important term in Anabaptist thinking. The German word has at least three different meanings: (a) moral responsibility for one's acts, presupposing free will; (b) accounting or answer to be given if asked; and (c) reply or answer, with the connotation of defense, mostly in polemical writings. Generally (b) is the major meaning of the term as found in 16th-century Anabaptist literature. The classical locus is I Pet. 3:15; Luther's translation says: "Seid allzeit bereit [originally, 1522, 'erbietig'] zur Verantwortung jedermann, der Grund fordert der Hoffnung die in euch ist." The King James Version has: "Be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you"; and the Revised Standard Version has: "Always be prepared to make a defense to any one who calls you to account for the hope that is in you." In each instance it means: confess your faith publicly whenever asked, "having a good conscience," as verse 16 continues to say. This is one of the foremost virtues of a disciple of Christ; it made the Hutterite confessions shine in gloomy places, and it was their strength and victory.

Before the rise of Anabaptism, Jörg Haug (q.v.) of Juchsen used this popular quotation as the motto of his widely read tract, Ordnung eines christlichen Lebens (1524). Then Peter Riedemann put it on the title page of his great Rechenschaft (Verantwortung) of 1541, when he presented to Philip of Hesse "the reason for his hope." This verse is found repeatedly in tracts and records of trials and inquiries by the world. The Brethren were always ready to give an account, and they never tired of explaining the ground of their hope.

(c) The connotation of "Beantwortung" is used often in Anabaptist polemics. Thus, e.g., Pilgram Marpeck (q.v.) replied in 1544 to Schwenckfeld's Judicium with a heavy volume called Verantwortung (q.v.). Here the term lacks the meaning of (a) altogether.

(a) Only Ulrich Bergfried in a recent study, Verantwortung als theologisches Problem im Täuferium des 16. Jahrhunderts (1938), applies the meaning (a) to a discussion of Anabaptist thought, claiming that this term meaning "responsibility," is the very core of all debates between Anabaptists and Lutherans. He meant to show the implications of the basic decision whether or not man is morally responsible for his acts. Bergfried clearly recognized the exemplary Christian life of the Anabaptists, and then interprets this attempted holy life as emphasizing the problem of "Verantwortung" (responsibility) as the "central norm of all piety and religion." From his strictly Lutheran theological viewpoint Bergfried opposes such an outlook as "anthropocentric" rather than "Christocentric," and thus calls the Anabaptist vision "the myth of the pious man" (201). Bergfried's position is that Christ alone bears our sins and our responsibility, for man is "an enslaved sinner." The ideas of obedience and sanctification of life do not enter his theological system. This interpretation misses the deepest Anabaptist intentions. It is certainly correct that the Anabaptists accepted the idea of Free Will (q.v.), i.e., the possibility of obeying (or disobeying) God's commandments. Hence they never denied that in a certain way man is responsible for his acts, to be sure only after his spiritual rebirth. But to call "responsibility" the key theological problem of Anabaptism is misleading, and rather shows the difficulty which traditional Lutheran theology has in coping adequately with the issue of sanctification and obedience to God's Word. (See also Sweet and Bitter Christ.)

R.F.

Only for the meaning a: Ulrich Bergfried, Verantwortung als theologisches Problem im Täuferium des 16. Jahrhunderts (Wuppertal, 1938); Walther Köhler reviewed and criticized Bergfried's book in Menn. Gesch.-Bl. (1940) 10 ff.; Hans G. Fischer, "Lutheranism and the Vindication of the Anabaptist Way," MQR XXVIII (1954) 27-38.

Verantwortung by Pilgram Marpeck. The word "Verantwortung" appears frequently in Anabaptist book titles and is taken from I Peter 3:15 where the word "defense" (RSV) is thus translated in the Zürich (Froschauer) Bible. This verse is cited more often than any other in the defense or answer of the Anabaptists to their accusers. The word meant "answer" for them, not "responsibility" as it does today.

The most ambitious answer to critics of the Anabaptists was made by the Marpeck (q.v.) brotherhood in the form of the Verantwortung über Casparn Schwenckfelds Judicium. This reply circulated only in manuscript and did not appear in print until 1929, when Christian Hege published an edition prepared by Johann Loserth. In this modern edition the first part extends to 113 pages, while the second part contains 389 pages. It consists of 100 Reden und Antworten (Statements and Answers). The Statements are taken verbatim from Schwenckfeld's Judicium, and the Answers, which vary considerably in length, constitute the reply to Schwenckfeld's criticism of the Vermanung (q.v.). Since the Vermanung was a common confession around which the brotherhood was to unite, it is no surprise that Schwenckfeld's Judicium was taken with such seriousness, and evoked such an extended reply.

The first part of the book deals with two main themes, baptism and the Lord's Supper, but also treats such matters as the use of the term "sacrament," the covenant, covenant member, dissension among believers, the Incarnation, and testing the spirits. It was written in great haste and hence is more concise than part II. Its main sources are the Scriptures and Schwenckfeld's writings. It was written in a little more than a year and was sent to Schwenckfeld at the beginning of 1544, with the note that if this work brought results the authors would desist from writing the second part; otherwise that would be forthcoming shortly.

The second part was written at greater leisure and makes use of a number of sources, one of the most important being the Testamentenerleütterung (q.v.), which must have been published soon after the completion of the first part of the Verantwortung. The Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs, Schwenckfeld's writings, Sebastian Franck's Paradoxa, and the Deutsche Theologie are also used as sources for the second part. While the first part is pointedly directed against Schwenckfeld, the second part has a much wider frame of reference, even though the starting point continues to be statements appearing in the Judicium.

Both the date and authorship of the Verantwortung are uncertain. Kiwiet's claim that the second part of the Verantwortung was written substantially by Leupold Scharnschlager (q.v.), and that he is solely responsible for the section beginning on page 409 of the printed edition, has not been proved by actual literary analysis; since it is built on slender and inadequate evidence it must remain a conjecture. Since both Marpeck and Scharnschlager worked on the Vermanung, the Verantwortung, and the Testamentenerleütterung, it is very difficult to prove who wrote what sections. Individual authorship was not held in high esteem by them, for the brotherhood together studied the Scriptures and their conclusions were always subjected to the scrutiny of the brotherhood. It might be easier to prove that Marpeck wrote the opening section of many of the answers, and that then Scharnschlager furnished a series of Scripture verses connected with the word "Item" at each point to prove the statements made by Marpeck. Scharnschlager's confession to the Strasbourg council in 1534 seems to indicate that he liked to use the concordance style, simply listing a series of Scripture passages, and that he had a predilection for pointing out inconsistencies in the writings of the Reformers (in his confession) and in Schwenckfeld (in the Verantwortung). If this could be shown conclusively (and his few extant letters appear to support it), Gerhard Hein's suggestion that Scharnschlager is responsible for the Testament-erleütterung would gain some support. He certainly must be considered a coauthor of the Verantwortung, for many of the emphases and expressions which occur in his letters are found also there.

The date of the Verantwortung is also uncertain. The first part was completed at the end of 1543, and no doubt the Brethren were already working on the second part at that time. In 1546 Schwenckfeld refers to a large book by the Anabaptists in which they treat the faith of the patriarchs, which he has seen. One is inclined to see in this a reference to Verantwortung II, since a predominant portion deals with this subject (82 pages). The only question would be whether the time from January 1544 to February 1546 would have allowed Marpeck and Scharnschlager to complete both the Testament-erleütterung and Verantwortung II. The most probable solution is that Verantwortung II was written after 1544 and completed before 1556, the year of Marpeck's death, and that after it had been sent to the various congregations for approval it was copied for a wider use among the brotherhood.

The Verantwortung was of limited value since it was directed at a concrete problem, viz., spiritualism. Soon the tension between the Pilgrimites and the Schwenckfelders subsided, and the book fell into neglect. (For its later use and influence see Marpeck.) The modern Christian who reads it finds that many of the problems to which it is directed are very much with the church today. It is the clearest analysis of spiritualism and its dangers which the Anabaptists produced, and even its repetitious style and verbosity do not minimize its value as a source for the theology of the Marpeck brotherhood.

W.K.L.

Johann Loserth, ed., Pilgram Marbecks Antwort auf Kaspar Schwenckfelds Beurteilung des Buches der Bundesbezeugung von 1542 (Vienna and Leipzig, 1929); Jan J. Kiewit, Pilgram Marbeck (Kassel, 1957) 74-76; Torsten Bergsten, "Pilgram Marbeck und seine Auseinandersetzung mit Caspar Schwenckfeld," Kyrkohistorisk Arsskrift, 1957 and 1958, 56-67.

Verantwortung, the popular shortened title of Clare verantwortung ettlicher Artickel/ so jetz durch jrre geyster schriftlich vnnnd mündtlich aussschweben/ von wegen der ceremonien dess Newen Testaments/ als Predigen/ Tauffen/ Abentmal/ Schrift etc. This booklet was published in 1531, without indication of its author or locale. Both Camill Ger-bert and Alexander Nicoladoni, who had never seen the book, erroneously attributed it to Johann Bün-derlin (q.v.). It was clearly not written by Bün-derlin since it attacks Bün-derlin's position.

The Verantwortung discusses three points. The first is a reply to the assertion of certain "erring spirits" that the children of God should not use the ceremonies of the New Testament, baptism, Lord's Supper, Scriptures, etc., any longer because of the abuse into which they had fallen. The author's reply is that abuse is not sufficient basis for the cessation of ceremonies, and that length of time does not pervert ceremonies (Bün-derlin used this argument), but rather that God even works sometimes to re-establish correct order. To prove this the author somewhat reluctantly adduces evidence from the Old Testament, with the explanation that the erring spirits argue mainly from the Old Testament.

While the first point is discussed in 4½ pages, the second point is given 11½ pages. The author deals here with the assertion by the "erring spirits" that since the apostles are dead there is no longer a command or witness of the Scriptures for the ceremonies, hence they are invalid unless an external command would come that they ought to be continued. The reply to this argument is that then the Lord's Prayer will also need to be discontinued. He rejects the argument that the words of the Bible are not meant for us, and insists that the last days are the days after the life of Christ, and that no special signs are now needed. He criticizes also the excessive individualism of these "spirits" and reminds them that the gifts of the Holy Spirit are given for the common good of the church, and not for individual consumption.

The third argument, 17 pages, deals with the continuity of apostolic authority. The "erring spirits" insist that the apostles were in no position to hand down their authority to their successors; they only called bishops and there it ended. The reply to this objection is an excellent statement on the nature of authority in the church. Christian ministers do not derive their authority from an external act, but from the authority of Christ, who "thrusts His spirit into the bosom of their hearts" as He did to the eleven. In a limited way the author deals also with the accusation that the Anabaptists were making an idol of the ceremonies.

The stress on the order of Christ, the voluntary nature of baptism, footwashing, church leadership, baptism as suffering (sea of tribulation: "meer der trübsal"), all point in the direction of this being an Anabaptist booklet. But where was it published and by whom? The evidence is strong that it is directed against Bün-derlin, certain phrases being used which also occur in Bün-derlin's writings. If it was directed against him, it likely was written by someone at Strasbourg in 1531. Since Marpeck (q.v.) was then in Strasbourg and published two booklets in 1531 it is possible that it was written by him. An argument against his authorship is that the censors reported that one of his two books of 1531 openly asserted Anabaptist doctrine and contained the information that he himself had been baptized. Such information is not contained in the Clare Verantwortung, but is found in the other booklet, Ain klarer unter- richt (see Unterricht). One copy is known to exist in the Stuttgart State Library (microfilm in GCL). W.K.L.

Camill Gerbert, Geschichte der Strassburger Sectenbewegung zur Zeit der Reformation 1524-1534 (Strasbourg, 1889) 96; A. Nicoladoni, Johannes Bänderlin (Berlin, 1893) 126; W. Klassen, "Pilgram Marpeck's Two Books of 1531," MQR XXXIII (1959) 18-30.

Verband badisch-württembergisch-bayrischer Mennonitengemeinden e.V. is the new name given to the Badisch-württembergisch-bayerischer Gemeindeverband (q.v.) at the time of its reorganization on March 24, 1949, with legal office at Heilbronn, Württemberg. Christian Landes, Lautenbach, has been the chairman and treasurer since 1949, but the office of chairman is only for legal purposes and has no ecclesiastical significance. The executive officer is Ulrich Hege, Reichen, whose title is secretary. In 1958 the Verband consisted of 21 congregations with 1,585 baptized members, distributed as follows by provinces: Palatinate 2 congregations, 130 members; Baden 7, 486; Württemberg 6, 627, and Bavaria 6, 342. The increase over 1951 was due largely to the inclusion of the refugee congregation at Backnang, Württemberg, with 292 members, chiefly of Galician origin. Eichstock, Bavaria, formerly independent, and Nürnberg, Bavaria, were also taken in. H.S.B.

Verband der Bürger holländischer Herkunft (Association of Citizens of Dutch Extraction) was originally known as the Verband der Gemeinden und Gruppen des Südens Russlands, the word Gemeinden referring to villages rather than to congregations. On Feb. 19, 1921, the church and civil leaders (representatives) of the Molotschna district in South Russia, including about 60 villages (besides three individual farms) covering a Mennonite population of about 28,000, met in the church at Alexanderwohl under the leadership of Elder G. Plett (q.v.) of Hirschau, with the purpose of finding some basis on which the young men of the brotherhood in the new Soviet nation could maintain their non-resistant position. A committee consisting of B. B. Janz, chairman, Dietrich Richert, H. Bartel, and A. Fast was chosen to form an organization to deal with the government in carrying out this purpose. The legality of the organization and its civil rights had to be confirmed by a government charter. In Kharkov, the capital of the Ukraine, the word "Mennonite" caused some objection as a religious term, and had to be dropped after a hard struggle. Then the name above was adopted to cover the Mennonites of the Ukraine exclusively with their population of about 60,000, and was chartered in the spring of 1922. The entire constitution was later (about 1924) adopted into the laws of the nation because of a financial loan to the Association from Holland, in the hope of obtaining more such loans from other countries. For religious concerns another committee was later chosen, with Elder Jakob Rempel as chairman. The 30,000-40,000 Mennonites living elsewhere in Russia followed the example of those in the Ukraine and founded the All-Russian Mennonite Agricultural Union (AMLV, q.v.), with Peter Froese and C. F. Klassen (q.v.) as leaders. Every year a congress of Mennonites was held in the Ukraine with the permission of the government and in later years with a representative of the government present, to do the business of the Association and to elect the leadership. The most important activities of the Association concerned the economic welfare of the settlements, especially in cattle raising (the German Red cow), the trade of the co-operatives, the elimination of violence on the part of local Soviet officials, securing foreign loans, and also securing permission for the emigration of many Mennonite refugees (which, however, soon became general), at first to Paraguay, then to Canada. Permission for this emigration was secured on April 22, 1922, by the Association. Each Mennonite settlement in the Ukraine formed a local chapter of the central association. The most important of these were in Halbstadt, Gnadenfeld, Chortitza, Zgradovka, and Memrik, with other smaller groups. They were outstandingly successful economically. The first emigrant train with about 700 left Chortitza in June 1923, via Moscow, to Libava for embarkation on a Canadian Pacific steamer.

Not a single communist was a member or an officer in this association. It enjoyed the unquestioned confidence of all the Mennonites. In brief, the Association became the first link in the rescue of the Mennonites from Russia. It was able to function until Feb. 19, 1926, the date of the last congress in Kharkov, where Janz resigned the leadership, and another committee was chosen, consisting of Hermann Dück, Peter Funk, etc., all of whom, with Philipp Cornies, the young assistant of Janz for many years, were sent into exile soon after. Thus the Association was liquidated as a step in the decline of the Mennonite settlements, which were now without legal rights. Janz managed to secure his passage for escape from Russia immediately following the congress of 1926, and in the eleventh hour escaped to Canada in June 1926. B.B.J.

Verbeek (Verbeeck), a rather common Dutch family name both Mennonite and non-Mennonite. Joos(t) (q.v.) Verbeeck (Joos de Cruysere), a Mennonite elder, suffered martyrdom at Antwerp, Belgium, in 1561. In the 17th and 18th centuries there were a number of Verbee(c)ks in both the Lamist and Zonist congregations of Amsterdam. They very likely stemmed from Mennonites who had left Flanders because of persecution c1580. In Amsterdam the Verbe(c)ks were outstanding businessmen. Some of them served as deacons. Since the early 19th century there have been no Verbeeks among the Amsterdam Mennonites. vdZ.

Verbond (league, covenant), a term much used by the early Dutch Anabaptists, who often called themselves Bondgenoten (q.v.), i.e., Covenanters; the expression "van den Verbonde" is frequently found in early Dutch Anabaptist writings. It was especially used by the revolutionary Anabaptists, particularly by the Batenburgers, who were said to be "int verbond van Batenburg." This usage has misled Karel Vos and A. F. Mellink to considering the "Verbond" to mean a social league to overthrow the political order. But this is not right; as Lowell H. Zuck has pointed out in his Yale dissertation, Anabaptist Revolution Through the Covenant in Six- teenth Century Continental Protestantism (New Haven, 1954), "Their motives for revolutionary activity were not nihilistic, but religious. Their purpose was the building of a new society, the kingdom of God on earth, which God would immediately inaugurate eschatologically, after the destruction of the old. Their own revolutionary covenant signaled the end of the Old age and identified those who participate in the New age." The word is derived from the Bible (Jer. 31:31-33; Rom. 11:27, and many other places) and it was also used by the peaceful Anabaptists, among whom "verbond" according to I Peter 3:21, meant a close relation to God, a covenant with God (Christ), as is clearly pointed out by the martyr Jan (q.v.) Pauw (Grosheide, Verhooren, 50), who said that baptism is a certification or sign of the "verbond," and that all who are in the "verbond" are also baptized, and that the "verbond" is nothing other than that they promise to walk in the ways of God, without deviating from them. (See also Covenant.)

vbZ.

Verbond der vier Steden, Het (The League of the Four Towns), also called Ordinantie, is an alliance made about 1560 by the ministers of the Mennonite congregations of Franeker, Harlingen, Leeuwarden, and Dokkum in the Dutch province of Friesland. In this Ordinantie of 19 articles they regulated their relations and passed the resolutions that the money for the care of the poor in all four churches would be provided from a common fund, and that the ministers of any of these congregations were also entitled to serve in the other three. The intention of this league was unquestionably laudable, but it was a serious error to conclude it among the ministers without consulting the membership and to keep it secret. Trouble arose when in Franeker Jeroen Tinnegieter (q.v.), a Flemish immigrant, was chosen as preacher, who was not accepted by the ministers of Harlingen, Leeuwarden, and Dokkum, where according to the terms of the League Tinnegieter was entitled to preach. Then the secret league came out into the open and particularly the members of Flemish descent in the congregations of Franeker and Harlingen were outraged at the abridgment of their rights. The result was the Flemish-Frisian (q.v.) quarrels in 1566-67, which ended with a schism.
vbZ.

DB 1893, 1-90; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 464; BRN X, 536 ff.; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 397 f., 407-13.

Verbondt van Eenigheydt (Alliance of Unity), an arrangement between a number of Dutch Mennonite churches made at Utrecht on Sept. 9, 1664, and ratified by 98 ministers and deacons, representing 28 churches in a meeting held at Leiden Oct. 1 and 2, 1664. This Alliance meant a concentration of the conservatives after the Dutch Mennonites had been divided by the Lammerenkrijg (q.v.) into a more progressive (Lamist) and a more conservative (Zonist) part. The arrangement is embodied in six articles, which state that the existing and approved confessions of faith that were in harmony with the Scriptures were to be maintained; ministers who opposed these confessions were to be suspended, and newly chosen ministers were to subject themselves to the authority of the confessions. The representatives promised each other to stand together, to maintain the basic creed of the church and to invite other churches to join the Alliance. A booklet containing the minutes of the Utrecht and Leiden meetings and inviting similarly minded churches to join the Alliance was published under the title Het Oprecht Verbondt van Eenigheydt . . . met minnelijke aenbiedinge aen alle die soo gesint zijn (Rotterdam, 1664; reprints Amsterdam 1665, Haarlem 1700, Rotterdam 1739). The Verbondt van Eenigheydt was not a confession of faith as is stated by Herman Schijn, but an agreement to maintain the approved confessions. This Alliance of the conservatives, soon generally called Zonists (q.v.), in course of time developed into the Zonist Conference (Sociëteit).

vbZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 706, 885-87; DB 1863, 60; 1898, 18; Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis II (1744) 212; H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamsz (Haarlem, 1954) 104-8.

Verbrugge, a former Dutch Mennonite family, descended from Mennonite refugees from Flanders, Belgium, was found in the 17th and 18th centuries at Rotterdam, Haarlem, Amsterdam, and Leiden. Some of its members served as deacons. The Amsterdam branch of this family operated an important trade house. Cornelis Verbrugge, d. 1762 at Leiden, was a physician at Rotterdam from 1736 and for many years a treasurer of the Mennonite congregation.
vbZ.

Verburg, Jan Dionys, d. Oct. 21, 1692, at Rotterdam, Holland, where he was a member of the Waterlander Mennonite congregation. He was, however, more interested in the Collegiant (q.v.) movement than in his church, being one of the founders of their "college" in his home town. In the Collegiant movement he played an influential part. He obviously was a man of broad views, who sometimes even preached for the Remonstrant (q.v.) congregation of Rotterdam.
vbZ.

J. C. van Slee, De Rijsburger Collegianten (Haarlem, 1895) passim; C. B. Hylkema, Reformatoren, 2 vv. (Haarlem, 1900-2) passim.

Vercolie (Vercolje, Vercoilgen, Verquoilge): see Verkolje.

Verdrag der Broeders tot Embden (Agreement of the Brethren at Emden) is the agreement made on April 4, 1579, at Emden in East Friesland, Germany, by Hans de Ries and seven Waterlander leaders, representatives of the Island (i.e., De Rijp), Purmerend, Amsterdam, and Rotterdam on the one hand and the congregation of Emden on the other. This agreement was very important in the development of the Waterlander branch. Though the views of the Emden brethren on the Incarnation differed somewhat from the Waterlander views, the Emden congregation wholeheartedly joined in the union. The original copy of the "Verdrag," signed by the representatives, is found in the Amsterdam Mennonite Archives. It was published by Blaupot ten Cate in Groningen, 264-70. (Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 365 f.; DB 1864, 21; 1917, 14.)
vbZ.

Verduin (Verduyn), a Dutch Mennonite family found in Amsterdam (Lamist church) in the 17th and 18th centuries. A few of them served as deacons. Pieter Adriaens Verduyn (c1625-1700) was a noted physician at Amsterdam, who was called to attend the king of Denmark; he wrote a number of medical works. Another member of this family was Abraham Verduin (q.v.). (N.N.B.Wb. III, 1283 f.; church records of Amsterdam.)

vdZ.

Verduin, Abraham (Amsterdam, Dec. 1, 1668-Koog aan de Zaan, 1756), was trained for the ministry by Galenus (q.v.) Abrahamsz at Amsterdam. He was appointed ministerial candidate by the church board of the Amsterdam Lamist congregation and accepted a call of the Koog-Zaandijk congregation, which caused some trouble with the trustees of the Amsterdam congregation, who wished Verduin to be a preacher of their church. Verduin served at Koog-Zaandijk for nearly sixty years, from 1698 until his death. He was the first formally trained and salaried minister of this congregation. Until 1726 he received a salary of 600 Dutch guilders, but after this year he refused the payment, henceforth serving "for love." He probably practiced some other profession which enabled him to do without the salary. Verduin served with great ability and much blessing. In April 1728 his colleague, Dirk Simonsz Moeriaen(s), a lay preacher, died. Verduin preached his funeral sermon, Het Heil in den Dood (Haarlem, n.d.). Besides this sermon he published a large number of books: Kort Onderwerp van de Voornamste Geloof-zaaken (Amsterdam, 1707), Kort onderwys voor Geloofs-leerlingen (Amsterdam, 1714), Ootmoedig Gebed van de Hebreeuwse Kerk in de Woestyn, a sermon (Amsterdam, 1718), Christelyke Godgeleerheid, 2 vv. (Haarlem, 1729), Examen Argumentorum (Amsterdam, 1729), in which treatise he opposed the Remonstrant professor van Cattenburgh (q.v.), who had attacked the Mennonites because they refused to take an oath, Geloofsbelydenis volgens de Gronden der Doopsgezinden (Haarlem, 1729), Christelyk Onderwys in Geloof en Zeden (Haarlem, 1734, 2d ed. Amsterdam, 1739), Korte Schets van het Christelyk Geloof (Haarlem, 1734, repr. Amsterdam, 1739, Haarlem, 1741, ibid., 1754), De Pligt der Barmhertigheid (Haarlem, 1739), a sermon preached on the occasion of an offering in behalf of the Prussian Mennonites, Brief aan Koenraad Bremer (Amsterdam, 1740), Paulus apostolise vermaaning aan Timotheus (Haarlem, 1742), Verhandeling van het Onderscheid tussen de Reden en het Geloof (Amsterdam, 1746), Leerredenen (sermons) Over de Geboorte, het Lyden, Sterven en Begraaven van onzen Heere en Zaligmaker Jesus Christus (Amsterdam, 1752).
vdZ.

Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis III, 497-508 (with portrait); DB 1918, 57, 58, 61, 62, 64-67; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 2033, 2537 f.

Vereeniging tot Handhaving van Gods onfeilbaar Woord in de Doopsgezinde Gemeente van Amsterdam was an association of the orthodox members of the Amsterdam Mennonite Church, founded in 1891 when liberal preaching and teaching became predominant in this church. In 1892 this group, which never exceeded 100 members, called C. P. van Eeghen, Jr. (q.v.) as its pastor. It rented a hall where van Eeghen and a few other pastors preached regularly and where they held the Lord's Supper and had a Sunday school for children. In 1912 after the death of van Eeghen, considering that "the association was not as necessary as it had been before," the association was dissolved. (DB 1912, 224; annual reports of the Vereeniging.)

vdZ.

Vere(e)niging tot ondersteuning van Doopsgezinde We(e)zen van onvermogene gemeenten (Dutch Association for the Relief of Mennonite Orphans of Impecunious congregations) was at first a subdivision of the Haarlemsche Vereeniging (see Vereeniging van Doopsgezinde Gemeenten), founded in 1860. Since 1923 the association, to which most Dutch congregations contribute, has acted as an independent body.
vdZ.

Vereeniging van Doopsgezinde Gemeenten (Union of Dutch Mennonite congregations), better known under its common name "Haarlemsche Vereeniging," was founded at Haarlem in 1860. Its objectives were fivefold: (a) to regulate the cases when poor members, financially supported by the church, moved to another congregation; it was agreed that in such circumstances the poor members be supported for ten years by the congregation from which they came, unless the church to which they moved was willing to take over the relief, which was stipulated; (b) to arrange the question of church letters, when a member moved to another congregation; though a Dutch Mennonite can remain a member of a congregation after he has left its territory, it is considered better that he join the church of his residence; (c) the care of Mennonite orphans, particularly in impecunious congregations, by founding an Orphans' Fund; by 1905 this fund amounted to 45,000 Dutch guilders; (d) to consider and promote the founding of new congregations; this project was discussed in the yearly meeting of 1864; (e) to take care of Mennonites living in the Diaspora, first discussed in 1894.

In 1860 69 congregations joined the association, soon followed by others. At first meetings were held each year to discuss the different problems. As its various objectives were gradually committed to subdivisional committees, meetings were held only every fifth year, the last time in July 1925. When the care of members in the Diaspora (see Verstrooiing) was assumed by the A.D.S. (q.v.) in 1923, the Vereeniging van Doopsgezinde Gemeenten was dissolved, its subdivision for the care of the orphans becoming an independent association. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1001; II, 2, pp. 163 f.; DB 1861, 94-102; 1876, 69; 1894, 74 f., 79, 110; 1905, 196 f., 200.)
vdZ.

Vereeniging van Doopsgezinde Gemeenten in Gelderland, Overijssel, Utrecht, en de Naburige in het Koninkrijk Pruisen, founded at Zwolle in 1858: see Zwolsche Vereeniging.

Vereeniging van Doopsgezinde Gemeenten in Zuid-holland en Zeeland: see Zuidhollands-Zeeuwse Ring.

Vereeniging voor Gemeentedagen: see Broederschapswerk.

Vereinigung der Mennoniten-Gemeinden im Deutschen Reich (since 1934: der Deutschen Mennonitengemeinden) was founded in Berlin in 1886 by 18 German Mennonite congregations (12 of North Germany and 6 of the Palatinate), a prior attempt at Friedelsheim in 1874 having failed. Since 1934 all German Mennonite congregations but those of the Badisch-Württembergisch-Bayrischer Gemeindeverband (q.v.) have belonged to the Vereinigung; i.e., now about five sixths of the c12,000 Mennonites in Germany. The original statutes of 1886 were revised in 1902, 1914, and 1934. In Hamburg in 1897 and 1902 the Vereinigung was incorporated; in 1922, also in Hamburg, it secured the status of a public corporation. An executive committee, a board of directors, and the assembly of representatives of the participating congregations are entrusted with the management. Presidents have been Hinrich van der Smissen of Hamburg 1886-96 and 1902-27; Ernst Weydmann of Crefeld 1896-1902; Hans Müller of Crefeld 1927-32; Emil Händiges of Elbing and later Monsheim 1932-53; Otto Schowalter of Hamburg 1952-58; Abraham Braun of Nierstein/Rhein since 1958.

The regular triennial assemblies met in Berlin in 1887, 1890, and 1893; Hamburg 1896; Berlin 1899; Hamburg 1902; Berlin 1905; Danzig 1908; Crefeld 1911; Hamburg 1914, 1917, 1920, and 1926 (also an extraordinary assembly in 1927); Berlin 1929, 1932, and 1937; Marienburg 1942; Thomashof 1947; Branchweilerhof 1949; Hamburg 1952; Munich 1955; and Frankfurt/Main 1958.

The liberal city congregations of North Germany had started the Vereinigung and wanted it to follow the model of the Dutch A.D.S. (q.v.), but the German Mennonites of 1886 lived under other conditions than the Dutch who had founded the A.D.S. 75 years earlier. The founding German congregations were divided into two types: those under a rationalistic and those under a pietistic influence. So the plan of a Berlin theological professorship failed at the very beginning. The only accomplishment in this field was scholarships for Mennonite students of theology, of which a few were given. But whereas all Dutch Mennonite students had the same teachers and so more or less the same attitudes, since they all attended the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary (q.v.), the German students developed more or less as many attitudes as they had teachers. Even in 1934, when the situation in the Third Reich made unity especially desirable, and in 1951, when the flight to the West resulted in a new situation for North Germany, the differences could not be overcome.

World War I and the subsequent inflation, as well as World War II and the subsequent currency reform, twice ruined the finances of the Vereinigung. The Vereinigung had started to gather an endowment fund. In 1908 alone Bernhard Brons Jr. (q.v.) at Emden and his son-in-law Dr. Jan van Delden at Gronau gave M 10,000 each for the Predigerfonds. The assets at the end of 1913, the last year of peace, had reached M 336,173; ten years later only one fourth remained: RM 72,977. And when at the end of 1938, the last year of peace, after some 15 years RM 92,315 had been reached, 10 years later not even one twelfth remained: DM 6,764.

Notwithstanding these handicaps the Vereinigung could do rather valuable work. By means of a "Predigerfonds" (q.v.) it raised the salaries of ministers in urgent cases. By means of a "Prediger-Ruhegehaltsskasse" and a "Prediger-Witwenkasse" it supplied small pensions for the ministers and their widows. A publications committee provided periodicals for ministers and procured subsidies for printing the Mennonitische Blätter (q.v.), the Mennonitisches Lexikon (q.v.), and several books, the latter by a prize competition which produced the Kurze Geschichte der Mennoniten by Christine Hege (q.v.), published in 1909. The Vereinigung backed the Comeniusgesellschaft (q.v.) and the Mennonitischer Geschichtsverein (q.v.). It has been connected with the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches since 1930, and has been a member of the World Council of Churches since 1948. Delegates are sent to ecumenical meetings, as far as means permit. The Vereinigung was a co-founder of the Arbeitsgemeinschaft der christlichen Kirchen in Deutschland in 1948.

A relief agency, the Hilfswerk der Vereinigung der Deutschen Mennoniten-gemeinden (q.v., HV-DM), was started in 1946 for the British and the French Zones while the Christenpflicht (q.v.) of the Gemeindeverband was responsible for the American Zone.

The Vereinigung often had to discuss the question of the oath with the authorities. The questions of war and peace, of military service (q.v.), and conscientious objectors (q.v.) also often led to conversations and negotiations (see Germany). E.C.

Reports and proceedings of the Vereinigung, written and printed; H. G. Mannhart, Jahrbuch, 1888, 107-33; Abraham Braun, "70 Jahre Vereinigung," in Der Mennonit XI (1958) 99-101; Ernst Crous, "70 Jahre Berliner Mennoniten-gemeinde," Der Mennonit XI (1958) 102 f.

Vereinsschule: see Preparatory Schools.

Vereiniging voor Doopsgezind Broederschapswerk: see Broederschapswerk.

Verfalje (Verfailje), a Dutch Mennonite family of Flemish descent, found in the 17th and 18th centuries in the congregations of Haarlem and Amsterdam. Jacob Jacobsz Verfailje (b. 1665 at Haarlem, d. 1738 at Alkmaar) moved with his stepfather Theunis Dirksz Kuyper (q.v.) from Haarlem to Alkmaar in 1670, where he learned the trade of shoemaking, and also some Latin. In 1683 he moved with his stepfather to Harlingen, where he became a preacher of the church c1689. In 1694 he was called as preacher to the Lamist (q.v.) congregation of Amsterdam (salary 2,000 Dutch guilders!). Here he served until 1727, then moving to Alkmaar, where he served 1727-38 in the Waterlander congregation. A Jacob Jansz Verfalje is mentioned as preacher of Krommenie about 1730. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 678-83, 1190, 1192, 1467, 2825; DB 1891, 9; 1905, 23 note 1.)
vdZ.

Verhaal der Onderhandeling . . . voorgevallen in Amsterdam 1684 en 1685 (Amsterdam, 1685) is the circumstantial report of the negotiations between the representatives of the Lamist (q.v.) and Zonist (q.v.) churches of Amsterdam to restore unity in the Amsterdam congregation, which had been severed by the Lammerenkrijgh (q.v.) and the schism of 1664. These negotiations, however, failed. The main difference concerned the importance of the confessions of faith. The Zonists thought them indispensable; the Lamists on the contrary did not wish to have fixed confessions of faith. The Lamists were represented in the conferences by Galenus Abrahamsz, Willem van Maurik, and some Amsterdam Lamist deacons; the Zonists by Samuel Apostool and Michiel Fortgens with some Amsterdam Zonist deacons, but also by some Zonist leaders from outside, e.g., Pieter Jansz Stapper, Jan Maartens Mol, E. A. van Dooregeest, and Samuel van Deyl.

vdZ.

Verhaal van't gene verhandelt ende besloten is in de By-eenkomste tot Leyden is the printed report (published at Amsterdam, 1661) of a meeting of a number of Flemish elders, preachers, and deacons, held at Leiden, Holland, on June 18-22, 1660. This meeting was called by the congregations of Rotterdam, Dordrecht, Gouda, and Leiden to discuss the growing liberalism of the Flemish Mennonites, as taught by Galenus (q.v.) Abrahamsz of Amsterdam and Willem van Maurik (q.v.) at Utrecht. At this meeting of conservative leaders 19 congregations were represented; three others sent a letter of agreement. Tieleman Jańsz van Braght (q.v.) of Dordrecht was its moderator, Bastiaan van Weenighem (q.v.) of Rotterdam its secretary. A survey of the strict Flemish doctrines was presented and a number of congregations, e.g., Schiedam (q.v.), were accused of laxity in maintaining the doctrines as formulated in the confessions of faith. Some congregations were reproved for permitting their members to partake in the communion services of Waterlander and Frisian congregations and for admitting Waterlander preachers to their pulpits.

It was resolved to urge Galenus Abrahamsz either to abandon his views or "to stand still" in his ministry; a committee was appointed to admonish him (Galenus refused to receive this committee). It was also resolved to compile a new confession of faith out of the existing confessions, and a committee was appointed to this end (the confession, however, did not materialize).

The Leiden meeting, sometimes ironically called the "Leidsche Synode" by the progressive Mennonites, was actually the beginning of the Lammerenkrijgh (q.v.), which led to the Lamist-Zonist schism.
vdZ.

Verhamme, a Dutch Mennonite family, whose ancestor Pieter Verhamme moved from Kortrijk (Courtrai) in Flanders, Belgium, to Haarlem, Holland, in 1567 because of persecution. Here this family was found first in the Flemish, then in the Peuzelaarsteeg Mennonite congregation until it died out in the 18th century. From about 1700 a branch was also found in Amsterdam as members of the Lamist (q.v.) church. Here too they died out. Elisabeth Verhamme, one of the last descendants, died unmarried in 1858 and left a legacy to the A.D.S. (q.v.).

The Verhammes were prominent businessmen at Haarlem and Amsterdam. Abraham Verhamme

(1639-1727) is said to have been one of the wealthiest citizens of Haarlem. They were faithful members of the church. As far as known, no members of this family served as ministers, but some of them were trustees of the Mennonite orphanage at Haarlem, and a number of them both at Haarlem and Amsterdam served as deacons.
vdZ.

Verhandlungen der Diener-Versammlung, minutes of the Amish Mennonite Ministers' Conferences held annually 1862-78 (except 1877) before district conferences were organized. The minutes for 1862-64 and 1868 were published by John Baer and Son, Lancaster, Pa., and the remainder by John F. Funk and Brother of Chicago (1866) and Elkhart. Among the discussions recorded are the controversy over baptism in a creek, meetinghouses, the function of deacons, teamster service under military control, pensions, singing at funerals, offering a reward for the return of stolen goods, interest rates, investment in government bonds, and the restoration of a bishop who had been guilty of adultery. Names frequently mentioned in the minutes are John K. Yoder (1824-1906, q.v.) of Wayne County, Ohio; Samuel Yoder (1824-84, q.v.) of Mifflin County, Pa.; and John P. King (1827-87) of Logan County, Ohio, all of whom were born in Mifflin County, Pa. (GCL and BeCL have full sets of minutes.)

J.A.H.

DIENER-VERSAMMLUNGEN 1862-78

Date	Place	Attendance	Pages of Minutes
1862 June 9-12,	Wayne Co., Ohio	72	23
1863 May 25-27,	Mifflin Co., Pa.	42	20
1864 June 16-18,	Goshen, Ind.	71	23
1865 June 5-7,	Wayne Co., Ohio	89	9
1866 May 20-23,	Danvers, Ill.	75	23
1867 June 9-12,	West Liberty, Ohio	42	13
1868 May 21- June 3,	Belleville, Pa.	34	24
1869 May 16-18,	Walnut Creek, Ohio	27	10
1870 June 5-8,	Archbold, Ohio	40	36
1871 May 28-31,	Livingston Co., Ill.	56	30
1872 May 19-22,	Lagrange Co., Ind.	56	39
1873 June 1-4,	Orrville, Ohio	41	47
1874 May 16-19,	Washington Co., Iowa	28	16
1875 May 16-19,	Hopedale, Ill.	38	52
1876 June 4-7,	Archbold, Ohio	30	34
1878 June 9-12,	Eureka, Ill.	43	18

J. A. Hostetler, "Amish Problems at the Dienerversammlungen," Menn. Life IV (October 1949) 34-39; J. S. Umble, "The Oak Grove-Pleasant Hill Amish Mennonite Church in Wayne County, Ohio, in the Nineteenth Century (1815-1900)," MQR XXXI (July 1957) 3, 156-219.

Verhelle, Pieter, b. c1660 at Haarlem, Holland, was a preacher of the Flemish Mennonite congregation at Haarlem until 1693, when he moved to Hamburg, Germany, and served there from 1694 until after 1710. A sermon of his, Predigt, is published with Roosen's Unschuld (Ratzeburg, 1702). Like his father-in-law, Gerhard Roosen (q.v.), he held the conservative Zonist (q.v.) doctrines, whereas Jan de Lanoy, also a preacher of the Hamburg-

Altona congregation, was more Lamist (liberal). In his sermons Verhelle often attacked de Lanoy's views. Pieter Verhelle was a member of the Verhelle family that stemmed from Mennonite emigrants from Flanders, Belgium, found at Haarlem from c1600. vdZ.

B. C. Roosen, Geschiede der Mennoniten-Gemeinde zu Hamburg und Altona I (Hamburg, 1886) 55, 65.

Verhogingsfonds: see Fonds tot Verhoging. Besides the Fund mentioned there, another Verhogingsfonds existed, established in 1865 by some Mennonites of Amsterdam, whose functions were assumed by the Fund founded in 1911. (DB 1865, 150 f.) vdZ.

Verhuisdenbureau, an office of the Dutch Mennonites which registers the moves of the Mennonites, in order to induce Mennonites moving to a new community to join the congregation in their new residence. The office was started in 1935 and managed by H. C. Barthel 1935-36, G. A. Menalda 1937-42, G. Fopma 1942-51, and F. H. Pasma since Jan. 1, 1952. vdZ.

Verkade, a Dutch family, found since the 15th century in the province of South Holland, where they were farmers; in the 18th century a few had small businesses such as bakeries and cheese shops. They all belonged to the Reformed Church. Pieter Verkade (Nootdorp, 1767-Vlaardingen, 1848) broke with the family tradition on two points: he left the farm to become a public notary, and he left the Reformed Church to join the Mennonites. His grandson was Ericus Gerhardus Verkade (Vlaardingen, 1935-Hilversum, 1907), who was the founder of the "De Ruyter" bakery at Zaandam. He was a faithful member of the church and served as deacon of the Zaandam-West congregation in 1864-73 and 1875-76; in 1876 he moved to Amsterdam where he was a deacon 1877-81. His nephew Cornelis Pieter Verkade (Harlingen, 1864-Haarlem, 1934), under whose leading the bakery at Zaandam developed into the famous Verkade Factories producing cookies, chocolates, and other confections, was also a deacon of the Zaandam-West congregation, serving 1895-1900 and 1901-10. vdZ.

Nederl. Patriciaat XL (1954) 373-83; S. Lootsma, Het Nieuwe Huys (Zaandam, 1937) 195, 196.

Verkamt, Daniel: see Daniel van der Camp.

Verkindert (Ver Kindert, van der Kinderen), a former Dutch Mennonite family. Joost (q.v.) Verkindert died as an Anabaptist martyr in 1570 at Antwerp, Belgium. Verkinderts, who may have been Joost's relatives or descendants, shortly after emigrated from Kortrijk (q.v.), Flanders, to the Netherlands; some were at Haarlem from c1580. Pieter Ver Kindert, born at Franeker in Friesland, was a cloth merchant at Haarlem and c1620-after 1649 a preacher of the Haarlem Flemish den Blok congregation. In 1649 he was secretary of the Flemish conference held at Haarlem. He published Een korte en seer grondighe historische Vertellinge belanghende den Twist tot Francker Anno 1587 . . . (Haarlem, 1628). This writing, an account of the quarrels which in 1586-87 led to the schism among the Flemish Mennonites (Huiskeepers-Contrahuiskeepers), also contains valuable information about the Flemish-Frisian dissensions of 1566-67. His Brief, dienende om te bewijzen . . . (Amsterdam, 1634) deals with the same controversies. Verkindert also replied to Petrus Bontemps (q.v.), who had attacked the Mennonites, in Korte Ontschuldinge over d'onbehoorlijcke ende al te ware beschuldinge van Petro Bontemps (Haarlem, 1643). In addition he published Korte Verklaeringhe and Naerder Verklaeringhe (both Haarlem, 1634), in which he expounded a number of Scripture texts. Besides these publications, the following are mentioned by Schagen: Korte verklaringe van de Christelyke Gemeente ende 't Volck Godts des Nieuwen Testaments (Haarlem, 1628), Over de Gemeente Gods . . . , found in the Huysboek of Jan de Buyser (q.v.), and Handelinghe der Vereenigde Vlaemse en duytsche Doopsgezinde Gemeenten . . . (Vlissingen, 1666). vdZ.

Marten Schagen, Naamlijst der Doopsgezinde Schrijveren (Amsterdam, 1745); Biogr. Wb. IV, 758-60.

Verkolje (Vercoilge, Vercolie), a Mennonite family found in the 17th and 18th centuries at Amsterdam, Holland. They had emigrated from Kortrijk (q.v.) in Flanders, Belgium, where Jossine Andries, the wife of Rougier van Quoilge (see Stijntgen Vercoilgen), suffered martyrdom in 1567. In Amsterdam they belonged to the Flemish congregation; later they were in both the Lamist and the Zonist churches. Both branches died out in the 18th century.

It could not be ascertained whether Johannes (Jan) Verkolje (Amsterdam, 1650-Delft, 1693) and his son Nicolaas Verkolje, b. 1673 at Delft, from 1700 living at Amsterdam and died there in 1746, both painters, who had some reputation during their lifetime, also were Mennonites, belonging to this same family. The Amsterdam Rijksmuseum has five paintings by Jan Verkolje and one by Nicolaas. vdZ.

Church records of Amsterdam; Thieme-Becker, Allg. Lexikon der bildenden Künstler XXXIV (Leipzig, 1940) 257 f.; Catalogus Rijksmuseum Amsterdam, 1921.

Verkruissen (Verkruyssen), a family of Mennonite refugees from Flanders, Belgium, settling at Haarlem, Holland, c1580 and from the 17th century also found at Rotterdam and Amsterdam. Some of its members were deacons of the church. This family died out in the 19th century. vdZ.

Verlaan, a former Dutch Mennonite family, found in the 17th century at Amsterdam, where Johannes (Jan) Verlaan was a preacher of the Waterlander Toren (q.v.) congregation in 1642-45. Nicolaas Verlaan (b. c1690 at Amsterdam, d. c1763 at Haarlem) was trained for the ministry at the Remonstrant (q.v.) seminary at Amsterdam, thereupon serving the Amsterdam Lamist congregation 1714-16, Rotterdam 1716-29, and Haarlem Peuzelaarsteeg church 1729-d.c63. During his Rotterdam period he was active in behalf of the suppressed Mennonites of Prussia and occasionally too he supported Mennonites from the Palatinate emigrating to America via Rotterdam.

He was married to Anna van der Hoef; his sons

Jan and Willem Verlaan were both warm Collegiants (q.v.) and often addressed the meetings at Rijnsburg (q.v.).
vdZ.

Verloove (Verlove), a Dutch family of Mennonite refugees, moving from Flanders, Belgium, to Rotterdam and Haarlem, Holland, in the early 17th century or even earlier. An outstanding member of this family was Karel (Carel) Verloove, b. 1633 at Haarlem, d. c1700 at Amsterdam, who was a poet, whose verse was highly esteemed during his lifetime. One of his publications was Uytbreijding over de heylige Lofzangen (Amsterdam, 1686), a songbook containing some 200 hymns with psalm tunes. He belonged to a group of liberal poets, usually called the circle of Jan Zoet (q.v.), all of whom favored Collegiant (q.v.) views. Karel Verloove was a friend of Jan Luyken (q.v.), who dedicated one of his poems to Verloove, and was well acquainted with Johannes Antonides (q.v.) van der Goes and Pieter Cornelisz Plockhoy (q.v.). His brother Pieter Verloove also wrote verse. Members of this Verlo(o)ve family are still found in the Rotterdam congregation.
vdZ.

N.N.B.Wb. IV, 1380 f.; G. Kalf, Geschiedenis der Nederl. Letterkunde IV (Groningen, 1909) 462, 464, 522, 528, 561; V, 133; C. B. Hylkema, Reformaten II (Haarlem, 1902) 103.

Vermande (Vermander, Vermandele, Van (der) Mander), a widely ramified Dutch family, formerly Mennonite. This family is of Flemish descent, emigrating from Flanders, Belgium, to Holland because of persecution. Gerrit (q.v.) and Hans (q.v.) Vermandele were Anabaptist martyrs, both executed at Antwerp, Belgium, in 1569. Carel Vermander (see Mander, Carel van) (1548-1606), a noted poet and painter, moved from Flanders to Haarlem, where he was a member of the Old Flemish congregation. In the early 17th century the Mennonite Vermandeles lived near Aardenburg in Dutch Zeeland Flanders and some Vermanders at Amsterdam. Vermandes were in the 17th century found among the members of the Mennonite congregations in Haarlem, Amsterdam, Rotterdam, and Delft. Some of them were deacons: Lewys Jacobs Vermande served in the Flemish congregation of Rotterdam from 1641; Isaac Jacobs Vermande represented Delft at the Flemish conference at Leiden in 1660, and in 1664 signed the Verbondt van Eenigheydt (q.v.) for Delft. In Amsterdam they were members of the Zonist (q.v.) church. They were all businessmen, some of them, particularly at Amsterdam, very wealthy; e.g., Lodewijk Vermande (1676-1748) of Amsterdam, who in 1716 married Maria Welsingh. They had only one surviving daughter (Maria Alletta 1726-79, married to Hendrik Pieter van Beeck), and this branch died out with her. The Haarlem branch also died out in the 18th century. The members of the Rotterdam and Delft branches, and a side branch at Hoorn, all left the Mennonite Church about 1700. At present there are no Mennonite Vermandes. (Church records of Amsterdam and Rotterdam; family papers of Lodewijk Vermande in the Amsterdam Mennonite archives; Ned. Patriciaat XIV, 1924, pp. 348-52.)
vdZ.

Vermander, Carel: see Mander, Carel van.

Vermaner, a former Dutch Mennonite name for a minister not holding the full office of an elder or bishop (oudste and leeraer tot den vollen dienst). The vermaner or admonisher was charged to preach and admonish but not to baptize. The Dutch also used the term prediker (preacher) for the same office, and in modern times the term predikant. That "vermaner" came into use would indicate that the early Dutch Mennonites emphasized strongly that duties of a minister consist not only in preaching the Word of God but also in admonishing the individual members to live a consecrated life. Not by accident did they coin this term; it was deeply anchored in their basic Christian convictions. The term is borrowed from II Peter 1:12 "I will not be negligent to put you always in remembrance of these things" which is read in the Old Dutch Bible versions "to admonish (vermanen) you always about these things." (DB 1872, 77.) The title "vermaner" also used by the Danzig Mennonites disappeared during the 17th century in the period of adjustment to the environment. (See also Ministry, Netherlands.)
C.K.

H. G. Mannhardt, Die Danziger Mennoniten-Gemeinde (Danzig, 1919) 106.

Vermaning, a Dutch Mennonite name for meeting-house in the 17th-19th centuries. Their words vermaner (admonisher) and vermaning (place of admonishing) indicate the emphasis the Anabaptists placed on practical consecrated Christian living and discipleship. Highly suspicious of the state church ministers and churches, they coined new terms to assure a distinction between their concepts and those of the other churches. The meetinghouse was usually a simple structure, at times barnlike and hidden (schuilkerk). The hidden church originated in the days when the Mennonites were not permitted to build meetinghouses, and was also used when they were finally given permission to do so, but under the condition that they would not be on public streets and places but hidden, and that they would have no steeples or bells so that no one would be "misled" to listen to their "admonishings." Today the Dutch refer to their church as kerk just as the Reformed Church does. The distinctive name, though sometimes still used in Friesland, mostly disappeared during the 19th century when the Dutch Mennonites adjusted themselves to their environment and culture. (See also Architecture.)
C.K.

Vermanje, Jan Tjerks (b. c1743 at Midlum near Harlingen, d. Dec. 17, 1829, at Den Horn), was an untrained Dutch Mennonite preacher for more than 61 years. His start as a preacher was rather unusual: he was the servant of a farmer at Witveen (q.v.) in Friesland, who was a minister of the church; one Sunday when his master was ill, Vermanje preached in his place (a somewhat different account in DB 1901, 104, note). His testimony gave such satisfaction that the congregation chose him as preacher in 1762. He served at Witveen until 1782, and though he had a very poor education, being even unable to write, he seems to have been a rather eloquent speaker: in 1782 he was called to the Mildam-Knijpe congregation, where he served for ten years. Here he adopted his family name Vermanje, because he was living in a room of the vermaning (q.v., meetinghouse, Frisian formanje). On Dec. 27, 1791, he preached the last sermon in the Old Flemish meetinghouse at Beneden-Knijpe, which was then pulled down. Finally he served at Den Horn from 1792 until his death. In his last years, unable to walk, he was carried to the pulpit. (N.N.B.Wb. III, 1295; DJ 1837, 34; DB 1872, 39 f.)

vbZ.

Vermanung, the commonly used short form for a book published in 1542 by Pilgram Marpeck (q.v.) and Leupold Scharnschlager (q.v.), two leaders in the South German Anabaptist movement. The full title of the book is Vermanung; auch gantz klarer gründtlicher un(d) unwidersprechlicher bericht zu warer Christlicher . . . pundtssvereinigung allen waren glaubigen frommen und gutthertzigen menschen zu hilf und trost mit grund heyliger schrift durch bewerung warer Tauff und Abentmals Christi sampt mitlauffung und erklärang irer gegensachen und Argumenten wider alle vermeynte Christliche Pündtnus so sich biss her un(d) noch under dem nammen Christi zutragend. Our knowledge of it has been greatly enhanced by Schwenckfeld's rather condescending reply to it; the circumstances of its publication are known only from Schwenckfeld's correspondence. Although the book was not directed against Schwenckfeld, he felt attacked by it, and since he had a number of other complaints against Pilgram's brotherhood, he wrote the Judicium (see article Marpeck) in reply.

About two thirds of the Vermanung is an expanded translation of the Bekentnisse van beyden Sacramenten published at Münster in 1533 (as discovered by Wray 1954, reported in ARG 1956), for which Bernt Rothmann (q.v.) is generally given credit, although actually six men signed the introduction. The two main subjects of both books are the sacraments of baptism and communion. First there is a lengthy introduction (not present in the Bekentnisse) decrying the splintering of the Anabaptist movement into a variety of sects in the twelve years since 1530, and calling the discouraged to rally around the banner of Christ. Marpeck and Scharnschlager admitted that they used other confessions in the Vermanung, but such had first been tested and purified, because they believed that nothing is more dangerous than truth mixed with error. After the introduction there is a discussion of the term "sacrament" (q.v.), and then baptism is discussed. While the Bekentnisse had brilliant arguments against infant baptism, the logic of adult baptism receives strong support only through the view of the church seen in the Vermanung, namely, that it is a suffering community; hence all forms of violence are categorically rejected, with a pointed reference to the outcome of the tragedy at Münster. Marpeck and his co-worker made a much sharper distinction between the Old and New Testaments than did the Bekentnisse, and at one point they rejected the typology of the Bekentnisse. On original sin, on baptism as pouring as well as immersion, on remaining faithful unto the end, and finally in the stress on the covenant, the Vermanung differs from the Bekentnisse. For a full discussion of the content of the Vermanung see the article Marpeck.

The Vermanung is one of the most important books written by the South German Anabaptists in the 16th century. It represents an attempt at unification outside of Switzerland and North Germany, which rejects the Hutterian communism and is aware of what happened at Münster. Further it occasioned the lengthy debates with Caspar Schwenckfeld which forced the Marpeck brotherhood to think through the issues presented by the spiritualists.

In a letter to the Moravian churches in 1553 Marpeck mentioned that he was sending 20 "Bundeszeugnisse" and it is quite possible that this refers to copies of the Vermanung since it is also called "Das Buch der Bundesbezeugung." Robert Friedmann found a handwritten copy of the Vermanung among Hutterite codices in Austria.

Christian August Salig is the first modern writer to indicate knowledge of the Vermanung, and he knew it only through Schwenckfeld's Judicium. Two copies are known to exist, one in the British Museum (photocopy in GCL) and the other in the Württemberg Landesbibliothek in Stuttgart, from which the modern edition published in the Gedenkschrift was prepared. An English translation has been made (in GCL).
W.K.L.

Christian A. Salig, Vollständige Historie der Augsburgischen Confession und derselben zugethanen Kirchen III (Halle, 1735) 1113 ff.; Jan J. Kiwiet, Pilgram Marbeck (Kassel, 1957); Torsten Bergsten, "Pilgram Marbeck und seine Auseinandersetzung mit Caspar Schwenckfeld," Kyrkohistorisk Arsskrift, 1957 and 1958 (Uppsala); Frank J. Wray, "The 'Vermanung' of 1542 and Rothmann's 'Bekentnisse,'" in Archiv für Reformationsgeschichte, 1956, 243-51; Heinold Fast, "Pilgram Marbeck und das oberdeutsche Täuferium," Archiv für Reformationsgeschichte, 1956, 232; Gedenkschrift zum 400-jährigen Jubiläum der Mennoniten . . . (Karlsruhe, 1925) 185-281.

Vermeer (Vermeeren, Vemerer, Van der Meer), a common Dutch family name. Adriaen (q.v.) Vermeer, of Leiden, was an Anabaptist martyr, executed at Haarlem, Holland, in 1537. Joos Vermeeren (Joachim—q.v.—de Suickerbacker) of Antwerp, Belgium, was a Mennonite elder in the 1560's. Later there were some Mennonite Vermeers in the Rotterdam congregation and Vermeerens at Haarlem until c1900.
vbZ.

Vermeersch (see also Meersch, van der, and Mersch, van der), a Dutch family of refugees, emigrated from Poperinghe in Flanders, Belgium, for the sake of their faith, moving to Leiden and Haarlem, Holland, in the 1580's. They were probably Mennonites. Among them was Gillis Vermeersch, banished from Poperinghe in 1568. There were Mennonite Vermeersch at Haarlem and Amsterdam in the 17th and 18th centuries. In Haarlem Gillis Vermeersch, married to Maria de Haan, was a trustee of the Waterlander Mennonite orphanage at Haarlem from 1583, and some Vermeersch were deacons of the Mennonite church at Amsterdam during the 17th and 18th centuries.

An outstanding member of this family was Gillis Vermeersch, b. c1654 at Amsterdam, d. 1722 at Harlingen, Friesland, a son of Willem Vermeersch. Gillis moved to Harlingen about 1678 where he was married to Marijke Fontein. At first he was a tinsmith, but later he came to great prosperity as a merchant trading with Prussia and Russia, and shipowner, also participating in the West Indian (Caribbean) Trading company. He was for many years a deacon of the Harlingen congregation and the first treasurer of the Friese Sociëteit, founded in 1695, serving as its treasurer 1696-1721. These families all died out in the 18th century. vbZ.

Jaarboek van het Centraal Bureau voor Genealogie IX (The Hague, 1955) 179, 186, 188; DB 1878, 90; 1895, 30; Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 187; G. A. Wumkes, Stads- en Dorpskroniek van Friesland I (Leeuwarden, 1930) 1, 2.

Vermeulen (Vermuelen, Vermolen, Vermoelen, Vermule, Van der Meulen), a common Dutch family name, derived from molen, i.e., mill, is found among the Mennonites in the Netherlands and formerly in Prussia. Not all the Vermeulen families are related. Some Vermeulens were religious refugees from Flanders, Belgium. Jacob Pietersz Vermeulen (van der Meulen, q.v.) was a Mennonite elder at Haarlem, Holland, c1600. Krijn Vermeulen (Quirijn van der Meulen, q.v.) lived about the same time at Danzig, West Prussia. Ambrosius Vermeulen in 1589 founded at Danzig the well-known distillery "Zum Lachs" in the Breitgasse (ME I, 40). A Mennonite Vermeulen family has been living at Rotterdam, Holland, since the early 17th century. Harmen Gillis Vermeulen was a deacon of the Waterlander congregation there from 1666. He had previously been a deacon of the Flemish church, but left this congregation because of its strictness in church discipline. There are still some Vermeulens in the Amsterdam and other Dutch Mennonite congregations. vbZ.

Vermeulen, Jacob Pietersz: see Meulen, Jacob Pietersz van der.

Vermeulen, Krijn (Cryn): see Meulen, Quirijn van der.

Vermeulensvolk, a branch of the Dutch Mennonites who sided with Jacob Pieters van der Meulen (q.v.), elder at Haarlem, who with his followers left the Old Flemish Mennonites in 1593 (not 1598 as is stated ME III, 660). They were also called Bankroetiers (q.v.) because the cause of the schism was the failure to apply the ban to a member who became bankrupt (Dutch, bankroet). vbZ.

Vermoser, Jeronimus, city secretary of Laufen, Austria, and an Anabaptist preacher. He was seized by the Salzburg government before Nov. 20, 1527. There is no record of his fate. Very likely he was one of the thirty-eight persons who were locked into a house in Salzburg and burned to death.

Christian Meyer, "Die Anfänge des Wiedertäufertums in Augsburg," in Zeitschrift des Historischen Vereins für Schwaben und Neuburg I (1874) 247; Josef Jäkel, Zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in Oberösterreich und speciell in Freistadt (Mus.-Jahr.-Ber. XLVII, 1889) 47; ML IV.

Verniers, Laurens, a Mennonite elder, at first active in Antwerp, Belgium. In 1567 he was banished from Antwerp by the Duke of Alba (q.v.), but he had already escaped to Franeker in Friesland about two years previously. Concerning his work there is not much information. A letter by Elder Hans Busschaert (q.v.) to Verniers, published by Vos, says that both Busschaert and Verniers sided with the Flemish during the Flemish-Frisian dissensions. This letter, undated, was probably written shortly after the spring of 1567. In 1570 an elder Laurens of Franeker visited Cleve (q.v.), Germany, with Hendrik van Roosevelt (q.v.) to settle a quarrel in the Mennonite congregation of this town. After their visit in Cleve they traveled to Cologne to defend themselves against the charge of unorthodoxy made against them by Ameldonck, who then was an elder of Cologne. This Elder Laurens was apparently Verniers. (K. Vos, Antwerpen, 338, 382-84; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 446; DB 1893, 16.)

vbZ.

Vernon County (Mo.) Amish Mennonite Church was listed by Hartzler and Kauffman (Mennonite Church History) in 1905 as a congregation of 18 members in the Amish Mennonite Western District Conference. C. C. Schrock was the deacon as well as the first settler. The date of the first meeting-house was given as 1894 and the address of the church was Statesburg. M.G.

Versailles, Mo., the county seat (pop. 1,781) of Morgan County, in the central part of the state. Versailles is the shopping center for about 200 Mennonites living mostly in the farming area northeast of the town. There are two Mennonite churches near Versailles: the Mt. Zion Mennonite Church (MC) 6 miles northeast, and the Bethel Mennonite Church (GCM) 10 miles northeast of Versailles. The first Mennonite settlers located near Versailles in 1868. It was the home of Daniel Kauffman until he moved to Scottdale, Pa., to become editor of the Gospel Herald. Very few of the Mennonites live in the town. L.G.

Verscheyden Schriftuerlijcke Liedekens is a small Dutch hymnal containing 29 hymns, published by Jan Theunisz (q.v.). Jan Theunisz, using the motto "Jaecht nae't best," wrote seven of them. (Yearbook Amstelodamum XXV, 1928, iii.) vbZ.

Verschuren (Verschueren, Verschuer, van der Schuere), a former Dutch Mennonite family of Flemish descent, found in Rotterdam, where Joost Verschueren was a deacon of the Old Flemish congregation c1631-36, and particularly at Haarlem (Peuzelaarsteeg church), where they are found from c1580 until the 18th century, some of them serving as deacons. Dionys van der Schuere (q.v.) was a Waterlander preacher at Haarlem and Amsterdam. vbZ.

Versluys: see Sluys (Sluis) van der.

Verspeck (Verspecht), Albert (Albrecht), d. 1612 at Amsterdam, was a Dutch Mennonite elder. In 1576 he was an elder of the Waterlander (q.v.) Mennonite congregation at Antwerp, Belgium. He was probably engaged in some business, with Hans (q.v.) Bret, who suffered martyrdom at Antwerp on Jan. 4, 1577, as his servant. After Bret's death Verspeck moved to the Netherlands. In September 1577, then living at Alkmaar, he was a coauthor with de Ries (q.v.) and some other Waterlander elders of a confession of faith. At the Waterlander conference of 1581 at Amsterdam Verspeck represented the Antwerp congregation, and was sent by the conference, commissioned to visit the church in Gent, Belgium, and the Mennonites in Zeeland every four months. Later he was an elder of the Amsterdam Waterlander congregation until his death.

If the assumption is correct that this Mennonite elder is identical with the Albrecht Verspecks who is mentioned by Wessel as an ouderling of the Reformed Church at Antwerp on Nov. 4, 1575, then Verspeck, like de Ries, was Reformed before he joined the Mennonites. vdZ.

K. Vos, Antwerpen, 360; J. H. Wessel, De Leerstellige Strijd . . . (Assen, 1945) 22 f.; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 335; BRN VII, 248; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 520; II, Nos. 82b, 83a; DB 1863, 111 note; 1864, 20; 1872, 57; 1877, 79 f.; 1904, 142, 144 note 2.

Verstrooiing, the Dutch word for Diaspora. The Mennonite congregations are rather thickly scattered in northern and western parts of the Netherlands, but in the east and south they are rather scarce. Mennonites moving to these areas often do not find a Mennonite congregation and remain members of the congregation of their former homes. In order to keep the contact with these "Verstrooiden" (dispersed members), Pastor W. van der Hoek (q.v.) of Kromwal in 1849 asked the A.D.S. (q.v.) to provide care for the Mennonites in the Diaspora, but the A.D.S. did not accept the suggestion at this time, considering this area outside its realm. The Haarlemsche (q.v.) Vereeniging, founded in 1860, discussed this problem in its meeting of 1864, but adopted no special measures. The matter was dropped until the 1892 meeting of the Zwolsche (q.v.) Vereeniging, when Pastor Tj. Kielstra (q.v.) brought up the subject again. Thereupon a committee was appointed to study the matter. The 1894 annual meeting of the Zwolsche Vereeniging resolved to pass the matter to the Haarlemsche Vereeniging. Through the perseverance of Kielstra, a committee was set up by the Haarlemsche Vereeniging. In the summer of 1897 W. J. van Douwen, pastor at Almelo, and F. C. Fleischer, pastor of Broek op Langendijk, visited a large number of scattered Mennonites. They were called bezoek-leraren (similar to Reiseprediger in Germany, Alsace, and Switzerland). This work has been continued until the present time. Especially Kielstra and later Cornelis Vis Jzn (q.v.) should be mentioned as the stimulators of this work. The committee appointed by the Haarlemsche Vereeniging developed in 1905 into an independent association (Vereeniging ter behartiging van de godsdienstige belangen der Doopsgezinde Broeders en Zusters in de verstrooiing). In 1925 the A.D.S. took over this activity, and the association was dissolved. At present (1958) ten visiting ministers visit the Mennonites in the Diaspora, who thus receive a pastoral visit at least once a year.

In behalf of these Mennonites the Committee, the Association, and the A.D.S. have published a number of booklets, No. 1 being published in 1897 and No. 61, the last, in 1941. These Geschriftjes ten behoeve van de Doopsgezinden in de Verstrooiing contain reports, sermons, and particularly papers on Mennonite history. vdZ.

DB 1893, 124; 1894, 73-75, 113; 1895, 144; DJ 1907, 56-63; annual reports in the Zondagsbode; Geschriftjes t. b. v. de Doopsgezinden in de Verstrooiing, Nos. 34 and 42; annual reports of the A.D.S. since 1925.

Verveld (Vervelt, Verrevelt), a former Mennonite family, now extinct, found at Sappemeer, Dutch province of Groningen. Koert Izaks Verveld (1719-1804), a merchant, was a preacher of the Sappemeer Mennonite congregation 1756-d.1804. vdZ.

Vervolg van Christelijke Gezangen (Supplement to Christian Hymns) (Groningen, 1808) is a small Dutch Mennonite hymnal containing 33 hymns with notes, introduced in 1808 in the Zwolle (q.v.) congregation, and for this reason generally called Zwolsche Bundel or Zwolsche Liederen. (DB 1865, 74.) vdZ.

Verwer, a Mennonite family name, found at Zaandam, Amsterdam, Rotterdam, Alkmaar, Graftdijk, and some other congregations in the Dutch province of North Holland (several apparently unrelated branches). Aris Jansz Verwer, d. 1679, was a preacher of the Frisian congregation at Zaandam-West and from about 1649 of the Aris-Janszvolk, a group which had separated from the Zaandam-West Frisian church, and which was dissolved shortly after the death of Aris Jansz. The cause of the schism is not clear.

In the Rotterdam branch there was Adriaan Verwer, a merchant, who later moved to Amsterdam. He was a fervent Collegiant (q.v.), a friend of Joachim Oudaen (q.v.), and the author of a book against the philosopher Spinoza: De Atheisterye het Mom-aanzigt afgerukt (1683); he also wrote Inleiding tot de Christelyke Godsgeleerdheid (Amsterdam, 1698) and books on the Dutch language (1707) and on the Dutch maritime law (1716, 1730). In Amsterdam (Lamist) and elsewhere some Verwers were deacons. vdZ.

S. Lootsma, Het Nieuwe Huys (Zaandam, 1937) 22 f., 101 f., 191; (J. de Lange Cjzn), Beknopte Geschiedenis der Doopsgez. gemeente te Alkmaar (n.p., n.d.—Alkmaar, 1927) 14, 42, 159; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 705; II, Nos. 122; 126; II, 2, No. 378; DB 1863, 38; 1912, 106; Marten Schagen, Naamlijst der Doopsgezinde Schrijver (Amsterdam, 1745) 117 f.

Verwer, de, a Dutch Mennonite family name, found at Zaandam and Amsterdam. Abraham de Verwer, b. before 1600, d. August 1650, a member of the Amsterdam Waterlander congregation, was a painter, particularly of naval combats. Two of his works, a naval combat and a view of a sailship, are found at the Amsterdam Rijksmuseum. His drawings have greater merit than his canvasses. In 1639-41 he was in Paris, where he painted and sketched some views of the town. His son Justus de Verwer (c1626-c86), first living at Amsterdam, later at Gouda, of whom it is not known that he was a member of the church, was also a painter.

Jacob de Verwer (1829-71) of Zaandam was trained for the ministry at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary and served as pastor at Baard 1854-56 and De Rijp 1856-d. 71. vdZ.

Thieme-Becker, Allg. Lexikon der bildenden Künstler XXXIV (Leipzig, 1940) 306.

Verzaameling van de afbeeldingen van veele voor-naame manen en leeraaren . . . onder de Doopsgezinde Christenen . . . (Amsterdam, 1743), a collection of pictures which contains the portraits of 30 Mennonite ministers, all Dutch except two, viz., Gerrit Roosen of Hamburg, Germany, and Jan Gerritsz van Emden, of Danzig, Prussia. Each of the copper engravings, reproducing etchings of Rembrandt, Uylenburgh, Mierevelt, T. de Vlieger, and C. van de Pas, is provided with a short laudatory poem by Adriaan Spinniker (q.v.). The complete collection of portraits was republished (Amsterdam, 1780) without the verses. The ministers depicted here are Menno Simons, Dirk Philips, Lubbert Gerritsz, Hans de Ries, Jan Gerritsz van Emden, Aldert Volkertsz, Reynier Wybrandsz Wybma, Cornelis Claesz Anso, Pieter Andries Hesseling, Hans Alenson, Pieter Pietersz, Yeme Jacobsz de Ring, Abraham Dirksz (Bierens), Jan Willemsz, Pieter Gryspeer(t), Tobias Govertsz van den Wyngaard, Bartel Louwer, Anthoni Jacobsz Roscius, Jacob Cornelisz, Gerrit Roosen, Lambert Klaasz Aker, Galenus Abrahamsz, Tieleman van Braght, Lieuwe Willems (de) Graaf, Herman Schijn, Michael Fortgens, Pieter Schrijver, Abraham Verduin, and Joannes Houbakker. vdZ.

Verzaameling van Stichtelyke Gezangen, a song-book published 1705 at Amsterdam. This collection, containing 21 songs with notes, was apparently printed for the Mennonite Zaandam-Oost congregation. It was edited particularly for the young people, who had previously used the Stichtelijke Rymen by Camphuysen (q.v.) (Preface). Two of the songs in this Verzaameling commemorated the preacher Foe(c)ke Floris (q.v.), d. Sept. 28, 1703, who had served at Zaandam-Oost. vdZ.

Vest, Balzer, an Anabaptist martyr, was put to death for his faith in Innsbruck, Austria. Nothing further is known.

Vet, Melchior, an Anabaptist martyr, a friend and traveling companion of Georg (Jörg) Blaurock. He was burned at the stake at Dracha "in the time of Michael Sattler," i.e., in 1527. The Hutterite Chronik calls him Veit and says that he was burned at Ettach (Switzerland?). (Mart. Mir. D 4, E 416; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 48.) vdZ.

Vettre: see Claudine Levettre.

Veurne (Furnes), a town in Flanders, Belgium, where an anonymous Anabaptist martyr was executed in 1553. He is celebrated in the song "In bitterheyt der sielen," No. 10 of the Lietboecxken. The hymn speaks of his farewell to his brethren. This seems to indicate the existence of a Mennonite congregation at Veurne, concerning which, however, there is no information; probably this church was the same as that of Leisele near Veurne, of which Maillart (q.v.) de Grave and his wife were members in 1568 and of which Paulus (q.v.) van Meenen was the elder. vdZ.

Veyt (Feyt): see Greyenburger, Veyt.

Veyt, Peter: see Voit, Peter.

Vianen, a small town in the Dutch province of South Holland, formerly the seat of a small Flemish (q.v.) Mennonite congregation. In 1649 it had no preacher and was served by the church of Utrecht. Gijsbert Gerritsz of Vianen signed the Verbondt (q.v.) van Eenigheydt for the congregation in 1664. The congregation seems to have died out soon after. At any rate it had dissolved by 1700. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 2337; Blaupot t. C., Holland I, 222, 330; II, 43; DB 1863, 96, 102.) vdZ.

Viblarre, Andries: see Andries Meulenaar.

Victoor (Victor Willemsz), an Anabaptist martyr of Niel? in the territory of Jülich (q.v.), was burned at the stake with four others at Antwerp, Belgium, on Jan. 30, 1557. Particulars are lacking. He is celebrated in the song "Aenhoort God, hemelsche Vader," No. 16 of the Lietboecxken. (Offer, 564; Mart. Mir. D 184, E 568; Antw. Arch.-Bl. VIII, 433, 437; XIV, 22 f., No. 241.) vdZ.

Vienna, the capital of Austria in both its wider and its narrower sense (see Austria), since c1300 the seat of the ruling house of Hapsburg (see Habsburg), situated on the Danube at the crossroads from East to West and North to South, a strong bulwark against the Turks in 1529 and again in 1683, is a place where many nations and races mingle but has a predominantly German population (1955 c1.8 million). Vienna never had an Anabaptist congregation for any length of time but was the scene of execution of at least 23 Anabaptists during the reign of Ferdinand I (q.v.). Among the martyrs were Balthasar Hubmaier (q.v.) and his wife, executed March 10, 1528; Jacob Wideman (q.v.); Hieronymus Käls (q.v.), the schoolmaster, martyred with Michel Seifensieder and Hans Oberecker on March 31, 1536; Oswald Glait (q.v.) in the autumn of 1546; Hans Staudach (q.v.) and Anthoni Keim (q.v.), executed with two others on Nov. 22, 1546; and finally Hans Gurtzham (q.v.) of Carinthia, on June 27, 1550.

The first Anabaptist influence in Vienna was apparently brought by transient brothers on their way to and from Nikolsburg (situated 50 miles north of Vienna), where Anabaptism had shown a vigorous growth ever since Hubmaier and Glait led the movement (c1526). Hans Hut (q.v.), leaving Nikolsburg with Glait in early 1527, stopped in Vienna and held meetings (well known in Anabaptist history) at a house in the Kärntnerstrasse, where he is said to have baptized not less than fifty persons, among them Leonhard Schiemer (q.v.). Discovery of the group by the authorities forced Hut to flee and seems to have led to the final dissolution of this budding congregation. A well-advertised threat of the harshly Catholic Ferdinand to tear down houses which harbored Anabaptists was not carried out, and it is known that the inn "Freisinger Hof" actually had Anabaptist guests after this.

Apparently some of the Austerlitz (q.v.) Brethren, led by Jacob Wideman (q.v.), maintained a group in Vienna for a time, but little is known about them. However, Inquisition material shows that booksellers in Vienna were always in contact with Moravia and may have functioned as middlemen (DeWind). Hieronymus Kāls, who was arrested with Michel Seifensieder and Hans Oberecker in Vienna on Jan. 8, 1536, while en route to his brethren in Tirol, reported in his second letter from prison, "We have learned that many pious Christian hearts have nobly testified the truth of the Lord here in Vienna, brothers and sisters." Among these was Jacob Wideman, whom Kāls mentioned expressly as a martyr (1535). Leonhard Lochmaier (q.v.), likewise en route to Tirol from Moravia, was arrested with Jörg Fasser (q.v.) in Neudorf, south of Vienna, and brought to trial in Mödling near by, but they were soon miraculously freed. Oswald Glat was also arrested in Vienna in the fall of 1546, and having resisted all pressure to recant was drowned in the Danube at night. The last Anabaptist execution in Vienna was that of Hans Gurtzham in 1550.

A milder policy toward nonconformists came with the accession of Emperor Maximilian II in 1564, but this period soon came to an end when Jesuits settled in Vienna and with them the Counter Reformation set in. There is no further record of Anabaptists in Vienna, even not as transients.

After World War II numerous Mennonite refugees from Russia found their way to Austria through Rumania, Hungary, and Czechoslovakia, some of them (c400 at the peak) settling in Vienna, where a few were still living in 1958. The Mennonite Central Committee began relief work in Austria in September 1946, with headquarters in Vienna, ministering to the general population as well as to Mennonite refugees. In 1949 a headquarters house was secured and a spiritual ministry established which ultimately developed into a mission. The mission was fully organized with a pastor in 1957 under the Swiss Mennonite Conference with MCC financial support, and located in the MCC house at Cottagegasse 16, purchased in 1958. In 1959 the mission was transferred to the European Mennonite Evangelization Committee (EMEK). LOSERTH, R.F.

J. D. Unruh, In the Name of Christ (Scottdale, 1952); Zieglschmid, Chronik; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Henry DeWind, "A 16th Century Description of Religious Sects in Austerlitz," MQR XXIX (1955) 45; ML IV.

Vierstra, a Mennonite family found at IJlst in Friesland, Netherlands, where some of its members served as deacons. Sieger Meintes Vierstra (1838-1915) was treasurer of the church for 25 years. Meinte Jans Vierstra (1862-1936), a member of the same family, served the Hindeloopen congregation for many years as a treasurer. vbZ.

Viet Nam, a country in southeastern Asia formerly known as Indo-China. In 1957 two Mennonite agencies were working in this country. The Viet Nam Mennonite Mission (MC) was founded by the Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities in 1957. James and Arlene Stauffer and Everett and Margaret Metzler began language study in Saigon in 1957. The Mennonite Central Committee opened relief work in Viet Nam in 1954. The twelve relief workers on the field in 1957 were located at Banmethuot with the Leprosarie de Mission Evangelique and in Saigon. M.G.

Viglius (Wigle) van Aytta, of Zwichem (1507-77), a learned nobleman of Friesland, Netherlands, a friend of Erasmus (q.v.), a Roman Catholic clergyman, ecclesiastical inspector for the bishop of Utrecht in the Dutch province of Groningen 1534-35, member of the (Spanish) Secret Court of Brussels, several times ambassador of Emperor Charles V, was a bitter opponent of heresy and especially of the Anabaptists. His letters contain some particulars about the Anabaptists after 1534.

A painted portrait which until the early 20th century was supposed to be a picture of Menno Simons (DB 1916, facing p. 33) probably represents Viglius van Aytta. vbZ.

N.N.B.Wb. II, 46-52; Mellink, Wederdopers, 21, 258, 262, 329; Menn. Life III (1948) No. 3, p. 16; B. H. D. Hermersdorf, Wigle van Aytta van Zwichem (Leiden, 1914).

Vijf geestlicke Liedekens (Five Spiritual Songs) is a small hymnal published (Leiden, 1600) by Jan Theunisz (q.v.). It contains besides the five hymns mentioned in the title a number of other songs, ten of which bear the device "Jaecht nae't best," which was the device of Jan Theunisz himself. Most of these hymns were reprinted in Verscheyden (q.v.) Schrijftuerlijcke Liedekens of 1603. (Yearbook Amstelodamum XXV, 1928, p. 109, No. 2.) vbZ.

Vijg(h), a former Dutch Mennonite family, whose members were found in a number of congregations in the 17th and 18th centuries, e.g., Rotterdam, Brielle, and Amsterdam. A conservative branch of this family at Amsterdam were members of the Zonist (q.v.) church, but most of the Vijghs were rather liberal and frequented Collegiant meetings; Jacques Vijgh, e.g., a flax merchant of Rotterdam, was in 1729 baptized as a Mennonite by immersion. Dirk van Beek, a Mennonite minister of Rotterdam, administered this baptism at Schiedam. In the 18th century some Vijghs left the Mennonite Church, the liberals at Rotterdam and Amsterdam joining the Remonstrants and the conservatives of Amsterdam the Reformed Church. vbZ.

Church records of Rotterdam and Amsterdam; DB 1909, 161; J. C. van Slee, De Rijnsburger Collegianten (Haarlem, 1895) passim.

Vijnken (Vyntgen) de Jonc(h)eere, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake with her sisters Goudcken (q.v.) and Janneken de Joncheere and two other women on July 21, 1562, at Gent, Belgium. Vijnken, who was unmarried and 30 years of age, was born at Merendree in Flanders. These martyrs are commemorated in the hymn "Als men schreef duyst vijfthondert jaer ende twee en tsestich mede," found in the Lietboecxken. (Mart. Mir. D 289, E 759; Verheyden, Gent, 29, No. 91.) vbZ.

Vilgard, an Anabaptist martyr: see Marthin of Vilgraten.

Vill, a village in the Adige Valley: see Fill.

Villa des Sapins: see Valdoie.

Villages (Holländerdörfer). Nowhere else have Mennonites developed a distinctive village pattern as did the Prusso-Russian group. To be sure, the Swiss Mennonites surviving as religious refugees in remote areas as pioneers on uncultivated land developed a pattern of settlement known as the Hof. In the Jura Mountains of Switzerland as well as in Alsace-Lorraine and the southern parts of Germany they became owners or renters of large farms and estates (Höfe), on which they established themselves in increasing numbers, developing some of them into small villages and hamlets. Some of the villages still indicate such an origin in the name ending in hof or heim. Among them are Spitalhof, Friedelsheim, Gerolsheim, Kriegsheim, Weierhof, Ibersheimerhof, and Kohlhof, all located in the Palatinate and Hesse. These places established and occupied originally by Swiss Mennonite refugees have in many instances grown to sizable villages or towns. Some are still primarily occupied by Mennonites, while in others the Mennonite population has become a minority. Today they reveal no peculiar Mennonite characteristics in the total pattern of the surrounding communities.

The Swiss Mennonites settling in Poland, Volhynia, and Galicia established some villages. In Poland they lived in Urszulin and Michelsdorf and in Volhynia in Eduardsdorf, Horodyszcze, Waldheim, Kotozufka, etc. These were the Swiss Volhynian Mennonites who later settled near Moundridge, Kan., and Freeman, S.D. The Swiss Galician Mennonites established the villages of Falkenstein, Einsiedel, Rosenberg, Rosenhof, Kiernica, Horozanna, Ehrenfeld, Dobrovlany, Podusilna, etc. Some of these were not villages in the sense of a closely knit unit. Even the closed villages were not always built according to a specific pattern. The early Galician villages of Falkenstein, Einsiedel, and Neuohof followed a specified plan. The others were mostly cluster villages (Haufendörfer). Most of these villages were occupied by the Mennonites for a limited time only. The Hutterite villages are described in the article Bruderhof. The Swiss and German Mennonites settling in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and other states as a rule lived on individual farms, following the practice of their environment. One exception was Germantown (q.v.), Pa., founded in 1683, which was mixed Quaker and Mennonite and soon became a town.

The Mennonites of Prussia and Russia developed a unique pattern of villages during their colonization and settlement efforts, which was also transplanted to Manitoba, Mexico, and Paraguay. This pattern, although of Germanic background, includes some features based on the religio-cultural background and development of the Prusso-Russian Mennonites.

During the first half of the 16th century Dutch religious refugees settled at the mouth of the Vistula River in Prussia, mostly under Polish authorities. Their villages became known as "Holländerdörfer" or "Holländereien." These settlements established by a certain type of settlers under certain contracts with the lords and administered in a certain way became the nucleus or background of the Mennonite villages of Prussia, Poland, and Russia, which were later transplanted to Manitoba. They differed from the type prevailing along the Vistula River. The medieval colony village of the Vistula area was as a rule organized by a "locator" who functioned as Schulze (mayor), through whom a lease was obtained from the royal owners of the land, and who invited settlers from everywhere to till the land on long-term leases. The locator did not pay rent and his office was hereditary. Such a village was established in accordance with the "German right."

The villages established according to the "Dutch right" ("Holländisch Weis' und Gebrauch") functioned on a different basis. A group of settlers entered an agreement with the landowner. The lease agreements differed. The lease was usually for 40 years. The office of the Schulze was not hereditary. He was elected from the village community and had no special privileges; the government was democratic. Originally the occupants of these "Dutch" villages were actually primarily Dutch by background and to a large extent Mennonites. Later on the term "Holländerei" came to mean nothing more than a village and land rented and established on the basis of the "Dutch right." The occupants of such a "Dutch" village could come from any part of Europe and belong to any creed.

By 1772 there were some 400 Holländerdörfer established in the Vistula region, but not nearly all were occupied by Mennonites or by Dutch settlers. Felicia Szper (p. 110) lists for 1676 the following villages as "Holländische Hufen" in the two Werders of Marienburg occupied by Dutch Mennonites: Platenhof, Tiegenhagen, Tiegerweide, Reimerswalde, Orloffferfeld, Pletzgendorf, Orloff, Pietzgendorf, and Petershagenerfeld.

Horst Penner lists for the 18th century the following villages with a predominantly Mennonite population: Altebabke, Altendorf, Beyershorst, Blumen-Ort, Einlage, Freienhuben, Glabitsch, Gross-Plehnendorf, Gross-Walddorf, Halbstadt, Herrenhagen, Heubuden, Klein Mausdorf, Kozelicke, Ladekopp, Marienau, Neuendorf, Neunhuben, Orloff, Orloffferfelde, Petershagen, Pietzkendorf, Pop-pau, Pordenau, Reimerswalde, Rosenort, Rückenau, Scharfenberg, Schönhorst, Schönsee, Schmerblock, Schönau, Tiege, Tiegenhagen, Tiegerweide, and Wotzlaff.

The villages located on the Vistula were also characterized by being established in swampy areas which had to be drained. Ditches and canals led to the river at the elevated end of the land. Homes were located along the street, which at times followed the windings of the river. Villages established according to the old "German right" did not have the residence, barn, and shed under one roof, as did the Dutch villages, in which the barn was directly connected with the residence and the shed was attached to the barn, the whole in some cases forming a triangle. At some places the dwelling had an addition for the retired parents called Endenkammer. The porch added to this structure in many cases was of Prussian and not Dutch background.

In some instances the land of each farmer adjoined his yard. This would indicate that the pattern was related to the "Hufendörfer" practice. E. K. Francis classifies the Russian Mennonite pattern as a "Gewanddorf," which is characterized by the rotation of crops according to an established pattern. This was at times the case in Russia and also Manitoba. However, the Gewanddorf is a cluster of homes and farms, which the Mennonite village never was. The latter always followed a very symmetrical design, the houses being located in a straight line at regular intervals on one side or on both sides of the street. This village therefore more nearly resembled a Hufendorf. However, it developed peculiarities of its own. For this reason it is best to identify this type of village simply as Holländerdorf.

The Holländerdörfer established in the swampy regions of the Vistula Delta by Dutch Mennonites became the pattern not only for other settlers in that area, but were transplanted to entirely new and nonswampy locations in Poland and Russia. Naturally the environment somewhat modified the village pattern and practices. The low countries of the Netherlands and the Vistula areas were exchanged for the steppes of the Ukraine, where there was at times too little rainfall. Although the location of the villages was often chosen along rivers, such as the Dniepr or the Molotschna, the geographic and climatic conditions differed considerably. Hardly any dams had to be built to prevent flooding. The crops differed somewhat. The need for summer fallow made it necessary at times to adhere to an agreed-upon communal pattern of crop rotation.

The great genius and promoter of the uniform establishment of villages was Johann Cornies (q.v.), who as chairman of the Agricultural Association (q.v.) introduced some rigid rules for the layout of villages, exact location of each building in the village, the construction of the buildings, the planting of the shade trees and orchards in the yards, the maintenance of the village street, the location of the school, etc. During the first half of the 19th century a significant feature of the Russian Mennonite village pattern was the communal pasture for all cattle, sheep, and horses. As a rule, the village consisted of a wide unimproved main street with 20 to 40 homes and farmyards on each side. The land of the individual farmer at times adjoined his yard. This was not always the case; if the land surrounding the village was not all of the same quality, it was parceled out to give all the farmers equal shares of both the better and the poorer land. The farm usually consisted of approximately 160 acres. The community had a cowherd who in the early morning drove the cattle and other animals through the village to the community pasture. The village generally had a corral at one end where the horses not needed for farm labor were kept overnight. In the morning they joined the herd. During the hot noon hours the cattle rested at the village pond, creek, or river. The cowherd was usually a native Russian and lived near the corral.

The older villages as a rule consisted of farmers with full-sized farms (Vollwirte) who had originally purchased the land, some owners of half-size farms, and some "Anwohner" (q.v.). The Anwohner lived in a suburb of the village, which had yards and homes for people without land (see Landless). They were as a rule the landless younger generation working for the farmers or in small industry. They were also the candidates for the establishment of a new settlement whenever money and land for this purpose became available. The establishment of new settlements and villages gradually became the responsibility of the Mennonite authorities of the mother settlement. Some of these settlements consisted of only a few villages, while others had nearly as many as the Molotschna settlement, viz., 58 villages. With slight modifications these villages were patterned after those of the mother settlements in the Ukraine. In the early days of the settlement the buildings consisted of a frame of lumber and walls of adobe brick, with a roof of straw and later of shingles. As the settlers became more prosperous they replaced the early buildings with brick structures having a tile or tin roof. The architectural pattern of the house, residence, barn, and shed as a rule remained the same (see Architecture).

The administration of the villages and settlements was similar to that in Prussia, i.e., according to the "Dutch right." The Schulze and other members of the village assembly (Schultheat) were elected by the voters of the village. Usually the village was administratively a part of the total Mennonite settlement which had an Oberschulze (q.v.) as the mayor. During the early 19th century the Mennonite settlers were not responsible to the local Russian authorities but to the Fürsorgekomitee (q.v.) established by the Russian government to supervise and administer all foreign settlements in Russia. Toward the end of the past century, the Mennonite administrations became responsible to their local Russian administrations (see Government Among Mennonites of Russia).

With few modifications this pattern of village settlement and administration was transplanted to Manitoba by the Old Colony (Chortitza), Fürstenland, and Bergthal Mennonites. The more progressive Bergthal and Kleine Gemeinde groups on the East Reserve provided a disintegrating element when they realized that living on one's own farm had some advantages over the traditional village pattern. Hence many villages were abandoned. The transfer of some of the Bergthal Mennonites to the West Reserve introduced this influence also among the Old Colony and Fürstenland Mennonites. This and the matter of self-administration vs the acceptance of the municipality system and the parochial vs public school system became the vital issues which caused numerous schisms and the ultimate emigration of the more conservative element among the Old Colony, Sommerfeld, and Bergthal Mennonites to Mexico and Paraguay after World Wars I and II. At the turn of the century the Manitoba Mennonites established daughter settlements in the areas of Hague and Swift Current, Sask. Here too, as in Mexico, Menno in the Chaco, and Villarrica in Paraguay, they established villages on the old pattern of Prussia and Russia. Lack of some building materials and adjustment to the Latin-American environment have caused some slight deviations, but basically the layout, architecture, and administration of the village have been maintained.

A very interesting element in the Mennonite practice of establishing villages in various parts of the world is the naming of these villages. As is evident from the village names of the Marienburg Werder, the names were German. The reason for the choice of German names by Dutch settlers may have been that they dealt with authorities and lords who spoke either German or Polish. Some of these German names such as Orloff (although originally very likely Slavic) and Tiege were transplanted to the Ukraine. However, because of the multiplicity of villages established in Russia, most of the names originated there. In the early decades the names were primarily German. Toward the end of the past century they received at times an official Russian name while the settlers themselves gave them German names with a very strong poetic flavor. At the beginning of the 20th century, Russian village names (or even numbers) were used. During the anti-German feeling of World War I many German names were replaced by Russian names. As a result of World War II practically all the names were made Russian.

It was in Russia that the practice of using the same names for villages or daughter settlements flourished, like the repetition of names of grandparents, uncles, and aunts in a newly established family. Certain of these names in the daughter settlements of Russia, Canada, and South America were particularly popular. New combinations appeared. The popularity of names containing "Blume," "Frieden," "Rose," "Schön," or "Wald" reveals that the hard-working Mennonite farmers liked to give their villages poetic names. A new element was added in Russia when they began to name their villages after the czars. Many appendices were added to names such as Alexander and Nicholas (Nikolai). High officials were memorialized in names like Köpental, Konteniusfeld, and Hahnsau. In some instances the villages were named for the Russian noble from whom the land was purchased for the establishment of a daughter settlement.

The Manitoba Mennonites, who were primarily of the Chortitza or Old Colony background in Russia, used a considerable number of names of the villages from which they came, including some found in the Molotschna settlement. It is here that old forms are used to create new names through new combinations. Hardly an English name appears in the 110 villages established in the West and East Reserves. Sometimes the same names are used in both Reserves. The Manitoba names were transplanted to the Swift Current and Hague settlements in Saskatchewan and to the settlements in Mexico and Paraguay. Some of the same names are used in the three (Manitoba, Swift Current, and Durango) settlements of Mexico. It is likely that the village assembly decided on the name. If the majority of the settlers came from one village, they simply agreed to use the same old name. At times the prefix Neu (new) was used, e.g., Neu-Schönwiese or Neu-Bergthal.

Some of the Mennonites of the Molotschna settlement who came to the prairie states in and after 1874 made an attempt to perpetuate the village pattern of Russia and Prussia. The Krimmer Mennonite Brethren established the village Gnadenau (q.v.) at Marion, Kan., and the Alexanderwohl congregation settled originally in seven villages north of Newton. Also the conservative Kleine Gemeinde members of Jansen, Neb., settled in villages. But aside from these hardly any attempts were made to establish villages. The reason for this may be that the Molotschna Mennonites, being more progressive, were inclined to recognize and adopt the good practices of the new country. Although they had asked to have compact areas set aside in order to be able to establish their traditional settlements, they were not granted this privilege. The East and West Reserves were the Canadian answer to this request for the Old Colony Mennonites. As a rule the Mennonites in the prairie states had to be satisfied with the opportunity to purchase alternate sections of land along the railroads such as the Santa Fe and the Burlington. This made it difficult for them to establish compact settlements, and even more so to realize the old traditional village pattern with self-government. The few villages actually established soon disintegrated. However, driving along Highway 15 from Newton to Lehigh or Hillsboro, one can still see remnants of the villages of the Alexanderwohl community near Goessel. To be sure, there are Mennonite towns such as Goessel, Lehigh, Hillsboro, Moundridge, and Elbing in Kansas; Meno in Oklahoma; Henderson and Jansen in Nebraska; Mountain Lake in Minnesota; and Freeman in South Dakota; but they were not established according to the traditional pattern and cannot really be classified as Holländerdörfer. They are typical American towns of the prairie states.

On the following pages a list of Mennonite villages established in Prussia, Russia, Canada, the United States, Mexico, and Paraguay is given. This constitutes the first attempt to list in alphabetical order all Mennonite villages of Prusso-Russian background which could be classified as Holländerdörfer. Only the major Prussian villages of the Marienburg Werder are listed. Various sources were used, some of which conflicted. The list makes, therefore, no claim to completeness or to full accuracy. No attempt has been made to state which villages are still in existence and which have disappeared. The major point is to show how large a number of villages was established and how frequently the names were repeated by pioneers who generation after generation continued their journeys as "pilgrims and strangers."

Not all of the later villages in Russia which were given Russian names are listed. Numerous villages in Russia have doubtless been destroyed and very few are at the present occupied by Mennonites. Of the more than 100 Mennonite villages established on the East and West Reserves of Manitoba, only a small number have survived. This is the case particularly on the East Reserve. The traditional village life continues with a minimum of disturbance from the outside among the Old Colony Mennonites of Mexico and in some of the settlements in Paraguay.

The following list indicates how often the names were repeated in the various settlements. Only those which appear more than five times are listed.

Frequency of Names

- 13 Chortitza
 11 Blumenort, Grünfeld, Orloff, Reinfeld, Schönau
 9 Gnadenfeld, Gnadenthal, Hochfeld, Schönthal, Rosenort, Rosenfeld
 8 Kleefeld, Neuanlage, Nikolaifeld, Reinland, Rosenthal, Schönfeld
 7 Blumenhof, Blumenthal, Grünweide, Grünthal, Halbstadt, Neuhoftung, Neuhorst, Rosenhof, Schönewiese, Silberfeld, Waldheim
 6 Alexandrovka, Blumenfeld, Friedensfeld, Hamburg (Hamburg), Hochstädt, Lichtfelde, Neuendorf, Nikolayevka, Osterwick
 5 Altona (Altenau), Bergthal, Blumstein, Kronsthal, Landskrone, Lindenau, Reinthal, Rosengart, Rudnerweide, Sommerfeld, Tiege

In order to identify the settlements in which the villages occurred the key to the symbols, "Mennonite Settlements," which follows the list of villages, should be used.

MENNONITE VILLAGE NAMES
 (Holländerdörfer)

In Prussia, Russia, Canada, United States, Mexico, Paraguay

(This is a nearly complete list. Symbols indicate settlements. For key see next section.)

- Adelsheim (Dolinovka)—Ch
 Ak Metchet (Central Asia)
 Aktatch—Te
 Alexanderfeld (Grishevka)—Ku
 Alexanderkron(c)—Mo, Sl
 Alexandertal—Mo, Fü, Al
 Alexanderwohl—Mo
 Alexandrovka—Me, Te, Sl, Om, Kuz, Da
 Alexeyevka—Ig, Om
 Alexeyfeld—Sl
 Alfneue—MC
 Aliesova—Or
 Altenau (Altona)—Pr, Mo, Az, MER, MWR
 Ananyevka—Sl
 Andreasfeld (Ukraine 1870, one village)
 Andreyevka: see Gnadenthal
 Anna—Sad
 Anneskoye—Na Arrival—Su
 Auhagen—PN
 Baragan—Cr
 Belo Berezevo—A
 Berezovka—Udrak—Da
 Berezovka—Sl
 Bergfeld—MER, MWR, PM
 Bergthal—Be, MER, MWR, MC (twice)
 Blumenfeld—Bo, Br, KA, Ne, Da, MC
 Blumengart—Ch, MER, MWR, PM
 Blumenheim—Br, SH, MC
 Blumenhof—Bo, MER, MWR, SSC, MC, MD, PFe
 Blumenort—Mo, KA, Sl, A, MER, MWR, SSC, NJ, MC, MD, PFe
 Blumenstein (Blumstein)—Pr, Mo, MER, MWR, MC
 Blumenthal—MWR, Sh, MG (twice), Me, PM, PFe Bodanovka—A
 Bogomazov—NS
 Borissopol—Ar
 Borissovka—Pa
 Brunnenthal—PM
 Burwalde (Baburka)—Pr, MFe, MWR, MC
 Central (Zentral)—PFR
 Choroskoye—Sl
 Chortitz(a)—Ch (twice), Ba, Or, Sl, MER, MWR, SH, SSC, MC, PM, PN, PVB Deyevka—Or Dmitrovka—Ar
 Dobrovka—Or
 Dolinovka—Or, Sl
 Domninskoye—Pa
 Donskoye—NS

- Ebenfeld (Rovnpol)—Bo, Sl, Pa, MER
 Edenberg—MWR, Sh
 Edenthal—MC, PM
 Eichenbach—MC
 Eichenfeld (Dubovka)—Mill, A
 Eichengrund—MWR
 Eichenthal—MC
 Eigengrund—MER, PM
 Eigenhof—MER, PM
 Einlage (Kitchkas)—Ch, NWR, MC, PN
 Ekaterinovka—Mi, Eg, Sl
 Elenovka—Ma, Mill
 Elisabethtal—Mo
 Emmathal—KA
 Eugenfeld (near Alexandrovsk, Ukraine, one village)

- Felsenbach—Bo
 Felsenthal—MC
 Feodorovka—Or Fernheim—MC
 Filadelfia—PFe
 Fischau—Pr, Mo
 Franzfeld (Varvarovka)—Mill
 Franzthal—Mo
 Fresenheim—At
 Friedensdorf—Mo
 Friedensfeld—Sl, Om, Mir, A, PM, PFe
 Friedensheim—PN, Pv
 Friedensruh—Mo, MWR, MC, MFe
 Friedrichstal—Be, MER
 Fürstenau—Pr, Mo
 Fürstenwerder—Pr, Mo, PV

- Gelbbrunn—PM
 Georgstal—Fü
 Gerhardsthal—Tch
 Gnadenfeld—Mo, Au, Sl, A, KA, MER, MWR, MC, PM
 Gnadenheim—Mo, Sl, Pm, PFe
 Gnadenthal—Mo, Ba, Au, Al, KA, MWR, SSC, MC, PN
 Gortchakovo—Da
 Greenfarm—MWR
 Grigoryevka—Na, Sl
 Gronau—PN
 Grossweide—Pr, Mo, MWR, MC, PM, PN, PFR
 Grossfürstental—Su
 Grottsfeld (Krotovka)—Al
 Grünewald—PV
 Grünfeld—Sh, Ba, A, KA, Mer, Sh, MC, (twice), MD, PM
 Grünland—MC
 Grünthal—MER, MWR, Sh, MC (twice), MD, PM
 Grünweide—MWR

- Hahnsau—At
 Halbstadt—Pr, Mo, Sl, MWR, MC, PM, PN
 Hamburg (Hamburg)—Mo, Bo, Om, MER, MWR, MC
 Heimstätte—PN
 Heuboden—Pr, Be, MER, MWR, NJ, MC, PM
 Hierschau—Mo
 Hildesheim—PV
 Hochfeld—Mill, KA, MER, MWR, Sh, MC, MD, Pm, PVB
 Hochstädt—Sl, MER, Sh, MC, MD, PM
 Hochtäl—MC
 Hoffnungsau—MC
 Hoffnungsfeld—MWR, MC
 Hoffnungsort—Bo
 Hoffnungsthal—MC
 Hohenau—PM, PFe
 Hohendorf—AT, Au

- Ignatyev—Ig
 Insel Chortitza—Ch
 Ivangorod—Mill
 Ivanovka—Sl, Om

- Kalinovo—Me
 Kamenka—Or Kameshevoye—Or Kameshlak—Te
 Kamenets—NS
 Kantserovka—Or Karaguy—Or Karambash—Da
 Karasan—Cr

Karathal—Sl
 Karlsruhe—PFe
 Karpovka—Me
 Kirchheim—PV
 Kitchkas—Or
 Kleefeld—Mo, Sl, A, MER, MWR, MC, PM, PFe
 Kleinstädt—MWR, PM
 Klippenfeld—Mo
 Klubnikovo—Or Koltan—NS
 Kondratyevka—Bor
 Konteniusfeld—Mo
 Konstantinovka—Le, Pa
 Köppental—AT, Au
 Korneyevka—Me
 Kornishheim—Pa
 Kotlyarevka—Me
 Krasnovka—Al
 Krassikovo—NS
 Kronsfield—Sh, MWR, MC, PN
 Krongarten (Krongart)—Ch, MER, MWR
 Kronsthal (Kolinsk)—Ch, NS, MER, MWR, Sh
 Kubanka—Or Kulikovo—Da
 Kuterla—NS

Ladekopp—Pr, Mo
 Landskron(e)—Mo, Sl, MER, PFe, PFr
 Laubenheim—PM
 Lavarov—Su
 Leonidovka—Ig, Ar
 Lichtenau—Mo, MER, PN
 Lichtfelde (Lichterfelde)—Pr, Sl, MWR, MC, Pfe, PV
 Lidyevka—Ar
 Liebenau—Pr, Mo
 Liebental (Lyubimovka)—Al
 Lindenau—Pr, Mo, AT, MWR, PM
 Lyessovka—Me
 Lyubomirovka—Bor
 Loshkarevo—Ol
 Lugovsk—NS
 Lustigstal—Cr
 Lystanderhöb—AT

Margenau—Mo, Om
 Marianovka (Maryanovka)—Me, Te, Ar
 Mariawohl—Mo
 Marienthal (Maryevka)—Mo, Al, Pv
 Markovka—Sl
 Maslyanovka—Om
 Medenthal—AT Memrik—Me, A
 Michailovka—Me
 Michailsburg—Fu
 Miloradovka—Mi, Pa
 Miropol—Ol
 Montanay—Cr
 Morgenthal—MC
 Müdelburg—Te
 Münsterberg—Mo
 Muntau—Pr, Mo
 Muravyovka—Al

Nadarovka—Pa
 Natashino—Pa
 Neuanlage—NJ, MER, MWR, Sh, MC (twice), MD, PM
 Neu-Chortitza—Ba (see Chortitza)
 Neuenburg (Malashovka)—Ch, MER, MWR, MC
 Neuendorf (Neudorf)—Ch, MER, MWR, SSC, MC, PN
 Neuheim—Ba, PN
 NeuhoF—MC, PN
 NeuhoFnung (Nadezhdino)—Al, MWR, MER, MC, MD, PM, PVS
 Neuhorst—Ch, MER, MWR, Sh, MC, MD, PN
 Neukirch—Mo
 Neumöln—PM
 Neurecht—MC
 Neustädt—MC, MD
 New York—Ig, A
 Nikolaidorf—Mo, Sl
 Nikolaifeld—Za, Au, Bor, Su, Sl, Om, Mill, PN
 Nikolaithal—Bo
 Nikolayevka—Me, Ig, Or, Te, Tr, Sl
 Nordthal—MC
 Novo-Stepnoye—Sam

Olgafeld—Fü, Sh, MC
 Olgino—Ol, Pa
 Orbelyanovka—Tem
 Orechov—A
 Orloff (Ohrloff, Orlovka, Orlovo)—Pr, Mo, AT, Al, Za, Au, Me, Sl, Om, PFe Ostenfelde—AT Osterwick—Ch, MER, MWR, Sh, MC, PM
 Ostheim—T

Pastwa—Pr, Mo, MER
 Paulsheim—Mo
 Pessotchnoye—Bez
 Petersdorf (Nadezhdovka)—Mill
 Petershagen—Pr, Mo
 Petrovka—Na, Or Pleshanovo—NS
 Podolsk—NS
 Pordenau—Pr, Mo
 Prangenau—Pr, Mo
 Pretoria—Or, Te
 Pribrezhnoye—A
 Prossovo—Sl
 Putchkovo—Om

Rayevka—Pa
 Rebrovka—Pa
 Reichenbach—MER, PM
 Reinfeld (Reinfeld)—Pa, Mill, MER, MWR, Sh, SSC, MC, MD, PM, A Reinland—Pr, MWR, Sh, SSC, MC (twice), PM, PVS
 Reinthal—Ch, MWR, MC, PM, PVS
 Rio Verde—PM
 Rodnitchnoye—Or Rohrbach—Te
 Romanovka—Au, Ig, Or, Ol
 Rosenbach—Fü, SSC
 Rosenberg—PV
 Rosenfeld (Tchistopol)—Sl, MER, MWR, NJ, Sh, SSC, MC, MD, PVB
 Rosengart (Novoslobodka)—Ch, NR, MER, MWR, MC
 Rosenheim—Da, MC, PM
 Rosenhof—Br, Sl, NJ, MWR, SSC, MC, PM
 Rosenort—Pr, Mo, NJ, MWR, SSC, MC, MD, PFe, PV
 Rosenthal (Kantserovka)—Ch, MER, MWR, NJ, A, MC, MD, PFe
 Rosenwald—Sl, OM, MWR
 Rovnopol: see Ebenfeld
 Rozovka—Min
 Rückenau—Pr, PFr
 Rudnerweide—Pr, Mo, MWR, MC, PM
 Ryskovo—Sam

Samoylovka—Sam
 Sandhorst—PN
 Saratova—Sl
 Sarona—Cr
 Schanzenberg—MER
 Schanzenfeld—MWR, SSC, MC
 Schönauf—Pr, Mo, Al, Sl, Min, NER, MWR, MC, PM, PFe
 Schönbrunn—PM, PFe
 Schöndorf—Bo, MWR, MC
 Schöneberg (Smolyanaya)—Ch, MER, MWR
 Schönfeld (Krasnopol)—Br, Be, MER, MWR, SSC, MC, MD, PM
 Schönhorst (Vodyanaya)—Pr, Ch, MER, MWR
 Schönwiese—Ch, MER, MWR, SSC, PM, PFe, PVS
 Schönsee—Pr, Mo, Za, MER, Sl, A, PVS
 Schöenthal—Be, MER, MWR, Sl, MC (twice), MD, PM, PN
 Schönwalde—PV
 Sergeyeveka—Fü, Sl
 Shestakovo—Sam
 Shumanovka—A
 Silberfeld—MER, MWR, MC, MD, PVB, Sl, A Silberthal—MC
 Smolyanovka—Om
 Soborovka—Pa
 Sofiyevka—Pa
 Sommerfeld—MER, MWR, MC, PM, PVS
 Sparrau—Pr, Mo
 Spat—Cr
 Springfield (Springfield)—KA, SSC
 Springstein—MC

Springthal—MC
 Steinau (Starozavodskoye)—Bo, Ne
 Steinbach—Bo, NER, MC, PM
 Steinfeld (Kamenopol)—Mo, Sh, PN
 Steinreich—MC
 Stepanovka—Or
 Strassberg—MER, PN
 Sulak—Te
 Suvorovka—Or, SI

Talheim—MC
 Talma—Te
 Taranovka—Te
 Tatyankovka—SI
 Tchernozemnoye—Or Tchernov—SI
 Tchernyevka—SI
 Tchukreyevka—Om
 Tchistopol—Pa
 Tempelhof—Tem
 Thalbach—MC
 Tiefenbrunn—PV
 Tiege—Pr, Mo, Az, SI, PN
 Tiegenghagen—Pr, Mo
 Tiegerweide—Pr, Mo, Om
 Tukulchak—Cr

Valuyevka—AF
 Vassilyevka—Na
 Vladimirovka—Ar
 Vollwerk—MER, PM
 Voloyevka—Tr
 Vyazemskoye—Ar

Waldeck—PB
 Waldheim—Mo, MWR, MC, PM, PFr, PV, PVS
 Waldhof—PN
 Waldhorst—PV
 Waldreich—MC
 Waldsruh—PFe, PV
 Wanderloh—Te
 Weidefeld (Weidenfeld)—MWR, MC, PM, PVB
 Wernersdorf—Pr, Mo
 Wiesenfeld (single village in Ukraine)—SI, MC, PFe
 Wiesenheim—MC, PM
 Wohldemfurst—Ku
 Wüstenfelde—PFe

Yurgino—A Yurmankey—Da
 Zabangagul—Or Zelenoye—Or Zentral (see Central)

The total number of villages of Prusso-Russian Mennonite settlements following the pattern of the Holländerdörfer is 769. The largest number was located in Russia. The total number of the alphabetical list of "Mennonite Village Names" is 327. The total number of villages including those duplicated in this list is 773. On one hand, this is not a complete list of villages established (the total would probably approach 1,000). On the other hand, not all villages are in existence any more and by far not all villages are in existence are occupied by Mennonites today. Nevertheless, this study illustrates a very significant phase of the spread of Mennonites and the socio-economic pattern of their life with a unique religious and cultural background. C.K.

Gerhard Hein, "The Development of the Mennonite Hof of the 17th Century, Palatinate into the Mennonite Church of Pfalz-Rheinland Today," MQR XXIX (1955) 188-96; idem, "Wie aus den Mennonitenhöfen der Kurpfalz im 17. Jahrhundert die Mennonitengemeinden in Pfalz-Rheinland von heute wurden," Der Mennonit (September 1954) 132; "Dorf," Der Grosse Brockhaus (Wiesbaden, 1953) 326; Horst Penner, Ansiedlung mennonitischer Niederländer im Weichselmündungsgebiet . . . (Weierhof, 1940); Peter Bachmann, Mennoniten in Klempoln (Lemberg, 1934); J. W. Fretz, Pilgrims in Paraguay (Scottsdale, 1953); C. A. Dawson, Group Settlement, Ethnic Communities in Western Canada (To-

MENNONITE SETTLEMENTS CONSISTING OF VILLAGES (Holländerdörfer)

Prussia, Russia, Canada, United States, Mexico, Paraguay

Key to Symbols

(As a rule only the settlements consisting of more than one village are included. Number of villages, year of founding, and abbreviation of name or symbol are given.)

Settlement	Number of Villages	Year of Founding	Symbol
Amur, Siberia	20	1927	A
Alt-Samara (Alexandertal)	8	1861	Al
Am Trakt, Samara	10	1853	AT
Arkadak, Saratov	7	1910	Ar
Auli-Ata, Central Asia	6	1889	Au
Baratov, Ukraine	2	1879	Ba
Barnaul, see Slavgorod
Bergthal, Ukraine	5	1836	Be
Bezenchuk, Samara	1	1897	Bez
Borozenko, Ukraine	7	1865	Bo
Borrissovo, Ukraine	3	1892	Bor
Brazol (Schönfeld), Ukraine	4	1868	Br
Chortitza, Ukraine	18	1789	Ch
Crimea, Ukraine	25	1862	Cr
Davlekanovo, Ufa	5	1894	Da
Fürstenland, Ukraine	6	1864	Fü
Ignatyev, Ukraine	7	1889	Ig
Kansas, Alexanderwohl	8	1874	KA
Kuban, Caucasus	2	1863	Ku
Kuzmitsky, Ukraine	1	187	Kuz
Manitoba, East Reserve	54	1874	MER
Manitoba, West Reserve	56	1875	MWR
Memrik, Ukraine	10	1885	Me
Mexico, Cuauhtemoc	96	1926	MC
Mexico, Durango	16	1927	MD
Millerovo, Don area	5	197	Mill
Miloradovka, Ukraine	2	1889	Mi
Minusinsk, Siberia	2	1913	Min
Miropol, Ukraine	1	1867	Mir
Molotschna, Ukraine	56	1804	Mo
Naumenko, Ukraine	4	1890	Na
Nebraska, Jansen, U.S.A.	7	1874	NJ
Nepluyevka, Ukraine	2	1870	Ne
Neu-Rosengart, Ukraine	2	1878	NR
Neu-Samara, Samara	12	1890	NS
Olgino, Caucasus	4	1895	OI
Omsk, Siberia	11	1899	Om
Orenburg (Deyevka)	23	1894	Or
Paraguay, Fernheim	21	1930	PFe
Paraguay, Friesland	9	1937	PFr
Paraguay, Menno	26	1928	PM
Paraguay, Neuland	24	1947	PN
Paraguay, Volendam	16	1947	PV
Paraguay, Villarrica, Bergfeld	7	1948	PVB
Paraguay, Villarrica, Somerfeld	9	1948	PVS
Pavlodar, Siberia	13	197	Pa
Prussia, Marienburg		167	Pr
Werder
Rovnopole, Samara	1	1903	Ro
Sadovaya, Voronezh	1	1909	Sad
Samoylovka, Ukraine	4	1888	Sam
Saskatchewan, Hague	17	1894	SH
Saskatchewan, Swift Current	15	1905	SSC
Shlachting, Ukraine	2	1874	Sh
Slavgorod (Barnaul), Siberia	58	1909	SI
Suvorovka, Caucasus	4	1894	Su
Terek, Caucasus	13	1901	Te
Tempelhof, Caucasus	2	1868	Tem
Tchornoglas, Ukraine	1	1860	Tch
Trubetskoye, Ukraine	2	1904	Tr
Yazekovo (Nikolaipol), Ukraine	8	1869	Ya
Zagradoval, Ukraine	5	1871	Za
Zentral, Voronezh	1	1909	Ze

ronto, 1936); Heinz Lehmann, Das Deutschtum in Westkanada (Berlin, 1939); Unruh, Hintergründe; E. K. Francis, In Search of Utopia (Altona, 1955); Felicia Szper, Niederlandsche nedersetzingen in West-Pruisen gedurende den Poolschen tijd (Enkhuizen, 1913); E. Keyser, De Nederlanden en het Weichseltal (Naarden, 1942); H. E. Wolfram, Die Niederlande und der Deutsche Osten (Berlin, 1943); "Alexanderwohl Villages in Kansas, 1874," Menn. Life IV (October 1949); Walter Schmiedehaus, "Mennonite Life in Mexico," Menn. Life II (April 1947); Elisabeth Peters, "Life in a Mennonite Village," Menn. Life XI (July 1956); Jacob Quiring, Die Mundart von Chortitza in Süd-Russland (Munich, 1928); Gedenkfeier der Mennonitischen Einwanderung in Manitoba Canada (Steinbach, 1949); Walter Schmiedehaus, Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott (Cuauhtemoc, 1948); Zdzislaw Ludkiewicz, Osady Holenderskie na nizinie Sartawiko-Nowskiej (Torun, 1934); Die Mennoniten-Gemeinden in Russland (Heilbronn, 1921); Herbert Wiebe, Das Siedlungswerk niederländischer Mennoniten im Weichseltal . . . (Marburg, 1952); J. Driediger, "Farming Among the Mennonites in West and East Prussia," MQR XXXI (1957) 16-21.

Village Chapel Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Mission, unorganized, was opened in Orange Cove, Cal., with 16 Sunday-school pupils on July 22, 1945. The city then had a population of 2,500. As the population increased to 5,000, attendance increased to 98. Gerhard T. Thiessen served two years as pastor. In 1949 the population of the town began to decline, and the attendance at the mission with it. In all about 150 professed conversion, but because of constant migration only five were baptized. Leonard Wiebe was the pastor in 1955. G.T.T.

Villarrica, a Paraguayan town some 120 miles southeast of Asunción, in the area of which Old Colony Mennonites settled in 1948, who like the first Mennonite settlers in Paraguay, i.e., the Menno Colony in the Gran Chaco founded in 1926, also came from Canada. The group at Villarrica numbered 1,644; 740 came from the East Reserve on the Red River in southern Manitoba, 764 came from the West Reserve on the same river, while another 140 came from Saskatchewan. The East Reserve group purchased 27,500 acres, largely of primitive forest land, about 65 miles east of Villarrica, and settled in 7 villages with Chortitz as the administrative, trade, and industrial center. The remainder of the group of immigrants founded the colony of Sommerfeld some 15 miles from Bergthal, settling on 85,000 acres of forest land which they purchased at about $3.00 per acre. Here nine villages were built; one of these, also named Sommerfeld, became the trade, industrial, and administrative center.

All the settlers of both these colonies, like the earlier immigrants from Canada, came to Paraguay hoping that it would here be easier for them to preserve their spiritual heritage, the German language (though in everyday life only Plattdeutsch is spoken), and their traditional, rural way of life. All of these they thought were threatened in Canada, with the young people leaving the farms for the city, availing themselves of higher education, and in many instances joining the military forces. The village life, church, and school in the new homeland were arranged according to the traditionally conservative pattern of their forefathers as these settled in Russia in the 1780's and again in Canada in the 1870's. Colony affairs are voted upon by the group, the ministers are elected from the ranks of the laymen, and teachers for the schools are also laymen able and willing to teach the "three R's." No higher education is provided for, and men rely on reading the Bible which also serves as textbook at school, periodicals—mostly religious journals edited by sister denominations, or farm journals, or the radio for widening their horizons. However, the making of a livelihood in the new homeland calls for considerable adapting. The once proud wheat farmers and "mixed" farmers of the Russian steppes and the Canadian prairies are here truck farmers, gardeners, raising kaffir corn, maize, peanuts, mandioca, and citrus fruits; they become "rancheros" raising the scrub but hardy cattle adapted to the tropics; or they cut, dress, and sell what useful timbers can be found in their forests, mostly lapacho and cedar. Or, lacking the means to start on their own, they are reduced to cowhands and wage earners. Paraguayan conditions, lacking markets and marketing facilities as well as natural resources, do not provide opportunities for much diversification and expansion, nor are economic and political conditions stable enough to encourage it. For this reason about one third of the immigrants that came in 1948 have returned to Canada. J.W.N.

W. Quiring, Im Schweisse deines Angesichts (Steinbach, 1953) 79-102; Mitteilungen, Inst. für Auslandsbeziehungen, November-December 1954, 302-3 (Stuttgart, Germany); J. W. Fretz, Pilgrims in Paraguay (Scottsdale, 1953) 9, 48, 153 ff.

Villegas (Argentina) Mennonite Church (MC) is located in the city of Villegas (pop. 7,000) on the Ferro Carril Oeste (main line of the Western Railroad), seat of the County of Villegas, in the Province of Buenos Aires, Argentina. The evangelical work in this town was begun by the Christian and Missionary Alliance, but because of scarcity of workers they had practically abandoned the town. Because it was near the town of America, where the Mennonites had been working, they exchanged their work established in Maza for this city in February 1941, and in the next month T. H. Brenneman and his family moved there to start the work anew. The congregation was organized in April 1942. The membership in 1957 was 16. The following pastors have served at Villegas: T. H. Brenneman 1941-45; Pedro Lanik, student pastor, 1945-46; Rogelio Peruggia, graduate of the Mennonite Bible Institute of Bragado, 1947-52; Alberto Ens 1953-54; Heriberto Palomeque 1954-55; Lawrence Brunk 1956-58; and Aladino Scorza 1959-. E.V.S.

J. W. Shank et al., The Gospel Under the Southern Cross (Scottsdale, 1943) 74 f., 195; Minutes of the Twenty-first Convention of the Argentine Mennonite Church (1947).

Villers-le-Château, a former Mennonite congregation near Châlons-sur-Marne, France, which died out in the 19th century. (Almanach Menn. du Cinquantenaire 1901-1951, 35.)

Villgraten: see Mart(h)in of Vilgraten.

Vilna: see Wilna.

Vincent Dircxzoom, an Anabaptist martyr, executed on Nov. 29, 1555, at Leeuwarden in Friesland, Netherlands. He was a tailor of IJlst (q.v.). Further particulars are lacking. His name and the date of his execution are found on a memorial table in the Mennonite church of IJlst. vdZ.

Vincent van der Hoeve: see Hoeve, van der.

Vincent de Hondtsvolk, followers of Vincent de Hondt (q.v.), an elder of Haarlem, also called Dantzigers, who separated from the Flemish Mennonites and from c1620 assembled in the meetinghouse "Het Goudgrendeltje" on the Smallegracht, Haarlem, until they merged with the Heiligland (Flemish) congregation c1782. An attempt in 1633 to merge with the Old Flemish church miscarried. (Kühler, Geschiedenis II, 197.) vdZ.

Vincent Mennonite Church (MC), located in East Vincent Twp., Chester Co., Pa., a member of the Franconia Conference, was probably established in 1735. In 1798 John and Catherine Rhoades conveyed two acres of land to representatives of the congregation, and for a long time the meetinghouse was called the Rhoades Church. This meetinghouse was remodeled in 1858, and razed in 1889 when a new church, 35 x 55 ft., was built. The Vincent congregation was small. It is claimed that the steep-pitched roof (making it appear more churchlike than most Mennonite meetinghouses) was built to facilitate the sale of the church in case the congregation died out. Sunday school and the English language were both adopted well in advance of the rest of the Franconia Conference congregations, and these two changes probably prevented the death of the church. The ministers of the congregation in 1958 were Amos Kolb, bishop, and Matthew Kolb and Jacob F. Kolb, preachers, with a membership of 152. J.C.W.

J. C. Wenger, History of the Mennonites of the Franconia Conference (Telford, 1937) 112-16.

Vincente Adriaensdochter, an Anabaptist martyr, drowned at Delft, Holland, on Jan. 24, 1539, with three other women. She is probably the same person as the Vincente Adriaens from Naaldwijk, who had attended a meeting held in her home town in 1536. Vincente was apparently an adherent of David (q.v.) Joris. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 749; Mellink, Wederdopers, 204, 220 f.) vdZ.

Vinck, Otto, an estate steward at Wesel (q.v.) in Rhineland, Germany, in whose house Henric (q.v.) Rol administered baptism in February or early March 1534; among the persons then baptized was Vinck himself. Jan (q.v.) van Geelen visited him in December 1534 or January 1535. On Jan. 18, 1535, Vinck, who was an instrument of the revolutionary leaders at Münster (q.v.), was arrested, being charged with an attempt to create a revolt at Wesel. On April 13, 1535, he was beheaded. The question whether his activity was connected with the expectation of many Dutch Anabaptists that Wesel would be "the new Zion," is still to be studied. (Mellink, Wederdopers.) vdZ.

Vine Press was a printed, bimonthly, four-page 7 x 8½ in. paper sponsored by the Middle District Conference (GCM) Young People's Union begun in December 1936 by Inda Sprunger. This English periodical, circulation 650 copies, was sent to churches and Bluffton College for distribution. It was discontinued in 1957 in favor of the Youth Page in the Central District Reporter after the merger of the Middle and Central district conferences. O.A.K.

Vineland, a village in Lincoln County, Ont., the heart of the fruit-growing belt of the Niagara Peninsula, the site of the oldest existing (not the first) settlement of Mennonites in Ontario, and the first organized Mennonite church, founded in 1801. The settlement is historically known as the Twenty, taking its name from the Twenty Mile Creek, about 20 miles from Niagara Falls. The first settlers arrived about 1786 from Pennsylvania, with a large number coming from Bucks County, Pa., in 1800-1. The church here suffered three serious schisms during the latter half of the century, giving birth to the Mennonite Brethren in Christ congregation about 1875, and the Wisler Church, now extinct, in 1889. The membership in 1959 was 68; it is an M.C. congregation.

Two congregations of Russian Mennonites have been established in the village following the immigration of 1922-23. The United Mennonite Church, organized in 1936, has a membership of over 340, and the Mennonite Brethren, organized in 1935, a membership of 270. A large percentage of the members are fruit-growers, with an increasing number finding employment in near-by cities. Bethesda Home, a mental hospital operated by the Mennonite Brethren Conference, is located about two miles southwest of the village. A home for the aged was erected in the village in 1955 by the United Mennonite churches of the area. (See Twenty.) B.C.

Vineland (Ont.) First Mennonite Church (MC), until 1956 known as the Moyer Mennonite Church (q.v.).

Vineland (Ont.) Mennonite Brethren Church, a member of the Canadian M.B. Conference, was organized on Nov. 20, 1932, under the leadership of D. Klassen. The first meeting place was a rented implement shed, where services were held with the members of the United Mennonite Church. All of the original members were immigrants from Russia. Later the building was bought by the Mennonite Brethren Church and converted into an attractive church building, like a tabernacle in appearance. Ministers who have served the congregation are D. Klassen, J. F. Dick, G. Matthies, B. B. Boldt, I. Ewert, P. F. Goertzen, J. K. Janzen, D. M. Thielman, A. A. Froese, Peter Mandtler, Henry Wiebe, and A. G. Wall who is still (1957) serving as pastor, with a membership of 250. H.H.J.

Vineland (N.J.) Training School was the location of Civilian Public Service Unit No. 92 from March 28, 1943, to June 14, 1946. The unit, operated by the Mennonite Central Committee, consisted of 16 men in 1945, who did maintenance and farm work as well as serving as orderlies and attendants. The school had a population of 550 mentally deficient children. (M. Gingrich, Service for Peace, Akron, 1949, pp. 237 f.) M.G.

Vineland (Ont.) United Mennonite Church (GCM), a member of the Conference of Mennonites in Canada, was formed by Mennonites who arrived from Russia in 1924-26 and later, who at first worshipped in an old abandoned sawmill. In 1927 they joined the United Mennonite Church in Ontario under the leadership of Bishop J. H. Janzen of Waterloo. The first ministers to serve this group were John Wichert, elected by the group in 1927, and Cornelius Neufeld and Nicholas Fransen, elected in 1929. Until that time sermons were read from books by someone in the congregation. On Dec. 24, 1935, a new meetinghouse was ready for occupation, built mostly by voluntary labor. On April 13, 1936, the congregation resolved to separate from the Waterloo United Mennonite Church and organize as an independent congregation under the leadership of Bishop Dietrich H. Koop. By 1942 the congregation had grown to such an extent that the church had to be enlarged. In 1944 Koop died and John J. Wichert was elected to this office. Other ministers serving the congregation are Nicholas Fransen, Abram H. Harder, and John W. Neufeld (ordained 1954). In 1957 a larger church was built of brick. The membership in 1958 was 348; John J. Wichert was the pastor.

J.J.W.

Vinne, van der, a Dutch Mennonite family, probably of Flemish descent, living at Harlingen in Friesland c1600, from where Laurens van der Vinne moved to Haarlem c1610. Since then van der Vinnés have been members of the Haarlem Mennonite congregation.

Many members of this family were artists. (1) Vincent Laurensz (Haarlem, 1629-1702) was a physician and a talented painter; in 1649-52 he traveled in Germany, writing a diary of this trip. He also published a list of painters whom he knew at Haarlem. His sons were (2) Isaac (Haarlem, 1655-1740), who operated a printing house and a bookshop, and in his leisure hours made meritorious etchings; (3) Laurens (Haarlem, 1658-1729), who managed a cotton factory and was also a painter; and (4) Jan (Haarlem, 1663-1721), a painter and etcher and the owner of a silk mill. Sons of (3) Laurens were (5) Vincent (Haarlem, 1686-1742), painter and etcher, (6) Jacob (Haarlem, 1688-1737), painter and etcher, deacon of the Mennonite congregation, and (7) Jan (Haarlem, 1699-1753), also a painter. (8) Laurens (Haarlem, 1712-42), a son of (6) Jacob, also made some paintings. Sons of (7) Jan were (9) Vincent (Haarlem, 1732-?), a painter and etcher, and (10) Jan (Haarlem, 1734-1805), an etcher.

Their art, though not without merit, seldom surpasses mediocrity. Most important is the work of (1) Vincent, who specialized in still life; a self-portrait by him is found in the Frans Hals museum at Haarlem. Etchings and drawings of several members of this family are found in the Teyler museum at Haarlem.

The van der Vinnés were loyal members of the church. In addition to (6) Jacob, other members of this family served as deacons at Haarlem—Izaak van der Vinne, d. 1801, serving for 45 years, Vincent van der Vinne, d. 1811, serving for 46 years, François Huurkamp van der Vinne, d. 1815, 38 years, Vincent van der Vinne (1798-1856, a great-grandson of [6] Jacob), who is also known for his etchings and woodcuts, deacon from 1837 until his death, representative of Haarlem on the board of the A.D.S. (q.v.) from 1854. Some members of this family also served as trustees of the Haarlem Mennonite orphanage.

vdZ.

Church records of Haarlem; Thieme-Becker, Allg. Lexikon der bildenden Künstler XXXIV (Leipzig, 1940) 392-94.

Vinne, Dionysius, one of the Wassenberg preachers (q.v.), b. at Diest in Brabant, was won to Lutheranism by 1523 in Antwerp, later betook himself to Jülich. With brief interruptions he zealously preached the new doctrine in Wassenberg, Höngen, and especially Süstern. On Sept. 17, 1532, he went to Münster in Westphalia, was baptized there on Jan. 5, 1534, and appointed to the office of apostle. On Oct. 13, 1534, he was sent as an apostle to Osnabrück, where he was immediately arrested. Vinne and four other apostles were executed at Iburg, one died in prison, and one, i.e., Graess (q.v.), was pardoned.

NEFF.

Rembert, Wiedertäufer, 302 ff.; W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 48-50 and passim; Mellink, Wederdopers, 48 f. and passim; ML IV.

Virgil Mennonite Brethren Church, also called the Niagara congregation, located near Virgil, Lincoln Co., Ont., a member of the Canadian M.B. Conference, was organized Nov. 6, 1937, under the leadership of John F. Dick. The membership in 1957 was 477, most of whom are rural people. The first meeting place was a rented hall in Niagara-on-the-Lake. Then a church was built near the village of Virgil. The congregation in the beginning consisted of only a few members, but grew very quickly because of a strong influx of Mennonite Brethren families from Western Canada after a series of droughts and crop failures. Ministers who have served the congregation are J. F. Dick, D. Klassen, A. Block, J. Derksen, P. Friesen, F. Wiens, P. Esau, F. F. Krocker, I. Ewert, and John D. Penner. The pastor in 1957 was F. J. Wiens.

H.H.J.

Virginia, known since the adoption of the first state constitution in 1776 as the Commonwealth of Virginia, area 40,815 square miles, population 3,318,680, the oldest of the 13 original colonies, founded in 1607. West Virginia (q.v.) was a part of the state until 1863. Geographically present-day Virginia is divided into three areas—the coastal plain or tide-water Virginia, the Piedmont Plateau, and the Great Valley area between the Blue Ridge Mountains on the east and the Alleghenies on the west. Distinction should be made between the Valley of Virginia and the Shenandoah Valley. The latter is only that part of the Valley which is drained by the Shenandoah rivers, tributaries of the Potomac, at Harpers Ferry. The Shenandoah Valley consists of about two thirds of the northern part of the Valley.

Not all the land of colonial Virginia was used for farming; much of it was used for grazing. Here the first roundups and corrals in American history took place. The plantation system did not come to

NORTHERN DISTRICT

1. Lindale
2. Trissels
3. Zion
4. Morning View
5. Park View
6. Cross Roads
7. Hebron
8. Bethel
9. Riverside
10. Mt. Hermon
11. Buckhorn
12. Valley View
13. Cullers Run
14. Criders
15. Salem
16. Woodland
17. Crest Hill
18. Stephens City
19. Mt. Jackson
20. Lucas Hollow
21. Peru
22. Pleasant Grove

MIDDLE DISTRICT

23. Gospel Hill
24. Zion Hill
25. Broad Street
26. Ridgeway
27. Chicago Avenue
28. Weavers
29. Mt. Clinton
30. Bank
31. Pike
32. Peake

33. Rawley Springs
34. Bethany
35. Bethel, W. Va.
36. Brushy Run
37. Gladwin
38. Hunting Ground
39. Horton
40. Lambert
41. Lanesville
42. North Fork
43. Riverside
44. Roaring Run
45. Simoda
46. Smoke Hole
47. Spruce Mountain
48. Sandy Bottom
49. Mt. Herman
50. Beldor
51. Elkton
52. Mt. Vernon
53. Temple Hill

SOUTHERN DISTRICT

54. Springdale
55. Hildebrand
56. Mountain View
57. Stuart's Draft
58. Greenmonte
59. Lynside
60. Ebenezer

MENNONITE CONGREGATIONS IN VIRGINIA and WEST VIRGINIA

SCALE OF MILES 0 5 10 15 20

See also Rockingham County map

60 Ebenezer
SOUTH BOSTONKerr Dam Reservoir

NORTH

Virginia until after the Revolution, when the price of tobacco was so low that the small farmer was unable to carry on and sold his land to the larger landowner. The result was the plantation system. The exception to the above rule was the Shenandoah Valley of Virginia. This area was settled by the Pennsylvania Germans, who proved to be better farmers than the English, preserving and conserving the native fertility of soil. Even today Pennsylvania German farms can be recognized.

In religion in many respects local government and church organization in Virginia was a replica of the mother country of England. The county board or bench ruled the county and the vestry board organized on the same pattern was responsible for the religious life of the people. These agencies were self-perpetuating. On the state level, until 1787 Virginia had the state church, the Anglican Church. This meant that everyone in Virginia was expected to join this church. The sumptuary laws of early Virginia were almost as strict as those in Massachusetts. Quakers were banned in 1660; they were not to hold conventicles. In the 18th century dissenters were permitted in the Valley of Virginia. Their coming was the beginning of the breakdown in the state church system. Mennonites, Quakers, Lutherans, and other groups came, followed by the Baptists just before the American Revolution.

These groups in time became champions of religious freedom in the state. The Enlightenment of the 18th century had its influence too. Thomas Jefferson became one of the leaders of the movement. He became a champion for religious freedom and for the disestablishment of the state church in Virginia. Jefferson believed that there should be no compulsion in matters of religion. He was aided in his cause by the dissenters. Some of these, particularly the Baptists, had wholeheartedly participated in the American Revolution. Should they not be free to worship God as they pleased? They naturally thought so and used their participation in the war as a lever to obtain freedom in religion. The Pennsylvania Germans worked with and for Jefferson too. It is said that the Pennsylvania Germans came "down in shoals" to vote for Thomas Jefferson. It was in 1787 that the state church of Virginia was disestablished. Mr. Jefferson considered this as one of three outstanding achievements of his life.

Of the 100 counties in Virginia, Mennonites have lived in 15; viz., Page, Frederick, Shenandoah, Rockingham, and Augusta in the Shenandoah Valley; Fauquier, Orange, Fairfax, Greene, Nelson, and Albemarle, just east of the Blue Ridge; Amelia and Halifax in the center; and Warwick, Norfolk, and Princess Anne on the Atlantic Coast. The most populous Mennonite settlements in the Valley are found in Rockingham and Augusta counties, and in the southeastern part of the state at Denbigh and Fentress in Warwick and Norfolk counties.

The original settlements made in Page, Frederick, and Shenandoah counties in 1728 were nearly wiped out by an Indian raid in 1758. Page County (q.v.) was also the scene of the Rhodes massacre when John Rhodes and members of his family were killed near Luray in 1764. The next two settlements were made in Rockingham County, the first and largest in the Linville Creek, Cedar Run, and Brock's Creek area extending from Edom and Broadway on the east to Turleytown and Cootes Store on the west. In 1773 this area was occupied by the Stovers, Shanks, Brennemans, Brunks, Coffmans, Beerys, and Geils. The above settlement in the northern part of the county soon overflowed to help establish a new and second settlement in the vicinity of Harrisonburg. A third settlement was made soon after the Revolution in Augusta County near Waynesboro.

Most of the Virginia Mennonites who came in 1773-1820 came from Montgomery, Lancaster, and York counties in Pennsylvania. The period 1820-30 was the time of organization of the oldest existing continuous congregations in Rockingham and Augusta counties. A settlement made in Frederick County (Winchester) (q.v.) in the 1870's died out by 1900-10. The coastal settlements in Warwick (Denbigh) and Norfolk (Fentress) counties were begun in 1897 and 1900 respectively of different stock, mostly from Allen County, Ohio. The small settlement in Halifax County, near South Boston, was started in 1900. In recent years Old Order Amish settlements were made in the Stuarts Draft (Augusta County) and Catlett (Fauquier County) areas. In both areas Beachy Amish congregations have emerged. Near Kempsville, in Princess Anne County on the coast, an Old Order Amish settlement was established in 1903. In the 1940's the Old Order Amish of Kempsville withdrew to re-establish themselves in the Shenandoah Valley at Stuarts Draft, Augusta County. In the 1950's a Beachy Amish Mennonite church and a Conservative Mennonite church were formed in the Kempsville area. The Conservative Mennonites have two other congregations in the state—one at Gladys, the other at Schuyler, Va.

The only division among the Virginia Mennonites occurred about 1900 when a small group of Old Order Mennonites (q.v.) separated from the main Virginia Conference body in Rockingham County. Today this group has two congregations near Dayton.

Thus in 1957 the total Mennonite and Amish baptized membership in Virginia was 4,304, distributed as follows:

VIRGINIA MENNONITES BY BRANCHES

Name	Congregations	Members
Virginia Conference (MC)	43	3,514
Ohio and Eastern Conference (MC)	1	31
Conservative Conference (MC)	3	115
Old Order Mennonites	2	350
Beachy Amish	3	259
Old Order Amish	2	160
Six groups	Total	54
		4,429

Of this number the 31 congregations of the Virginia Mennonite Conference (MC) in the Shenandoah Valley with their 2,838 members constitute the heart of Virginia Mennonitism, with the Eastern Mennonite College at Harrisonburg as a strong asset. At Harrisonburg also is the headquarters of Mennonite Broadcasts (q.v.) and the Virginia Mennonite Home for the Aged (q.v.). A second center is the Denbigh-Fentress area around Norfolk, where there are 9 congregations affiliated with the Mennonite General Conference, with 731 members.

H.A.B.

Virginia Conference of the Mennonite Church (MC). The Lancaster Conference had supervision over the Virginia Mennonites in the 18th and early 19th centuries, although very little is known about this arrangement. Apparently in times of crisis at least, and probably also for the ordination of ministers, the Virginia members called in Lancaster leaders for assistance.

It was not until 1835 that the more progressive leaders of the Virginia Mennonites took steps to establish a conference of their own. The first meeting was held at the Weavers church (q.v.) in that year. The minutes of this first Virginia conference in German have been preserved and have been published in English translation in the Minutes of the Virginia Mennonite Conference. The conference was divided into three bishop districts in 1837, which now have the names Northern (for northern Rockingham County), Middle (for western Rockingham County), and Southern (for the churches in Augusta County). With the expansion of the Virginia Conference in the late 19th and 20th centuries other districts have been added, the principal ones being Warwick, Norfolk, Tennessee, and Sonnenberg in Ohio.

No records of the Virginia Conference were kept 1836-59. Informal meetings of the Virginia church leaders were likely held during this period. The so-called Burkholder Confession of Faith was translated into English and published in 1837. A committee was appointed to select hymns for an English hymnbook, which was published in 1847 under the title A Selection of Psalms, Hymns, and Spiritual Songs as the first English Mennonite hymnal in America.

The first attempt to compile the minutes of the Virginia Conference was made in 1883 when a committee of five was appointed, who published their work in 1884 under the title Proceedings of the Mennonite Conferences in the Valley of Virginia. It was also decided by the conference at that time to print the minutes of each successive conference. A second compiling committee was appointed in 1910 when a summary of all the minutes of the Virginia Conference was published in booklet form, together with some biographical sketches of early leaders, under the title A History of the Mennonite Conference of Virginia and Its Work. A third compilation was issued in 1939, when all the minutes of the conference were published under the title Minutes of the Virginia Mennonite Conference, Including Some Historical Data, A Brief Biographical Sketch of Its Founders and Organizers, and Her Official Statement of Christian Fundamentals, Constitution, and Rules and Discipline.

The records show that district meetings were held following the semiannual state conference, at which meetings the resolutions of conference were presented to and ratified by the congregations. In 1884 it was decided that resolutions of conference should not be published as being accepted until they were ratified by the congregations. How general these district meetings were is not known. For the Middle District numerous references to these meetings have been preserved. No records are extant for the Northern and Southern districts, but it can be assumed that they were also held. It was thought that these meetings helped the officials of the church apply the resolutions of conference. These district meetings to ratify conference resolutions were discontinued in the 1920's; the reasons for this are not clear. In time the resolutions passed by the conference were simply regarded as decrees "for to keep," not needing ratification by the membership.

The organization of the Virginia Conference was very simple at first. The offices were moderator and secretary. The moderators were usually ministers, but in recent years bishops have served in this capacity. The list includes Michael Shank, Joseph N. Driver, Samuel Shank, Christian Good, L. J. Heatwole, A. B. Burkholder, J. S. Martin, John L. Stauffer, and Truman Brunk. For many years lay brethren served as secretaries. This practice was discontinued in the 1930's. It was thought advisable at that time to have members of conference act in this capacity. A roster of the secretaries includes David H. Landes, Emanuel Suter, C. H. Brunk, S. M. Burkholder, C. D. Wenger, E. J. Berkey, H. D. Weaver, J. R. Mumaw, Ward Shank, and Linden Wenger.

At first the lay members did not attend the conference sessions. It was just a matter of the Virginia ministers meeting semiannually to talk over their common problems with the subsequent passing of resolutions that might be helpful. Somewhat later the lay members of the church were invited, and now a certain number attend. All the bishops occupied the bench behind the long pulpit; they took turns addressing the opening session of the conference. Then there were testimonies from all the ministers and deacons. Following this the regular business of the conference was considered.

A number of changes have been made in the organization and procedure in recent decades. The bishops discontinued the use of the pulpit; their opening admonitions were replaced by a conference sermon; the testimonies were limited to a few visitors. Bishops served as moderators. Closed or preliminary sessions of conference were held in which problems facing the conference were discussed. This body then decided what subjects should be presented to the open conference for discussion and possible action. Since 1911 the semiannual conferences have been replaced by annual conferences.

Resolutions, some conservative, others progressive, have been formed and adopted. A number of conference actions have dealt with the subject of pride and the drift toward worldliness. To check or to prevent the entrance of doctrinally liberal thought into the church doctrinal statements were drawn up by the conference which were accepted almost without change by the Mennonite General Conference in 1921. In keeping with the conservative emphasis resolutions were passed which asked the members of conference to discontinue the use of musical instruments in their homes, and the use of the radio was made a test of membership for a number of years.

One Virginia bishop advocated the establishment of a General Conference fifty years before it was organized. Then when General Conference did come in 1898 the Virginia Conference held aloof from it until 1911. Sunday schools were permitted in 1869. The conference was slow in working with the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities, but it sanctioned the establishment of a local mission board which continues to function. One illustration of change in the history of the conference was the removal of the ban on the use of radios and musical instruments. As a result of this and subsequent actions, the Virginia Conference has become the home of Mennonite Broadcasts, Incorporated (q.v.).

The work and organization of the Virginia Conference has been greatly increased in the last 50 years. Illustrations of this would include the Virginia Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities for city, rural, and even foreign work, the Property Aid Plan, the Automobile Aid Plan, the organization and supervision of highland churches, and the establishment of Eastern Mennonite College (q.v.) as a conference school. In 1958 the Virginia Conference had a baptized membership of 4,741, with 32 organized congregations and 52 unorganized mission congregations. There were 9 bishops, 90 ministers, and 20 deacons.

H.A.B.

Virginia Mennonite Automobile Aid Plan, Harrisonburg, Va., was organized in 1933 under the Virginia (MC) Conference to provide insurance coverage for damage to automobiles and hospital and surgical care to owners and dependents. In 1958, 1,252 vehicles were listed.

H.S.B.

Virginia Mennonite Property Aid Plan was authorized by the Virginia Mennonite Conference (MC) in 1911. The Aid Plan covers loss by fire, lightning, and windstorm, to dwellings, farm and commercial buildings, and churches. Membership is limited to members of the Mennonite Church and serves in addition to Virginia parts of West Virginia, Tennessee, Ohio, Florida, and Georgia which have some connection with Virginia Conference. Offices are at Harrisonburg, Va. In 1958 listings numbered 1,497, covering $21,164,868 in property holdings. L.M.W.

Vis, a common Dutch family name found in many parts of the Netherlands, both Mennonite and non-Mennonite. A widely ramified Mennonite family, the interrelationships of which have not yet been cleared up, was found in the Zaan district in the province of North Holland in the 17th century. A Mennonite branch at first seems to have lived in Zaandijk, but in the early 17th century was also found at Zaandam; its members spread all over Holland in the 19th century.

Gerrit Jansz Vis, of Zaandijk, was a well-to-do merchant and shipowner. In 1728 he was appointed one of the directors (surveyors) of the Dutch Greenland Whaling; though a Mennonite he was chosen as a burgomaster of Zaandijk in 1740.

Waligh Gerrits Vis, d. April 1767, of Zaandam, was a lay preacher of the Frisian congregation (Oude Huys) at West-Zaandam 1714-66. Among his descendants was Heyme Vis Jr (1826-1914), a factory owner at Zaandam, trustee of the A.D.S. in 1895-1902 and member of the church board of Zaandam-Oost for many years. Numerous members of the Vis family have served as deacons at Zaandam, in both the West and Oost congregations, Koog-Zaandijk, Wormerveen, Utrecht, and other places.

The following Vises were all educated at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary and served the church as pastors: Abraham Vis (Zaandam, 1837-Heerenveen, 1911), serving at Mensingeweer 1861-63, Zwolle 1863-66, and Heerenveen 1866-1901. He was a trustee of the A.D.S. 1886-1905. Pieter Albert Vis (Workum, 1865-Heelsum, 1940) served at Witmarsum-Pingjum 1890-91, Beemster 1891-1914, Edam 1914-18, and Inrsum-Poppingewier 1918-30. He championed state pensions for the aged (actualized in the Netherlands in 1957) and for many years delivered addresses and propaganda speeches on the subject. His sermon commemorating his 25 years in the ministry, Gadachtenispreek, was published (n.p., n.d.-1915). Both his sons Pieter and Albert Vis went into the ministry. Pieter Vis (de Beemster, 1893-The Hague, 1942) served at Mensingeweer 1917-20, Drachten 1920-26, Arnhem 1926-38, and The Hague 1938-42. He was one of the first Dutch Mennonite ministers to promote youth associations and a founder and the first president of the Friese (q.v.) Doopsgezinde Jongeren Bond (1924) and also the first president (1928) of the (general) Doopsgezinde (q.v.) Jongeren Bond. He promoted the forming of groups of catechism classes. He published some sermons and papers, e.g., his address on "Verschuivingen in het Oorlogsvraagstuk" (DJ 1940). His brother Albert Vis (b. 1894 at de Beemster) served at Witmarsum-Pingjum 1919-22, Heerenveen 1922-25, Den Burg 1925-39, and since 1939 at Beverwijk. He obtained his Th.D. degree in 1936 at the University of Amsterdam on the dissertation (in English) The Messianic Psalm Quotations in the New Testament (Amsterdam, 1936).

Cornelis Vis Jzn (Oudkarspel, 1872-Winschoten, 1952) was a pastor of the congregations of Noord-eind van Graft 1896-99, Warga 1899-1906, Noord- and Zuid-Zijpe 1906-9, Kampen 1909-30, and Winschoten 1930-39. For many years he was the stimulating secretary of the Association for the Mennonites in the Diaspora (see Verstrooiing). Jan Mari Vis (Amsterdam, 1880-Noordbroek, 1956) served at Noordbroek 1906-45. In 1924-45 he also served the congregation of Mensingeweer and 1928-45 of Middestum. Besides his ministry he was a practicing lawyer.

Not related to the former branch is the Mennonite Vis family on the island of Terschelling, some of whom have been deacons of the church, Pieter Vis, d. 1927, serving for 40 years, and a Vis family, originally found at Venhuizen (q.v.), of which Suffridus A. Vis (b. Amsterdam, 1927), serving as pastor at Aardenburg since 1952, is a descendant. vdZ.

G. J. Honig and J. C. Vis, Geschiedenis en Handboek der Familie Vis (1899); S. Lootsma, Het Nieuwe Huys (Zaandam, 1937) 190, 192; Inw. Arch. Amst. II, 2, No. 675; DB 1894, 154; 1901, 213; 1902, 243; De Zondagsbode XXIV (1910-11) No. 26 f.; XXVIII (1914-15) No. 16; DJ 1943, 26-32; 1953, 13.

Vis(ch)buurt: see Ternaard.

Vischer, Andreas, is mentioned in Wolkan, Lieder, 32. He was an elder at Auspitz (q.v.), Moravia, about 1535.

vdZ.

Vischer, Gall: see Fischer, Gall.

Vischer, Laux, a potter, guildmaster of the carpenters in Augsburg, united with the Anabaptists and was taken prisoner, put in chains, and expelled from the city on Oct. 18, 1527, together with Eitelhans Langenmantel (q.v.), Endres Widholz, Gall Fischer (q.v.), Peter Schleppach, Hans Kissling, and Ulrich Eckart. Vischer was also made to pay a fine, which was put into the alms fund. He is designated as "one of the chief adherents and promoters of Anabaptism." His son, the potter Laux Vischer, had likewise joined the Anabaptists and was baptized in the summer of 1527 by Jörg of Passau (q.v.). Laux Vischer the younger was arrested in April 1528 and recanted. Also his mother Anna, who had been baptized by Salminger (q.v.) and recanted on Oct. 3, 1527, was arrested in April 1528, put in irons, and expelled from the city. HEGE.

Fr. Roth, "Der Höhepunkt der wiedertäuferischen Bewegung in Augsburg und ihr Niedergang im Jahre 1528," passim, Zsicht des hist. Vereins f. Schwaben u. Neuburg XXVIII, Augsburg, 1901; ML IV.

Vischer, Lienhard, a Mennonite elder of Moravia, who was active in Bavaria (q.v.) c1584-87. (ME I, 252.).

Vishenau, a principality in Moravia, where the Hutterian Brethren established two Bruderhofs. The Brethren here became noted for their production of beautiful ceramics (q.v.). The Bruderhofs were burned down on June 20, 1605, by soldiers. In October 1622, the Brethren were expelled from Vishenau, leaving all their possessions behind. They settled in Hungary. HEGE.

F. Hruby, "Die Wiedertäufer in Mähren," in Archiv für Ref.-Gesch. XXX (1933) 197; K. Cernohorsky (in Czech), The Production of Vishenau Fayence (Vishenau, 1928); Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 351, 408; ML IV.

Visscher, a common Dutch family name, Mennonite as well as non-Mennonite. Jan Visscher (b. 1801 at Blokzijl, d. Aug. 14, 1882, at Utrecht) was a Mennonite minister, educated at the Amsterdam seminary and pastor of Hengelo 1824-28 and Utrecht from 1828-61. He wrote a paper against the modern (liberal) theology of J. H. Scholten, professor at Leiden, found in Jaarboeken voor Wetenschappelijke Theologie VIII, 1850, separately reprinted under the title Brief aan een' Doopsgezinden broeder over den Heiligen Doop (Utrecht, 1851); with his colleague D. S. Gorter (q.v.) he had a debate on the same question. He also published Een woord van Troost, a sermon (Haarlem, 1859), Tweetal Leerredenen (Haarlem, 1859), and a few other sermons. In the Doopsgezinde Bijdragen of 1876 he published a paper on the question whether persons who had been admitted into Mennonite congregations without baptism should be accepted by other Mennonite congregations. In an era of growing liberalism among the Dutch Mennonites Visscher was a champion of the conservative suprarationalist views. His son Jan Visscher (b. 1829 at Utrecht, d. April 27, 1885, at Akkrum) was a Mennonite pastor at Akkrum 1855-d.85. Both father and son Jan Visscher were trustees of the A.D.S. (q.v.). Alle Visscher (q.v.) was not related to them. vdZ.

H. B. Berghuys, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinde gemeente te Utrecht (n.p., n.d.-1926) 80 f., 84.

Visscher, Alle, a native of Bolsward in Friesland, Netherlands, was a friend of Menno Simons, whom he visited at Wüstenfelde (q.v.) a few days before his death. Alenson reports that Menno said to Alle, "Do not be a servant of men as I have been." (Tegenbericht, BRN VII, 258.) vdZ.

Visscher, Jan Cornelisz, a member and probably a deacon of the Waterlander congregation of Amsterdam, who with Anslo (q.v.) and other church leaders attended a meeting held 1614 at Baambrugge to settle a dispute between Rijk Jacobs (q.v.) and Hans de Ries (q.v.). (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 548.) vdZ.

Visschersweert, a hamlet on the Maas River in the present Dutch province of Limburg, in the 16th century belonging to the territory of Valkenburg, was, like the neighboring hamlet of Illikhoven (q.v.), a center of Mennonite activity c1545-47. On a pasture near Visschersweert Menno Simons preached in 1545, and from Visschersweert he went by boat to Roermond. Theunis van Hastenrath (q.v.) also preached and baptized here. Among the Mennonites of Visschersweert were Jan (q.v.) Neulen, Eeren Neuten, and the martyrs Metken (q.v.) and her husband Jacob Vrancken. vdZ.

W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdóm Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 330 f. and passim; Ernst Crous, "Auf Menno's Spuren am Niederrhein," in Der Mennonit VIII (1955) 155; DB 1864, 151 f.; 1890, 54-56, 60 f.

Visser, a Dutch family name, Mennonite as well as non-Mennonite; the name is still very common, and means "fisherman." Many of the numerous Mennonite Visser families are not interrelated. The following persons by this name have served as Mennonite ministers: Jan Visser, d. c1762, serving at Schiedam 1728-31 and at Haarlem (Peuzelaarsteeg congregation) 1731-57. He published Redenvoering (Sermon) over Matt. 24 vers 6-8 op den Beededag des Jaars 1741 (Haarlem, 1742).

Pieter Jans Visser, d. Oct. 30, 1789, was a lay preacher of Twisk 1743-46 and Hoorn 1746-d.89. His son (?) Jan Visser, d. Nov. 29, 1831, also a lay preacher, served at Medemblik 1780-83 and Koog-Zaandijk 1783-d.1831. A Leerrede (Sermon) of his was published at Purmerend in 1808. Dirk Gerbens Visser, d. July 1836, was a lay preacher at Gorredijk-Lippenhuizen 1806-29 and at Irnsum 1829-d.36. Haitje Hantjes Visser was a lay preacher and later elder of the congregation of Balk 1828-54.

Cornelis Visser, d. 1944, of Haarlem, a deacon from 1900 until his death, was for many years the secretary of the Dienstjarenfonds (q.v.). vdZ.

Vissering, a Mennonite family found since the 17th century at Leer in East Friesland, Germany. David Joosten, who died in 1709, did not yet bear this family name; his descendants, usually businessmen and wholesalers, were among the pillars of the Mennonite congregation of Leer. His sons adopted the family name of Vissering (at first also Visring). In the course of the 17th century there were branches of this family at Leer, Emden, and Amsterdam. The branch at Leer died out in the 19th century.

The Emden branch left the Mennonites and joined the Reformed Church. The branch at Amsterdam, founded by Coenraad Vissering (1746-1810, a grandson of David Joosten), who became a banker at Amsterdam, at first belonged to the Zonist congregation and after the merger of this church with the Lamists in 1801 to the United Mennonite church. Some of them were deacons at Amsterdam.

This family furnished two Mennonite preachers, e.g., Jacobus David Vissering (q.v.) and his son Gerbrand Vissering (q.v.).

Prominent members were Simon Vissering (q.v.) and his son Gerard Vissering (1865-1937), a financial expert, director of the Dutch National Bank, financial adviser to the former League of Nations, who was called by the governments of China, South Africa, and Turkey to organize or reform their monetary systems. Both were of the Dutch branch. Willem Vissering (1802-60), living on the estate Lintel near Norden, East Friesland, was a "Landrat"; his son Friedrich Bodewin Vissering (1826-85), living on an estate near Dornum in East Friesland, was an "Oekonomienrat" and a member of the German Parliament. vdZ.

Ned. Patriciaat XXIV (1938) 300-18; G. ten Cate, Geslachtlijst van de familie Vissering (n.p., 1903); DB 1904, 241; MQR XXV, 249.

Vissering, Gerbrand, b. June 2, 1813, at Groningen, d. June 27, 1869, at Jisp, unmarried, was a son of Jacobus David Vissering (q.v.) and his second wife Baudina Cnoop. He studied theology at the University of Groningen and the Mennonite Seminary at Amsterdam, thereupon serving as pastor at Zuid-Zijpe 1837-42 and Wormer-Jisp 1842-d.69. Vissering was a somewhat solitary man and a Greek scholar; his sermons were not very popular. In 1854 he published a new translation of the New Testament from the original Greek (Amsterdam, 1854, repr. 1859). For this scholarly work he received in 1860 an honorary Th.D. degree from the Groningen University. His New Testament translation was also much appreciated by the Synod of the Dutch Reformed Church, who recommended his version and appointed him on a committee to prepare a new Dutch Bible to replace the antiquated Statenvertaling (q.v.). vdZ.

D. Harting, Levensbericht van Dr. G. Vissering (Leiden, 1870).

Vissering, Jacobus David, b. Oct. 24, 1774, at Leer in East Friesland, Germany, d. Dec. 17, 1846, at Groningen, Netherlands, married first to Trijntje Kool (1772-1803) of Beverwijk, then to Baudina Cnoop (1779-1849) of Bolsward, was a Dutch Mennonite pastor. After studying theology at the University of Groningen, he was trained for the ministry by Pieter Beets (q.v.), pastor at Westzaandam, and appointed ministerial candidate by the church board of Westzaandam on March 12, 1798. He served at Alkmaar 1798-1809 and at Groningen 1809-46, retiring on Nov. 29 of this year, after he had served for 47 years. Particularly in Groningen he worked with great blessing. During his pastorate Vissering, who was the preacher of the united Flemish and Waterlander Pelsterstraat church, and his colleague Pieter Klomp (q.v.) of the Old Flemish congregation in the Boteringestraat succeeded in bringing about a merger of these two congregations in 1809. In 1815 Vissering dedicated the new meetinghouse in the Boteringestraat. As far as is known he did not publish any writings. vdZ.

Naamlijst 1798, 63; H. Dassel Sr, Menno's Volk in Groningen (Groningen, n.d.-1953) 39, 41, 43, 48 f.; DB 1882, 87 f.; 1883, 41.

Vissering, Simon, b. June 23, 1818, at Amsterdam, d. Aug. 27, 1888, at Ellecom, was a descendant of the Vissering (q.v.) family of Leer. He was married to Geertje Corver (1825-98) of Amsterdam. Vissering studied law and was at first a lawyer at Amsterdam. In 1850-79 he was professor of politics at the University of Leiden. In 1879 he became Minister of Finance of the Netherlands. He was a loyal member of the church. During his Leiden period he was on the board of the Leiden congregation 1859-79. He was also interested in the founding of the Mennonite congregation at The Hague in 1881. In 1866-73 he was a trustee of the A.D.S. (q.v.); in 1867 he took the initiative for a better constitution for the A.D.S. Besides being a brilliant jurist and financial expert, he took a keen interest in literature, serving as coeditor of the leading Dutch periodical (monthly) De Gids 1849-88, and for a few years he was editor of the Amsterdamsche Courant. He published papers on juridical, economic, statistical, financial, and literary subjects. A large number of these papers were published in Herinneringen (3 vv.) and Verspreide Geschriften (Leiden, 1889). (N.N.B.Wb. X, 119-22; Buys, "In Memoriam" in De Gids 1888.) vdZ.

Visvliet, a village in the Dutch province of Groningen, where there was formerly a Mennonite congregation, usually called Kollum (q.v.) and Visvliet. It was probably Leenaert (q.v.) Bouwens who laid the foundation of this congregation by baptizing seven persons at Visvliet in 1551-54, five in 1554-56, and six in 1563-65. Concerning the Mennonites of Visvliet there is only scarce information. In 1643 it is reported that some Visvliet Mennonites had the "insolence to buy a house, which they provided with benches for use as their church." In the next year on the orders of the States of Groningen this meetinghouse was demolished, but the Mennonites continued to hold their meetings. At this time the Mennonites of Visvliet were very likely Ukowallists (q.v.). Later their congregation belonged to the Groningen Old Flemish conference and was represented at its meetings in 1681 and 1683. By 1700 the congregation had died out. vdZ.

G. A. Wumkes, De Gereformeerde Kerk in de Ommelanden (Groningen, 1904) 38; DB 1879, 3.

Vit tho Pilgram: see Fijf Pilgrims.

Vlaanderen, Oost and West, two provinces of Belgium: see Flanders.

Vlaardingen, a town in the Dutch province of South Holland, some 8 miles west of Rotterdam, formerly the seat of a Mennonite congregation. Anabaptism was found here as early as 1535, for on Dec. 15, 1535, Brunt, the attorney general, wrote to the Stadholder van Hoogstraten that the Anabaptists of Vlaardingen could not be arrested because they had all fled. In 1539 Anabaptists were again mentioned here. Later there was a congregation, of which Theunis Theunisz was a preacher in 1571. Still later there were an Old Flemish and a Flemish congregation, which may have merged in 1632 or shortly after. In 1651 a (new?) meetinghouse was built on the Fransenstraat, but in 1681 this house was sold, the congregation then having dissolved. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 143, 213, 593; DB 1912, 31, 38, 42; information from M. C. Sigal, former archivist of Vlaardingen; De Zondagsbode LII (1928-29) No. 32; Algemeen Doopsgez. Weekblad IV (1949-50) No. 16.

Vlaming (Vlamingh, Flaming, Flaminck, Fleming, Flemming, Flämmig, Flamig), a Mennonite family name. There was formerly a Vlaming(h) Mennonite family at Amsterdam, now extinct, of which Hans Vlamingh (q.v.) was a member. Cornelis (q.v.) de Vlaminck (Cornelis Jansz), according to Mellink a revolutionary Anabaptist, executed at Zwolle in 1535, was an Anabaptist at Amsterdam. Hans Hendricksen van Linth, called Hans Vlaminck, and his wife Linken, who had both fled, were banished Oct. 12, 1575, because of Anabaptism. These Vlaminges are apparently unrelated; the name simply means that they stemmed from Flanders (modern Belgium). A Vlaming (Flemming) family is also found among the West Prussian Mennonites, at Montau as early as 1636. Hans Vlaming was preacher of the Nieschewski (q.v.) church from 1737; he later moved to Deutsch Kazun (q.v.), where he also was a minister, serving until c1795. Heinrich Flaming moved from Franztal, West Prussia, to Molotschna, Russia, in 1825. There are also some Flamings in America. vdZ.

Vlamingen (Vlaamschen, Vlaamsche Doopsgezinden), a branch of the Dutch Mennonites: see Flemish Mennonites.

Vlamingen, Dan(t)ziger Oude: see Danzig Old Flemish Mennonites.

Vlamingen, Groninger Oude: see Groningen Old Flemish Mennonites and Groninger Doopsgezinde Sociëteit(1).

Vlamingh, Hans (d. c1672 at Amsterdam), a Mennonite merchant in Amsterdam who took a warm interest in the oppressed and persecuted Swiss Brethren in the canton of Bern (q.v.). He sent several letters to the authorities at Bern, two of them dated Oct. 24, 1659, and April 16, 1660, which were published by Ernst Müller. Vlamingh presents a lengthy declaration of the innocence of the Swiss Brethren and the obligation of the state to grant them the free exercise of their religion. Besides his intervention Vlamingh started a relief action in the Amsterdam Zonist (q.v.) congregation, in which also the Lamist (q.v.) congregation participated. A Commission for Swiss Matters was appointed (which later developed into the general Mennonite Committee for Foreign Needs), on which Vlamingh served as secretary and treasurer. In 1671 he corresponded with Swiss leaders who had recently emigrated to the Palatinate, e.g., Valentin Huthwohl, Johann Clemens, and Jacob Everlinck. From the Palatine Mennonites he received a letter of thanks with a list of the Mennonites who had immigrated into the Palatinate from Switzerland. Vlamingh, whom Ottius called "Hans Flaming, a Mennonite, a merchant of Amsterdam, an honest and reliable man," was a loyal Mennonite. In 1639 he was active in the merger of the Frisian-High German congregation of Amsterdam with the Flemish "bij't Lam" church. In the same year he was at Utrecht to bring about a similar union between the Frisian and Flemish congregations. In 1639 and from 1656 he was a deacon of the Lamist church. In the schism of 1664 (see Lammerenkrijgh) Vlamingh sided with the conservative Zonists and served as a deacon in the Zonist church as well as treasurer from the beginning. In this capacity he asked the Lamists for a division of the church property. NEFF, vdZ.

Ottius, Annales Anabaptistici (Basel, 1672) 329 f., 335 f., 348, 350 f.; Mart. Mir. D 805, E 1104; Müller, Berner Täufer, 173-79, 186; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1194, 1248, 1405; DB 1863, 32, 80; Kühler, Geschiedenis II, 199; ML III.

Vliedorp, a hamlet in the northeast of the Dutch province of Groningen, where there was a Mennonite congregation in the 17th century which belonged to the Groningen Old Flemish branch. This congregation, mentioned in a letter of 1626, was represented at the conferences of the Old Flemish held in 1679, 1681, and 1683, in 1679 by its elder Walle Luitjes, who died in that year. The congregation, which was probably small, had merged with the neighboring church of Kloosterburen (q.v.) before 1710 and together with this church with that of Rasquert (q.v.). (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 562; Kühler, Geschiedenis II, 138; DB 1879, 6.) vdZ.

Vlieger, de, a Mennonite family in Hamburg, Germany, where this family is found at least from the early 17th century; in 1611 the Mennonite Symon de Vlieger was married to Maria Koen(en). A man of importance was Carl de Vlieger, d. about 1702, married in 1666 to the widow of the preacher Werner Jansz Colombier and in 1681 to a daughter of Elder Gerhard Roosen (q.v.). Carl de Vlieger took part in Greenland whaling from 1674 on by equipping his own ships, as did also his sons and his grandsons. The de Vlieger family became very wealthy. Carl de Vlieger contributed liberally to the building of the meetinghouse at Altona in 1674, as did his widow in 1716, when a new church was to be built to replace the former, which was burned down during the war in 1713. Many members of the de Vlieger family were deacons, and some served as preachers; one of these was Gerrit Vlieger from 1765.

It could not be ascertained whether Karl de Fleger (Vlieger), who in 1652 published a Mennonite hymnal with a confession of faith (see Psalmen, de CL), belonged to this family. Some members of the de Vlieger family, temporarily living at Amsterdam, were members of the Zonist (q.v.) church. The Hamburg de Vlieger family died out in the early 19th century.

A Mennonite de Vlieger family, emigrants from Waarschoot in Flanders, Belgium, was living at Aardenburg (q.v.) in Dutch Zeeland Flanders in the 17th century. One Jan de Vlieger (1700-32), apparently a descendant of this branch, lived at Zierikzee. Some de Vligers were members of the Amsterdam Lamist church in the 18th century. The relationship between this family and de Vligers of Hamburg and Aardenburg could not be determined.

vdZ.

B. C. Roosen, Geschichte der Mennoniten-Gemeinde zu Hamburg und Altona I (Hamburg, 1886) 37, 39, 46, 48, 57, 58, 61, 64; II (Hamburg, 1887) 6, 16, 49, 55, 82, 84; Wanda Oesau, Hamburgs Grönlandfahrt (Glückstadt-Hamburg, 1955) 143-45; church records of Aardenburg and Amsterdam; Robert Dollinger, Geschichte der Mennoniten in Schleswig-Holstein, Hamburg und Lübeck (Neumünster, 1930).

Vlieland, one of the Dutch North Sea islands, where there was formerly a Mennonite congregation. In the 17th century Westvlieland was a Mennonite center, with two meetinghouses; but this western part was gradually swallowed up by the sea, and the population moved to Oostvlieland in the early 18th century; the Mennonite congregation was then usually known as Oostvlieland (or Oosterend op't Vlie). There was a Mennonite congregation on Vlieland by c1560. In 1563-65 Leenaert (q.v.) Bouwens baptized 45 persons here and later nine; the martyr Jan (q.v.) Geertz, of the neighboring island of Texel, executed in 1564, greeted the brethren of Vlieland in his "Testament."

About 1600 there were two congregations on Vlieland, one Waterlander (q.v.) and one Janjacobsgezinden (q.v.), to the members of which Jan (q.v.) Jacobsz dedicated the hymn "Aen die Vlielanders," found in Eenighe Gheestelijcke Liedekens (Amsterdam, 1612). The Janjacobsgezinde congregation had a meetinghouse in Westvlieland, and died out before 1705. The Waterlander congregation, though at first larger in membership (129 baptized members in 1705), was rather poor, and was subsidized by the Rijper (q.v.) Sociëteit, of which it was a member from 1703, and also by the Lamist congregation of Amsterdam. Most Mennonites of Vlieland were sailors and captains on the large vessels sailing from Amsterdam and other Zuiderzee ports as far as Denmark, Danzig, and Russia, and in the church books numerous notices are found concerning members having died at Kopenhagen, Danzig, Saint Petersburg, and other distant cities or at sea. Other members of the Vlieland congregation were engaged in coastal navigation and herring fishery. During a large part of the year the church meetings were attended largely by women and children, the male members being abroad. As elsewhere in seaports the moral level of the church members was low and discipline more necessary than in most Dutch churches. It was very difficult to find deacons and preachers from their own membership, most of the men being absent for months. Consequently the old men had to serve as deacons and at a rather early date preachers, all untrained, were called from outside: Jan Jacobs Tichelaar, called from Stiens, served 1704/5-d.21, followed by Jelte Jelts Postums 1721-49, Dirk Jansz Bogert 1751-61, Aris Dirksz Baas 1762-69, Hendrik Tijmens 1770-78, and Adriaan Vrijer 1778-98. Then the pulpit remained vacant. The membership had rapidly decreased: 129 baptized members in 1705, about 80 in 1750, 20 in 1778, and only four in 1808. In 1813 the congregation was dissolved; the property, about 1500 Dutch guilders, was transferred to the Rijper Sociëteit, which also sold the meetinghouse (for 500 guilders) and supported the last member, who died in 1819. At present the pastor of the neighboring island of Terschelling (q.v.) is in charge of the few Mennonites living on Vlieland.

vdZ.

J. Loosjes, "De Doopsgezinde gemeente op Vlieland," in DB 1912, 76-93; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 726; II, Nos. 915, 1055, 2338 f.; II, 2, Nos. 498a, 498b; DB 1861, 92 f.; DJ 1942, 40; 1943, 45 f.

Vliermaal, a village near Hasselt in the Belgian province of Limburg, where in 1538 a number of Anabaptists were sentenced to death. Some Anabaptists from Aachen, Germany, and from England had recently settled in the region of Hasselt. According to somewhat inexact information nine men were burned at the stake and ten women executed by drowning. These victims were apparently Anabaptists. Their names are not given, with one exception: Jannes (q.v.) van Rommerswael, who was executed at Curingen near Hasselt, June 14, 1538.

vdZ.

W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 161.

Vliet, van der, a Dutch Mennonite family, whose progenitor was (1) Lucas (Luitje) Heeres van der Vliet (before 1600-after 1645), a merchant at Appingedam (q.v.) in the province of Groningen, and a preacher of the local Mennonite church. His son (2) Lucas Lucasz van der Vliet (1624-98), also a merchant, moved to Amsterdam, where his son (3) Dirk van der Vliet (1651-79) was a gold and silver smith. (4) Jan van der Vliet (1678-1723), a son of (3) Dirk, had a prosperous cloth shop, but it was (5) Cornelis van der Vliet (1705-80) and his brother (6) Jan van der Vliet (1717-85), sons of (4) Jan, who made the fortune of this family by the ironworks they founded at Amsterdam. The firm still exists, since 1906 under the name Van der Vliet and de Jonge. At the same time Cornelis and his descendants operated an important wholesale business.

The first members of this family at Amsterdam were all Lamists. From 1730, however, one branch belonged to the Zonists. In both Amsterdam churches some of the van der Vliets were deacons. (6) Jan van der Vliet and his sister Cornelia (1720-93), married to Pieter Verbeek, were friends of Zinzendorf (q.v.) and benefactors of the Moravian Brethren (Hernhutters, q.v.) in Holland. Until 1807 all the members of this family married Mennonites with only one exception in 1781; in the 19th century they all married non-Mennonites.

vdZ.

Nederl. Patriciaat XI (1920) 320-31; W. J. C. Bijleveld, Genealogie van het Geslacht van der Vliet (The Hague, 1924); W. Lütjeharms, Het Oecumenisch-Philadelphisch Streven der Hernhutters (Zeist, 1935) 143, 167; Amsterdam church records.

Vlissingen, a seaport on the island of Walcheren (q.v.) in the Dutch province of Zeeland (1955 pop. 26,000; 200 Mennonites). Anabaptism seems to have arisen here somewhat later than in the other towns of Walcheren like Middelburg and Veere; not until 1567 is there information about it. In 1567 Hendrick (q.v.) Alewijnz, of Vlissingen, traveled about preaching; arrested in 1568, he died as a martyr at Middelburg in 1569. He also preached in the neighborhood of Vlissingen. That there was then a congregation at Vlissingen may be concluded from a letter written by the martyr Hans (q.v.) Marijnsz van Oosten, of Vlissingen, who was executed with Hendrik Alewijnsz in 1569. On the same day another martyr, Gerrit (q.v.) Duynherder, probably also from Vlissingen, was put to death. Dirk (q.v.) Meeuwesz, of Vlissingen, was apprehended in 1570 and burned at the stake there in 1571. He is the only martyr who died in Vlissingen. From c1575 Mennonites of Flanders, Belgium, came to Vlissingen, where it was safer, for baptism. One of the elders from Flanders who performed baptisms at Vlissingen was Hans (q.v.) Busschaert, c1587. About this time or shortly before, the congregation was greatly increased by the arrival of Mennonite refugees from Flanders. Thus the congregation was mostly of Flemish descent, and consequently sided with the Flemish branch. According to Faulkelius (q.v.) there was c1600 also a congregation of the Naeldemansvolk (q.v.), of which Cornelis (de) Compas(maker) was the leader; they were also called "Compasmennisten." This account obviously refers to a Waterlander congregation at Vlissingen, concerning which there is no further information.

The Flemish church was always small (exact figures before c1638 not available); in the 17th century the following families, all descendants of refugees from Flanders, are found among the members: van Daelle (Dale), Fa(c)k, Geleynsz, van Houteryve (Outrijve), Ta(c)k, and Willeboorts. Besides the Waterlander and Flemish congregations in the early 17th century there was at Vlissingen also an Old Flemish congregation which in 1602 separated from the Flemish church; it is also called the Huiskopers (q.v.) or Voetwasschers church. This small group disappeared shortly after 1640, probably by merging with the Flemish.

About 1620 the number of Mennonites at Vlissingen can be estimated at c400. They seem not to have encountered special difficulties from the Reformed magistrates: in 1589 an agreement was made to exempt the Mennonites from military service upon payment of a certain sum by the congregation. During the 17th century Mennonites had to have their marriages performed by the city officials after announcement in the Reformed church, but from 1638 their marriages could be performed in their own meetinghouse. The Mennonites of Vlissingen could meet rather freely. At first meetings were held in private homes; when the membership increased in the early 17th century a house near the Reformed church was used as a meetinghouse. In 1641 a house on the Peperdijk was remodeled into a church (the "new church" mentioned in 1668 probably refers to some alteration of the Peperdijk meetinghouse). This meetinghouse was very plain, with backless benches and without a pulpit. It was remodeled in 1723, 1744, 1848, and 1859. In 1744 it obtained a pulpit; in 1848 a parlor organ. In 1859 the pulpit was replaced by a simple platform. This meetinghouse was used until 1889.

In 1632 the preacher Oillaert Willeboorts and the deacons Per Jacob Pennen (the name obviously mutilated) and Lieven Marijnsz signed the Dordrecht (q.v.) confession for Vlissingen. During the Lammerenkrijgh (q.v.) after the Lamist-Zonist schism Vlissingen, influenced by its elder Pieter Baert, sided with the progressive Lamists.

The congregation of Vlissingen like that of Middelburg has an important and considerable archives, now found in the Provincial Zeeland Archives at Middelburg. Records of members and other Vlissingen church books are preserved since 1665. The congregation contributed liberally to the Committee for Foreign Needs and to other needs also of non-Mennonites.

There is a complete list of ministers since 1628. Until 1689 they served without remuneration; in this year it was decided to pay the preacher a salary of 300 Dutch guilders, soon considerably raised. The list of ministers reads as follows: Oillaert Willeboorts 1628-after 1648, Gillis Anthonissen Timmermans 1638, Cornelis Remeusz Elinck 1642, Joost van Outrijve 1649-72, Frans Claesz 1649, Frans Cornelisz 1650, Adriaen van Nispen 1650, Antheunis de Niel 1659, Pieter Baert 1659-after 1673, Jan Pietersz van Nes 1660, Pieter de Jager 1663-71, Maurits Arents 1663, Frans Theunissen Hugemans 1667, Leendert Lievens 1670, Jan Samuëlsz Tack 1673-d.97, Lieven van Outrijve 1675-d.82, Anthony van Stein 1676, Christiaan van Nispen 1683, Joost van Outrijve 1686-93, Paulus de Wind 1691, Joannes Nettis 1700, Jan van de Voorde 1701, Gerbrand Voor(e)n 1701-c25, Abbe Cornelisz Oosterling 1704, Jan Cornelisz Wit 1718, Gerardus Pauli 1722, Frederik Jaarsma 1726-50, Jacobus Hesseling 1750-53, Joannes Cuperus 1753-58, Gerlof Rekker 1759-1809. After the death of Rekker (1809) the membership being rather small and finances insufficient, the congregation of Vlissingen was served by the ministers of Middelburg until 1871. In this year Vlissingen again had a pastor of its own, H. D. Tjeenk Willink, serving 1871-73, followed by A. Snellen 1874-78 and J. Dyserinck 1879-84; when Dyserinck left a union was again made with Middelburg, whose pastor served until 1899; then a union was made with Goes, which lasted until 1919, pastor T. H. Siemelink, who served in the combination Goes-Vlissingen 1908-19, from 1919 serving only at Vlissingen until he retired in 1927. He was followed by O. L. van der Veen 1929-31, Miss A. J. van den Ban 1932-39, and Miss M. de Boer since 1939.

The baptized membership was about 165 in 1665 and c285 in 1673. From then it decreased, many Mennonites moving to Middelburg and Amsterdam. In 1730 the baptized membership stood at 125, in 1757 at 99, in 1773 at 74, in 1834 at 22, and in 1838 at only 18. From then there was a considerable increase: 32 in 1861, 49 in 1888, 98 in 1901, 115 in 1926, and 183 in 1958.

The old meetinghouse of 1641 on the Peperdijk was sold in 1889 to a Reformed group: a new church was dedicated on July 6, 1890, by Pastor Tj. Kielstra of Middelburg. This church, furnished with a new organ in 1908, was destroyed during World War II on April 24, 1942. On Feb. 20, 1949, a new meetinghouse on Vrijdomsweg 1 (architect P. Feenstra) was dedicated by Miss de Boer, pastor of the congregation. Church activities are now (1958): a ladies' circle, youth groups, Sunday school for children. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 559, 580 f., 1167, 1996; II, Nos. 1266, 1270 f., 2340 f.; II, 2, Nos. 499-642; J. Cuperus and J. de Loos, "History of the Congregation," manuscript in the Archives of the congregation; H. P. Winkelman, "De Doopsgezinde Gemeente te Vlissingen," DB 1875, 32-42; K. R. Pekelharing, "Bijdragen voor de Geschiedenis der Hervorming in Zeeland 1524-72," in Archief VI of the Zeeuwsch Genootschap van Wetenschappen (Middelburg, 1866) 293 f., 296 f., 303, 305, 306; Mart. Mir. D 405 f., E 757 f.; DJ 1837, 6; 1850, 43; DB 1861, 176; 1872, 196; 1877, 5; 1883, 101 f.; 1884, 111 f.; 1885, 131 f.; 1890, 143; 1899, 212; 1907, 168; DJ 1950, 33-38; Algemeen Doopsgez. Weekblad XI (1956-57) No. 51.

Vlugt, van der, a Mennonite family of bankers at Haarlem, Holland, six of whom served as deacons of the Haarlem Mennonite congregation since 1762, and some of whom were trustees of the A.D.S. (q.v.). An outstanding member of this family was Willem van der Vlugt (b. 1853 at Haarlem, d. 19— at Leiden), who studied law and from 1880 was professor of law at Leiden University; he also was a member of the Dutch Second Chamber. From 1885 he was a deacon at Leiden, and 1887-1921 a trustee of the A.D.S., its moderator 1895-96, and curator of the Mennonite seminary 1890-1921. Jan van der Vlugt of Haarlem was treasurer of the Committee for Foreign Needs from 1921, acting in behalf of the Russian refugees. Abraham Jan Theodoor van der Vlugt (1894-1954) was active in the relief of the Mennonite refugees from Russia in 1923. In 1929-38 he was a trustee (also treasurer and moderator) of the Hague congregation; in 1945 he was appointed Minister of State and ambassador of the Netherlands to Finland, where he suddenly died at Helsinki on Jan. 8, 1954. vdZ.

Vöcklabruck, a town in Upper Austria, the home of Leonhard Schiemer (q.v.), the first elder of the Anabaptists in Upper Austria. About Pentecost of 1528, eight Anabaptists, among them Hans Tischler, a preacher, and Lienhart Laitschneider of Salzburg, were put to death here. These executions, performed on the grounds of the church, led to a trial, because Ciriac, Baron of Polheim (owner of Puchheim), who as Vogt of the parish of St. Gilgen saw in this deed an interference into his jurisdiction, demanded the sum of 1,000 florins as compensation. The city was summoned to answer this charge. HEGE.

Josef Jäkel, "Zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in Oberösterreich und speziell in Freistadt," in 47. Bericht des Museums Franciscus Carolus (Linz, 1889); ML IV.

Voet (Voth), a Mennonite family in Prussia: see Foth.

Voet (Foth), Hans, was a preacher of the Groningen Old Flemish congregation in Lithuania (q.v.), and after his expulsion from there, until 1760 in the Groningen Old Flemish congregation at Schönsee in the territory of Culm, West Prussia. In 1727 and again in 1732 he wrote a letter to the Mennonites at Amsterdam complaining that the Catholic bishop of Culm was severely oppressing them so that they needed much money to satisfy the bishop and his officials. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, Nos. 738, 763.) vdZ.

Voetwasschers (Footwashers), a name given to some Dutch Mennonites in the 16th century, found c1576 at Middelburg and other places in the province of Zeeland. This group soon disappeared by merging with the Waterlanders (q.v.). (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, Nos. 280, 282; DB 1863, 112 f.) vdZ.

Vogel, a former Mennonite family at Edam, Dutch province of North Holland, where Claas Dirkse Vogel, d. Sept. 21, 1741, was a preacher of the Frisian congregation. A Hans Vogel is mentioned in Prussia. vdZ.

DB 1887, 117, 119, 120, 128, 130, 131; F. Szper, Nederl. Nederzettingen in West Pruisen (Enkhuizen, 1913) 47.

Vogel, de, a Dutch Mennonite family, died out at the end of the 18th century. Members of this family were found at Leiden until 1710 and particularly in the Amsterdam Lamist church; as early as 1622 Salomon de Vogel was a member of this church. He was one of the deacons of six Dutch Mennonite congregations, who on May 20, 1661, petitioned the magistrates of Bern in behalf of their Swiss co-religionists, who were being persecuted.

They were loyal members of the church. Some of them left property to the church. Many of them served as deacons at Leiden, Jan de Vogel serving in the Flemish congregation until 1664; his son Willem de Vogel 1679-84. A Thomas de Vogel was a deacon of the Leiden Waterlander congregation until 1672 and Willem de Vogel from 1676 in the same church. Deacons at Amsterdam were Jan de Vogel Thomasz 1709-15 and 1721-26, and his son Thomas de Vogel 1731-37, 1741-47, and 1755-60. Cornelis de Vogel Leonardsz (q.v.) at Danzig and Leonard Thomas de Vogel (q.v.) belonged to this family. vdZ.

Church records of Amsterdam; L. G. le Poole, Bijdragen tot de kennis van het kerkelijk leven onder de Doopsgezinden . . . te Leiden (Leiden, 1905) 10 f., 12, 15-17, 65, 66, 196; Müller, Berner Täufer, 192.

Vogel, Cornelis de (Cornelis Leonardsz), a member of the Lamist Mennonite congregation at Amsterdam, Holland, who moved to Danzig, Prussia, in 1726 for his banking business. He presented a letter of membership to the Danzig Mennonite Schladdall congregation, but he was refused in 1727 because he wore a periwig. Thereupon de Vogel asked admission to the Markushof (q.v.) congregation in 1728, but was rejected there too. These refusals, which were particularly due to the conservatism of the Danzig elder Hendrik (Heinrich) van Dühren (q.v.), caused much trouble in the Danzig congregation. In 1735 de Vogel had not yet been admitted as a member.

Cornelis de Vogel Leonardsz, as well as his father-in-law Jan van Hoek (q.v.) and his brother-in-law Jan van Hoek, both of whom were Danzig bankers, served as mediators between the Prussian Mennonites and the Dutch Mennonite Committee for Foreign Needs. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1235, 1624, 1628, 1632, 1639, 1642, 1648, 1650; II, 2, Nos. 2634 f., 2640 f.) vdZ.

Vogel, Huizen de, three houses on Kerkstraat 316-20 at Amsterdam, bequeathed to the Lamist Mennonite congregation at Amsterdam in 1794 by Leonard Thomas de Vogel (q.v.). The houses at first were used to lodge the orphans of the church, but since 1800 they have been used for aged married couples. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 533-37.) vbZ.

Vogel, Leonhard Thomas de, b. at Amsterdam c1725, d. 1794 at his stately country home, "Vijverburg" on the Vecht River, of which he had been the owner since 1770, a son of Thomas de Vogel and Elisabeth Bosch, married 1756 to Catharine van Lennep (1726-), died childless. From his great fortune he bequeathed to the congregation bij't Lam at Amsterdam, into which he was baptized in 1745, three houses on the Kerkstraat (see Vogel, Huizen de) and a sum of money to be administered by the trustees of the congregation as "Fonds de Vogel," for the expenses of the Mennonite theological seminary, which was then an activity of the Amsterdam Lamist congregation. Since the founding of the A.D.S. (q.v.) in 1811, which took over the seminary, this fund has always been represented among the trustees of the A.D.S. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 310, 2476, 2499, 2559, 2568 f.; DJ 1850, 138, 140; Verslagen of the A.D.S.) vbZ.

Vogel, Wolfgang (c1500-27), an Anabaptist martyr, born in Reutlingen, Swabia; he joined the reform movement of Nürnberg at an early age. Around 1523-24 there was in this city a group of "evangelical-minded men" who found themselves in open conflict with the budding Lutheran movement. The poet Hans Sachs is said to have belonged to this group, and Vogel apparently shared its "radical" outlook. In 1524 as pastor in Bopfingen and in 1525 as pastor in Eltersdorf, he tried to introduce the Reformation. In early 1526 he also became acquainted with Hans Hut, who was then a bookseller in Nürnberg, and it is probable that Hut won him for the new, still more radical ideas of Anabaptism.

Hearing that Bopfingen had dismissed his successor (a like-minded preacher), Vogel addressed a missive to the citizens of that city, called Tröstlicher Sendbrief und christliche Ermahnung zum Evangelio, an den ehrbaren Rat und die ganze Gemeinde zu Bopfingen (1526), a pamphlet, printed without naming the printer or the place of publication. (Today only two copies of it are known: one in the Mennonite library at Amsterdam, and the other in the archives of Nürnberg.) The Bopfingen council was embarrassed and offended by this somewhat aggressively prophetic pamphlet, a true penitential sermon, and decided to forward it to the Nürnberg council for advice and action. Lazarus Spengler, a leading councilman and censor of Nürnberg, called Vogel from Eltersdorf to account for this tract, and warned him not to indulge further in such "liberties." Although it dismissed him, the council soon discovered that Vogel was an Anabaptist. Upon examination he admitted having been baptized by Hut and also having baptized others. Since there was as yet no Anabaptist church organization Vogel seems to have acted as an isolated individual. Vogel, under the jurisdiction of the Nürnberg council, was imprisoned and the case reported to Kasimir, Margrave of Brandenburg (Bayreuth-Ansbach); but before it could receive an answer it decided to make an example of Vogel. Thus a sham trial was held, complete with torture, and an argument was trumped up that Vogel intended rebellion. On March 26, 1527, he was beheaded without opportunity to defend himself. The trial records no longer exist and may have been destroyed to obscure the situation.

The most important aspect of this story (a first in the long epic of Anabaptist persecutions) is the Sendbrief of 1526, which profoundly reflects the spirit of this first decade of both the Reformation and Anabaptism. Wiswedel gives an elaborate summary of its contents (pp. 162-69). Not unlike Haug's (q.v.) Christliche Ordnung of 1524, this Sendbrief is less typically Anabaptist than non-Lutheran. It is a forceful call to repentance addressed to the citizenry of Bopfingen and to authorities in general, "kings, princes, and lords." The old theme of "reason and obedience" (q.v.) occupies a central place in his arguments. The cross is inevitable for those who obey God's Word: like gold in fire so also must man be tried by tribulation and persecution. One can easily understand that the council members of both Bopfingen and Nürnberg were baffled by this letter; they simply interpreted it as a voice of rebellion.

In 1717, two hundred years later, in the days of flowering Pietism (q.v.), Dr. J. D. Herrnschmidt, professor of theology in Halle, by chance discovered a copy of this Sendbrief, perhaps in the archives of Bopfingen, where he had been a superintendent, and re-edited it in 1717 as a devotional tract for his congregation in Halle. What once had caused martyrdom for its author was now welcomed and applauded, even though there is good reason to assume that the pamphlet was reinterpreted in the mild and rather harmless way of 18th-century Pietism. R.F.

J. H. Ottius, Annales Anabaptistici (Basel, 1672); Wiswedel, Bilder I, 152-69; Wappler, Thüringen, 245; TA Bayern I; R. Friedmann, Mennonite Piety Through the Centuries (Goshen, 1949) 26 f.

Vogelsberg: see Mont des Oiseaux.

Vogelstock, near Landau in the Palatinate, Germany. A Mennonite congregation of Bächlingen-Vogelstock is mentioned in the Dutch Naamlijst from 1767. Its preachers were Johannes Ellenberger 1754-d.c85, Philip Sties until c1769, Johann Berg serving 1763-after 1802, Jacob Sties(s) from 1769, Daniel van Huben (?) 1782-c88, and Jacob Sautor 1787-after 1802. Elders of this congregation were Daniel Hirschler, living at the Geisberg, until 1769, at the same time elder of the Schafbusch (q.v.) congregation, and 1769-85 Christian Hege of the Branchweilerhof. In 1785 preacher Sties was chosen as elder, serving until after 1802. In the Naamlijst of 1784 and following editions this congregation is listed as Bächlingen-Vogelstock-Sankt Johanneskirchen. In the 19th century it was called Sankt Johann or Johanniskirchen. The Namensverzeichnis (Danzig, 1857, p. 37) mentions preachers Jacob Zörger and Jacob Res serving from 1851, and Jacob Riess, also serving from 1859. The congregation then numbered 70 baptized members. In 1887 (Mannhardt, Jahrbuch 1888, p. 28, No. 14) it numbered 40 souls, with Jacob Zörger as preacher. (See also Sankt Johann.) vbZ.

Vogt, a Mennonite family name: see Voth.

Voit (Veyt), Peter, a Hutterite missionary and co-worker with Jakob Hutter. Hutter mentions him twice in his letters, once saying that Voit had brought a group of converts from Tirol to Moravia. Voit was seized in Austria in 1534 and imprisoned in a dark dungeon in Egenburg, and his ankles were so tightly bound in irons that gangrene set in and his feet decayed. Helplessly he had to suffer having the mice eat his toes. He was later released. He was received by the exiled Moravian Anabaptists, who were themselves in dire need (1538) and lodging in the open field. Both of his feet had to be amputated. He died in 1570. (Zieglschmid, Chronik, 121, 138, 143; ML IV.)

HEGE.

Voitsbrunn (Veutlasprun, Voitsbrunn, Slovakian Selec), a village in Moravia near the Thaya marshes between Nikolsburg and Feldsberg, was the site of two Hutterite Bruderhofs, the first established in 1557, the other in 1561. The Brethren had a noted bathhouse here. They were expelled from Voitsbrunn by Sigmund von Dietrichstein (q.v.) in 1591. (Zieglschmid, Chronik, 368; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 279, 432; ML IV.)

Vola-Vodzinska Mennonite Church, located near Plonsk, northwest of Warsaw, Poland, was a subsidiary of the Deutsch-Kazun Mennonite Church (q.v.). The Namens-Verzeichnis of Prussian Mennonites mentions this congregation for the first time in 1843 (p. 34), when the following ministers were listed: Franz Ewert (1818), Benjamin Foth (1837), Jacob Köthler (1842), and Heinrich Kliwer (1842). Heinrich Kerber and Heinrich Kliwer, both elected in 1842, were deacons. The fact that 1842 is given four times as the year of the election of the church officials could indicate that this was the year of the organization of the church.

In 1857, in addition to Jacob Köthler and Heinrich Kliwer, Peter Froms was listed as minister. The deacons were the same. In 1881 Cornelius Balzer, Julius Balzer, and Peter Pauls are listed as ministers, all elected in 1880. Heinrich Bartel served as deacon. At this time the congregation, although still a subsidiary of Deutsch-Kazun, had its own meetinghouse at Vola-Vodzinska. Together the congregations had a membership of 597. Kupsch reports that many of the Mennonites of this group joined the Baptists around 1860. Many others no doubt joined the emigration to the United States around 1874. By the outbreak of World War I there were only eight families or 35 persons left at Vola-Vodzinska (see Deutsch-Kazun).

Kupsch has given an account of a revival among the Mennonites of this area in the villages of Adamov, Kicin, and Vola-Vodzinska. Above all, Peter Ewert (q.v.) and Johann Penner (q.v.) were instrumental in promoting the revival and introducing baptism by immersion, which ultimately took a large part of the congregation to the Baptist Church. In 1858 Johann Penner, of Adamov, on a visit to his relatives at Vola-Vodzinska, testified for his renewed faith and was imprisoned for ten days. A revival occurred. The first baptism by immersion took place at Kicin on Aug. 25, 1860. Soon there was disunity between the Baptists of Mennonite background and those of Lutheran tradition. The Baptists did not share the Mennonite principle of non-resistance and the practice of footwashing. For a while Penner and Ewert separated from the Baptists. However, "Ewert recognized his error, repented, and came back to the Baptists, and became a missionary. Penner also returned to the Baptists in 1863."

In 1862 the Baptists in Vola-Vodzinska had a following of about 20 among the Mennonites. The Baptist missionary Alf (q.v.) was quite active among them. He and Ewert also corresponded with the Mennonite Brethren of the Ukraine. The Mennonites of Poland who were revived and testified for their new Baptist faith shared in the persecution which came over this new movement. They were pioneers of the revival which spread through Poland and gave rise to the Baptist movement and at the same time they speeded up the disintegration of small struggling Mennonite groups and churches.

C.K.

Kupsch, Gesch. der Baptisten in Polen (Lodz, 1932); Friesen, Brüderschaft, 244 ff.; Namens-Verzeichnis (1843, 1857, 1881).

Volbot (Volboet), Abraham Davidsz, was a member of the Flemish Mennonite congregation "in den Blok" (q.v.) at Haarlem. After the Reformed pastor of Haarlem, Petrus Bontemps (q.v.), had attacked the Mennonites and had been replied to by the Mennonite deacon Joost Hendricks (q.v.) of Amsterdam, Volbot also entered into the polemics by publishing (under the pseudonym of Gerard van Vryburgh) two pamphlets with curious titles: Hollandsche Zeep tegen Uytheemsche Vlecken . . . (Amsterdam, 1643, repr. 1644) and, after the reply of Bontemps, Loogh-Water op de Laster-Vlecken van P.B. . . . (Amsterdam, 1664, should be 1644).

A. D. Volbot was a strict Flemish Mennonite, an opponent of Galenus (q.v.) Abrahamsz and of Collegiantism (q.v.) in 1655. About his private life nothing is known.

voZ.

DB 1863, 134, 136; J. C. van Slee, De Rijnsburger Collegianten (Haarlem, 1895) 146.

Volder (de), a Mennonite family at Alkmaar, Netherlands. Pieter de Volder was a preacher of the local Flemish congregation in 1621 and Grietje Jacobs Volder the mother of Marten Schagen (q.v.). voZ.

Volendam, a steamer of the (Dutch) Holland-America Line of 15,434 tons gross, built in 1922, scrapped in 1952, named after the small Dutch town of Volendam in North Holland, was used for the transport of Mennonite refugees, and is particularly known for its transport of Mennonites from Europe to Buenos Aires in 1947. C. F. Klassen (q.v.), then the MCC representative in Europe, who organized the journey, chartered the ship. Some 650 Mennonite refugees embarked at Rotterdam, Netherlands, on Jan. 28, 1947; in Bremerhaven some 450 others from a refugee camp at Gronau, Germany, joined them. Then they waited for a large group from Berlin. Because Klassen gave a financial guarantee to the Holland-America Line for a possible delay in sailing and this warrant was accepted without the usual bail, the ship waited for the Berlin group. This was a group of some 1,100 Mennonite refugees from Russia who after much trouble and danger of life had reached Berlin and even in Berlin had a narrow escape, for only at the last moment did the Russian authorities give the necessary permission to travel through the Eastern Zone of Germany, occupied by the Russians. Packed into railway freight cars they were transported to Bremerhaven, from where the Volendam sailed on Feb. 1, 1947, with the 2,306 Mennonites. The emigrants were led by Peter and Elfrieda Dyck, who had come with the Berlin group. During the train journey a woman died, and a baby during embarkation. Two aged persons and a baby died at sea, and four children were born on the boat: one was named Peter Volendam (after Peter Dyck and the ship), and one Elfrieda (after Mrs. Dyck). Upon arrival at Buenos Aires further transportation was difficult, and for a large number of these immigrants impossible until October 1948, because a revolution had broken out in Paraguay. About 1,200 of the passengers of the Volendam settled in Eastern Paraguay, giving to their new colony the name of Volendam after the ship which had brought them to the new world and to liberty. Of the remaining 1,100, 870 founded the Neuland (q.v.) Colony in the Paraguayan Chaco (q.v.), 162 remained in Buenos Aires, and the rest joined their relatives in the Fernheim or Friesland colonies or settled in Asunción, the capital of Paraguay.

A second Mennonite transport of the Volendam was that in 1947 of 1,640 (including 635 infants) Old Colonists (q.v.) from Quebec to Buenos Aires, who were also to settle in Paraguay, and a third transport by the Volendam was in October 1948, that of a group of 751 West Prussian and Galician Mennonites for Montevideo, Uruguay, and a number of Mennonites from Russia, who intended to go to Paraguay, and who disembarked in Buenos Aires. The International Refugee Organization (q.v.) paid about $160,000 for the cost of the first chartering of the Volendam and assumed the full cost of the third transport as far as Asunción.

Thus the name of the Volendam is well known in Mennonite history. C.A.W.B.

Logbooks of the Volendam: J. W. Fretz, Pilgrims in Paraguay (Scottsdale, n.d., 1953) 39-41; "Peter Dyck's Story," Menn. Life III (1948) No. 1, 8-11; Gustav E. Reimer, "Von Danzig nach Uruguay," Menn. Life IV (1949) No. 3, 12-14.

Volendam Agricultural Co-operative (Cooperativa Agrícola de Volendam), located in Colony Volendam in Alto-Paraguay near the port of Mbopicua, was organized on July 2, 1947, under the Paraguayan law No. 13635 of 1942, with a membership of 295, which included all family heads of the colony. The Co-operative was founded upon the advice of the colony leaders and MCC representatives to facilitate adequate distribution of funds made available by the MCC, to enable the economical provision of supplies to the settlers and profitable sale of their produce, and to establish small basic industries which would meet the daily needs of the immigrants. The first year its only capital was maintenance funds and loans made available by the MCC.

Its shares are valued at 20,000 guaranies, payable by dividends, and its 1949 turnover was 460,000 guaranies; profits are either used for the expansion of the Co-operative or paid to the members in the form of new shares. The Co-operative and its president are responsible to the administration of the colony (Amt) for all its activities (see Volendam Colony) and acts as the financial arm of the colony in all matters. Besides a shortage of operating capital, considerable difficulties were at first encountered through the armed raids of Paraguayan bandits at repeated intervals, who took advantage of the unarmed Mennonite watchmen. P.K.

Volendam Colony, Paraguay, was founded July 1, 1947, when the 57,000-acre tract of land occupied by the colony at Mbopicua on the east side of the Paraguay River near the Friesland Colony (q.v.), 8 miles north of Rosario, was purchased. The 1,135 settlers (295 families) were part of the contingent which had been brought to South America by the Volendam, having been rescued out of Berlin. Another large group of the Volendam, passengers settled contemporaneously in the Neuland Colony (q.v.) near Fernheim Colony. C. A. Defehr of Winnipeg, the MCC representative for this purpose in Paraguay, had chosen the location and arranged the land purchase. Two additional small groups of immigrants arrived in Volendam from Europe in 1948. A group of some 50 came on the Stuart Heinzelman to Buenos Aires in July 1948. In November 1948 a larger group of 447 for Volendam arrived in Buenos Aires on the second voyage of the Volendam. Thus the total immigrant group of settlers in Volendam in 1948 was almost 1,723. The first 1,135 settlers established 12 villages, with a co-operative and a "Waisenamt" (q.v.). The river harbor was named Puerto Menno. In 1950 Volendam had 15 villages with a total population of 1,810 in 441 families on 441 farms, and 8 elementary schools. Most of the land was heavily wooded, though fertile, and had to be cleared by hand. The economic progress of the colony was slow, and a considerable number of persons have migrated to Canada, so that in 1959 the total Volendam population was only c1200. In 1950 the total church membership was 938—800 in the Mennonite Church and 138 in the Mennonite Brethren Church. H.S.B.

J. W. Fretz, Pilgrims in Paraguay (Scottsdale, 1953); W. Quiring, Im Schweisse Deines Angesichts (Steinbach, 1953).

Volendam Mennonite Brethren Church, located in Colony Volendam near Puerto Mbopicua, Alto-Paraguay, is a branch of the Friesland M.B. Church and hence of the General Conference of the M.B. Church of North America. Upon the arrival of the first immigrants from Russia via Germany after World War II in 1947-1948, services for the church group were sponsored and conducted largely by the Friesland M.B. Church under the leadership of Kornelius Voth. In late 1948 another group of immigrants joined them including their minister, Franz Janzen. Services continued as before until the Volendam M.B. Church was formally organized on Nov. 9, 1949, under the leadership of Franz Janzen assisted by Kornelius Voth of Friesland, with a membership of 138. Later Johann Barwich was ordained deacon. Services are held regularly in co-operation with the Mennonite Church, except on the first Sunday of each month, when they are held separately in the village schools. A new brick church with seating capacity of 400 was built in the village of Mariental in 1950. Choir and youth work are largely in co-operation with the local Mennonite church. Church discipline is practiced according to Biblical teachings and other church practices are similar to those observed and followed in the Friesland M.B. Church. In 1957 the membership was 112, with Aron Reimer as pastor. J.Fu.

Volendam Mennonite Church (GCM), located in Colony Volendam near Puerto Mboicua, Alto-Paraguay, a member of the South American District Conference and also of the General Conference Mennonite Church, was organized temporarily in 1947 and fully approved on April 15, 1948, under the leadership of Hans Epp, with a membership of 599, all of whom were immigrants from Russia via Germany through the Mennonite Central Committee during 1947-48. The current membership is 800 and is served by two ordained ministers, Hans Epp and Jakob Priess, and nine young unordained ministers, none of whom have had special ministerial training. The ordained ministers receive financial support from the G.C.M. Church of North America. Church services are held regularly together with the Mennonite Brethren, except on the first Sunday of every month, when only members attend, in 12 school buildings in various villages. A new brick church was built near the village of Tiefenbrunn in 1950. Saturday services known as "Wochenschluss," young people's instruction in Mennonite history and Bible, and Sunday school are held regularly. The church has four choirs. Church discipline is attempted but difficult to enforce at this early stage. Communion services are held six times each year.

H.P.E.

Volga German Autonomous Soviet Socialist Republic, also known as German Volga Republic, was established as a settlement in southeastern European Russia consisting of 10,885 square miles, had a population of 605,542, and was located mostly on the east bank of the Volga, adjacent to the Saratov and Stalingrad regions. The Germans constituting the Republic, largely Lutherans, had come to Russia c1760, having been invited by Catherine II. They lost their special privileges and autonomy c1870. Many migrated to North and South America at that time. The Revolution of 1917 prevented a transfer of the population to Siberia, which had been ordered in 1915. In 1918 the region was organized as a German district and in 1924 as an Autonomous Republic. The Republic suffered severely in the famine of 1921-22. The capital of the Republic was Engels, formerly Pokrovsk. The Trakt Mennonite settlement (q.v.) was located in this Republic. On Sept. 24, 1941, after Hitler had invaded Russia, the Republic was dissolved and the German population, which comprised 67 per cent of the total, was exiled to Asiatic Russia. This included the Mennonites.

C.K.

Am Trakt. Eine mennonitische Kolonie im mittleren Wolgagebiet (North Kildonan, 1948); Lothar König, Die Deutschmünsel an der Wolga (Dülmen, 1938); Johannes Schleuning, Die deutschen Kolonien im Wolgagebiet (n.d., n.p.); Gerhard Bonwetsch, Geschichte der deutschen Kolonien an der Wolga (Stuttgart, 1919).

Volhynia, a province of western Russia before 1917, the location of several Mennonite settlements 1800-74. The Mennonite pioneers coming to Volhynia, some of Dutch and some of Swiss ethnic origin, were among the first German colonists to penetrate western Russia, a movement sponsored by Polish and Russian noblemen to aid the economic development of the country.

On the basis of the accentuated discriminatory policy of the militaristic Prussian government against the ethnically Dutch Mennonites of the Vistula Delta area (which also generated the larger migration to the southern Ukraine) and because of the liberal offer of the Polish Count Potocki, a small group of Mennonites from the Graudenz (q.v.) area moved to Potocki's land in 1791, settling in the village of Michalin, near Machnovka, southwest of Kiev. When the Michalin area passed under Russian control at the second partitioning of Poland, in 1793, an effort was made by the Russian authorities to impose additional taxes on the Mennonites, i.e., the taxes normally wrested from all Russian serfs. The Mennonites insisted on their privileged status (as German colonists and Mennonites) and finally in 1804 secured a ruling in their favor. Meanwhile, however, a large number of the Michalin settlers accepted the good offer of Prince Edward Lubanirsky and in 1801-12 settled in villages near Ostrog in Volhynia. A few families from Zabara joined them soon after. Those who remained in Michalin were reinforced by other Dutch-Prussian Mennonites and the community continued until 1874.

The first and leading village inhabited was Karolswalde (q.v.), situated four miles south of Ostrog. In 1821 the Mennonites were located in two villages, Karolswalde and Antonovka, with 38 families. Further expansion occurred in 1828 with the settling of the neighboring village of Karolsberge. In a listing of 1857, in addition to the three villages mentioned above, Jadvinin and Dossidorf were named. In 1874 Fürstendorf, Gnadenthal, and Waldheim were added, but Dossidorf was not mentioned. An additional village associated with the group was Fürstenthal. All of the villages were located in the vicinity of Ostrog, most of them south of that center. The most common family names were Unruh, Dirks, Schartner, Koehn, and Jantz. The Mennonites living in these villages were organized into one congregation. There is evidence that in 1857 and after, they met in two groups. Benjamin Dirks was ordained to the eldership in 1817 and Tobias Unruh in 1853. Economic progress was slow. Virtually the entire group, under the leadership of Elder Tobias Unruh, migrated to America in 1874 to find new homes near Canton and Pawnee Rock, Kan., and Avon, S.D.

Additional Dutch-Prussian Mennonites came to Volhynia in 1806-18 and possibly later. Although some of the details of the movements of these later groups are lacking, it is known that some came from the Schwetz-Graudenz area on the Vistula River, and others from the Netzebruch near Driesen in Neumark, province of Brandenburg, Germany. The best known of these migrations was that of a group of 21 Mennonite families with the names of Beyer, Böse, Dirks, Voth, Nachtigall, Nickel, Pankratz, Richard, Sperling, Unruh, and Ziekle, who in 1811 entered into a contract with the nobleman Wacław Borejko, settling on his land and founding the village of Zofyovka located north of the town of Wysock on the Horyn River. The terms of the contract were very good, as will be suggested below, but the land on which they located was marshy. The group left Zofyovka in 1828 and established "Ostrova" which is identical with Jozefin, 20 miles northeast of Luck, Volhynia. They also settled in the neighboring village which they again named Zofyovka. Here they were on the land of Count Michael Bichkowski.

The second group coming in 1806-18 settled near the town of Rafalovka on the Styr River some distance north of Luck, on the land of Count Olisarov. Later this group moved to the colony of "Vola" in Volhynia but neither the time of the move nor the location of the colony is known. A third group coming to Volhynia, some of which may have come as late as 1823, settled in two villages 20 miles southwest of Novograd Volynski, named Waldheim (Waltajem) and Zabara (Dossidorf). There is evidence that in this period some Dutch-Prussian Mennonites located at the villages of Horodyszcze, Bereza, and Melanienwald, all three approximately 25 miles northwest of Novograd Volynski.

In 1836 (some writers suggest 1838) the Mennonites living in the above villages of Jozefin-Zofyovka, Waldheim-Zabara, and Horodyszcze-Bereza, 40 families in all, left Volhynia, and settled in the south Ukrainian Molotschna Mennonite settlement, where they founded the village of Waldheim, a name carried with them from Volhynia. The move was fostered by the fact that the Netzebruch Mennonites, who were related to some of them, had gone to the Molotschna settlement in 1834, and also because it was felt that Mennonite privileges were better and more secure in the Ukraine.

Not all were satisfied with their new home, Waldheim, in the Molotschna settlement. Religious and economic misunderstandings arose between the older settlers and the newcomers. The dissatisfied members secured permission from the Russian government to return to Volhynia, and accordingly in 1848 they trekked back to Volhynia and founded the village of Heinrichsdorf some miles north of Berdichev in Eastern Volhynia. Here the group lived until 1874 when they left for America. During at least the latter years of their stay the group acknowledged the eldership of Tobias Unruh of the Ostrog Mennonite settlement and accepted his supervision.

Mention should also be made of a village of Dutch-Prussian Mennonites, Lindenthal, located approximately 10 or 15 miles northwest of Zhitomir. The source of this settlement and the time of origin is unknown.

Two groups of ethnically Swiss Mennonites also proceeded to Volhynia, and met and merged there into a larger community. One group from South Germany, coming as part of the Mennonite movement to Galicia in 1784-86, consisting of nine families (prominent were Krehbiel, Miller, Schrag, and Zerger), left the Galician Mennonite settlement in 1796 and attempted unsuccessfully to integrate themselves into the Hutterite Bruderhof located in the northern Ukraine on the River Desna at Vishenka. The actual involvement in communal living, demanding economic and some religious re-orientation, was not as satisfactory as anticipated, and therefore in the spring of 1797 the party left the Hutterites. Most of them settled near or joined the Dutch-Prussian colony of Michalin, referred to above. A few families went to Michelsdorf, a village to be mentioned below. Those who dropped anchor at Michalin stayed there until the disagreement with the government regarding taxes became acute; then when some of the Dutch-Prussian Mennonites went to Ostrog the Swiss families likewise moved to Volhynia, going northwest a bit farther, however, to the Dubno area. On the lands of Prince Lubanirsky they inhabited the village of Berezina, possibly situated a mile or two south of Dubno. The stay at Berezina was short because the dam proposed by the prince was to flood the village. On the recommendation of Lubanirsky the group resettled at Vignanka, a mile north of Dubno. Here the group lived for some years, and as the number enlarged some probably moved to the near-by villages of Futtur and Zahoriz, both known to have had Swiss Mennonites. When the second group of Swiss Mennonites came from Michelsdorf to Eduardsdorf, the Vignanka group in the course of time became a part of the Eduardsdorf settlement, some moving to that village and all becoming ecclesiastically related to the Eduardsdorf congregation. In 1874, however, Vignanka was no longer inhabited by Mennonites.

The second group of Swiss Mennonites to find their way to Volhynia left Montbéliard, France, in 1791; it consisted of six or more Amish families with the names of Gering, Graber, Kaufman, Stucky, Lichti, and Roth. Although the group may have proceeded directly to Poland, there is some evidence they spent a few years in the Russian province of Podolia. Sometime between 1795 and 1800 the party settled in the Polish villages of Urzulin and Michelsdorf, both located 30 miles northeast of Lublin. Joseph Mündlein of the Galician Mennonites joined the group after their arrival and is known to have been their elder in 1802. The group was further reinforced by a few families who had been a part of the ill-fated attempt to join the Hutterite colony.

Never fully satisfied with the productivity of their marshy land and because of better prospects in Volhynia, the larger part of the Michelsdorf-Urzulin colony accepted the offer of Prince Lubanirsky and under his sponsorship founded the village of Eduardsdorf about 1807, 15 miles west-southwest of Dubno. It became the leading village of the Swiss Mennonites until 1861, and from it the Mennonites found their way into the neighboring villages of Zahoriz, Futtur, Hecker, Goritt (Koryto), Lisseberg, and possibly others.

The remaining Swiss Mennonites left Michelsdorf and Urzulin in 1837, proceeding to Horodyszcze, apparently 25 miles northeast of Rovno. In the same year, or soon thereafter, a few families from Horodyszczce moved to Dossidorf (Zabara) and Waldheim. There is some evidence that all three of these villages were taken over from the Prussian Mennonites who had left for the Molotschna in 1836. Bereza and Alt-Kolowert were Swiss Mennonite villages near Horodyszczce.

With the increasing scarcity of land near Dubno and the opening of considerable land for ownership in eastern Volhynia, the larger portion of the people of the Eduardsdorf settlement moved in 1861 to two villages, Kutusovka and Neumannovka (q.v.), 30 miles northwest of Zhitomir. Those remaining in the Dubno area lived in the villages of Futtur, Zahoriz, Hecker, and Goritt. Church services were held alternately at the first two mentioned villages.

Kutusovka (q.v.) and Neumannovka were located 3 miles apart. In time dwellings were built along the road between the two villages. The church was built between the two villages and gradually the entire complex was known as Kutusovka. Economic conditions were good, with a good market for surplus products in Zhitomir and Kiev.

Many of the Swiss Mennonites were Amish during much of their stay in Volhynia, losing however some of the distinctive characteristics in the years prior to their emigration to America. In the early years in Volhynia the group subscribed to the Amish Discipline signed at Essingen (q.v.) in 1779. There is evidence that Pietism was influential in their later changing orientation. At the time of the migration to America the Swiss Mennonites were organized into four congregations, Zahoriz-Futtur, Waldheim, Horodyszczce, and Kutusovka, with meetinghouses at the latter two locations. Through intermarriage with other Mennonites and non-Mennonite German colonists, there were added to the already present Swiss-German family names of Albrecht, Flickinger, Gering, Graber, Kaufman, Krehbiel, Miller, Schrag, Schwartz, Stucky, Sutter, and Zerger, such names as Dirks, Ortmann, Prieheim, Ries, Senner, Straus, Wedel, Voran, and Waltner. The group spoke a South German dialect.

A total of 159 families left Volhynia in 1874 for America, and settled in Hutchinson and Turner counties, S.D., and McPherson and Harvey counties, Kan. The first group left Russia from the villages of Zahoriz and Futtur, the second group from Goritt and Hecker, the third group from Horodyszczce and Waldheim, and the last group from Kutusovka. By and large the first three groups settled in South Dakota and the fourth in Kansas.

The Mennonites, both Dutch and Swiss, were brought to Volhynia primarily through the liberal offers of progressive noblemen. Although the details of the privileges given the Mennonites are in general not known, there is evidence that they were superior to those normally given to German colonists but inferior to the sweeping concessions granted by Empress Catherine to the south Ukrainian Mennonites. The only extant contract is the one entered into by Count Boreyko and the 21 families who settled at Zofyovka near Wysock. Some of the conditions in the contract were as follows. With the exception of a land tax of 120 gulden per hide (per year; they rented a total of 33 hides) to be paid after the initial three years, the colonists were to be free of all other state taxes, dues, and responsibilities. They were given complete freedom as to vocation, engaging in skills without responsibility to any guild, and were given a free hand in disposing of their products. They were given complete religious freedom with the encouragement of a grant of half a hide of land for the erection of a school and cemetery. Every household was given 200 gulden as a loan to enable it to begin farming.

Although conditions were favorable for that time, the repeated moving, the sometimes poor land, and the economic disadvantages of peasantry resulted in limited economic progress for the Mennonites of Volhynia. Much of the gain was lost when land and goods had to be sold at great loss at the time of their emigration to America. With some exceptions such as the later years in Waldheim and Kutusovka, the land was rented, not owned. In northern Volhynia greater attention was given to cattle raising, whereas in southern Volhynia more small grain crops were raised. Although the majority of the Mennonites were farmers, others, especially in Ostrog and Heinrichsdorf, were blacksmiths, carpenters, wagon-makers, cabinetmakers, weavers, millers, stone-masons, and bricklayers. Farming was primitive, the implements consisting of the plow, harrow, wagon, scythe, and sickle; the main crops were rye, wheat, buckwheat, oats, millet, flax, peas, and potatoes. Cereal crops were scythed by hand, stored in the shed, and threshed by flail during the winter months. Pasture land was often held in common.

In apparently all instances the Mennonites in Volhynia had religious freedom. The ministry was threefold, consisting of elder, minister, and deacon. The Swiss Mennonites usually had an elder for each congregation, but the Prussians often had one elder supervising several congregations. Services lasted two to three hours; sermons were often read from a book of sermons. Church discipline was severe, including the use of the ban. Officials of the various congregations had considerable contact with one another. There was a strong stress on tradition.

The schools were elementary and were administered by the church. School days were ended when an individual was mature enough to work. Thus educational advancement, at least in part, was limited by economic considerations. Sometimes the minister was also the schoolteacher. Both the religious and educational life of the Mennonites in Volhynia lacked the stimulation and challenge of outside contact.

There was considerable inter-colony visitation among the Mennonites in Volhynia, especially within either the Swiss or Prussian groups; there also was some moving of individual families from one village to another. However, very little if any of this took place between the Prussian and the Swiss. Since the Mennonites were few in number and scattered among the Slavs, the influence of Russian culture was marked, especially in the later years.

Although the great majority of Volhynian Mennonites emigrated to America in 1874, a few stayed on. Seven families, in part or whole of the Swiss Volhynian Mennonites, are known to have remained in Volhynia. Some of these came to America within ten years after the main groups had left. During World War I a Benjamin Schrag moved from Eduardsdorf to the Galician Mennonite settlement near Lemberg. Even in World War II a German Mennonite soldier fighting on the Russian front found evidences of the Swiss Mennonite stay in Volhynia. Before World War I there still were 15 families (Prussian) living in Lindenthal, two near Ostrog, eight near Luck, and seven in the Minsk area.

M.H.S.

Walter Kuhn, "Deutsche Täuferiedlungen im west-ukrainischen Raume," Zeitschrift für Ostforschung IV (1955); Ernst Crous, "Mennoniten in Wolhynien," Gesch.-Bl. XIII (1956) 2-10; M. Woltner, Die Gemeindeberichte von 1848 der deutschen Siedlungen am Schwarzen Meer (Sammlung Leibbrant); J. A. Schmidt, Schmidt Family Record (Vermillion, 1948); J. A. Boese, Loretta's Settlement (Tyndall, S.D., 1950); C. Henry Smith, The Coming of the Russian Mennonites (Berne, 1927); Karasek-Luck, Die deutschen Siedlungen in Wolhynien (Leipzig, 1931); P. P. Wedel, Kurze Geschichte der aus Wolhynien, Russland nach Kansas ausgewanderten Schweizer-Mennoniten (Moundridge, 1929); P. R. Kaufman, Unser Volk und seine Geschichte (Basil, Kan., 1931); Martin H. Schrag, "European History of the Swiss-Volhynian Mennonite Ancestors of Mennonites Now Living in Kansas and South Dakota" (unpublished master's thesis, Eastern Baptist Theological Seminary, 1956); idem, "The Swiss-Volhynian Mennonite Background." Menn. Life X (October 1954); ML IV.

Volk, Jörg, a radical Anabaptist of Franconia, was in Augsburg at the time of the Martyr Synod in August 1527. He was executed in Bamberg in January 1528. He was accused in 1530 by Marx Mayr, at the latter's trial, of having advocated community of wives at a meeting in Thuringia in 1527.

J. E. Jörg, Deutschland in der Revolutionsperiode von 1522 bis 1526 (Freiburg i.B., 1851) 682, 287; Fr. Roth, Augsburgs Ref.-Gesch. (Munich, 1889) 232; ML III.

Volkert, Jansz, b. c1610 at Hoorn, d. there 1681, a well-to-do cloth merchant on the Nieuwedijk at Amsterdam, was a syndic of the Cloth Guild. As such he was depicted in 1661 by Rembrandt (q.v.) in the famous painting "De Staalmeesters" (the Cloth Syndics) now found in the Amsterdam Rijksmuseum (Jansz is the second person to the left, standing). He was also the owner of an art cabinet in which he collected paintings, books, and curiosities, and was a member and probably a deacon of the Old Frisian Mennonite church (Bloemstraat congregation) at Amsterdam. His last years he spent in the home of Jacob Fransz Sleutel (q.v.), who was married to his sister Aaltje Jans. (Yearbook Amstelodamum, 1957; Algemeen Doopsgez. Weekblad XII, 1957-58, No. 41, p. 5.) vdZ.

Volkertsz, Aldert, b. 1569 at Amsterdam, Netherlands, d. there Aug. 26, 1645, was a preacher of the Old Frisian (Bloemstraat) congregation for more than 40 years. Schijn-Maatschoen inserts a laudatory poem on him. Under the enigmatic motto, "Soo Gode wil my ga," he wrote a songbook entitled Nieu Geestelijck Liet-Boeck, ghenempt den Bloempot (Amsterdam, 1626), which contains 56 hymns without notes. A copy of this hymnal is found in the Amsterdam Mennonite library. (Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis III, 77-80, with portrait.)

vdZ.

Volkertsz, Jan: see Jan Volkertsz Trypmaker.

Vollenhoven, a Dutch Mennonite family, whose progenitor was (1) Jan Hendricksz (de) Hertoghe (Amsterdam, 1657-1727), who took the family name of Vollenhove(n). Both he and his wife Lysbeth Rombouts as well as his descendants were members of the Amsterdam Mennonite Lamist (q.v.) congregation. His grandson (2) Cornelis Vollenhoven (1723-89) was a merchant at Amsterdam. A son of (2) Cornelis was (3) Hendrik Vollenhoven (1753-1826), married to Catharina Johanna van Bee(c)k, who obtained his D. Jur. degree at Leiden in 1774 and after the Napoleonic Wars was a high official in the Dutch state. He served as a deacon in the Amsterdam congregation and was also a trustee of the Amsterdam Mennonite seminary. A son of his was (4) Jacob van Beeck Vollenhoven (1780-1834), a businessman at Amsterdam, partner in the trading company of Ten Cate and Vollenhoven, consul of Prussia, cofounder and trustee of the A.D.S. (q.v.) and curator of its seminary, both 1811-d.34. (5) Hendrik van Beeck Vollenhoven (1811-71), a son of (4) Jacob, was a physician at Amsterdam until 1840; he then gave up his practice because of poor health, to become a member of the van Heukelom and Vollenhoven firm of grain merchants. He was a member of the Dutch First Chamber 1849-71 and its president 1870-71. He served the Mennonite church as a trustee of the A.D.S. (moderator 1856-57) and seminary curator. Like his father and other members of the family he was a deacon of the Amsterdam congregation. His grandson Hendrik van Beeck Vollenhoven (1877-1943) was a physician at Haarlem and a deacon of the Haarlem Mennonite congregation 1924-d.43.

vdZ.

Nederl. Patriciaat XI (1920) 332-37; church records of Amsterdam; DJ 1850, 143; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 2495; DB 1863, 24; 1868, 100; 1898, 32; 1907, 196; N.N.B.Wb. IX, 1222 f., 1224 f.

Vollenhoven, van, an outstanding and widely ramified Dutch family, Mennonite until the 19th century. By its faithfulness and its contributions, both spiritual and financial, this family has given the Mennonite church in Holland meritorious service. Its ancestor was (1) Lubbert Wolfertsz (1578-1663), at first a bargeman, who took the family name of van Vollenhoven, probably after the town of Vollenhove (province of Overijssel), from which he may have stemmed. From about 1610 he lived at Schiedam (q.v.) near Rotterdam, where he operated a cloth business, and was also a shipowner. He was a deacon and probably a preacher of the Schiedam Flemish Mennonite congregation from 1630. His son was (2) Coenraad Lubbertsz, called Koenraad van Vollenhoven (q.v.), who was a Mennonite preacher at Schiedam and at Haarlem. Another son of (1) Lubbert Wolfertsz was (3) Jan Lubbertsz van Vollenhoven (Schiedam, 1624-Amsterdam, c1670), founder of the Amsterdam branch of this family. (4) Anthoni Lubberts (1617-1707), another son of (1) Lubbert, was an important owner of herring boats at Schiedam and a founder of the large herring fishery of Vlaardingen. (5) Cornelis van Vollenhoven (Schiedam, 1690-Rotterdam, 1768), a grandson of (4) Anthoni, was a flax merchant at Rotterdam and the founder of the Rotterdam branch. He was a deacon of the church at Rotterdam, as were nine of his descendants between 1721 and 1840. In the 19th century this branch joined the Remonstrants (q.v.). Other prominent members of this family were (6) Coenraad van Vollenhoven (Schiedam, 1682-1743), a son of (4) Anthoni, an owner of herring boats, director of the relief of the poor and of the town orphanage, deacon of the Schiedam Mennonite Church, (7) Willem van Vollenhoven (1707-79), a merchant and wholesale dealer at Amsterdam, who later lived at Haarlem, where he was a deacon and a trustee of the Mennonite orphanage. He is the founder of the Haarlem branch. (8) Jan Messchert van Vollenhoven (Rotterdam, 1748-Bloemendaal, 1814), owner of a brewery at Amsterdam, director of the Dutch Levant trade, shipowner, and writer. His son Jan Messchert van Vollenhoven (1812-81) in many respects broke the traditions of his family: he studied law, was not engaged in business but in politics, left the liberal political views of his ancestors to side with the "Anti-Revolutionaries," for which political party he was a member both of the Second and the First Chamber. He was a burgo-master of Amsterdam 1858-66. His descendants were Reformed. (9) Aelbert van Meurs van Vollenhoven (Rotterdam, 1749-Utrecht, 1817) was a wholesale dealer and banker at Rotterdam and a deacon of the Rotterdam congregation. His widow Alida (Hesse-link) van Vollenhoven (Heerenveen, 1754-Utrecht, 1829) left a considerable sum to the congregation of Knijpe (q.v.) into which she had been baptized. (10) Maria Elisabeth van Vollenhove (1730-1811), a great-granddaughter of (4) Anthoni, was first married to the Remonstrant pastor Jan Verbeek and then (1797) to the Mennonite pastor Cornelis de Vries (q.v.) at Haarlem. After 1881 there are no Mennonite van Vollenhovens. Some branches died out; others joined the Remonstrants and the Reformed church. An outstanding non-Mennonite descendant of this family was Cornelis van Vollenhoven (1874-1933), from 1901 professor of international law at the University of Leiden. vdZ.

Nederl. Patriciaat XVI (1926) 278-340; DB 1863, 22, 24; 1909, 164, 166, 167; P. Veen, De Doopsgezinden in Schoterland (Leeuwarden, 1869) 118 f.; K. Vos, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinde gemeente te Rotterdam (repr. Rotterdam, 1907) 47 f.; J. Rogge, Het Handelshuis van Eeghen (Amsterdam, 1948) 52, 97, 109; N.N.B.Wb. III, 1333 f.

Vollenhoven, Koenraad van (Coenraad Lubbertsz), b. Jan. 9, 1611, at Schiedam, d. Oct. 21, 1679, at Haarlem, was married three times, in 1631 to Marytge van Bergum, in 1638 to Magteld Strick, and in 1669 to Gertruy Wybrandsdochter. He was a cloth merchant and a Mennonite preacher and elder, 1634-40 at Schiedam and 1640-d.79 in the Flemish den Blok congregation of Haarlem (it is not clear how he could sign a contract in Haarlem as early as September 1635, as is stated in DB 1865, 19). During his ministry at Haarlem this congregation also became involved in the differences between a more progressive and a more strictly conservative part, which had in Amsterdam led to the Lamist-Zonist schism (see Lammerenkrijgh). Van Vollenhoven sided with the liberal Lamists or Galenists, followers of Galenus (q.v.) Abrahamz, supported by the preacher Jan des Rameaux, while the Haarlem conservative Flemish Mennonites were led by preacher

Isaac Snep (q.v.). The dissensions ended with a schism in 1665 as in Amsterdam; even the intervention of the magistrates of Haarlem could not prevent the split. In 1670 a wall was built in the Blok meetinghouse to separate it into two meetinghouses, one for the Lamists, led by van Vollenhoven, and one for the Zonists, led by Snep. Like most Lamists van Vollenhoven was a Collegiant (q.v.). vdZ.

DB 1863, 130, 137-43, 156 f.; 1865, 19-21; 1909, 166; W. J. Kühler, Het Socinianisme in Nederland (Leiden, 1912) 174 f.; J. C. van Slee, De Rijsburger Collegianten (Haarlem, 1895) 184.

Vologda Region, located in north central European Soviet Russia, consists of 57,514 square miles, with a population of nearly two million. The region consists of many marshes, lakes, streams, and extensive forests, and has long winters and poor soil. The chief towns are Vologda, the capital, Cherepovets, and Veliki Ustyug. Because of the many forests and the severe winters, which make settlement in the region unpopular, this territory has been used extensively for exile by the Soviets. Thousands of Mennonites were exiled to this region 1925-40 and many perished. During the last years some moved from here to warmer climates. C.K.

The most vivid description of the fate of those exiled has been presented by Hans Harder in his novel In Wologdas weissen Wäldern (Altona, n.d.-c1930); J. Rempel, Der Sowjethölle entronnen (Kassel, 1935), and G. Fast, Im Schatten des Todes (2nd ed., Winnipeg, 1956).

Volost, the Russian word for county and county government, also used by the Mennonites of Russia, although the German word Gebietsamt was more commonly used. (See also Government of Mennonites in Russia.) C.K.

Voluntary Service, the name given to a program of practical service "In the name of Christ" for young people, primarily in Mennonite and affiliated groups, which arose in the latter part of World War II and has been sponsored and administered largely by the Mennonite Central Committee and several of the larger Mennonite groups, especially the Mennonite Church (MC) and the General Conference Mennonite Church. Voluntary Service arose initially early in 1943 in the Mennonite Church (MC) as the result of a request from the Virginia Conference to the Peace Problems Committee in late 1942 to provide some type of service as an alternate to civil defense work which was at that time being pressed upon Virginia Mennonites by the Government Civil Defense Agency. The Peace Problems Committee in turn requested the Relief Committee at a conjoint meeting Feb. 12, 1943, to undertake setting up a program for Mennonite service units. The proposal was described in a memorandum of that date as follows: (1) We believe that in addition to meeting the present emergency situation, we should think in terms of a long-range program of Christian testimony through our units. (2) We believe it will be practical to organize Mennonite service units which shall be distinctly Mennonite in their personnel, work, and practice. (3) The service should be put on a voluntary and nonremunerative basis. (4) The service units should be a particular avenue for youth expression of our Christian faith and Mennonite practice. (5) The service units should be initiated through our church schools and through other church organizations where there is sufficient interest and personnel to undertake it. (6) The service units should include the particular skills existing within our Mennonite constituency as well as the trained abilities of those who are preparing for the work of teaching and evangelism in the church. (7) The service units should be integrated into our whole church and missionary program.

Voluntary Service was first undertaken as a summer service program. The first unit of four worked in Chicago May 2 to July 2, 1944, in connection with the Mennonite (MC) Mission work there, doing a religious survey, conducting a summer Bible school, and renovating mission buildings. In 1945 three units were set up in connection with the Canton and Detroit city missions, the West Liberty (Ohio) Children's Home, and the rural mission work at Culp, Ark. The program of summer service units developed rapidly thereafter. The Peace Problems Committee brought to the Mennonite General Conference session of August 1946 a proposal for a permanent long-range service program under the Mennonite Relief Committee including year-round service, which was approved by the Conference. A General Council (MC General Conference) policy resolution adopted Oct. 18, 1950, urged vigorous development of a broad Voluntary Service program. A full-time director of VS under the MRC was appointed, beginning June 1, 1949, and a year-round VS program in addition to the summer program was set up, beginning Sept. 1, 1949. This program has grown until on Feb. 1, 1958, the year-round service had 165 workers in 28 projects on the continental United States, Puerto Rico, Alberta and Ontario, Canada, and Algeria, while the summer service program in 1958 had 150 workers in 17 widely scattered units. Meanwhile the Lancaster Conference had established a vigorous summer service program and several other conferences had started limited programs. In all of these programs the original connection of church- and mission-related projects was maintained.

Meanwhile the MCC had inaugurated a VS program, which arose in part out of the summer service projects established during World War II for girls in connection with CPS (1944, 1945, 1946), and in part under the influence of the example of the Quaker summer work camps which had been operated as early as 1935. The first regular MCC summer service units (6), including one at Cuauhtemoc, Mexico, were operated in 1947 after CPS had closed. Year-round VS was inaugurated in 1947-48 at Gulfport, Miss. The MCC program developed rapidly and by 1957-58 had 193 workers in summer service units and 112 in year-round service. The General Conference Mennonite Church has operated a program since 1946 including both summer units and year-round service projects. In 1958 it had 35 participants in 8 year-round units and 81 in 16 summer units. MCC summer service began in Canada in 1948, and year-round service in 1953. During recent years Canadian Summer Service had 80-90 workers each summer. The year-round program is now concentrated in Newfoundland, where there were 33 workers in 1958.

The Mennonite Brethren Church does not currently operate a VS program of its own, although some district conferences did so in the early 1950's. A number of its young people are serving in the VS program of the MCC. The 1957 M.B. General Conference approved VS in the following resolution: (a) "That we stand in approval of Voluntary Service whenever and wherever it remains in line with the evangelical policies of the church. (b) That mature young people from our churches who are members in good standing, are well established in faith, and who have a missionary motive for service be encouraged to enter voluntary service."

It has been agreed that MCC operate VS for those Mennonite bodies which do not operate their own programs and in addition operate pioneer and experimental types of projects and furnish general leadership. A Voluntary Service section was set up in MCC administration at Akron in 1947; Elmer Ediger served as first director until 1951. In 1957 this section was combined with the I-W Service section.

The Voluntary Service concept has spread to Europe and South America through MCC. In 1952 European VS was established as "Mennonitischer freiwilliger Dienst," under the direction of a board composed of representatives of the European Mennonite churches of Holland, Switzerland, France, and Germany, and the MCC. The MFD operates only summer service projects, with headquarters in Kaiserslautern, Germany. Already in 1948-51, American Mennonite college students who came in summer tours to Europe, had spent several weeks each summer in VS in summer work camps under MCC sponsorship. In 1957 a Mennonite VS program was begun in South America under MCC sponsorship, with Martin Duerksen of Buenos Aires as director, called Christlicher Dienst.

Related to Voluntary Service but actually an alternative to I-W Service (q.v.) is Pax Service (q.v.), a program for overseas service by young men serving as conscientious objectors under the United States Selective Service Act (draft), who volunteer for service abroad under MCC. Pax (i.e., Peace) was begun in 1950 and has operated largely in Germany, although also in Greece, Korea, Peru, and Paraguay. The Pax period of service is two years, the terms are the same as for VS, i.e., maintenance and $10.00 per month pocket money, and the cost is borne largely by the church. In 1958 110 men were serving in Pax.

In the short space of twelve years the VS idea has become widely accepted throughout American Mennonitism, particularly for mature young people. It has promoted the spirit of Christian service in the name of Christ, and particularly in those cases where it is kept in close connection with the missionary and evangelistic outreach of the church it has brought an added new approach to evangelism. It has also opened up an avenue for dedicated and sacrificial short-term service for many who might not be able or qualified to do regular full-time Christian work on a lifetime basis. H.S.B.

VS 1958, Relief and Service Office of the Mennonite

Board of Missions and Charities, Elkhart, Ind.; Agape, a monthly VS periodical published by the Mennonite Relief and Service Committee, Elkhart, 1955-; J. D. Unruh, In the Name of Christ (Scottsdale, 1952) Chapter VI, "Voluntary Service," 294-309.

Von dem unverschampten frävel, ergerlichen verwyren unnd unwarhaftem leeren der selbsgesandten Widertouffern, vier gespräch Bücher, zu verwarnenn den einfaltigen, Durch Heinrichen Bullinger geschrieben. Ein guter bericht vonn Zinsen. Ouch ein schöne underwysung von Zähenden (Zürich, 1531, 178 leaves), is the title of the first of the two books against the Anabaptists written by Heinrich Bullinger (q.v.), which appeared in print in February 1531 in Zürich, though written in 1530. The occasion was the activity of the Anabaptist preacher Hans Pfistermeyer (q.v.) in the "Free Counties" between Zürich and Aarau (q.v.). The young Bullinger was at that time a minister in his home town of Bremgarten, the principal town of this region. Here he had helped the Reformation to break through and had gathered a lively congregation. Pfistermeyer's preaching stirred up large crowds. They were fascinated by his main theme, the question of tithes and interest. The official ministers had much trouble and sought help; this was the occasion for Bullinger's book. For some years already he had discussed Anabaptist ideas in his private writings and letters. Now his friends urged him to summarize his experience with the Anabaptists and give guidance to refute them. The book was begun in April 1530 and finished toward the end of the year. When Bullinger discussed the question of the interest with some Anabaptists in January 1531, his manuscript must have been already in print.

The book has four sections ("books") and two appendices. Except for the appendices it is written as a dialogue (gespräch Bücher) between Simon, who sympathizes with the Anabaptists, and Jojada, who defends "the truth." During the process of the discussion Simon is convinced by Jojada. The argumentation tends to popularize the problems and their orthodox solution. There is no interest in the history of Anabaptism, only in its refutation.

A list of twenty Anabaptist errors covers the themes discussed: (1) spirit and Scripture, (2) the right to preach, (3) the unity of the church and separation, (4) justification and sanctification, (5) the sleep of the soul, (6) rebaptism, (7) baptism of infants, (8) community of goods, (9) the vagrancy of the Anabaptists, (10) preachers and education, (11-16) the Christian and the magistracy, nonresistance, oath, death penalty and war: the whole of the third book, (17-20) spiritual and material freedom (tithes, interest, and usury: the whole of the fourth book). The appendices continue to discuss the last question in a different literary form: the first is a tract on interests and usury, the second a letter to Bullinger's brother on tithes.

The picture of the Anabaptists drawn by Bullinger is a vivid one. Scholars, therefore, have been tempted to follow him in delineating the life and piety of Anabaptism. A comparison, however, shows that it contains scarcely any traits that had not been attributed to the Anabaptists by Bullinger's teacher Zwingli (q.v.). For both men the main accusation was one of separatism and sedition, and this disqualified the Anabaptists morally. Theologically the Anabaptist error was the ideal of a pure and stainless church, and accordingly the postulation of a "sinless" life. That in contrast to this demand their way of living was full of the most reprehensible conduct was stressed indefatigably by both Zwingli and Bullinger. The dependence of Bullinger on Zwingli goes so far that one could almost imagine a similarly vivid picture of the Anabaptists even if Bullinger never had seen any but had only read the anti-Anabaptist writings of Zwingli.

Also Bullinger's refutation of the Anabaptist position kept chiefly to Zwingli's arguments. His main interest was to defend the integrity of the "Volkskirche" against all divisive tendencies. It was only within such an over-all organization that he saw any guarantee of a possibility to preach the Gospel to all men, believers and nonbelievers. A small community consisting only of confessing Christians could not be a tool of the Almighty God who wanted to save all the world. To Bullinger's eyes it was hypocrisy. He supported his arguments by two fundamental ideas. The first was the invisibility of the true church: because all true believers are known only to God, all outward things, including church organization and discipline, can be delegated to the magistracy. The second idea was the incapability even of the Christian to obey the divine commands: lacking this prerequisite of all Christian ethics man nevertheless can do the will of God by following the less difficult Golden Rule or law of charity (neighborly love), a civic virtue sufficient to justify the name of "Christian." Especially this concept of a second, less rigorous, will of God was a key to refute all Anabaptist demands for a serious obedience to New Testament commands.

The influence of Bullinger's book reached far. In April 1531 it was used in dealing with Hans Pfistermeyer in Bern. Sebastian Franck (q.v.) published extracts in his Chronicle which appeared in September of the same year. Menno Simons knew Bullinger through Franck. In many letters Bullinger was asked to send the book to his friends. In 1535 it was translated into Latin and slightly supplemented by Bullinger's colleague Leo Jud: Adversus omnia Catabaptistarum prava dogmata . . . libri IIII per Leonem Judae aucti . . . and published in Zürich. In 1548 and 1551 three English translations (partly extracts?) appeared by the French refugee Jean Veron: (1) An Holesome Antidotus or Counterpoysen agaynst the pestylent heresye and secte of the Anabaptistes . . . (London, 1548); (2) A most necessary and fruteful Dialogue, betweene ye Seditious Libertin or rebel Anabaptist, and the true obedient Christian . . . (Worcester, 1551); (3) A most sure and strong defence of the baptisme of children, against ye pestiferous secte of the Anabaptistes (Worcester, 1551). A Dutch edition did not appear, but the necessity of such a translation was one of the occasions for Bullinger's second book against the Anabaptists (Der Widertouffern ursprung, q.v.). H.F.

Vondel, van den (van Vondel, van Vondelen, van den Vondellen), a Dutch family, originally from Antwerp, Belgium, where Joost van den Vondel joined the Mennonites. Because of persecution Joost like many others left Antwerp in 1582 with his wife, moving to Cologne, Germany, where at this time the Mennonites could live rather unmolested. Joost van den Vondel's wife died soon after and in 1585 he married Sara Cranen (Kraen, q.v.), also a Mennonite refugee from Antwerp who was living at Cologne. Joost and Sara had seven children; among them were Clementia, b. 1586, in 1607 married the widower Hans de Wolff of the Mennonite de Wolff (q.v.) family at Amsterdam; Joost (q.v.), b. 1587; Sara, b. 1595, in 1614 married the Mennonite grain merchant Joost Willemsz van Nijkercke (Nieukerck, q.v.) at Amsterdam; and Catharina, b. 1602, in 1624 married Jan Arisz Bruyninck of Amsterdam; Catharina joined the Catholic Church in 1644.

Joost van den Vondel and Sara Cranen lived at Cologne until 1595. Gradually conditions there had grown worse for the Mennonites and after Joost had been fined for "heresy" in 1595, he and his family left the town. Via Frankfort and Bremen, Germany, they moved to Utrecht, Netherlands, where they lived for nearly a year, settling at Amsterdam in 1596, where they started a silk shop in Warmoesstraat. Joost died in 1608. He may have been a member of the Amsterdam Flemish congregation; his wife Sara, d. 1637, was a faithful member of this congregation.

The suggestion has been made (A. J. Barnouw, Vondel, Haarlem, 1926, p. 3) that the Anabaptist martyr Joost (q.v.) de Hoedemaker, who suffered martyrdom at Antwerp in 1569, belonged to the same family, since both he and Joost van den Vondel (at Antwerp and Cologne) were hatters. Adriaen Vondel (Vervondel) was a preacher of the Mennonite church at Veere, Zeeland, in 1665. (For literature, see Vondel, Joost van den.) vdZ.

Vondel, Joost van den, b. Nov. 17, 1587, at Cologne, Germany, d. Feb. 5, 1679, at Amsterdam, Netherlands, the son of Joost van den Vondel of Antwerp and Sara Cranen (Kraen), operated a silk business at Amsterdam, at first with his mother, then independently until this business failed. In his old age he was a clerk in the city pawnshop of Amsterdam. In 1610 he married Maeyken de Wolff; they had four children, Joost (b. 1612), Anna (1613-72), Constantijn, and Saartje (the last two died at an early age). In 1641 Joost Jr. joined the Catholic Church with his father, and Anna also became a Catholic.

Joost van den Vondel is the greatest Dutch poet. His literary works, among which were a number of Biblical and historical plays in verse, are among the treasures of the Dutch literature.

Like his parents he was a Mennonite. He, however, did not join the Flemish church as they did, but the Waterlander congregation of Amsterdam. It is not clear why he preferred this branch of Mennonites, but it was probably because the Waterlanders were more open to culture and the arts than the Flemish. In 1616 he was chosen (by lot) as a deacon of the Amsterdam Waterlander congregation, serving until 1620, in this year taking leave because of "great unfitness because of his depression," as is said in the Memoriael by the Waterlander preacher Reynier Wybrands. It is not clear what this meant. Probably he was ill, suffering a depression of spirits; but it is also possible that the church did not approve of his connections with the literary clubs of that time (Rederijkers) or his Remonstrant (q.v.) leanings. In 1624 he wrote a sonnet for Anthoni Jacobsz Roscius (q.v.), a Waterlander preacher of Hoorn, who had suffered a tragic death. In 1626 during a conflict in the Amsterdam Waterlander congregation between Nittert Obbes (q.v.) and the other preachers of the church Vondel took the side of Obbes in his poem Antidotum, Tegen het vergift der Geestdryvers, Tot verdedighing van't beschreven woord Gods. About 1638 he composed the familiar laudatory inscription to Rembrandt's etching of Preacher Cornelis Claesz Anslo (q.v.). But after 1620 he had no special connections with the congregation and was gradually estranged from it. About 1641 he joined the Roman Catholic Church. The reason for this step is still a matter of discussion. A number of reasons may have co-operated in inducing him to this step. Among these reasons there certainly were a feeling of discomfort in the "divided church" and a longing for the unity of all Christians, the sparse furnishings of the Mennonite meetinghouses, and their sober worship services. Other factors were the influence of ecumenists like Hugo de Groot, and particularly of Catholic friends such as Plemp, and finally the propaganda of the Jesuits at Amsterdam, who in this period made a large number of converts including some Mennonites.

As there is no agreement as to the year in which Vondel actually joined the Catholic Church (Catholic authors usually assume it to have been 1639, but it was probably not until 1641), there is no agreement as to Vondel's Catholic mentality. Whereas Brom boldly claims that even as a Mennonite Vondel was "as Roman Catholic as an altar," Smit says, "His Mennonite conviction during his whole life remains the kernel of his religious attitude. Much that has been called pure Catholic in him is basically pure Mennonite. His famous tragedies show strong Mennonite characteristics." It is, according to Smit, notably the Waterlander piety which was continued, and which can be clearly shown in his later tragedies.

After Vondel had left the Mennonite Church he remained in contact with a number of them. For some Mennonite couples he composed nuptial hymns (this, however, was mostly hack work). Laudatory poems, nuptial poems, and poems of mourning were written by Vondel for members of the following Mennonite families: Anslo, Block, de Flines, Linnich, de Wolff, Leeuw, Looten, de Neufville, van Tongerlo(o), and de Vries. Among his Mennonite friends until his death were the Blocks, and especially Agnes Block, who was married first to Vondel's relative Joan de Wolff and then to Sybrand de Flines, both members of the Mennonite church. She visited him regularly, she contributed to his material needs, she comforted him in the loneliness of his old age; on a last visit shortly before his death, she spoke with him on death and eternity.

There are a number of editions of Vondel's literary works. At first the tragedies and other works were printed separately and some poems even on loose sheets. The last edition of his complete writings is an edition in ten volumes with an index, published at Amsterdam 1927-37. vdZ.

Of the numerous books and papers concerning Joost van den Vondel we mention only P. Leendertz Jr., Het leven van Vondel (Amsterdam, 1910); A. J. Barnouw, Vondel (Haarlem, 1926); J. M. F. Sterck, Het leven van Joost van den Vondel (Haarlem, 1926); G. Brom, Vondel's Beking (Amsterdam, 1907); B. H. Molkenboer, "Wanneer werd Vondel Katholiek?" in Vondelkroniek III, 1932; W. A. P. Smit, "Vondel en zijn Beking," in Nieuwe Taalgids XXIX (Groningen, 1935); G. Brom, "Vondel en Rembrandt," in Jaarboek van de Maatschappij voor Nederl. Letterkunde 1955-56 (Leiden, 1956); G. Brom, Vondels Geloof (Amsterdam, 1935).

Voogt (Voogd, Voocht), a Dutch family name. Jacob Jansen Voogt was a preacher of the Waterlander Mennonites at Leeuwarden in Friesland; in 1687 he was banished from the town under suspicion of Socinianism (q.v.), but this sentence was mitigated and Voogt was allowed to preach again on condition that his sermons be examined by a Reformed pastor before he preached them. This man is probably identical with the Jacob Janse Voocht who was a weaver at Amsterdam 1671-82 and was a leader of the "College" (see Collegiants) there.

The West Prussian Mennonite Vogt (q.v.) family is apparently not related to the Dutch Voogt family. Nor is there any connection between the Swiss, South German, and American Vogt family name and this Dutch name. vdZ.

Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 205; DB 1860, 60 f.; J. v. van Slec, De Rijsburger Collegianten (Haarlem, 1895) 165, 260, 357 f.; Reimer, Familiennamen, 120.

Voorburg-Rijswijk, two suburbs of The Hague, Netherlands, where there is a Mennonite Kring (circle), founded in 1948 as a part of the Hague congregation. Services are held monthly in the church of the Dutch Protestant Association at Voorburg. vdZ.

Voordt, van, a patrician family at Utrecht, Netherlands, members of which were Mennonites c1561. Mennonite meetings were held in the home of Cornelis van Voordt. Probably Cornelis was not a member of the church, though he was in sympathy with it. Anna, his wife, and Jan, his son, were baptized by Elder Dirk (q.v.) Philips shortly before Christmas of 1561 in a meeting held in his home. In February or March 1562 a meeting here was surprised by the police and a number of Mennonites were arrested and tried. Cornelis and his wife, who were not present when the meeting was surprised, were forever banished from Utrecht, Holland, and Zeeland, and their property was confiscated. Jan van der Voordt, who was apprehended, recanted and was probably released. Berghuys is of the opinion that the Jan van der Voort who was ordained as a preacher or elder of the Utrecht Mennonite congregation was identical with this Jan van Voordt. This is, however, doubtful, for he would have been about 75 years old in 1606. vdZ.

DB 1874, 7 f., 18-20, 24 f. et passim; (H. B. Berghuys), Geschiedenis der Doopsgez. gemeente te Utrecht (n.p., n.d.-1926) 26.

Voorhelm and its lateral branch Voorhelm Schneevo(o)gt, a Mennonite family at Haarlem in the 17th-19th centuries, now extinct. Dirk Voorhelm was a preacher of the Jan-Evertsvolk (q.v.) or Kruisstraat congregation, which had separated from the main Flemish body in 1680. In 1690 he was present at Nijmegen when Elder Jan ter Mehr (q.v.), of Crefeld, ordained some preachers and deacons. The years of Dirk Voorhelm's service are unknown. He published a funeral sermon for his co-preacher Matthijs van Dalen, Lyck-Reden . . . (Haarlem, n.d.-1707). Two of his sons, Dirk Voorhelm, d. 1764, and Pieter Voorhelm, served the same church as preachers from 1711 and 1715 respectively until 1747 when this congregation merged with the Vlaamsche Blok (q.v.) congregation on the Klein Heiligland, and then served the united congregation until 1764 and c1755. Both Dirk and Pieter were trustees of the Flemish Mennonite orphanage from 1732 and 1707. The Voorhelms at Haarlem were businessmen; in the 18th century they specialized in bulb raising.

A member of this family was Maria Voorhelm, of Haarlem. She was baptized in 1740 at a private meeting in the home of her parents by Pastor Johannes Deknatel (q.v.) of Amsterdam, into "the general Christian Church," i.e., not into a special branch or congregation. At first she worshiped with the Moravian Brethren (q.v., Herrnhuter) at Amsterdam; later she joined the Klein Heiligland Mennonite congregation at Haarlem. In 1742 she was married to J. H. Schneevogt, who was a partner in the bulb nursery of the Voorhelm family. Their descendants took the family name of Voorhelm Schneevogt. George Voorhelm Schneevogt, d. 1850, was a deacon at Haarlem 1808-d.50 and a trustee of the Haarlem Mennonite orphanage until 1837; his son Carel Godfried Voorhelm Schneevogt, d. Oct. 24, 1877, at Haarlem, bequeathed 1,000 guilders to the A.D.S., of which he had been a trustee 1856-77; this donation is still administered as the Schneevogt Fund. He was a deacon at Haarlem 1836-d.77. His brother Gustaaf Eduard Voorhelm Schneevogt (1814-71), who in his youth was educated in the Herrnhut school at Neuwied, was a physician and a pioneer for a better medical and social treatment of the insane. From 1851 he was a medical professor at the University of Amsterdam. vdZ.

Church records of Haarlem; De weeshuizen der Doopsgezinden te Haarlem 1634-1934 (Haarlem, 1934) 24, 31, 32, 90; DB 1863, 145; 1874, 16; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, Nos. 72 f.; J. W. Lütjeharms, Het Oecumenisch-philadelphisch streven der Herrnhutters (Zeist, 1935) 59, 143 f.; annual report of the A.D.S. 1878, 9, 14; N.N.B.Wb. IV, 1234 f.

Voornaemste Hooft-Ketteren, De: see Greuwel der vornahmsten Haupt-Ketzern.

Voorst, van, a Mennonite family, originally found at Emmerich, Germany, and from c1670 at Amsterdam, Holland. At Emmerich Hendrik van Voorst, a shopkeeper, was a preacher of the Mennonite church in the 17th century. On June 17-18, 1672, he was interrogated by Femundus Formantin (q.v.), a French Catholic theologian, who accompanied the French armies invading the Netherlands. The interesting discussion dealt with the Mennonite views on the Scriptures, baptism, marriage, adoration of the saints, the Incarnation, and the Holy Spirit. Van Voorst ably defended the Mennonite doctrines and Formantin was impressed by his answers. The result was that the Mennonites were not molested. In 1690 van Voorst was active in behalf of the Mennonite refugees from the Palatinate.

The first member of this family at Amsterdam was Ameldonck van Voorst, a native of Emmerich, who settled at Amsterdam as a medical doctor c1680. He was married in 1682 to Cecelia Verkolje, and a member of the Lamist Mennonite congregation. Paulus van Voorst, married to Christina Roeters, a member of the Lamist church and its deacon 1706-12 and 1718-24, and a trustee of the Collegiant (q.v.) Oranjeappel orphanage 1694-1706, was the treasurer of the Dutch Mennonite Committee for Foreign Needs c1715-35. Most members of this family at Amsterdam were Lamists; some, however, in the 18th century were Zonists (q.v.). The van Voorst family is found in Amsterdam until c1820. Hendrik van Voorst (q.v.) belonged to this family.

voZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1372, 1380, 1424, 1607, 1622, 2115, 2117, 2329, 2331; II, No. 2701; II, 2, Nos. 795, 861; DB 1873, 58-71; J. Rogge, Het Handelshuis van Eeghen (Amsterdam, 1948) 264 note.

Voorst, Hendrik van, b. 1750 at Amsterdam, d. Oct. 2, 1808, at Zaandam, a Dutch Mennonite pastor, trained for the ministry at the Amsterdam Lamist Mennonite seminary in 1774-78, serving in the Zaandam-Oost congregation 1779-d.1808. He was a man of learning, particularly in philosophy. Three of his papers were given awards by the Teyler (q.v.) Foundation at Haarlem and published in the Verhandelungen (essays) of this association. His descendants in the 19th century produced ship biscuits, flour, and rice at Zaandam. (Naamlijst 1808, 74.)

voZ.

Voort, van der (van Voort), a former Mennonite family at Utrecht, Netherlands; Jan van der Voort, who was ordained as a preacher or elder of the Utrecht Mennonite congregation in 1606, is thought to be identical with Jan van Voordt (q.v.), who was baptized at Utrecht in 1561 by Dirk Philips (q.v.). In 1618 he was still serving, in this year buying a house in the Jufferstraat (later called Springweg), which was remodeled into a meeting-house.

voZ.

(H. B. Berghuys), Geschiedenis der Doopsgez. gemeente te Utrecht (n.p., n.d.-1926) 26 f.

Vorarlberg, the westernmost province of Austria, situated between the upper Rhine and the Arlberg Pass; with Bregenz on Lake Constance as capital. The population is Alamannic, hence akin to the Swiss and the Swabians. In the 16th century the country was composed of four manorial jurisdictional districts (Herrschaften), and was administered politically by the provincial government in Tirol. It had, however, a top magistrate (Oberster Hauptmann) as local authority. Around 1580 this was Count Hannibal of Hohenembs, who played a role in Anabaptist history. In spite of the openness of the country to Switzerland and Swabia and its proximity to Tirol in the east, Anabaptism was never very active here, except for the brief period of 1577-90. Only three death sentences of Anabaptists are known: Melchior Platzer (q.v.) in 1583 and two cases as late as 1618, Jost Wilhelm and Christine Brünnerin, neither of whom had yet received adult baptism but declared themselves as Anabaptists nevertheless.

The center of Anabaptist activities was the area of the "Farther (Hinterer) Bregenzerwald" (q.v.), a rather remote district with the parish of Au on the Eck River as its main place. The local authorities were inclined by and large to leniency. In spite of the fact that some Anabaptists had several times broken their "oath" never to return, they did not suffer the ultimate penalty, even though the Innsbruck government urged greater harshness. But the Vorarlbergers more or less resented these Tirolean interferences and in most cases disregarded them.

A number of family names appear both in the court records of the time and in the Hutterite chronicle, such as Seyfried (or Seiffert), Mosbrugger (Mosbrucker), Sailer, Wilhelm, Albrecht, Rusch (Ruesch), Berwig, and Beer. A certain Jacob Seyfried was apparently the first to have been active as a "street corner preacher" and promoter of Anabaptist ideas (c1577). In spite of his "promise" to stay away he returned no less than three times to the Bregenzerwald district. In 1579 Archduke Ferdinand of Tirol ordered that he should be sentenced to death if he returned once more. (This was the rather short period when Hapsburgs were slightly more lenient in religious matters than ever before. Emperor Maximilian II, q.v., is said to have shown leanings toward Protestantism; he died 1576, and soon afterwards the full sway of the Counter Reformation came into play.) In 1580 Anabaptist books were confiscated and one year later publicly burned; their list was sent to Innsbruck.

Between 1580 and 1585 a lively emigration to Moravia set in, mainly from the parish of Au; the County Council of the "Hinterer Bregenzerwald" reported in 1581 that forty persons had already left and more were preparing for this transfer, selling their property as best they could. Time and again one reads in archive records of "suspect people," their secret meetings, and of sectarian books all over this district. Now and then one hears also of a few returnees who had been dissatisfied in Moravia "with food and drink," but they represent a small minority. Often it happens that Anabaptists are even supported by the lower magistrates of the "Herrschaft" as was also often the case in Tirol. Loserth names in particular a certain councilman Philipp Koler (of the Bregenzerwald court district) as such a sympathizer and helper.

The climax of Anabaptism in Vorarlberg happened around 1583; in this year the former apothecary of Rankweil, Vorarlberg, Melchior Platzer (q.v.), who had become a schoolmaster at a Bruderhof in Moravia, returned as a missionary and was said to have been most successful in winning new converts to the Anabaptist way. Eventually he was caught, imprisoned, and treated in the traditional way (tortured). Still, the authorities would have released him also if he had been willing to pledge never to return to country and county. As he refused to do so he was handed over to Count Hannibal of Hohenembs, who apparently wanted to please the Innsbruck authorities and approved the death sentence. After 26 weeks of imprisonment in chains he was executed by the sword in Rankweil, Nov. 6, 1583. He met his fate with the traditional Anabaptist attitude, singing and admonishing the assembled people to repentance. Hans Kräl, the bishop of the Hutterites in Moravia and himself a Tirolean, had previously sent him a very fine epistle of comfort and encouragement. An anonymous hymn of 29 stanzas tells the story of his martyrdom (Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, 756-60).

After this period of 1577-90 we hear only now and then of new happenings in this area concerning Anabaptism and migration to Moravia. The Seyfried (or Seiffert) family was the most active of all over a period of 36 years (1577-1613). Also the Wilhelm family deserves mention. Thomas Wilhelm of Au had become a Diener des Wortes (preacher) with the Hutterites in Moravia 1617, but somehow came into conflict with the brotherhood, moved to Alwinz (q.v.) in Transylvania, and finally was said to have ended somewhere in Switzerland. The records of 1613, 1617, and 1618 contain references to several men and women who recanted from their Anabaptist faith, admitting that their children or other members of their household had gone to Moravia to join the Hutterite brotherhood. (During all these years one hears of only one case where a brother went to Switzerland to join a congregation there.)

The year 1618, finally, saw the two last cases mentioned above: Christine Brünnerin (in court records named Brenner) of the village of Au wanted to join her daughter in Moravia, but was caught while preparing to emigrate. She was badly tortured yet remained steadfast. Contrary to the usual practice in Vorarlberg, she was sentenced to death and executed by the sword Aug. 8, 1618. "Although she had not yet received water baptism and had not yet come to the brotherhood, God gave her the strength to acquire the baptism of the Spirit and of blood which is more important" (Beck, 370).

The other case is that of Joss Wilhelm and his wife Elsa (nee Mosbrugger), "pious, God-fearing, and well-to-do people" (Beck, 368). Their son (was this the above-mentioned Thomas?) had been in Moravia long before and had told them of the true Christian life in the brotherhood, and also that life in the world was wrong and sinful. Thereupon the two prepared likewise to migrate from Vorarlberg to Moravia but were caught and kept in prison for more than one year. The Innsbruck government insisted on a trial at the court of Bregenz. Joss was severely racked but betrayed no one. Finally, on May 14, 1618, he, too, was executed by the sword. The Hutterite Chronicle reports that the question was raised at which place his body should be buried. The Catholic priest of Au is said to have decided, "Bury him in my churchyard; I have no more pious man in it" (Beck, 369). His wife was sentenced to life imprisonment and loss of all property. The Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder contains a hymn of 24 stanzas commemorating the martyrdom of these two witnesses to the faith (817-21).

The last name recorded is that of Hans Mosbrugger (possibly a brother of Elsa Wilhelm) who lived in Moravia in 1621. (See Bregenzerwald.)

LOSERTH, R.F.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, in particular the long footnote 283-86; Joseph Bergmann, "Die Wiedertäufer in Au im Bregenzerwald und ihre Auswanderung nach Mähren im Jahre 1585," in Sitzungsberichte der kaiserlichen Akademie der Wissenschaften I (Vienna, 1843); John Horsch, "Ein Geisteszeugnis aus den wehlosen Gemeinden des sechzehnten Jahrhunderts," Menn. Fam.-Kal. (Scottsdale) 1928, pp. 20-26; idem, "Ein Sendschreiben Hans Kräls an einen Märtyrer," ibid., 1914, 32-35; Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottsdale, 1914); J. Loserth, "Die letzten Züge der Wiedertäufer nach Mähren," Zeitschrift des Deutschen Vereins f.d. Gesch. von Mähren und Schlesien, 1922; ML IV.

Vorbereitungsschule: see Preparatory Schools.

Vormoser: see Vermoser.

Vorsänger, a title commonly used in German-speaking Mennonite churches in Europe and America to designate the leader of congregational singing: see Chorister.

Vorsterman, a former Mennonite family at Amsterdam, Holland, from c1620 until the 18th century, when it died out. A well-known member of this family was Jacob Vorsterman, d.1729, who was very active as a trustee and secretary and treasurer of the Dutch Mennonite Committee for Foreign Needs. With Herman Schijn (q.v.) and five other brethren he presented a petition in the name of the Dutch Mennonites to the Bernese government in behalf of the suppressed Swiss Mennonites in 1710. The great relief action for the Swiss refugees in 1710-13 was described by Vorsterman in his Relaas wegens het afvoeren der Doopsgezinden uit Zwitserland en het overbrengen van velen hunner in Nederland, which account is found in manuscript in the Amsterdam Mennonite archives. Jacob Vorsterman was four times a deacon of the Amsterdam Zonist (q.v.) congregation. His father Abraham Vorsterman had also been a deacon of this church. His son Abraham joined the Amsterdam Lamist congregation, of which he was a deacon 1743-49. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1211, 1272, 1275, 1294, 1348, 1360, 1364, 1366, 1392, 1432, 1885, 2251; Müller, Berner Täufer, 194; DB 1909, 136 note 7.

Vorwärts was a weekly eight-page periodical, published as a community German language newspaper at Hillsboro, Kan., 1910-40. The newspaper had its background in the Hillsboro Presse published by the Central Publishing Company, beginning in 1900, later called Hillsboro Journal (German). Under the editorship of Jacob G. Ewert (q.v.) the name of the periodical was changed to Vorwärts in 1910 and to Hillsboro Vorwärts in 1932. In 1913 the publishing interests of the Mennonite Brethren were moved from McPherson to Hillsboro. With the move A. L. Schellenberg (q.v.), editor of Zionsbote (q.v.) and Der Deutsche Westen (q.v.), took over the editorship of Vorwärts, continuing until August 1919 and again 1922-30. By 1919 the periodical had 5,500 subscribers in and around Hillsboro as well as among Mennonite Brethren generally. J. D. Fast served as editor 1919-22, and during the final ten years P. H. Berg took over editorial duties. In the latter thirties an increasing amount of space was given to the English language and early in 1940 the name was changed to Hillsboro Journal (q.v.). J.F.S.

T. R. Schellenberg, "Editor Abraham L. Schellenberg," Menn. Life IX (January 1954).

Vorwärts-Kalender, a German yearly almanac, 64-160 pages of informative articles, poetry, and advertising, was issued by the Mennonite Brethren Publishing House 1925-42. It was offered as a premium to Vorwärts subscribers and was sold for 25 cents per issue. O.H.A.

Vos, a common Dutch family name, both Mennonite and non-Mennonite; in a number of congregations there are members by this name belonging to several unrelated families. Mennonite ministers by this name were Willem Vos, preacher of the Haarlem Peuzelaarsteeg congregation 1705-50, Klaas Pietersz Vos, preacher at Monnikendam in the early 18th century, Marcus Vos, preacher of the Groningen Old Flemish congregation at Zaandam 1757-74, and Karel Vos (q.v.). vdZ.

Vos, de, a common Dutch family name. Mennonites by this name were formerly found at Rotterdam, Amsterdam, Haarlem, and Hamburg-Altona. The relationship between these families could not be ascertained. At Rotterdam Anthoni de Vos was a deacon of the Flemish congregation in 1688-90. Apionie de Vos was a preacher of the Lamist (q.v.) congregation of Amsterdam in 1687-95. There was a de Vos family in the Amsterdam Zonist (q.v.) congregation in the 17th and 18th centuries. Not related to this Zonist family was a Lamist de Vos family at Amsterdam, of which Jacobus de Vos, of Haarlem, married there c1690 to Catharina van de Rijp, was probably a member. Among these de Voses some living at Amsterdam were important in the Mennonite church as well as in the Dutch business and cultural life. (1) Jacob(us) de Vos, who conducted an insurance business (first De Vos en Sanders, now De Vos en Zoonen); his son (2) Jacob de Vos (1735-1833), unmarried, manager of the insurance business, noted connoisseur of art, proprietor of an art collection, which after his death was sold for 121,500 guilders; (3) Willem de Vos (q.v.), also a son of (1), a Mennonite pastor (4) Jacob de Vos, son of (3), Amsterdam, 1774-Bloemendaal, 1844, who studied Latin and Greek, but later became a partner in the insurance company of his uncle (2) Jacob; he was interested in the arts (he designed the commemorative medal issued by the A.D.S. in 1835 for the centennial of the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary), a trustee of the A.D.S., and in 1815-19 a deacon of the Amsterdam congregation, as were some of his descendants. At Haarlem the Mennonite Willem de Vos promoted Collegiant (q.v.) principles; in 1710-43 he often addressed the yearly Collegiant meetings held at Rijsburg (q.v.).

For the Hamburg de Vos family see Voss, de.

vdZ.

Church records of Amsterdam; N.N.B.Wb. X, 1137; DJ 1850, 170 note; J. C. van Slee, De Rijsburger Collegianten (Haarlem, 1895) 187.

Vos, Karel, b. Aug. 22, 1874, at Rotterdam, d. May 30, 1926, at Middelstum, a Dutch Mennonite pastor and outstanding historian. He was a son of Jan M. Vos, a (non-Mennonite) schoolteacher at Rotterdam, and Wilhemina Wijbrands (Mennonite). The pastors and historians Aem. W. Wijbrands (q.v.) and C. N. Wijbrands (q.v.) were his uncles, and W. J. Kühler (q.v.) was his cousin.

Vos was trained for the ministry at the Amsterdam University and the Mennonite seminary. He only served two small congregations—Woudsend 1903-11 and Middelstum 1911-d.26. This enabled him to devote himself to the study of theological problems and particularly to the study of the history of the Dutch Mennonites, to which he was stimulated by S. Cramer, his professor in Mennonite history in Amsterdam. His most important work in this field is his book Menno Simons 1496-1561. Zijn leven en werken en zijne Reformatorische Denkbeelden (Leiden, 1914). For this book, the first up-to-date biography of this great leader, he did painstaking work. One of the results was that the years of birth and death of Menno could with great probability be fixed at 1496 and 1561.

Besides this book Vos published a large number of papers in De Zondagsbode and Doopsgezinde Bijdragen: "Jan Jansz Schot" (1905), "De Doopsgezinden te Ouddorp-Goedereede" (1907), "De Doopsgezinden te Middelharnis-Sommelsdijk" (1908), "De Doopsgezinden te Schiedam" (1909), "De doop bij overstorting" (1911), "Jaartallen uit het leven van Menno Simons" (1912), "Kleine bijdragen over de Doopersche beweging in Nederland tot het optreden van Menno Simons" (1917); in De Gids he published "Reyer Anso's Overgang" (1906), "Rembrandt's Geloof" (1909), and "Revolutionnaire Hervorming" (1920); some of his publications in Nederlandsch Archief voor Kerkgeschiedenis were "De copia der Outsten" (1911), "Meyndert van Emden" (also 1911), "Anabaptisten te Ahaus" (1914), "De Avondmaalsbediening bij de Doopsgezinden" (1915); in Groningsche Volksalmanak are found "Menno Simons in Groningen" and "Claas Ganglofs" (both 1919), "Brief over den watersnood in 1717" and "Doopsgezinde families onder Middelstum" (both 1921); "De Dooplijst van Leenaert Bouwens" is found in Bijdr. en Mededeelingen v. h. Hist. Genootschap (XXXVI, 1915), "De Doopsgezinden te Antwerpen" in Bulletin de la Commission Royale d'Histoire de Belgique (vol. LXXXIV, 1920). In the great historical survey (2 vols.) Rotterdam in den loop der Eeuwen (Rotterdam, 1907) he published in Vol. II a chapter on "De Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinde Gemeente te Rotterdam" (also separate edition). For the "Geschriftjes t. b. v. de Doopsgezinden in de Verstrooiing" he wrote Nos. 28, Onze Doopsgezinde Sociëteiten; 29, Oranje en de Doopsgezinden; 33, Adam Pastor; 43, Twee brieven van Menno Simons; 44, Balthasar Hubmaier; and 47, De Avondmaalsbediening bij de Doopsgezinden. His last work was an address for the Centennial of the Groningen Conference, but because of bad health he could not attend the meeting; the paper was read by N. van der Zijpp and after Vos's death a few days later, edited by him under the title Het Honderdjarig bestaan der Sociëteit van Doopsgezinde Ge- meenten in Groningen en Oost-Friesland (Groningen, 1926).

Vos also published Levensbericht van C. N. Wijbrands (Leiden, 1914), Aanteekeningen voor de Doop-catechisatie (n.p., n.d.), a number of pamphlets on theological and social subjects, and a few sermons. Outstanding Dutch newspapers like the Handelsblad and the Nieuwe Rotterdammer Courant published articles of his. Vos also made the index for both the Bibliotheca (q.v.) Reformatoria Neerlandica (1910) and Doopsgezinde (q.v.) Bijdragen (1912).

Vos was a man of radical liberal conviction; this view also influenced his conception of the history of the Mennonites. He was of the opinion that the revolutionary principles as found among the Münsterites (q.v.) were dominant among the Dutch Anabaptists at least until 1540 and that peaceful views and practices were very scarce in Dutch Anabaptism until that date. This conception was opposed by W. J. Kühler, John Horsch, Cornelius Krahn, and N. van der Zijpp. A. F. Mellink, however, in De Wederdopers in de Noordelijke Nederlanden 1531-44 (Groningen, 1954) carried forward Vos's theory.

Vos's scholarly qualities are great. During his lifetime his merits were highly esteemed, and he was appointed member of a number of Dutch historical societies and associations. After his death he was commemorated in the Zondagsbode, in Doopsgezinde Jaarboekje 1927, 21-23 (with portrait), in Groningsche Volksalmanak 1927, and in Levensberichten van de Maatschappij voor Nederl. Letterkunde 1928.

vdZ.

Vos, Willem de, b. 1737 at Amsterdam, d. there Jan. 8, 1823, married to Elizabeth Kops in 1766, a member of the above de Vos family, was a Dutch Mennonite pastor. It is not known how or where he was trained for the ministry, but it is certain that he received a good education, including a Th.D. degree. In 1759-62 he was pastor of the Mennonite congregation of Haarlem and from 1762 of the Lamist church, and after the merger (1801), of the United Mennonite congregation at Amsterdam, until he retired in 1814. He was a cofounder of the A.D.S. (q.v.) in 1811, and its first moderator 1811-12. He also acted as curator of its seminary. He promoted the merger of the Amsterdam Lamist and Zonist churches, which came about in 1801. Willem de Vos was a man of great learning, specializing in philosophy. His studies on (a) "De Grondregel der Protestanten . . . om in zaken van den godsdienst voor zich zelve te oordeelen," (b) "In hoeverre Jezus en zijne apostelen . . . zich naar de toen heerschende volksbegrippen hebben geschikt," and (c) "De genoegzaamheid van het inwendig bewijs voor de goddelijkheid der Evangelie-leer" (these essays are also known under somewhat modified titles) were given awards by the Teyler (q.v.) Foundation at Haarlem and published in its Verhandelingen, vols. IX (1789), XI (1791), and XV (1795). De Vos wrote an appreciative sketch of his colleague Allard Hulshoff (q.v.), d.1795, in Leven en Character van A. H. (Amsterdam, 1795). In 1786 he taught philosophy and religion in the Mennonite seminary.

He was a member of a number of learned societies, for which he sometimes delivered addresses on religious and timely subjects.

vdZ.

N.N.B.Wb. X, 1137 f.; Naamlijst 1829, 24; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 692, 697, 2505 f.; DJ 1840, 112; 1850, 113, 122, 143, 170, note 1; DB 1863, 16; 1898, 13, 20, 26, 32.

Vosges (France) Mennonite Church (called Darney, q.v., 1933-41) is one of the oldest Mennonite congregations in the French-speaking part of France, having always consisted of widely scattered farm families living west of the Vosges Mts., with the city of Epinal as the approximate center. During most of its history the meetings have been held in rotation in the homes. Before 1766 Mennonites were living in the mountainous area around Donon in the northeast of the Vosges Department. From here they moved westward, being joined by some families from the Markirch (q.v., Ste-Marie-aux-Mines) area. Others came later from the region of Zweibrücken and Saarguemines. The original families all spoke German, but by 1869 the language had become French. One of the alert elders, named Schweitzer of Goncourt, joined with the elder André Rediger of the Haute Marne congregation in 1869 in providing a French translation of the Zweibrücken (Elbing-Waldeck) catechism.

Because of intermarriage with Catholics, emigration to America, and moving westward in France into the Haute Marne area the congregation gradually grew smaller, so that in the 1930's the baptized membership was not more than 15, and the congregation held no services during the winter from November to March. Among the known elders' names were Hans Roger c1820-68, Joseph Schweitzer 1843-96, Jean Kremer 1894-1909, Nicholas Kremer 1898- , Joseph Kislig 1914- . In 1957 the congregation had some 45 members including unbaptized children, and met only once a month in private homes. Elder Kislig had retired, and the active minister was Jean Abresol.

H.S.B.

P. Sommer, "Assemblée des Vosges (Darney)," Christ Seul, August 1930, 5-9.

Voss, de, a former Mennonite family at Hamburg-Altona, Germany. In the 16th and 17th centuries the name was usually de Vos, like that of the Dutch de Vos family. In Hamburg a Willem de Vos is found as early as 1569. Gysbert and Gilbert de Vos, probably his sons, lived here in 1605. They certainly were immigrants from Flanders, Belgium, and relatives of Jan de Vos, b. c1550, who was burgomaster of Hondschooten in Flanders, and whose son Pieter de Vos, b. c1590, joined the Reformed and emigrated to Colchester, England. In 1627 Pieter (or Peter) de Vos was at Amsterdam and soon after he lived at Hamburg; by a privilege granted c1639 by Otto, Count of Schauenburg, he became the founder of Hamburg's big industry and of the considerable wealth of the de Voss family. He conducted a number of businesses at the same time, among which was a brewery operated for two centuries by members of the de Voss family; he and his descendants were also engaged in Greenland whaling. His son Abraham de Vos (1627-82), a merchant and businessman like his father, who apparently was baptized into the Baptist Church at Colchester, joined the Dompelaars (q.v.) at Hamburg in 1656 and became a preacher for this group. A few other de Vosses left the Mennonite congregation to join this group with him. Most of the family, however, remained Mennonite and until the 19th century many served as deacons. Jan Janssen de Voss, d. 1716, a deacon from 1706, was a preacher of the Hamburg Mennonite congregation 1712-d.16. Pieter de Vos Pz was an assistant pastor in 1727. Adriana de Voss, who emigrated to Germantown in 1700 with her husband, Harmen Karsdorp, and their children, may have been a member of this family. vbZ.

"Geslachtsregister der de Vossen," manuscript, by Gysbert van der Smissen in the 18th century; B. C. Roosen, Geschichte der Mennoniten-Gemeinde zu Hamburg und Altona I (Hamburg, 1886) 8, 9, 31, 40, 43, 47, 63, 66, 72; II (Hamburg, 1887) 6, 7, 8, 11, 84, 85; MQR VII (1933) 236.

Vossen, Arnold van (d. after 1708), a Mennonite immigrant from Hamburg, Germany, who arrived at Philadelphia, Pa., in 1700, joined the Germantown Mennonite Church. After some difficulty with van Vossen, Hans Neuss (Nice), the preacher of this congregation, left the church. Van Vossen may have been a member of the de Voss (q.v.) family of Hamburg-Altona. In 1702 he gave the land for the building of the Germantown meetinghouse. vbZ.

C. Henry Smith, The Mennonite Immigration in Pennsylvania (Norristown, Pa., 1929) 95, 96, 97, 104, 115; MQR VII (1933) 236; ML III, 424.

Vossenholius, Adrianus, a theologian and an opponent of the Mennonites whom he attacked in Dialogus. Ein Göttlich und Christlich Gespreck mit den Wedderdöperen . . . gehalten (Hamburg, 1575). This book, translated from Dutch into German, does not contain any valuable information. (Catalogus Amst., 101.) vbZ.

Voth (also Vooth, Voodt, Vodt, Voht, Voet, Vogt, Foht, Foth, Fogt, Fodt, Foot, a Mennonite family name, rather common among the former Prussian Mennonites, found there by 1630, in Danzig by 1677, but chiefly in the congregations of Montau-Gruppe, Schönsee, Jeziorka, Tragheimerweide, and Danzig. Hans Voth (Voet), a deacon or a preacher in Lithuania (q.v.), was expelled from there and emigrated to Walcheren (q.v.) in the Netherlands in 1733. Returning c1738 he again settled in Lithuania, for in the Naamlijst of 1743 he is mentioned as an elder of the Waterlanders (this means Frisians) in Lithuania. He died about 1753. Gillis and his brother Heinrich Voet were also expelled from Lithuania and living at Walcheren about the same time as Hans Voet. Not identical with the former Hans is the Hans Voet of Schönsee, who was before 1719 a preacher of the Groningen Old Flemish congregation at Przechovka-Konopat in West Prussia, and who visited Holland in 1726 to inform the Dutch Committee for Foreign Needs at Amsterdam concerning the situation in the territory of Culm (q.v.). In his letters of July 24 and Sept. 9, 1732, and March 16, 1735, he reported about the harsh measures of the Catholic bishop of Culm against the Mennonites. He was still serving in 1758, but by 1760 he had died.

Andreas Voth was a preacher of Jeziorka 1754-c88 and from 1765 of Brenkenhoffswalde (q.v.), as were Ernst Voth from 1762 and Cornelius Voth 1792, both serving until after 1802. The following ministers are named in the German Namensverzeichnisse and the Jahrbuch by Mannhardt: Peter Voth (1795-1850), of Komrau, 1826 preacher, 1830-d.50 elder of Montau-Gruppe, Heinrich Voth, preacher of Obernessau from 1875, and another Heinrich Voth, elder of the Lithuania congregation from 1882.

Whether the Prussian Voth-Foth family descended from a Dutch-Flemish Voogt family, or from a Swiss Vogt family, is doubtful. Vogt was a family name found among the early Swiss Anabaptists. Hans Vogt, of Villingen, canton of Aargau, attended the third Anabaptist disputation at Bern.

A number of Voths (also Vogt) emigrated from Prussia to Russia. Here David Voth was a deacon of the Gnadenfeld congregation as early as 1814, and Peter Voth a preacher of the Alexanderwohl church from 1848. Andreas Voth (q.v.), born in West Prussia, was a prominent M.B. educator in the Molotschna. Elder Heinrich Voth was ordained in 1925 to serve the Zagradovka Mennonite Church, and was the only Mennonite elder known to have survived the tribulation of the years since then and has been active in the post-Stalin period in ministering to the scattered Mennonite groups all over Russia. From Russia and Poland the name was transplanted to North and South America. H. R. Voth (q.v.) was a prominent missionary (GCM) to the Indians. Heinrich Voth (q.v.) and his two sons John and Henry S. Voth (q.v.) were prominent M.B. ministers and leaders. J. W. Vogt was for many years pastor of the Hillsboro Mennonite Brethren Church, then principal of the Corn (Okla.) Bible Academy, and more recently pastor of the M.B. Church at Neuwied, Germany. Other M.B. ministers bearing the name are Herman Voth, leader of the East Aldergrove (B.C.) Church, and D. Vogt, assistant leader at Fraserview, Vancouver, B.C. John J. Voth has served Bethel College and other institutions. Dr. Harold Vogt is on the staff of Prairie View Hospital. vbZ.

A. A. Toews, Mennonitische Märtyrer I (N. Clearbrook, 1949); Reimer, Familiennamen; Unruh, Hintergründe; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1114, 1596, 1621, 1661, 2012, 2033, 2061, 2108; II, No. 2636; II, 2, Nos. 738, 763, 779, 784; "Bezoekreis van H. B. Hulshoff," in Bijdr. en Mededeelingen v.h. hist. genootschap LIX (1938).

Voth, Andreas (1821-85), an M.B. educator in Russia, was born at Brenkenhoffswalde, West Prussia, Germany, emigrated to Russia with his parents in 1834 and settled in Gnadenfeld in the Molotschna Mennonite settlement. Voth had a better than ordinary education, with Wilhelm and Friedrich Lange (q.v.) and Heinrich Franz (q.v.) as his teachers. He served as a village teacher at Pastwa and Halbstadt. In 1853 he left teaching to enter business, but though he was not very successful in business and was burdened by it, he still spent much of his time and energy sacrificially. He rejected the office of minister, feeling himself unworthy of it, but served as a deacon. Voth possessed special gifts for mediation. He mediated between the ministers and teachers, between teachers and Russian officials, and between the Mennonite body and the Russian government. In all circles he enjoyed respect and confidence. His service as chairman of the Molotschna school board 1871-83 was very fruitful. He created a fund of 2,000 rubles for promising young men who wanted to prepare for teaching. Under his leadership the entire school system was reformed. The Halbstadt Zentralschule added a two-year pedagogical course for village teachers, followed later by other Zentralschulen. Voth founded the first secondary school for girls in his own home and at his own risk. He also played an essential role in revitalizing the teachers' conferences. When he retired from the board the Molotschna settlement and its subsidiaries had a unified program of instruction. In 1877 the Russian government gave him a medal in recognition of his educational work. Unfortunately, in his good nature, Voth allowed himself to be used as a tool by the wealthier landowners to try to secure special favors for them from the government at St. Petersburg. For this he was severely censured by the government minister. He vowed that he would never again act in that capacity. In consequence these men abandoned him, disregarding the great sacrifices he had made. He died on June 17, 1885, an economically ruined man. He had laid the foundations upon which Klett (q.v.) and Heese (q.v.) were able to build the educational system to new heights. A.B.

Peter Braun, "Der Molotschnaer Mennoniten Schulrat"; Friesen, Brüderschaft, 494, 646, 648; ML IV.

Voth, Heinrich (1851-1918), an elder and outstanding leader of the Mennonite Brethren Church, was born in the village of Gnadenheim, province of Taurida, South Russia, on Feb. 19, 1851, the third of the seven children of Heinrich and Helena (Fast) Voth. On June 12, 1873, he married Sarah Kornelsen. Nine children grew to adulthood. He taught in the Mennonite village school at Klippenfeld two years. During this time Voth was converted and had a deep religious experience, and a remarkable revival also occurred in his school. In 1876 the family emigrated to America, establishing a home on a farm near Bingham Lake, Minn. In June 1877 he joined the M.B. Church and immediately became an active member. At first he led the Sunday school, then he was elected to the ministry and in 1885 was ordained elder. He served as minister and pastor of the Bingham Lake M.B. Church about 40 years. During this time the congregation grew into one of the largest and most influential of the M.B. Church.

Elder Voth was active in the Mennonite Brethren Conference in many ways, attending every general conference from its beginning until his death. He traveled much as an evangelist and as itinerating preacher, holding meetings in all the M.B. churches. He had a thorough knowledge of the Scriptures and gave valuable Bible addresses. He served the M.B. General Conference on various committees; he was chairman of the Board of Foreign Missions in 1909-18. He served as moderator of the General Conference 14 years and as moderator of the Central District Conference 15 years. His oldest son, Henry S. Voth (q.v.), became a noted evangelist and pastor of the M.B. Church and a leading man in its conference activities, and his son John H. Voth served as an M.B. missionary to India for 34 years. In March 1918, the Voths moved to Vanderhuf, B.C., where he died Nov. 26, 1918. Interment was at Winkler, Man. J.H.L.

Voth, Heinrich S. (1878-1953), an outstanding Mennonite Brethren evangelist and leader, was born Jan. 28, 1878, near Bingham Lake, Cottonwood Co., Minn., the oldest son of Elder Heinrich Voth. His father was the leader of the local M.B. church and also a teacher. Heinrich S. Voth completed his secondary education in 1896. He taught public school in 1899 at Langdon, N.D. In 1900-1 he was engaged in colportage; he attended McPherson College, McPherson, Kan., in 1901-2, and in 1902 he was designated by the M.B. Church of North America to serve as evangelist, which position he held until 1908. On Aug. 28, 1904, he was married to Susie Warkentin, daughter of Johann Warkentin of Winkler, Man. On Dec. 5, 1908, he was ordained as minister in the M.B. Church of Winkler. He then served as pastor of the M.B. churches of Dallas and Portland, Ore., during 1909-16. He resumed his position as evangelist in 1916-20, following which he settled on a farm near Winkler and served as minister to this church. In 1931 he accepted the pastorate of the M.B. Church of Winkler, Man., and served in this capacity for 20 years.

Voth served on numerous committees during his most active life, a few of which will be mentioned here. He was vice-chairman of the M.B. General Conference in 1924-36, 1939, 1943, 1945-48. He was a member of the Board of Foreign Missions 1927-53, serving either as vice-president or secretary. He was a member of the General Conference Board of Education 1930-36 and member of the Board of Welfare of the General Conference 1930-43. He also served as Board chairman of the South Side Mission in Minneapolis, Minn., 1921-36. He served as chairman of the annual Northern District (Canadian) Conference for 18 years.

H. S. Voth was a man of breadth and force, with keen insight and tact in dealing with social problems. A characteristic phrase, "O Herr hilf, O Herr lass wohlgelingen," will linger long in the ears of those who knew him well. He died on Oct. 23, 1953. A.V.

Voth, Henry R. (1855-1931), a Mennonite (GCM) minister, missionary, anthropologist, and home mission worker, was born April 15, 1855, in South Russia. He came to America in 1874 and after teaching school the first winter entered the Wadsworth School (q.v.) in Ohio in preparation for mission work. He later attended the theological seminary of the Evangelical Synod of North America at Marthasville, Mo. After a short medical course in St. Louis he was sent to Darlington (q.v.), Indian Territory, to work among the Cheyenne (q.v.) and Arapaho (q.v.) Indians. His wife, Barbara Baer, whom he married in 1884, died there in 1889. In 1892 he was sent to Arizona (q.v.), to open a new mission field among the Hopi (q.v.) Indians. His second wife, Martha Moser of Dalton, Ohio, died in Arizona in 1901.

During his nine years in Arizona, Voth developed an intimate acquaintance with the Hopi Indians, collecting much original material relative to Indian religious life and folklore which was later displayed in the Field Museum, Chicago. He collaborated with George A. Dorsey in certain studies of the Hopis. He also wrote a number of original monographs published in the Anthropological Series of the Field Columbian Museum. Ed. G. Kaufman lists the following publications written by Voth and published in this series: (1) Brief Miscellaneous Hopi Papers, 1912, vol. XI, No. 2; (2) Hopi Proper Names, 1905, vol. VI, No. 3; (3) The Oraibi Marau Ceremony, 1912, vol. XI, No. 1; (4) Oraibi Natal Customs and Ceremonies, 1905, vol. VI, No. 2; (5) The Oraibi Oaquoel Ceremony, 1903, vol. VI, No. 1; (6) The Oraibi Powamu Ceremony, 1901, vol. III, No. 2; (7) The Oraibi Summer Snake Ceremony, 1903, vol. III, No. 4; (8) The Traditions of the Hopi, 1915, vol. VIII; (9) H. R. Voth joint author with G. A. Dorsey, The Mishongnovi Ceremonies of Snake and Antelope Fraternities, 1901, vol. III, No. 3; (10) Voth & Dorsey, The Oraibi Soyal Ceremony, 1901, vol. III, No. 1.

On leaving Arizona Voth served as home mission worker in the Western District Conference, giving much of his time to new congregations in Oklahoma. In 1906 he married Katie Herschler of Perry, Okla. In 1914-27 he served the congregations of Goltry and Gotebo, Okla. In 1927 he retired to Newton, where he died June 2, 1931.

Voth was president of the Mennonite Historical Association (q.v.) 1914-30. His interest in collecting historical items and in studying Indian language and folklore is reflected in the extensive H. R. Voth Collection in the Bethel College Historical Library. This collection contains his manuscript studies in the Arapaho language, and studies in Hopi ceremonial rites and folklore, in addition to a Hopi dictionary. J.F.S.

Ed. G. Kaufman, The Development of the Missionary and Philanthropic Interest Among the Mennonites of North America (Berne, 1931); The Mennonite, June 25, 1931.

Voth, Johann W., was born Jan. 27, 1863, the son of Elder W. Voth. He was a farmer. In 1907 he was elected minister of the Nikolaifeld Church in Zagradovka (q.v.), South Russia, and as elder upon Martens' resignation in 1908. He was well-intentioned but not a leader. In 1921 he had to resign as elder and minister, and lived quietly in retirement. Nothing is known of the end of his life. (G. J. Lohrenz, Sagradovka, Rosthern, 1947, p. 76.) G.L.

Voth, John Homer (1879-1943), an evangelist and foreign missionary of the Mennonite Brethren Church, was born on a farm near Bingham Lake, Minn., Dec. 23, 1879, the third of the nine children of Heinrich and Sarah (Kornelsen) Voth. He attended high school at Windom, Minn. At 15 he was converted and baptized and joined the Bingham Lake M.B. Church of which his father was elder. Voth began to teach in rural schools at 17 and continued this several years. In 1901 he came to McPherson, Kan., where for a number of years he attended the German Department School of the

M.B. Church. For three years he studied at the German Baptist Theological Seminary, Rochester, N.Y., where he was graduated. In 1918 Tabor College conferred on him the A.B. degree. On Aug. 18, 1907, Voth married Maria Epp. Of their eight children, two sons died in infancy and one while in service during World War II. In 1905-7 Voth did considerable evangelistic work in the M.B. Conference. He was ordained as a missionary to India by the M.B. Foreign Mission Board and left for this field in 1908.

Voth rendered valuable and effective services as itinerating missionary of the M.B. Mission among the Telugus in the Hyderabad State of India. He erected most of the buildings on the Devarakonda Station. He was successful in winning converts, training indigenous workers, and establishing churches. He began the monthly Telugu paper, "Suvarthamani," in 1920, which became the organ of the Andhra M.B. Church. When he finally left India in 1942 after a period of 34 years' service, there were 17 M.B. churches with a total of more than 3,000 members in the Devarakonda field.

Through his extensive writing for the Zionsbote and through his aggressive itineraries while on furlough, he created much interest for the cause of foreign missions in the M.B. Conference. In the summer of 1942 he and his wife returned to America and established their home at Tulsa, Okla. Here he died July 29, 1943. Interment was at Mountain Lake, Minn. J.H.L.

Voth, Tobias (1791-?), a pioneer educator among the Mennonites of Russia, was born July 16, 1791, at Brenkenhoffswalde (q.v.) near Driesen, Mark Brandenburg, Germany, where his father was a minister. He attended the local school under teachers who had studied in Leipzig and Berlin. At the age of sixteen he became a teacher of the local school, which position he held for five years. After passing a teachers' examination he taught at Soldin, where he married a Lutheran girl. In 1812 he accepted a school in Königsberg in Neumark. In 1818 he reported in his diary that he and his wife were converted through Jung-Stilling's writings, and then had fellowship with other Pietists. For two years he taught at Graudenz. In 1822 he went to the Molotschna to teach in the Ohrloff (q.v.) Zentralschule, where he also sponsored reading and mission circles. This school was sponsored by the Agricultural Association (q.v.), of which Johann Cornies (q.v.) was the chairman. Because of a disagreement with Cornies, Voth resigned after seven years of teaching and went to Schönwiese near Chortitza, where he taught for a number of years in a private secondary school. After this he taught in a secondary school at Steinbach, Molotschna. He died in Berdyansk. He was a gifted pioneer educator but did not find enough response and appreciation for his talents and as a result suffered many privations. C.K.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 78-79, 569-77; H. Götz, Die Molotschnaer Ansiedlung (Steinbach, 1950) 102-3.

Voth, Wilhelm (1832-1914), a Russian Mennonite elder, was born Dec. 23, 1832, in the Molotschna Mennonite settlement in South Russia, and moved to Zagradovka in 1872. Voth was poor, sickly, had a large family, was meagerly educated, but was a great reader, keen observer, and possessed great will power; he took a keen interest in all that took place in Mennonite circles. The new settlement at Zagradovka, comprising several thousand souls, had no ordained minister. In 1872 Voth and a few others were elected to preach. On June 2, 1874, the new congregation was formally organized; Voth was elected and ordained on the same day to serve as elder. It required leadership, courage, and wisdom to form this heterogeneous mass into a congregation. A meetinghouse, costing 7,000 rubles, was built in the village of Nikolaifeld and dedicated on May 5, 1891. With the organization of the large congregation and the construction of the church Voth's main work was done. His failing health forced him to resign as elder in May 1895. He died Aug. 20, 1914.

G.L.

G. J. Lohrenz, Sagradowka (Rosthern, 1947) 64; Friesen, Brüderschaft, 720.

Voting in governmental elections was long restricted by property qualifications and other requirements, so that full universal and democratic male suffrage was a late development in the Western World. In the United States it came into general acceptance c1825-40, in western continental Europe somewhat later, and in eastern Europe much later. Anabaptists as a nontolerated group or as refugee noncitizens would scarcely ever have had the privilege of voting. Most Mennonites in Europe, by the time they legally had the right to vote, were sufficiently assimilated into the prevailing culture, or had dropped the original Anabaptist doctrines of nonparticipation in the magistracy and nonresistance, to the extent that they felt no obstacle in their faith or principles to voting. In some other places full citizenship, including the right to hold office, was not granted Mennonites until quite late, in West Prussia not until 1867, and here it was conditioned upon acceptance of military service as a universal obligation.

In the New World with its freedoms, Mennonites from the outset have had the right to vote, subject to the same qualifications required of others. The only exception was when temporarily during World War I the Canadian government suspended the right to vote for all groups officially standing for nonresistance. This action was quickly rescinded at the end of the war.

American Mennonites themselves have generally exercised their right of suffrage, including even very conservative groups like the Old Order Amish. It is claimed that the Mennonites in Colonial Pennsylvania, along with other nonresistant German groups, helped to keep the Quaker Assembly in power years after it would otherwise have lost at the polls. Only in recent times have some more conservative individuals concluded that they should not vote because it presumably involved them in the support of men in offices which they themselves could not occupy. Some have also felt that the doctrine of separation of church and state, or even of separation from the world, required abstinence from voting. However, there is no record of any group or conference action prohibiting voting, although sentiment in some areas has become so strong on the point, especially in the Mennonite Church (MC), as to greatly reduce the number of Mennonite voters. Resolutions have been passed, however, discouraging or forbidding "electioneering," or "taking part in politics." It must be remembered of course that the percentage of voting in general in America is relatively low, often less than half of the qualified voters, and even in presidential elections seldom more than 50 per cent. Sentiment against voting becomes particularly strong in times of national stress and war or danger of war.

In areas of concentrated Mennonite population, Mennonite votes have been important, and Mennonites have been traditionally attached to one political party. In Canada most Mennonites were long thought to be supporters of the Liberal Party. In some areas, Iowa for instance, the Amish usually voted democratic. In other areas such as eastern Pennsylvania, Mennonites were traditionally thought to be Republican.

Even Mennonites who did not vote in political elections usually voted in "local option" elections in favor of the prohibition of the sale of alcoholic liquor. George R. Brunk, a bishop (MC) of Denbigh, Va., in one such election publicly urged his members to "vote out the saloon." On the other hand, some held that legislation was ineffective against liquor sale and consumption and that the Christian's method to work against such evils was not by political methods but by spiritual methods and education.

Occasionally pamphlets have been published against voting, as well as articles in such church papers as the Gospel Herald. Among the pamphlets were one by S. D. Mast, an Old Order Amish minister, Das Christenthum und der Stimmkasten oder die Ursache warum ich nicht an die weltliche Wahl gehe (c1875, 10 pp.), and J. L. Stauffer's tract of about 1915, Questions for the Christian Professor Who Votes (12 pp.).

H.S.B.

Voz Menonita, La, the monthly 24-page (with cover) 6 x 9 in. organ of the Mennonite Church (MC, Iglesia Evangelica Menonita en la Argentina) in Argentina, first number March 1932. It was varied somewhat in number of pages and in page size. In 1932-35 it was 5½ x 7½; 1936-53, 6½ x 9½; 1953- , 6½ x 8½. Editors have been Albano Luayza 1932-48, Ernesto Suárez Vilela 1949-56, Pedro Lanik 1956-58, and Marta de Alvarez beginning with March 1958. The place of publication has varied but in 1958 was Buenos Aires.

H.S.B.

V. P., the author of Successio Anabaptistica: see Walrave, Simon.

Vrank Willemsz (Winsen), of Amsterdam, was one of the first nine Dutch Anabaptists executed for their Anabaptist views. They all recanted, but nevertheless they were put to death at The Hague on Dec. 5, 1531. For particulars see Jan van Delft.

vdZ.

Vrede-bode aen onse lieve Vrienden, den Broederen met Haeren Dienaren ende Oudsten Vincent de Hondt is an invitation of the Old Flemish Mennonites meeting at Utrecht in 1633 which offered peace and union to the Vincent de Hondtsvolk (q.v.), which was, however, not accepted. (Kühler, Geschiedenis II, 197.) vdZ.

Vrede-handeling is the title of a booklet published at Rotterdam, Netherlands, in 1671, containing an account of the negotiations between the Waterlander Mennonites of Rotterdam and the Remonstrant (q.v.) church in this city concerning a union, which union, however, did not come about. vdZ.

Vredehandeligen, openbaar ghehouden tot Amsterdam den 3, 4, en 5 October 1630, tusschen de Dienaren der Vlaemsche Ghemeente ter eender ende de Vereenigde Hoogduytschen en Vriesen ter ander zyde (Amsterdam, 1630), and the same booklet followed by Een korte Vertooninge van het gene . . . vorder gehandelt is in de Vergaderinghe . . . 1636 (Haarlem, 1636), are two books mentioned by Schagen, now apparently lost, which give the negotiations leading in 1639 to the merger of the Flemish congregation of Amsterdam with the High German and Frisian group. The most important facts of these negotiations are also found in Kort Verhael van de Vereeniginghe tusschen de Doopsgesinde Ghemeynten (1639). vdZ.

M. Schagen, Naamlijst der Doopsgesinde Schryver (Amsterdam, 1745) 126 f.

Vreden, a town in Westphalia, Germany, where there was some revolutionary Anabaptist activity in 1534-35. A number of Mennonites lived here c1600. In 1593 the Catholic priest of Vreden complained that some of the children were unbaptized and that a few persons neglected to have their marriages solemnized in the (Catholic) church. There is an old Mennonite song addressed "aen de vrienden ter stede/ tot Boeckholt en tot Vrede/ tot Almelo oock mede"; this seems to indicate the existence of a congregation at Vreden. Shortly after 1600 all Mennonites were banished from the town, and though this sentence was never carried out rigorously, most Mennonites had left the town before 1615. Members of the following families are named as Mennonites here c1600: Straalman, Hofkes, Hölscher, Brummel (Brummel), Willink, Degenehr (Degenaar), Swerink, Budde(n), Portener, Walien. Some of these are found among the Dutch Mennonites at other places, particularly at Enschedé, about the same time or later. The Mennonite elder Hendrik (q.v.) van Vreeden and the Dutch Mennonite van Vre(e)den family found at Amsterdam in the 17th and 18th centuries may originally have been natives of Vreden. vdZ.

Vredesgroep: see Doopsgesinde Vredesgroep.

Vreede, a former Dutch Mennonite family, whose ancestor Dirck Pietersz Vreede, a native of Opspringen in the territory of Jülich (q.v.), Germany, moved to Leiden, Holland, c1655, because of persecution. In Leiden he was a tinsmith. He died in 1687, and must have been well-to-do, for he left a considerable legacy to the Leiden Waterlander Mennonite congregation, of which he had been a deacon since 1670. Most of his descendants were textile merchants or manufacturers; they were nearly all deacons of the church at Leiden, and some of them were trustees of the Bethlehems Hofje (old people's home). An outstanding member of this family was Pieter Vreede (1750-1837), manufacturer of cloth and woolen blankets, a fervent Patriot (q.v.), who played an important part in the Dutch political situation of about 1790 and shortly after. In 1798 he attained great political authority as a member of the Uitvoerend Bewind (executive government) of the Dutch Republic, sharing this power with two others, one of whom was the Mennonite Wybo Fijnje (q.v.). This office, however, lasted only for a short time, for Vreede and his group were too radical. He retired from politics, devoting his attention to his business, then at Tilburg. He was a close friend of F. A. van der Kemp (q.v.), once also a Patriot; in 1828 van der Kemp wrote him a letter from America. Though a member of the church Pieter Vreede, unlike his ancestors, was not interested in congregational life. His descendants, among whom was the famous professor of law G. W. Vreede (1809-80) at Utrecht, did not join the church. vdZ.

Nederl. Patriciaat XLI (1955) 341-70; L. G. le Poole, Bijdragen tot de kennis van . . . de Doopsgesinden . . . te Leiden (Leiden, 1905) passim; J. van der Poel, "Leven en Bedrijf van Pieter Vreede," in Verslag Historisch Genootschap, 1951, 30 ff.; DB 1907, 124, 145; N.N.B.Wb. IX, 1245-54.

Vreede, Adolf de, in 1660 presented three petitions to Bern, Switzerland, in behalf of the Bernese Mennonites, drawn up respectively by the Dutch States General and the cities of Amsterdam and Rotterdam. De Vreede, who arrived at Bern on June 11, was permitted to converse with the Swiss brethren who were in prison. This conversation, held in the presence of the Bernese Oberschultheis, had little success; the Swiss Mennonites were stubborn and perhaps somewhat embarrassed by the worldly figure of Vreede and the annoying presence of the Bernese official. They accused the Dutch Mennonites of worldliness and refused to consider the Dutch proposal to leave Switzerland and settle in the Netherlands. Nevertheless as a result of this visit a small number of the Swiss Brethren soon moved to the Netherlands. Concerning de Vreede there is no further information. He is said to have been a Mennonite, but he could not be identified as such. (Müller, Berner Täufer, 185-91.) vdZ.

Vreede (Vreeden, Vrede, Vreden), Isaac van, d. 1682, was chosen in March 1662 as a preacher of the Flemish Mennonite congregation (bijt Lam) at Amsterdam, Holland. After the schism in this church (see Lammerenkrijgh), van Vreede sided against Galenus (q.v.) Abrahamsz with the conservative leaders like Samuel Apostool (q.v.) and in June 1664 became a preacher in the Zonist (q.v.) church at Amsterdam. But here he did not feel at home. In 1670 he left the congregation with his co-preacher Pieter van Eyssen and founded the "Kleine Zon" congregation. In 1675 van Vreede left this group, founding the small congregation of "Het Sterretje." Being dismissed because of his quarrelsome intolerance he moved to Gouda, where he was called as preacher (1677) of the (Lamist) Mennonite congregation. It is one of the curiosities of history that this man, who had been a champion of the utmost strictness and had sharply attacked Galenus Abrahamsz and his ideas in Vrede-Presentatie aan Galenus Abrahamsz en zijne Medestemmers (Amsterdam, 1664), in 1679 invited his former opponent to perform baptism and administer the Lord's Supper at Gouda. vdZ.

H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamsz (Haarlem, 1954) 79 f., 86, 98, 113 f.; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 1404, 1762 2207, 2224 f.; DB 1900, 20, 32; 1918, 52.

Vreeden, Hendrik van, a Dutch Mennonite elder: see Hendrik van Vre(e)den.

Vreeken (formerly also Vreeke), a Mennonite family found at Aalsmeer, Netherlands, from at least the early 17th century. Most of them were fishermen in the 17th-19th centuries. They belonged to the Frisian Mennonites and in the 19th century to the "Nieuwe Vermaning." Many of them served as deacons and (lay) preachers. Ministers were Claes Fredriks, preacher 1732, elder 1742-d.89, Willem Arends Vreeke 1788-c1812, his brother Vreek Arends Vreeke 1788-d.1814, Cornelis Pietersz Vreeke 1801-c32, Klaas Vreesz Vreeken 1832, elder until 1866, Willem Arends Vreeken 1849, elder 1850-66, Dirk Vreeken c1858-66. In 1866 when the "Nieuwe Vermaning" merged with the Zijdweg congregation, Cornelis, Klaas, and Willem Vreeken retired. vdZ.

W. Tsj. Vleer, De Aloude Aalsmeerse Familiën (De Kaag, 1954) 43; Dutch Naamlijst; Gorter's Doopsgez. Lectuur, 1856, 58.

Vreeland, a village in the Dutch province of Utrecht, where there were Mennonites in the 16th century. About 1560 Wouter de Vries was the preacher of a small congregation at Vreeland, which met in the home of a certain Neeltgen where the members read from the New Testament and "by bad, false, and heretical teaching had seduced some persons." Three of them were arrested in early 1562 and tried in Utrecht: Neeltgen (Neeltje Claesdochter) and Gysbert Joosten and his wife. They confessed that they had attended a meeting at Utrecht in December 1561, in which Dirk (q.v.) Philips had preached and baptized. After renouncing their faith they were released. Nothing more is known of a Mennonite congregation at Vreeland. (DB 1903, 5 f., 19, 26.) vdZ.

Vries, de, a common Dutch family name, both Mennonite and non-Mennonite, found in nearly every Mennonite congregation, and in several unrelated families.

A prominent and widely ramified Mennonite de Vries family is found in Amsterdam. Its ancestor Wouter Takes (c1650-1728) settled as a butter merchant at Amsterdam c1689. He came from IJlst in Friesland and for this reason he was called de Vries, i.e., the Frisian. His son Gerrit de Vries (1691-1754) was an important merchant as were his sons and his grandsons. Among his descendants were the Mennonite pastors Abraham de Vries (1773-1862, q.v.) and Jeronimo de Vries (1838-1915, q.v.). Outstanding members of this family were Gerrit de Vries (1818-1900), a son of Pastor Abraham de Vries), who was a lawyer at Haarlem and in 1872-74 Prime Minister and Minister of Justice, later Privy Councillor of the Netherlands. He was a deacon of the Haarlem congregation from 1842 until he moved to The Hague in 1882. His son was the famous botanist Hugo de Vries (1848-1935). Matthias de Vries (1820-92, also a son of Pastor Abraham de Vries) was professor of Dutch literature at the universities of Groningen (1849-53) and Leiden (1853-90); Jeronimo de Vries (1776-1853), during his life noted as a literary man, editor of Vondel's (q.v.) works, numismatist and art connoisseur, deacon at Amsterdam and trustee of the A.D.S. (q.v.) in 1827-52, moderator 1842-43, and curator of its seminary, and his sons Jeronimo de Vries (1808-80), district judge at Amsterdam, author of juridical works, and Abraham de Vries (1817-79), justice in the court of Amsterdam, both of whom served the Amsterdam congregation as deacons, Jeronimo also as a trustee of the A.D.S. Also a number of other members of this family were deacons; until recent times a total of 14 at Amsterdam.

Another Mennonite family by this name was found at Amsterdam in the 17th century. Its members were, however, usually more interested in the Collegiant (q.v.) movement than in the Lamist (q.v.) church, of which they were members. They are known for their interest in Spinoza, whom they supported financially. They were well-to-do merchants. Among them were Joost Fransen de Vries, d. before 1654, married to Maria de Wolf, and their sons Isaack Joosten (b. 1632), Simon Joosten (1633/4-67), and Frans Joosten (1635-64).

Mennonite ministers by the name of de Vries (mostly not related) have been: Abraham de Vries (q.v.); Anthoni de Vries Mz (b. 1870), of Grijpskerk, pastor at Zwartsluis 1898, Zijldijk 1903, Ytens 1906, Terhorne 1914-35; Anthony de Vries (Amsterdam, c1745-Emmerich, Aug. 26, 1817), preacher of De Rijp 1770-71, Zaandam Oude Huys 1771-91 and after seven years of retirement, served at Emmerich, Germany, 1798-1817; Bouwe Pieter de Vries (b. 1893), pastor of Terschelling 1917, Hindeloopen-Koudum 1920, Balk-Woudsend 1923, Hoorn-Enkhuizen 1933, retired in 1948; Cornelis de Vries (q.v.); Derk de Vries (d. c1778), who was an untrained preacher at Langedijk-Koedijk 1727-c68; Hendrik Wiebes de Vries, of Heerenveen, d. there 1807 at an advanced age, lay preacher at Heerenveen 1760-65 and Blokzijl 1765-82; Jacob de Vries, until at least 1719 an untrained preacher of the Waterlander congregation at Alkmaar, author of De Jeugd ondervraagd Tot Doop en Avondmaal (Alkmaar, 1714); Jan Simons de Vries (b. 1742, d. July 31, 1822), an untrained preacher at Veendam 1771 and den IJp-Landsmeer 1781-1820; Jeronimo de Vries (q.v.); Klaas de Vries (q.v.); Paulus Simons de Vries (d.1808), lay preacher at Sloten 1765-69, and of the Ameland Waterlander congregation 1769-1804; Reitze de Vries (d.1860), pastor of Monnikendam 1809, Makkum 1814, and again Monnikendam 1818-59; Remmert Jacobsz de Vries (1643-1721), an untrained preacher and elder of the Zaandam Nieuwe Huys congregation 1673-c1721; Uilke Wytzes de Vries (d. c1781), an untrained preacher at Leeuwarden 1726-62; Wytze de Vries (d.1727), father of the former Uilke, an untrained preacher at Leeuwarden and Emden; he delivered a funeral sermon for his colleague N. J. Ley of Emden, which was published: Lyk-reeden (Amsterdam, 1728).

vdZ.

Nederl. Patriciaat V (1914) 439-49; XXVII (1941) 370-92; J. H. de Vries, De Amsterdamsche Doopsgezinde Familie de Vries (Zutphen, 1911); N.N.B.Wb. I, 1525-27; III, 1358-61; IV, 1428 f.; IX, 1255-58; Dutch Naamlijst, particularly 1792, 58; 1808, 76; 1829, 26, 70; DB 1889, 17, 25 f.; 1890, 14; 1891, 7, 9; 1896, 64, 69 f.; K. O. Meinsma, Spinoza en zijn Kring (The Hague, 1896) 103 et passim.

Vries, Abraham de, b. April 20, 1773, at Amsterdam, d. Nov. 3, 1862, at Haarlem, a Dutch Mennonite minister. He was a son of Gerrit de Vries and Catharina de Bosch. In 1814 he married Hillegonda van Geuns, d. 1866, the widow of Jacob Veen. Abraham de Vries, who was in his youth greatly interested in politics (like most Mennonites he was a Patriot, q.v.), and who in his student years at the Amsterdam seminary was even a captain of the Landstorm (army reserves), was appointed ministerial candidate in 1799. Thereupon he served the congregations of Nijmegen 1799-1801, Leiden 1801-3, and Haarlem 1803-38, in which year he retired. He was a man of great authority both in his own congregations and in the A.D.S. (q.v.), of which he was a cofounder in 1811, a member of its board 1811-39, and an honorary member 1839-57, when he resigned; he also was a curator of its seminary.

De Vries did not leave any theological writings. More than a theologian he was a literary man, well versed in several languages. In 1820 he refused a professorship in Greek and Latin at the University of Leiden. This university granted him an honorary Dr. Lit. Hum. degree in 1822. For more than 40 years he was also the city librarian and archivist of Haarlem. One of his sons was the well-known professor of Dutch literature Matthias de Vries (1820-92); another son was Gerrit de Vries (1818-1900), a lawyer and in 1872-74 Dutch Prime Minister.

Abraham de Vries was a member of several literary societies, including the Association for Dutch Literature; in the Levensberichten of this Association Chr. Sepp (q.v.) published an appreciative biography of de Vries (Leiden, 1863). (Naamlijst 1800, 58; DJ 1850, 143; N.N.B.Wb. V, 1078-80.) vdZ.

Vries, Cornelis de (1755-1811), a deacon of the Zaandam-Oost Mennonite congregation, who was the center of the preparation for the founding of the A.D.S. (q.v.) in 1811, not only serving as secretary of the preparatory committee, but also as the projector of its regulations and rules. He died just after the first meeting of the A.D.S. (DJ 1850, 144.) vdZ.

Vries, Cornelis (Kornelis) de, b. Aug. 16, 1740, at Koog aan de Zaan, d. Nov. 21, 1812, at Haarlem, married first to Alida Reesen, later to Maria Elisabeth van Vollenhoven, a Dutch Mennonite minister, who studied at the Zonist (q.v.) seminary and served the congregations of Enschedé 1763-71 and Utrecht 1771-86. In 1786 he retired to devote himself to study and literature. Moving to Haarlem in 1788, he established the Algemeene Konst- en Letterbode, a newspaper on art and literature, of which he was the editor until 1809. Besides articles in this periodical he published some doctrinal studies. On Nov. 7, 1773, on the occasion of the dedication of the new meetinghouse at Utrecht, he delivered a sermon which some members of the Reformed Church considered an offense to "the public (i.e., Reformed) church." Even the magistrates of Utrecht discussed the matter, but did not take action. This sermon was published under the title De Verdraagzame Begrippen der Doopsgezinden niet onbestaandbaar met hunne aanhoudende afzondering van de overige Kristenheid (Utrecht, 1773). De Vries further published Inwydingsreden over de tempels . . . (Amsterdam, 1769), a sermon preached at Enschedé at the dedication of the new meetinghouse; De onderscheidene en uitstekende Gelukzaligheid . . ., a funeral sermon for his colleague Joh. Cuperus (Utrecht, 1777); Geschiedenis van de eerste zonde der menschen . . . (Amsterdam, 1781); Katechismus der H. Schriftuur (Rotterdam, 1782); Kleine Katechismus (Haarlem, 1786); and Godsdienstig Leerboek voor Kristelijke Aankomelingen (Haarlem, 1802). De Vries was also interested in Mennonite history and possessed a good collection of about 1500 Mennonite books, which he contributed to the Enschedé congregation; this collection was destroyed in 1862 when the church burned down. A number of learned societies invited him to join. During his Utrecht period he was the editor of the Utrechtsche Courant 1782-87. vdZ.

J. van Geuns, Levensbericht (Obituary) in the Konsten Letterbode (1813) No. 15; (H. B. Berghuys), Geschiedenis der Doopsgez. gemeente te Utrecht (n.p., n.d.-1926) 60-62, 64 f.; Naamlijst 1815, 71 f.; DB 1863, 92 f.; 1868, 88; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 761, 2332.

Vries, Henri Marie de (1836-1910), whose father was not a Mennonite, but whose mother was a Mennonite, a daughter of Jeronimo de Vries (1808-80) of Amsterdam, lived from 1871 at The Hague, where he was a director of the Dutch State Bank and a member of the city council. When he came to The Hague there was no Mennonite congregation there. De Vries was the chief promoter in the founding of a congregation in The Hague. For many years he was a trustee and moderator of this new congregation and in 1887-1905 he was a trustee of the A.D.S. (q.v.). vdZ.

A commemorative biographical sketch (with portrait) is found in DB 1910, 219-29; see also "De Zondagsbode" XXIII (1909-10) No. 19.

Vries, Jeronimo de, b. June 17, 1838, at Amsterdam, d. April 29, 1915, at Haarlem, a Dutch Mennonite minister, a son of Gerrit de Vries Jzn. He married A. M. Jarman, d. 1902. He was educated at the Athenaeum at Amsterdam, where he studied classical languages and Dutch literature, and at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary. He served in the congregations of Noordeind van Graft 1862-65, Krommenie 1865-70, Wormerveer 1870-72, and Haarlem 1872-1908, retiring in this year. Particularly in the Haarlem congregation he developed his great gifts of intellect and heart. His health was poor; but he was a popular pulpit orator, a man of liberal convictions who stressed the ethical meaning of Christianity. Yet he was not a cold moralizer; his sermons overflowed with genuine piety and are at the same time stylistic masterpieces.

He published four volumes of preeken (sermons): Een Bundel Preeken (Haarlem, 1891, two reprints), Tweede Bundel Preeken (Haarlem, 1897), Twaalf Preeken (Haarlem, 1908), Twaalf Preeken, Nieuwe Bundel (Haarlem 1909-10). Besides these sermons he published Zedekundige Schetsen en Omtrekken voor de Jeugd (Haarlem, 1898); Karakterschetsen, an anthology, was published after his death by H. Britzel (Haarlem, 1915).

His colleagues, Simon Gorter, d.1871, and Jacobus Craandijk, d.1912, were commemorated by de Vries in the Levensberichten of the Association for Dutch Literature. In Eigen Haard, of which very popular weekly he was the editor for many years, he published numerous articles, a few of them concerning Dutch Mennonite history.

Jeronimo de Vries was a trustee of the A.D.S. (q.v.) 1886-1911, curator of its seminary, secretary of the Haarlemsche (q.v.) Vereeniging, and on the board of a number of non-Mennonite associations; e.g., codirector of the Teyler (q.v.) Foundation and trustee of the Nederlandsche Protestantenbond (q.v., Dutch liberal Protestant union), being a co-editor of its hymnal in 1882.

He was honored by S. Cramer (q.v.) in Doopsgezinde Bijdragen 1902, 172-86, and after his death by B. ter Haar in Levensberichten of the Association for Dutch Literature (Leiden, 1916, 255-90), by A. Binnerts Szn in Doopsgezind Jaarboekje 1916, 23-35 (with portrait) and in De Zondagsbode XXVIII (1914-15) No. 28. vdZ.

Vries, Klaas de, b. March 1716 at Emden, d. July 23, 1766, at Amsterdam, a son of Preacher Wytze de Vries and Grietje Wessels, was a Dutch Mennonite minister. He was educated at the University of Franeker and the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary. He served as pastor at Emmerich (Germany) 1741-44 and Amsterdam (Lamist church) 1744-d.66. In spite of poor health he was very active. He is said to have carefully prepared his sermons, which, however, were learned essays on religion and morals rather than direct Christian testimonies. In a commemorative poem he is called a preacher of penitence, but this is a somewhat rhetorical epithet for this rationalistically minded man. He opposed catechetical instruction by the church, believing that this was the task of the parents. Though he did not publish much, he was a man of great learning. After the death of Professor Tjerk Nieuwenhuis (q.v.) in 1759 he taught philosophy and physics at the Seminary for some time. His colleague Allard Hulshoff preached his funeral sermon: Klaas de Vries . . . geschetst in eene Lykrede (Amsterdam, 1766). His brother Uilke Wytzes de Vries (d. 1781) was an untrained minister of the Leeuwarden Mennonite congregation 1726-62. (DJ 1850, 112; DB 1918, 50, note 1.) vdZ.

Vries, Simon Sakes de, b. c.1723 at Deventer, Netherlands, d. there 1793, apparently a Mennonite, made a legacy to the Deventer Mennonite congregation. He was educated at the Athenaeum Illustre at Deventer, Utrecht University, obtaining his Ph.D. degree in 1744 from Leiden University. Oxford University granted him an honorary Ph.D. degree. De Vries, who was unmarried, and obviously a man of means, then returned to Deventer and divided his time between his brewery and his learned studies and writings. (N.N.B.Wb. I, 1527 f.; Blaupot t. C., Holland II, 157 f.; DB 1868, 99.) vdZ.

Vriesche Sociëteit in Noordholland (Frisian Conference in North Holland): see Friesche Sociëteit.

Vrieze (Vreese, Vreeze, Vries, Vriesse), de, a former Dutch Mennonite family, in the 17th century living at Aardenburg (q.v.) in Dutch Zeeland Flanders, whither they had emigrated from Flanders, Belgium. In the 18th century (some even earlier) they left the Mennonites and joined the Reformed Church. (De Nederl. Leeuw 1918; DB 1877, 11, 12.) vdZ.

Vriezen (Vriesche Doopsgezinden): see Frisian Mennonites.

Vrijburg(h), Geert van: see Volbot, A. D.

Vrijer, a former Mennonite family in the Dutch province of North Holland. Four of its members served as pastors: (1) Frans Albertsz Vrijer was preacher in the Frisian congregation of Barsingerhorn-Kolhorn 1723-c55. Though he had not received a special training for the ministry, he later trained some Mennonite preachers. His son was (2) Albert Fransz Vrijer, trained by his father, serving at Barsingerhorn-Kolhorn 1741-55, Den IJLandsmeer 1755-70, and Wormerveer-Noord 1770-98. He published Leerreden . . . (Amsterdam, n.d.-1791) (Naamlijst 1792, 57 f.). (3) Adriaan Vrijer, a son of (2) Albert, was preacher of Oosterend on the island of Vlieland 1778-98 (DB 1912, 89 f.). (4) Gerit Vrijer Az (1842-96), a grandson of (2) Albert, was a pastor of the congregations at Mensingeweer 1868-73, Stavoren-Molkwerum 1873-75, Poppingewier 1875-79, Noordeinde van Graft 1879-82, Den Horn 1882-84, and Broek op Langendijk 1884-96. He was educated at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary. vdZ.

Vrou Gerits: see Gerrets.

Vught, a village in the Dutch province of North Brabant, about five miles south of 's Hertogenbosch (q.v.). In 1533 a Sacramentist (q.v.) meeting was held near Vught attended by 200 persons; this shows that the new ideas had some adherents there. On Sept. 9 and 11, 1538, eight Anabaptists, including Paulus (q.v.) van Drunen, were burned at the stake at Vught. They probably lived at 's Hertogenbosch, where Paulus van Drunen was the elder of the congregation. In 1544 Magdalena (q.v.) of Waterland, a Davidjorist (q.v.), was executed here. Thereafter there are no traces of Anabaptists and Mennonites at Vught. In 1947 a Kring (circle) of Mennonites living at 's Hertogenbosch-Vught was founded, served at first by the pastor of Eindhoven, and since 1956 by the pastor of Nijmegen. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 41 f., E 447 f.; DB 1917, 184-94; Mellink, Wederdopers, 314 f., 337 f., 414; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 287.

Waal, De, a village on the Dutch island of Texel (q.v.), where there were three Mennonite meetinghouses in the 17th century—Waterlander, Frisian, and Flemish; the groups at De Waal using these meetinghouses were not independent congregations, but each more or less united with their respective congregations at Den Burg (q.v.). In 1772 all the Mennonite congregations of Texel except Den Hoorn (q.v.) merged into one single congregation called the Burg-Waal-Oosterend congregation. Thereupon the Frisian meetinghouse at De Waal was torn down (the Flemish meetinghouse had been abandoned at an earlier date) and the Waterlander meetinghouse only was left. It was remodeled in 1842 and is still in use. In the 19th century sometimes one of the preachers of the united congregation lived at De Waal. At present the Mennonites of De Waal belong to the Texel congregation, embracing all Mennonites on the island, including those of Den Hoorn. At De Waal there is a separate ladies' circle, a Sunday school for children, and a boys' club.

In 1649 (not 1648; see ME I, 614) Elder Claes (q.v.) Arentsz, of Nieuwe Zijpe, irritated the Reformed in his baptismal sermon at De Waal, which led to a religious disputation. (DB 1872, 195; 1873, 142, 143, 149; Blaupot t. C., Holland I, 195.) vdZ.

Waard, de, a Dutch Mennonite family originating on a polder near Pieterzijl in the province of Groningen, called the Waarden, from which this family has derived its name. Until c1850 they were nearly all farmers. Many of them served as deacons in the Pieterzijl (q.v.) (since 1892 called Grijpskerk, q.v.) Mennonite congregation, and Jacob Symons, a farmer at Ruigewaard, was 1726-d. c60 a lay preacher of this congregation, as was his son Jan Jacobs de Waard, who served 1753-d. c90.

Sytze Klazes de Waard (Pieterzijl, 1796-Haarlem, 1856), married to W. J. Krythe, was trained for the ministry at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary and served at Mensingeweer 1821-26, Akkrum 1826-28, and Haarlem 1828-d.56. He published, as far as is known, only three addresses on religious subjects held before the Haarlem Department of the Maatschappij (q.v.) tot Nut van't Algemeen.

His grandson Sytze Klazes de Waard (Groningen, 1849-Alassio, Italy, 1915), married to M. E. Backer, at first studied mathematics and physics, thereupon literature and theology, and after finishing his study at the Amsterdam seminary served as Mennonite pastor at Westzaan-Zuid 1879-83, The Hague 1883-94, and Utrecht 1894-1911, in which year he retired because of poor health. He published the dedication sermon, Tempelwijding (The Hague, 1886, reprinted 1886), delivered in September 1886, when the young congregation of The Hague acquired a meetinghouse. He also published a volume of sermons, Overdenkingen (Amsterdam, 1915), and a number of sermons preached on special occasions.

Another Sytze Klazes de Waard (1821-1911) obtained his M.D. degree at Groningen and practiced medicine for more than fifty years in his home town. He was for about the same time a treasurer of the Pieterzijl (Grijpskerk) congregation and published a booklet on the Mennonite history of the area in which he lived: Aanteekeningen uit de Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden in 't Westerkwartier (Groningen, 1901), which contains many particulars on the De Waard family. vdZ.

De Waarden en het Geslacht de Waard (Groningen, 1937); Naamlijst 1829, 25, 66; Gorter's Doopsgez. Lectuur 1858, "Kerknieuws" I, 17 f.; (H. B. Berghuys), Geschiedenis van de Doopsgez. gemeente te Utrecht (n.p., n.d.-1926) 89-94; De Zondagsbode XXIV (1910-11) No. 34.

Waasten(e) (Warneton), a town in the province of West Flanders, Belgium, where there was a Mennonite congregation about the middle of the 16th century, of which, however, there is no further information. Waasten was one of the congregations in whose name Adriaan van Kortrijk (q.v.) wrote to the congregation of Antwerp c1545. Like most congregations in Flanders it was probably soon wiped out by persecution. Hans (q.v.) Vermeersch was an Anabaptist martyr in Waastene in 1559. (Verheyden, "Mennisme in Vlaanderen," ms.) vdZ.

Wabbe Lysbethsdochter, of Pingjum in Friesland, Netherlands, was among the Anabaptists arrested at Oldeklooster (q.v.) in Friesland in 1535, and executed at Leeuwarden on March 14 of that year. (Vos, Menno Simons, 229.) vdZ.

Wäbl, Johann: see Waibl, Johannes.

Wackernagel, Philipp (1800-77), a German hymnologist, author of Das deutsche Kirchenlied von der ältesten Zeit bis zu Anfang des XVII. Jahrhunderts, 5 vv. (Leipzig, 1864-77), and Lieder der niederländischen Reformierten aus der Zeit der Verfolgung im 16. Jahrhundert (Frankfurt, 1867), both containing considerable numbers of Anabaptist hymns. (See Hymnology, ME II, p. 871, for details.) vdZ.

Wädenswil (Wädenswyl, Wädisswil), a village in the canton of Zürich, Switzerland, was the scene of a disputation by the Reformed clergy with the Anabaptists on Jan. 26, 1613, whose purpose was to secure the return of the Anabaptist dissenters to the Reformed Church. Fifteen Anabaptists appeared, led by Elder Hans Landis (q.v.) of Horigerberg, supported by Galli Fuchs, a schoolteacher, and Bachmann, a blacksmith. The representatives of the authorities were Zürich burgomaster Rudolf Rhaan, Landvogt Konrad Grebel, Pastor Hans Jacob Breiting of St. Peter's Church in Zürich, and the parish pastors of Horgen, Wädenswyl, and Richterswyl. The protocol of the disputation is to be found in the Zürich Staatsarchiv II. 44, under the title "Action mit den Wiedertauffern in Schloss der Herrschaft Wädiswil 26. I. anno 1613 gehalten."

Breitinger, the chief Reformed speaker, sought the reason for the separation of the Anabaptists from the state church. The repeated answer of the Anabaptists was that the life of the members of the state church manifested gross sin, and that sinners were admitted to the communion along with the godly. When Breitinger argued from the parable of the tares that the church should not attempt to root out the sinners but leave that to God, the Anabaptists only felt their view confirmed. The appeal of the burgomaster that they submit to the authorities and return to the church, that the authorities would appreciate their holy living, "the holier the better," fell on deaf ears. The Anabaptists steadfastly refused to yield and said unitedly, "We are ready to sacrifice life, body, property, and blood." They pleaded for toleration.

A second disputation in March 1613 had no better results. Landis refused all compromises, including the offer of emigration, saying, "The earth is the Lord's and no one has the authority to expel them from the country."

Thereupon the authorities invoked upon Anabaptists the heavy penalty of six years of service as galley slaves in the French or Venetian navies, a severe punishment usually reserved for criminals. Three recanted. The other three, Landis, Galli, and Stephan Zehender (q.v.), were sent in chains to Solothurn en route to the French galley, where they fortunately escaped. When Landis returned to Zürich the next year to serve his flock, he was arrested, tried, and executed on Sept. 29, 1614, as the last Anabaptist martyr (by direct execution) in Switzerland. (See also Horgen and Zürich.)

H.S.B.

Samuel Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931) 377-89; Cornelius Bergmann, Die Täuferbewegung im Kanton Zürich bis 1660 (Leipzig, 1916) 82-88; Paul Kläui, "Hans Landis of Zurich," MQR XXII (1948) 203-11.

Wadsworth, Ohio, the site of the first Mennonite higher school in America (1867-78) and the first Mennonite Sunday school in Ohio (1854), is located 30 miles south of Cleveland in southeastern Medina County. Once an agricultural center and then a coal-mining town, it is now an industrial city of 10,000, known for the production of matches, valves, rubber soles, brick and tile, and iron castings.

The Mennonite community is located for the most part west of town, where they settled north and south along the River Styx as early as 1828. The Wisler Mennonite Church stands on the site of the original church (three miles southwest). Almost all of its 30 members are rural, half of them living in the Wadsworth area. Near by is the Bethel Mennonite (MC) Church (132 members), organized after the division of 1872. Of its 40 families, 33 consider Wadsworth their shopping center, and 40 per cent earn the major portion of their incomes in town. The General Conference Mennonite Church, founded on the outskirts in 1852 and moved into town forty years later, is over 80 per cent urban, but 22 per cent of its 250 members are identified with other communities. R.W.K.

Rachel Kreider, "One Hundred Years in Wadsworth," Menn. Life VIII (October 1953).

Wadsworth First Mennonite Church (GCM), located in Wadsworth, Medina Co., Ohio, 12 miles west of Akron, was organized by Ephraim Hunsberger in 1852, who came to Wadsworth from Berks County, Pa. The first members were three families from the Bally Mennonite (GCM) Church at Hereford, Pa., who came in 1851. At the dedication of the first meetinghouse on Oct. 9, 1853, twelve were baptized to be added to the charter membership of 10. Hunsberger was ordained Oct. 10, 1852, in Pennsylvania for the new congregation at Wadsworth, and began preaching at Wadsworth the same month. The first deacon was ordained in 1853. In 1892 the congregation purchased its present meetinghouse, a former Congregational church on the corner of College and Pardee streets. The membership in 1957 was 264; A. J. Neuenschwander was the pastor. R.L.M.

Wadsworth Mennonite School, or simply the Wadsworth Institute, was the common designation in English for an institution which operated from Jan. 2, 1868, until Dec. 31, 1878, at Wadsworth, Ohio, and which was officially the Christliche Bildungs-Anstalt der Mennoniten Gemeinschaft. This was one of the very first attempts of the Mennonites in higher education, preceded only by the seminary in Amsterdam, started in 1735, and contemporary with the Weierhof (German) institution of 1867 and certain normal schools of the Mennonites in Russia. It grew out of the movement for union among Mennonites in America which resulted in the General Conference Mennonite Church (q.v.) organized in 1860. In this connection more adequate training was felt necessary for ministers and church workers. A program of systematic explanation and solicitation was inaugurated with the result that the General Conference was able to authorize the school in 1863 and complete the building for dedication in 1866. The school as planned was to provide three years of instruction primarily in Biblical subjects and largely in the German language. Carl Justus van der Smitten (q.v.), a university-trained Mennonite pastor in Germany, was induced to undertake pioneering service in the school and arrived in December 1868. In the meantime the school had been started under temporary supervision of Christian Schowalter with an assistant teacher and 24 students.

The program at Wadsworth was a combination of study and work. Rising at five o'clock and washing was followed by cleaning rooms, with morning devotions and breakfast at 7:30. The morning was given to study and instruction and the afternoon to work, each student being assigned projects in the yard, garden, or field. Supper at six was preceded by an hour of study and followed by another study period, with devotions again at nine. The school bulletin for 1876 lists a faculty of seven persons and three departments of instruction with courses as follows: Theological Department—Biblical History, Bible Knowledge, Exegesis, Doctrine Symbolics, Church History, History of the Bible, Catechism Instruction, Homiletics; German Department—Reading, Writing, Grammar, Spelling, Composition; English Department—Reading, Writing, Orthography, Grammar, Geography, Natural Philosophy, Logic, Algebra, Geometry, Trigonometry, and any of the branches usually taught in academies and colleges.

The influence of the van der Smissen family in the Wadsworth school was strongly felt. The father, mother, and two daughters were from a European culture with a background of books, music, wealth, yet withal deeply spiritual and keenly interested in mission work, evangelism, and young people. They exerted a deep influence on the young men from the rougher American communities. Yet, because of conditions inherent in the situation, difficulties began to arise early in the life of the school. Friction developed within the faculty between those of European and American culture; misunderstandings arose between the supporting constituency of the East and West; and enrollment decreased. Debts were incurred and the total indebtedness increased year by year, amounting in 1876 to over $9,000.00. In 1877 a serious attempt was made to erase the indebtedness and eliminate friction. The school was divided into two separate departments, German and English; the former was the theological work under the German teacher, and the latter the English and normal school work under the English teacher. Women also were allowed to enroll. The number of theological students increased to 16 while the normal school operated profitably with 30 or more students, and after 1878 was called the "Excelsior Normal School." Better feeling resulted in these two years and the indebtedness was reduced, but it was apparently too late. The General Conference in 1878 was thoroughly discouraged. A special committee found the double arrangement of the school unsatisfactory and the location unsuited for a school in which the German language dominated. The theological department consequently was closed in December 1878, and the normal school department, which operated independently, closed in May 1879. The total enrollment for the first nine years was 310, or an average yearly attendance of 34. Some 209 different persons attended the school, of whom not less than 130 were from Mennonite families.

The Wadsworth school made significant contributions to the church in spite of its relatively brief period of existence. It promoted unification by challenging the congregations to work together and by developing friendships between students from widely separated areas. It showed, in spite of opposition, that higher education was not incompatible with humility and evangelical zeal. It developed over the decade a generation of trained ministers who in general marked the beginning of the change from the lay ministry to the trained ministry. It promoted certain forms of evangelical work which introduced a new spirit in many of the churches. This is particularly true in the cause of missions, which was deeply woven into the Wadsworth program. Though the school was closed it confirmed the sentiment for education and blazed the way for the institutions of the next century. S.F.P.

Verhandlungen der Allgemeinen Konferenz der Mennoniten . . . Erste bis Elfte Sitzungen (Berne); H. P. Krehbiel, History of the General Conference . . . (Canton, 1898); Christliche Bildungs-Anstalt der Mennoniten-Gemeinschaft, Wadsworth, Ohio; J. E. Hartzler, Education Among the Mennonites of America (Danvers, Ill., 1925); Hillegonda van der Smissen, Sketches from My Life (Newton, n.d.); Anna Kreider, "Beginning of Theological Training Among the Mennonites of America," Menn. Life XIV (April 1959); Records of the school, BeCL.

Wadzeck, Friedrich (1762-1823), coauthor of Beiträge zur Kenntnis der Mennoniten-Gemeinden in Europa und Amerika, stemmed from the Bohemian Brethren congregation in Berlin, of which his father was a sexton. He was professor of literature, physics, and natural history in the royal cadet corps in Berlin, founding its library and serving as librarian. After 31 years of service he was retired, principally because of his opposition to the athletic program. Thereupon he devoted himself to establishing homes in Berlin for neglected children, which opened in 1819 and at the time of his death four years later were sheltering 400 children of the poorest families of Berlin. Wadzeck also left a large collection of copper etchings, containing the portraits of about 50,000 famous men and women. In co-operation with the Baron von Reiswitz (q.v.) he wrote a book on the Mennonites, which was published in Berlin (1821) with the title Beiträge zur Kenntnis der Mennoniten-Gemeinden in Europa und Amerika, statistischen, historischen und religiösen Inhalts, the income from which he applied to his charities.

A second volume with almost the same title as the 1821 volume, published by Baron Reiswitz as sole author under the title Beiträge zur Kenntniss der taufgesinnten Gemeinden oder der Mennoniten, statistischen, historischen und religiösen, auch juristischen Inhalts, Zweiter Theil (Breslau, 1829), gives the impression that Reiswitz did most of the work on the first volume, and reports that Wadzeck was too busy caring for poor children to even use for the benefit of the children the 500 free copies which he had received.

Friedrich August Schmidt's Neuer Nekrolog der Deutschen I (1823) No. 1, 272-94, contains a portrait of Wadzeck. There may be other articles on the Mennonites in the periodical published by Wadzeck from 1809 with the title Nützliches und Unterhaltendes Wochenblatt für den gebildeten Bürger und denkenden Landmann, which continued after his death in the interests of the institutions he founded. (ML III.) HEGE, H.S.B.

Waechlink (Waeckling) Dirks (also Walig [Walich, Walrius] Dirck Luytgens) of Winkel in the Dutch province of North Holland, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake on July 7, 1558, at The Hague together with Adriaen Pieters and Maerten Cornelisz. Waechlink was (re)baptized in 1538, arrested shortly after, but pardoned. Shortly before his arrest in 1558 he had publicly opposed the Catholic priest of Winkel, saying that the Mass was idolatry, and that in the Lord's Supper they should take "common bread of the table" as the apostles received from the hands of Christ and as is the practice of Sacramentists (q.v.) and Anabaptists. (Mart. Mir. D 202, E 583; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 390; ML I, 451.) vDZ.

Wael, Burgert van der, author or composer of the Mennonite hymnal Eeuwig Geluyt-makende Vreugt-Baswyn geblazen ter Gedachtenisse van de Geboorte, 't Leven, Lyden, Sterven, Verryzen en Hemelvaart onzes Heilands en Zaligmakers . . . (Dordrecht, 1670; Edam, 1699; Amsterdam, 1703, 1734, and 1736). No copy seems to be extant. About van der Wael all information is lacking. vdZ.

M. Schagen, Naamlijst der Doopsgezinde Schrijver (Amsterdam, 1745) 128; DJ 1837, 65.

Waelty (Wälti), Bernhard, an Anabaptist martyr, a peasant of Rüderswil, Switzerland, was put to death for his faith at Bern on July 7, 1537.

Mart. Mir. E 1129; Adolf Fluri, Beiträge zur Geschichte der bernischen Täufer (Bern, 1912) 14.

Waerma, Meindert, Hendrik, and Jacob, Mennonite ministers. Meindert Waerma was from 1715 a preacher of the Groningen Old Flemish congregation at Emden in East Friesland, Germany. His son, Hendrik Waerma, b. 1711 at Emden, d. July 26, 1771, at Deventer, married to Hester Saaxuma, of Groningen, was a preacher in his father's church at Emden 1741-61 and at Deventer, Netherlands, 1761-d.71. Though belonging to the Groningen Old Flemish branch, Hendrik Waerma was a man of tolerant and rather liberal views, as may be seen from the fact that he sent his son to the Amsterdam Lamist seminary. His many writings breathe a spirit of toleration. He published Beknopt Ontwerp van de Voornaamste Geloof-zaaken der Christelyke Godsdiens volgens de H. Schriftuur en de Belydenissen der Doopsgezinden (Emden, 1744); De Waere Weg des Heyls, twelve sermons (Groningen, 1751); Lijk-Predikacie. Op H.B. Alringh (1757); Afscheydspredikacie Embden 1761 (Deventer, 1762); Historisch Verhael wegens de oudheid en schriftmatigheid van het Geloof of de Leere der Doopsgezinden (Groningen, 1767); De Evangelische Geloofsleere der Doopsgezinde Christenen, die ook Mennoniten genaamt worden, followed by Beknopt Historisch Verhaal wegens de Leere der Doopsgezinden (Groningen, 1768), and Nodige Beantwoording (Groningen, 1768). The Mennonite Archives at Amsterdam contain a manuscript by H. Waerma, "Annotatie van de merkwaardigste voorvallen myns leevens," of 1747.

Jacobus Waerma (the son of Hendrik), b. 1753 at Emden, d. 1782 at Makkum, was trained for the ministry at the Amsterdam Lamist seminary and served at Makkum from 1777-d.82. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 682; II, 2, No. 685; Van der Aa, Biogr. Wb.; Blaupot t. C., Groningen II, 116, 124, 137, 226; DB 1881, 97; 1898, 64; 1919, 93 f.

Waffenlose Wächter, Der (The Weaponless Watchman), first issue apparently January 1871, an 8-page (sometimes 4-page) 10½ x 13½ in. (later 12 x 19) monthly, later bimonthly 1878-79, monthly 1880-81, 24-page quarterly 1882-88, published by Samuel Ernst (1825-1909) at Millwood and Gap, Pa., transferred 1873-77 to Lancaster, Pa., and back again to Gap (Millwood) 1877-83, moved to Olathe, Kan., 1884-88. Published as a bilingual religious paper (German, English), successor to Acorn & Germ which had been published at Millwood by S. Ernst and E. Z. Ernst as a trilingual paper (German, English, and Pennsylvania-Dutch) as follows: July 6, 1870, Sept. 14, 1870, and thereafter weekly to Dec. 7, 1870. In an autobiographical statement Ernst states that he published the journal "for nearly 18 years." In a family history, a son of Samuel, E. Z. Ernst states: "He [E. Z.] was a publisher and printer by trade beginning the business in 1870, . . . publishing the 'Acorn & Germ' and the 'Waffenlose Waechter' with his father near Gap, Lancaster County, Pa. In March 1877, he established the 'Sunbeam' of Lititz, Pa., in partnership with his brother-in-law, John G. Zook, but sold out and left for Kansas in 1879." About his father, E. Z. Ernst states, "They belonged to the Old Mennonites, organized and conducted a singing school at Millwood school district north of Gap, Pa., in 1870 and soon began publishing 'Waffenlose Waechter' for nearly 20 years." Ernst moved to Olathe, Kan., in 1884, bringing the paper with him and continuing its publication for several years. Inconclusive data does not permit an exact report concerning the paper, and only a few copies have been preserved in GCL and BeCL. The publisher states the paper's policy as "neutral in politics and non-sectarian," although it quite clearly was directed primarily to Mennonites as the name would indicate. It carried some articles on Mennonite history. H.S.B.

E. Z. Ernst, A Condensed Genealogical Record of the Descendants of Sebastian Ernst (Los Angeles, 1927); Samuel Ernst, The 50th Anniversary (n.p., n.d.-1898).

Wagenaar, Jan (Amsterdam, 1709-73), outstanding Dutch historian, author of Vaderlandsche Historie (21 vv., 1749-59) and a famous history of Amsterdam, at first belonged to the Reformed Church, but in 1730 joined the Mennonites, whom he however soon had left to participate in the Collegiant (q.v.) movement. He was also the author of some theological writings. When the Remonstrant (q.v.) minister K. Bremer (q.v.) attacked the Mennonites because of rejecting infant baptism, Wagenaar came to their defense, publishing Onderzoek over de oudheid en schriftmatigheid van den Kinderdoopt (Leiden, 1740, 2d ed. Amsterdam, 1776). vdZ.

Winkler Prins Encyclopedie, 6th ed., vol. XVIII (Amsterdam, 1954) 324; Blaupot t. C., Holland II, 26, 30, 31; DJ 1850, 128; DB 1912, 106.

Wageningen, a town in the Dutch province of Gelderland (1958 pop. c20,000; c200 Mennonites), the seat of the Dutch Agricultural University, also the seat of a Mennonite congregation. In 1892 C. Honigh began to work toward the founding of a congregation, soon assisted by B. D. van der Laag, d.1901, and P. Hoekstra, but it was not until Feb. 10, 1895, that a meeting of some 30 Mennonites living at Wageningen and surrounding villages decided to appoint a committee to arrange the founding; the result was the founding of an association for the promotion of the interests of Mennonites in Wageningen and surroundings in early February 1896; in 1905 this association was converted into a Mennonite congregation. On Good Friday of 1896 ten persons were baptized at Wageningen; this baptismal service was followed by a communion service, both led by B. Cuperus, retired Mennonite pastor of Zutphen, who had conducted a worship service at Wageningen on Oct. 9, 1895, and who henceforth preached there regularly, also giving catechetical instruction, and who by his liberal financial contributions made it possible for the small young congregation to build a meetinghouse, which was dedicated by Cuperus on Ascension Day May 24, 1901. Cuperus served until 1903, then resigning because of bad health; he was followed by S. D. A. Wartena of Zutphen. On Nov. 22, 1908, A. J. van Loghum Slaterus preached his entrance sermon as Wageningen's first regular minister. He served until 1917, followed by F. W. W. Braak 1918-20, P. G. van Slogteren 1922-26, M. van der Vegte Jr. 1927-40, and B. Dufour 1940-.

During World War II the meetinghouse was completely destroyed on May 10, 1940. A new church could not be acquired before 1951, planned by architect W. Gerretsen, and dedicated April 29, 1951, by Pastor Dufour.

The baptized membership was 32 in 1896, 55 in 1901, 73 in 1925, 108 in 1940, and 275 in 1958; church activities are a ladies' circle, and Sunday school for children.

In December 1732 the Mennonite Committee for Foreign Needs settled fifteen Mennonite refugee families from Lithuania (q.v.) in the neighborhood of Wageningen, forming a hamlet then called Menonietenbuurt. This settlement failed; some of these colonists had moved to Walcheren (q.v.) by 1736, where another group of Lithuanian refugees had settled. By 1738 the colony was dissolved and the houses were sold. A detailed account on this colonization was published by A. van Gulik in Doopsgezinde Bijdragen of 1905 and 1906 under the title "De mislukte kolonizatie te Wageningen." vdZ.

P. Hockstra, "Hoe de gemeente Wageningen e.o. tot stand kwam," in DJ 1927, 55-71; DB 1895, 183; 1896, 209; 1900, 230; 1901, 215; 1905, 112-68; 1906, 93-115; 1909, 186; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1173, 1237, 1921-94; DJ 1942, 45; 1952, 46-50.

Wagenmaker, a Mennonite family on the former Dutch island of Wieringen (q.v.), where many of its members have served the church as deacons since the 17th century. Cornelis Wagen(n)maker was from 1740 a preacher and 1743-d.84 an elder of the Wieringen congregation. He published Onderwyzing aangaande het Christelyk Geloof, a catechism (Amsterdam, 1759, repr. 1776). (DJ 1837, 117; DB 1891, 49, 50, 51, 57-59.) vdZ.

Wagmann, Uly, a Mennonite minister in the canton of Zürich, Switzerland, was arrested and imprisoned in the monastery of Oethenbach (q.v.), where he had to endure many hardships, from which he died in prison in 1654. (Mart. Mir. D 824, E 1122; see also Zürich.) vdZ.

Wagner, a family name found among the early Swiss Brethren; in 1529 there was a Marti Wagner in Therwil, Baselland, and a Hans Wagner in the Regensburg district. Bernhard Wagner (d. 1716/7), who was from 1712 an assistant of the Dutch ambassador Runckel (q.v.) and who settled the finances of the Mennonite emigrants to the Netherlands, was probably not a Mennonite. The martyr Georg (Jörg) Wagner (q.v.) was apparently not related to the former. Among the Hutterites in Moravia Georg Wagner (Wiser or Rader) was a preacher, who died in 1591 after having served for 31 years. In the 18th century some Wagners emigrated to America. Richard Wagner is elder of the Mennonite congregation at Frankfurt, Germany. vdZ.

Paul Peachey, Die soziale Herkunft der Schweizer Täufer (Karlsruhe, 1954) 141, No. 719; TA Zürich, 297, 298; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1359, 1363, 1369, 1373, 1388, 1390; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 420, 458, 592.

Wagner, Georg, one of the strong men of faith of the Reformation era, a martyr who is claimed by both the Lutherans and the Anabaptists. The Hutterite Chronik devotes two pages to his martyrdom (pp. 69-71). He stemmed, according to the account in the Hutterite chronicle, from Emering in Bavaria (Bavaria?). The date of his birth is unknown. He was seized in Munich, and was severely tortured in the Falkenturm. He persisted in four articles of faith: (1) the priests cannot forgive sin; (2) God or Christ is not bodily in the bread; (3) a human being cannot bring God from heaven; and (4) the water of baptism does not save. The greatest efforts were made to convert him. "Even the prince had pity upon him and is said to have most urgently admonished him and offered him a prebendary for his lifetime if he would recant." When the sad fate of his wife and child was presented to him, he said the two were so dear to him that he would not give them up for all of Bavaria; nevertheless for the sake of the Lord and God he would give them up. Nor was his wife able to persuade him. He died on Feb. 8, 1527. He was not Anabaptist. LOSERTH, H.S.B.

Wahli, Bendicht (c1720-95), a Swiss Mennonite elder, was born in Bolligen, Swiss canton of Bern. He married Katherina Oberli (d. 1771) of Lützel-flüh c1742, and rented the Berghaus (also called Maison Blanche) near Magglingen, on the mountain above Biel, in 1744. It was here that their four daughters and one son were born and raised. He was chosen as a minister of the Mennonites in the Jura in 1760 and became a highly respected leader. In 1782 he went with Peter Ramseyer, Hans Lehman, Hans Steiner, and David Baumgartner to Himmelshäuserhof, Palatinate, to help restore peace among the brethren there.

C. H. Meiners, Professors of Philosophy at the University of Göttingen, visited Bendicht Wahli while on a tour of Switzerland in the summer of 1782. In his printed report Meiners gives him the nickname "Täufer-Benz." He speaks of Wahli's industry in wresting a beautiful farm from a stony upland, walking for many miles over hill and valley to preach for several hours to a gathering of Anabaptists, earning his living by weaving; Meiners describes him as very intelligent and, though he had little schooling, able to speak with great knowledge on theological topics.

The Anabaptists have become well known in the canton of Bern because of an anecdote about "Täufer-Benz" that appeared in the obligatory reader for the fifth grade of the Bernese primary school in 1896-1920. The story relates that on a trip Täufer-Benz found a man weeping because he had been robbed of his money. Benz asked if he had been robbed of his God also. Receiving a negative reply, Benz said that then he had not been robbed of everything. Benz handed the astonished traveler his own filled purse saying that God had directed him to do this in His name. Before the traveler could recover from his astonishment Benz had proceeded on his way.

D.L.G.

Jakob Wyss, "Das Weisshaus (La Maison Blanche) in Leubringen," Bieler Jahrbuch 1933, 34-63; Heinrich Ludwig Lehmann, Das Bisthum Basel (1798) 101-3; A. Jakob Amstutz, "Die Wiedertäufer," Gem.-Kal., 1924, p. 48; C. H. Meiners, Briefe über die Schweiz I (1784) 147; ML IV.

Wahrheitsfreund, Der (1915-47), the German organ of the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church, was first published July 28, 1915. From that date to Oct. 25, 1933, it was published by the K.M.B. Publishing House, Chicago, Ill. In November 1933 the Krimmer Mennonite Publishing Committee became the publisher, with the office of publication at Hillsboro, Kan., for one year, and thereafter at Inman, Kan. The editors were M. B. Fast, July 28, 1915, to Dec. 26, 1917; D. M. Hofer, Jan. 2, 1918, to Oct. 25, 1933; J. G. Barkman during the one year at Hillsboro; J. H. Klassen from Nov. 7, 1935, until Dec. 12, 1945; and W. W. Harms from Dec. 9, 1945, until publication ceased. It appeared weekly, except for the first ten months of 1934, when it became biweekly. Each issue contained sixteen $12\frac{1}{4} \times 9\frac{1}{4}$ in. pages regularly from 1915 to July 5, 1933, and again from Nov. 21, 1934, until Jan. 1, 1941, having only 8 pages during the remainder of its history. The contents were typical of a denominational organ, with special features for young people and children. Articles in the English language appeared in the children's section as early as the second year of publication. By 1940 half of each issue was in the English language. Decline in the list of subscribers led the K.M.B. Conference in its October 1947 meeting to a decision to discontinue Der Wahrheitsfreund and to increase the size of its English counterpart, The Christian Witness. Der Wahrheitsfreund ceased publication with a special farewell number Nov. 5, 1947. (Nearly complete files in BeCl and GCL.) In September 1934 J. W. Tschetter, who had been associate editor of Der Wahrheitsfreund 1918-33 and an intimate colleague of D. M. Hofer in the K.M.B. Chicago Mission, started a rival paper called The Friend of Truth (q.v.), which was discontinued in April 1939. N.P.S.

Waibl, Johannes, a Hutterite, d. March 2, 1661, at Velké Levary, Czechoslovakia. He is the author of the song, "In meinem letzten endte rueff ich, o, Herr, zu dir," found in Wolkan, Lieder, 242 f., but not found in the Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder. (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 499; ML IV.)

Waisenamt (Orphans Office), an extraordinarily useful and important mutual aid church institution developed by the Mennonites in Russia for the administration of the estates of orphans, later used for a similar service to widows and elderly people or anyone needing help in the investment, care, and administration of funds. In effect the Waisenamt became a trust institution and almost a bank, rendering many services which modern trust companies and commercial banks perform on a business basis. The Waisenamt was actually a committee of usually two or three men called "Waisenmänner" (the chairman being called "Waisenältester," i.e., Orphan Elder), competent and experienced in handling financial matters, who served without pay (later the chairman was paid) in the spirit of Christian brotherly love. Since the capital accumulated during the operations of the trust committee soon attained considerable size and often had to be held for a period of years, it became necessary to invest the trust funds to secure returns in the form of interest; hence an investment business naturally developed. Persons seeking credit likewise naturally turned to the Waisenamt for loans. Inevitably a type of banking business developed.

Such an institution could develop only in a group or society set up in relative isolation from the surrounding culture and legally given a considerable degree of autonomy, as was the case in the Mennonite settlements established in Russia in 1789 f. and 1803 f. In a sense the Waisenamt was a necessity, particularly in the absence of adequate Russian governmental provisions in this field, as well as because of the wide variation between local Russian customs relating to inheritance and those brought along from West Prussia. A similar situation prevailed in Manitoba and Paraguay when immigrants from Russia reached these lands, although in Manitoba the legal arrangements were much more adequate. In Manitoba also, as the state came more and more to regulate private financial and lending institutions, compulsory regulation and finally incorporation was forced upon several of the Waisenamt organizations there. With the exception of this one region the Mennonite Waisenamt institution developed autonomously in the 19th century and remained so to the Revolution in Russia. It is still completely free in Mexico and Paraguay to operate autonomously in accord with the long-established customs and experience of the group. Numbers of men have rendered outstanding service to their people through their Waisenamt service, particularly in Russia and Manitoba. Fortunately a brief history and description of the Waisenamt as it developed in Russia is available from the pen of Johann Riediger, the last Orphan Elder of the Halbstadt district in the Molotschna settlement of South Russia, written in 1930 at Mölln, Germany, where Riediger was a refugee at the time. It was published as the introduction to a booklet called Teilungsordnung der in Süd-Russland angesiedelten Mennoniten, auf Anregung der mennonitischen Flüchtlinge in Deutschland neu herausgegeben (Karlsruhe, 1930). This account is presented in translation in the immediately following paragraphs.

"Since there is a danger that children will squander what the parents have saved through their labor, and also that inherited property may be administered poorly or in bad faith by relatives or friends, it becomes necessary to protect the interests of minor heirs, both in their personal life and in their finances, by means of special regulations. This was clearly recognized by the Mennonites in Russia when in 1807 they wrote down in 17 points the traditional practices regarding rights of inheritance and division of estates which they had brought along from the old homeland. This was simply the customary practice, quite simple practical rules which had proved their value in the course of the years. In 1814 these inheritance regulations (Teilungsordnung) were enlarged to 27 points. Later they were repeatedly revised in 1824, 1826, 1843, 1850; in 1894 the regulations were thoroughly reviewed and published in a small booklet in German and Russian by the publishing firm of H. A. Ediger in Berdyansk [called Teilungsordnung].

"In 1904 all the village communes of the Halbstadt district decided to reorganize the management of Waisenamt funds by establishing the Halbstadt Orphans Fund (Waisenkasse). The writer had had sufficient experience in the management of the previous system to learn its shortcomings and to help correct them in the new plan. He can highly recommend the new system in the form in which it existed in Halbstadt from that day on to the end.

"The Orphan Elders [managers] met weekly in Halbstadt to execute the necessary deposits and withdrawals of all trust monies. It should be inserted here that one should not give one man [elder] the responsibility for more than 8-10 villages (200-50 families) and that in any case a sort of Orphans Court should be established for the arbitration of disputes. Each village had its own record book in the Orphans Fund, in which all transactions were entered. For each ward of the trust one page was reserved. . . . The investment capital for each ward was paid into the Fund by his guardian and loaned out at 6 per cent, of which 5 per cent was credited annually to the ward, one per cent being used for overhead and to build up a reserve. The non-investment capital of a ward was only deposited but could be loaned out under certain conditions by the administrator of the Fund. The Orphan Elder received an annual allowance. The management costs were covered by a one-half per cent levy on participating capital deposits.

"The funds of aged widows and widowers, and in fact of all persons who were unable to manage their affairs themselves, were administered under the same terms. The money deposited for investment could be loaned out only in the Halbstadt district and for a maximum period of five years. Each borrower had to furnish two bondsmen whose signatures were to be attested by the elder for the village, whereby the village assumed a certain degree of guarantee for the loaned money of the ward. Guardians and caretakers [curators] had to be approved by the Waisenant administration after their elections."

The published Teilungsordnung of 1930 contained two parts: (I) Teilungs-Ordnung der Molotschnaer Mennoniten-Gemeinde und deren Tochter-Kolonien in 25 paragraphs, and (II) Teilungs-Ordnung der Chortitzsaer Mennoniten-Gemeinden und deren Tochterkolonien in 61 paragraphs, a total of 64 pages. Authentic printed copies of the original booklets were brought along from Russia and edited for publication by Benjamin H. Unruh. The publication was financed by the MCC, and several hundred copies were sent with the refugees to Brazil and Paraguay, where apparently each Mennonite colony set up a Waisenamt.

The Bergthal Waisenamt in Russia was used as the institution to finance the emigration of that group to Manitoba, although numbers of families also secured private loans. This Waisenamt had about $100,000 of capital at the time (1874). A flat levy of 25 per cent was made on all deposits to aid the penniless among the emigrants. This entire Waisenamt was simply transferred to Manitoba where it kept on functioning, as was the case with all the separate immigrant groups. After the division of the Bergthal church in Manitoba into three bodies, there were five Waisenamt institutions at the same time in Manitoba: (1) Old Colony and the Fürstenland group; (2) Kleine Gemeinde; (3) Chortitz of the Bergthal group in the East Reserve; (4) Bergthal of the liberal Bergthal group in the West Reserve; and (5) Sommerfeld of the conservative Bergthal group in the West Reserve.

"In Russia-Manitoba Waisenamt was not only a trust company, but an institution whose rules represented a body of laws regulating the transfer of property from one generation to another. Finally it served as a savings bank and finance institution. Historically the principles under which it operated reflected ancient concepts of farm property and inheritance which once had been widespread among the German colonists in Eastern Europe" (Francis, Utopia, p. 125, where the basic principles of inheritance and the operating regulations are described in detail).

The Waisenamt regulations were not only social rules but were grounded in Bible passages and hence had religious sanctions. The church elder had to sign every inheritance transfer contract. Even though the regulations in Manitoba had to be approved by the provincial government (they were always approved because not considered legally binding or in conflict with Manitoba law), they were still considered by the people as church regulations.

The Waisenamts in Manitoba served the people well until the time of the depression in the 1920's. The two which had been incorporated in Manitoba under government pressure went bankrupt, since borrowers were unable to repay loans, and depositors therefore could not secure repayments. To date the two bankrupt institutions have not been fully reorganized and are therefore not functioning. However there are still (1958) six Canadian Waisenamts in existence, four in Manitoba (three in the West Reserve and one in the East Reserve) and at least two in Saskatchewan where they are simply called "Mennonite Waisenamt." In Manitoba the four are called Sommerfelder, Bergthaler, Rosengart, and Chortitz.

The Waisenamts established in the Mennonite settlements in Mexico and Paraguay, 1922-30, have functioned effectively, although in Paraguay the co-operatives have taken over much of the function of providing credit to borrowers.

The basic decree-law (Privilegium) governing the settlement of Mennonites in Paraguay, adopted in 1927, contains in Article Two the following provision: "To administer the inheritances and especially the properties of widows and orphans by means of their special system of trust committees known as Waisenamt and in accordance with the particular rules of the community without any kind of restriction." Article Six specifies that there must be a report to the government by "the recognized authorities of the colonists" of "the names, authorities, and regulations of the trust committees (Waisenamt) in order that these may be approved by Congress." H.S.B.

J. W. Fretz, Mennonite Colonization in Mexico (Akron, 1945) 28 f.; idem, Pilgrims in Paraguay (Scottsdale, 1958) 105, 230; E. K. Francis, In Search of Utopia (Altona, 1955) 125-30; idem, "Mennonite Institutions in Early Manitoba, A Study of Their Origins," Agricultural History XXII (1948) 147 f., 150.

Waisenhaus (Orphanage), a prison in Bern, Switzerland, was built in 1657 as a dual purpose building: (1) as a reformatory and (2) as a training school for orphan children. It was located on the north side of the French Church (then the Predigerkirche). From the beginning it was also used as a prison for Anabaptists, and the very first instruction (July 13, 1657) to the board of managers specified that provision be made for "Widerteufer." Then on Dec. 20, 1658, the city council ordered the magistrates of Thun, Burgdorf, Langenthal, and Brugg to arrest the Anabaptist ministers and send them to Bern, and decreed that "a directorium of civil and clerical persons be established to see that this intent against the Anabaptist sect be diligently pursued and execution accomplished." This was the origin of the notorious "Täuferkammer" (Anabaptist Bureau; see Bern, ME I, 295) set up later. A subcommission of six was then set up on Jan. 4, 1659, called "Comitteerten zum Teufferischen geschefft," which had direct charge of Anabaptist matters under the Waisenhaus board. The first Anabaptist minister to be imprisoned in the Waisenhaus was Anthoni Himmelberg (q.v.), incarcerated on June 24, 1658, who died in prison on Oct. 25, 1660. The Waisenhaus served for many years as the Anabaptist incarceration house. H.S.B.

Adolf Fluri, "Das Waisenhaus als Täufer-Gefängnis," Beiträge zur Geschichte der Bernischen Täufer (Bern, 1912) 22 pp. of a reprint from Blätter für bernische Geschichte, Kunst und Altertumskunde.

Wakarusa, a town (pop. 1200) located in Olive Twp., Elkhart Co., Ind. Mennonite pioneers had settled in the vicinity before 1852, when the town was platted, and the Holdeman Mennonite (MC) Church had been built the year before. Approximately 60 Mennonite families live in the town, and about 10 business establishments are operated or managed by Mennonites. The town is a shopping center for some 750 Mennonites. The six Mennonite churches in the vicinity include Holdeman (MC), Salem (MC), Olive (MC), Yellow Creek (MC), Yellow Creek (Wisler), and Blossers (Wisler). The County Line (Wisler) church, 2 miles west and 1½ miles north of Wakarusa, was used for a number of years as an alternate place of worship for the Yellow Creek-Blossers group. The first Mennonite settlers in the Wakarusa community were Holdeman, Weldy, Davidhizar, Smeltzer, Lechlitner, Loucks, and Hartman families. L.V.C.

Walch, Johannes (b. 1551), of Schorndorf, Württemberg, an Anabaptist, in some way related to Heinrich and Hans Walch, who in 1542 were named in the "Turkish tax list," but are missing in the list of 1545. Heinrich was mayor of Schorndorf, but had committed some wrong and was expelled in 1545; likewise his brother Hans, a cooper, fled to Stetten, the refuge of the Anabaptists and Schwenckfelders under Hans Konrad Thumb (q.v.) in 1545. Possibly Heinrich and Hans were brothers, the former aiding the latter to escape. On Nov. 14, 1571, the retired mayor of Schorndorf, Hans Ulrich Walch, was a cosignatory of the will of a tanner, Hans Heutlin, whose wife emigrated after his death as an Anabaptist. A close relationship has not been established.

Johann Walch studied at the University of Tübingen, received the Master's degree in 1573, and then a musical degree (Repetens musicus). In 1578 he became deacon in Nürtingen. On December 4, he made a note in the Nürtingen baptismal record that before he performed a baptism he asked the sponsors questions about the power, benefit, comfort, and necessity of baptism, its originator, and the duties of the sponsors. In 1579 seven such tests were listed in the baptismal record. His seriousness as a pastor is evident. But this did not add to his popularity. There were also disputes with the priest Elias Benignus, as recorded in the Stuttgart Synodalprotokoll of March 11, 1581. Walch as deacon insisted among other things that the impenitent be excluded, which the priest would have the official right to do, and discussed this question among his confidential friends. But the congregation wished to have him transferred.

In January 1582 the authorities suspected Johann Walch of Anabaptist ideas. On January 20 he made the last entry into the baptismal record. Walch asked for release from his position, saying that he could not officiate any longer in view of the abuse of absolution and communion. During his examination he was recognized as an Anabaptist, though he tried to talk himself out of it. Finally he admitted that he had no faith either in Anabaptism or in the presence of Christ in the emblems of communion. The discussions lasted from Jan. 21 to Feb. 9, 1582; he refused to be instructed thereby.

The duke directed that he be put into the monastery at Bebenhausen. He was held there four months. The abbot, who was Eberhard Bidebach, the son-in-law of Johannes Brenz (q.v.), was assisted by Jacob Andreae, Heerbrand, Dietrich Schnepf, and other Tübingen theologians in trying to convert Walch. Walch finally signed a recantation on July 12, 1582. He now went to Stuttgart to the home of his father-in-law Ludwig Daser, the ducal director of music, who was to keep an eye on him. But in a short time he secretly went to Moravia with his wife Marie, his sons Severus and Secundus, and his sister Maria. From Pausram, which he reached by way of Vienna, he wrote to a citizen of Nürtingen, inviting him to follow them to Moravia. After his sister's death he returned. That was not later than 1587, for on Nov. 17, 1587, her estate was divided among the heirs.

Walch next went to Rod on the Rieberg, across the Rhine, three miles from Speyer. He lived on the Remberg estate of the Count of Löwenstein, serving as a cattle supervisor and physician (Arzneikundiger), as Veltin Rod (Wendel), an Anabaptist living in Rod, wrote to the inspecting abbot of Maulbronn. He must have won some adherents not only in chemistry (alchemy), but also in Anabaptism. The physician Hieronymus Walch and his son by the same name later appearing in Württemberg were perhaps his descendants.

Walch wrote scientific and philosophical tracts, which he published in Strasbourg in 1609 and 1618. In 1609 his Decas fabularum humani generis appeared, which contains some information about Marpeck. The foreword he wrote in his museum in Meistratzheim in Lower Alsace as the guest of the lords of Landsberg. On May 2, 1608, he dedicated the pamphlet to his students, Günther von Landsberg and Johann Reichard Wurmser von Wendenheim. In 1619 his tract of philosophical and chemical content appeared, called Der kleine Bauer, sampt beygefügtten commentariis, dedicated to Count Johann Reinhard von Hanna und Zweibrücken on July 25, 1618. In the home of the canon Johann Gessler he wrote to Jung S. Peter about the silver mine in Ste-Marie-aux-Mines (Alsace). When and where Walch died is not known. Walch was one of the Swiss Brethren, and was thereby opposed to the Hutterite doctrine of community of goods. Thomas Hägen, an Anabaptist refugee from Göppingen to Moravia, sent him a greeting on July 25, 1597, by way of David Laister. At that time Walch was in Strasbourg. (ML IV.) G.Bos.

Walcheren, an island belonging to the Dutch province of Zeeland (q.v.); Middelburg, the capital of Zeeland, is located on this island. Anabaptists were found at Walcheren by 1534, and later there were Mennonite congregations at Middelburg, Vlissingen, both of which still exist, and Veere, which died out shortly after 1671. In the early 17th century the Reformed classis of Walcheren, which was very strict and intolerant, acted against the Mennonites, but nevertheless the Mennonite congregations on Walcheren could develop.

In the early 18th century Walcheren for some years was the refuge for a number of Mennonite families who had been expelled from Lithuania (q.v.). They came to the Netherlands in December 1732 and were settled partly at Wageningen (q.v.) and partly on the island of Walcheren, where the Mennonite Committee for Foreign Needs bought farms for them in several villages. The church board of Middelburg (q.v.) administered the farms and aided the refugees in their many needs and difficulties. At first (December 1732) 15 families settled at Walcheren, in the following years some of the refugees from Wageningen also moved to Walcheren, but by 1736 some of them returned to Prussia, followed by the others. Most of them had left Walcheren by 1739; the last of these settlers left in 1744. The settlers did not feel at home and complained of the interference of the Middelburg deacons and the "big bosses" of the Amsterdam committee. The colonization was a failure.

The Dutch Mennonites spent about 80,000 Dutch guilders for this adventure.

During World War II Walcheren was badly damaged; the town of Vlissingen (q.v.) was largely destroyed; its Mennonite church was bombed. And in September 1944 nearly the whole island was flooded and the population had to flee. An MCC reconstruction unit of 11 men served on Walcheren from May 28, 1946, to Dec. 22, 1947. After the flood disaster of Feb. 1, 1953, a Mennonite voluntary service group worked on Walcheren. vDZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1995-2243; DB 1883, 88 ff.; 1884, 104 ff.; 1897, 163; 1908, 3 ff., 29; Menn. Life I (January 1946) 33-37; J. D. Unruh, In the Name of Christ (Scottsdale, 1952) 115-17.

Walchers Liedboek (Vlissingen, 1613) is a Dutch songbook composed by Jan Philipsz Schabaelje (q.v.) and his brother Dirk Schabaelje. vDZ.

Waldeck, formerly a small principality between Westphalia on the north and west and Hesse-Nassau on the south and east, capital Arolsen. It remained independent until 1867 when the administration of government was turned over to Prussia. The prince, however, remained on the throne until Nov. 13, 1918, when Waldeck became a Free State. In 1929 it was completely merged with Prussia. The village of Waldeck (pop. 900) lies in the province of Hesse-Nassau.

An Amish community existed in Waldeck and the neighboring territories of Wittgenstein, Berleburg, and Hesse for at least a century. In all the issues of the Dutch Naamlijst that reported German congregations, 1766-1810, Waldeck, Wittgenstein, and Berleburg all appear as congregations with separate ministerial lists. In 1766 Berleburg is described as 10 (2 German miles) miles from Wittgenstein and Wittgenstein as 18 (4 German miles) miles from Marburg (Hesse). The introduction to the 1797 edition of the Elbing Catechism states, "We elders and ministers of the Mennonite Church, who live in Hesse and Waldeck, have united to publish anew this catechism," but the title page says the booklet is published by "die Christliche Gemeinde im Waldeckischen welche Mennonisten benennet werden." The Naamlijst calls all three congregations "Zwitters." Apparently the scattered families lived not too far apart to think of themselves as one church, and it is known that the families were interrelated.

The Naamlijst reports as ministers for the Waldeck congregations: 1766, Michael Güngerich, Johannes Schänebeck, Christian Güngerich, Hans König, Christian Jungerich Jr.; 1769, the same except Schänebeck; 1780, Hans König as elder (ord. 1770), Christian Güngerich as elder (ord. 1773), and Bantz Schwartztrauben (ord. 1775); 1784, the same two elders plus Peter Güngerich and Christian Güngerich Jr.; 1786, 1793, 1802, and 1810, the same. For Wittgenstein only one appears, always David Ekker 1766-1810 (ord. c1760). For Berleburg likewise only one appears 1766-1810, always Michael Güngerich (ord. 1775), in 1766 called Jr.

The meetings were certainly held in rotation in the homes. The meeting which decided on publishing the catechism is stated in the introduction to have been held on a farm called Mittelhof in Niederhessen Dec. 11, 1796. From information secured from descendants who migrated to America c1831-35, two locations in Waldeck are known as places of residence; Mengeringhausen in Waldeck, where Christian Schwartzentruber was born in 1765, and where he operated a mill at the edge of town called the Galgenmühle; Hüninghausen, an estate near Helsen in Waldeck, where Christian Güngerich rented a dairy farm in 1743. (These two places are about 1½ miles apart, some 20 miles west of Kassel. Reinhardtshausen in Waldeck is also named as an Amish address in 1818.)

Among the family names known to have been found among the Amish in this general area including Hesse-Nassau, were Güngerich, Schwartzentruber, Schönbeck, Otto, Brenneman, Bender, Roth, Schöttler(?). The John Bender family emigrated to Somerset County, Pa., in 1851 from Oberweimar near Marburg in Hesse. The source of these families is not certain, but it was probably Alsace. In 1738 a Christian Güngerich formerly living on the Fleckstein Hof willed to Christian Güngerich the estate of Rödern in Northern Alsace.

Most of the Amish families of Waldeck and Hesse emigrated to Canada and the United States in the period 1830-60. The first location was Somerset County, Pa., near Springs, and Grantsville, Garrett Co., Md. Another was west of Kitchener, Ont. A third was Kalona, Iowa, although most of the settlers came to this region from Somerset County or its daughter settlement in Holmes County, Ohio. A few families, among them the Güngerich family, came first to Fairfield County, Ohio, then to Kalona. A considerable number of 20th-century Mennonite (MC) and Amish ministers and teachers descend directly from the Waldeck-Hesse group, among them S. C. Yoder, Simon Gingerich, Amos Gingerich, Paul Guengerich, Orland Gingerich, Melvin Gingerich, A. Lloyd Swartzendruber, Elmer Swartzendruber, D. H. Bender, H. S. Bender, Paul Bender, Ezra Bender. A majority of the Springs-Grantsville Mennonite and Amish membership of today, as well as about half of the Johnson County, Iowa, Mennonite and Amish groups, descend from the Waldeck-Hesse Amish.

The group who remained in Waldeck-Hesse gradually died out, and by the late 19th century had completely disappeared. A Paul Güngerich of Plettenburg, Westphalia, in 1957 reported that his parents were Mennonites and that he had been reared a Mennonite. The complaint of Christian Gingerich, a tenant of the Fiddemühlen farm in 1859, may be indicative of conditions: "He has for some time been unable to satisfy his religious needs in the Mennonite society because the sermons of the Mennonite preachers annoy rather than edify and even cause merriment. Also the celebration of the sacraments, especially that of the Holy Lord's Supper, were conducted without sanctity and the preceding ordinance of footwashing takes place with gross joking." In the absence of any representation of the Waldeck-Niederhesse congregation at the Offental (near St. Goarshausen) Amish Conference of May 20-21, 1867, it may be assumed that the congregation had died out by that time. The congregation had been represented in the notable Esingen (q.v.) Amish Conference of 1779 in the Palatinate by Christian Güngerich and Hans Schwartzentruber. Many of the descendants of the now extinct congregation joined the state church in Hesse and Waldeck. One of them, a Brenneman, is now serving as a Lutheran district superintendent in Hesse. The Hüninghausen estate was in the possession of the Güngerich family until World War I.

H.S.B.

Waldenses, the most important sectarian religious movement of the later Middle Ages, descendants of which still exist, known since 1532 as the Waldensian Church of Italy, a Protestant evangelical body, Reformed-Calvinistic in theology and polity. About the earlier history of the Waldenses considerable uncertainty exists because of the lack of adequate sources. Even the name is in doubt, although it was probably given because of Peter Waldo of Lyons, France, the founder of at least the French wing of the movement, a rich merchant who c1177 gave away his property and began a movement for Bible study and preaching, sending out his followers two by two. His followers were called the Poor Men of Lyons, since they took a vow of poverty. A similar movement about the same time in northern Italy, called the Poor Men of Lombardy, was probably a continuation of the Humiliati or followers of Arnold of Brescia. An attempted alliance of the two movements in 1184 was only partially successful. Their disregard of the prohibition of preaching by laymen issued in 1179 by the pope led to their persecution in many places for centuries, but did not result in their formal withdrawal from the Catholic Church. Most of them continued to observe the Mass and baptize their infants in the church. Although they suffered greatly they were never totally wiped out except in certain regions. Numerous martyrdoms were recorded; e.g., in Strasbourg some 80 were burned at the stake in 1211. Religious colloquies held to win them back to the church (e.g., in 1191 and 1206) were futile.

Various accounts have been given of their rapid growth and extensive spread geographically and in numbers, some of which are perhaps exaggerated. They spread early (1231-33) into South Germany, especially in Württemberg and Bavaria. In Austria about the same time the number was reported at 80,000. In South Germany they won many converts among the wool weavers. Nobles were among their patrons and even members. The Saxon nobleman, Johannes Drandorf, was martyred at Worms in 1423. Two of their most prominent martyrs were their bishops Friedrich Reiser (Strasbourg, 1450) and Stephen (Vienna, 1471). The last persecution in Germany was in 1479, ordered by Elector Albrecht Achilles of Prussia.

The Waldenses spread northward down the Rhine and into the Low Countries, as well as eastward into Bohemia, Moravia, Silesia, and Poland. As early as the 13th century they found refuge in the Alpine valleys of Piedmont west of Turin, and it is here that the remnant survived from which the modern Waldensian Church has sprung. Everywhere else they finally died out, largely before the Reformation, though not everywhere by that time. By 1719 the total number of Waldenses was c4,000 including children. Civic rights and a certain amount of religious freedom was granted by the Italian government on Feb. 17, 1848.

Romantic hero worship has often been inclined to make the medieval Waldenses full evangelicals of Protestant character, but this was not the case. They did emphasize the authority of the Bible as the only guide for faith and life, and laid particular stress on the words and example of Jesus, especially the Sermon on the Mount. They at first rejected all killing including capital punishment and war, and were nonresistant, although in the 17th century they defended themselves by arms, having dropped nonresistance and other earlier principles, including rejection of the oath and government office, when they became Reformed in 1532. Originally they formed an association of men and women who had rejected the world and had obligated themselves to apostolic poverty and a life of discipleship to Jesus through a formal vow. Some expressed doubts about infant baptism, but it was never rejected by the group. They rejected the hierarchy of priests and insisted upon the right of laymen to preach. Their preaching consisted usually of simple admonition to repentance, faith, and obedience in following the commands of Christ. Though not formally withdrawing from the Catholic Church, they set up at least later their own organization with a threefold ministry of bishop, presbyter, and deacon, with formal ordination. The preacher was called "uncle."

In modern times, about the middle of the 19th century, they experienced a spiritual revival, largely under influence from England, which ultimately turned them into an aggressive evangelistic group. The number of congregations and members in the new congregations in the cities such as Tunis, Milan, Venice, Rome, Bologna, Florence, and Naples has for some time been larger than at the home base congregations in the Piedmont valleys. In 1930 there were some 80 congregations with 22,907 members, including a considerable emigrant colony in Uruguay and a few congregations in the Eastern United States.

Mennonites have had little contact with the Waldenses. Dutch Mennonites gave them some support in the 19th century, and Anna Brons (q.v.) of Emden raised a bicentennial offering for them in 1889, amounting to 880 marks. From the late summer of 1946 to 1949 the MCC carried on relief work in the Waldensian valleys for the population there which had suffered heavily during the war. Headquarters were maintained in Torre Pellice, the Waldensian capital. This was followed by a student exchange program whereby a number of young Waldenses studied in American Mennonite colleges. A warm feeling of fellowship developed between the Mennonite workers and the Waldensian Church and H. S. Bender served as a fraternal delegate at the Waldensian Synod in 1948 and also lectured at the Waldensian Theological Seminary in that same year. In 1950 Waldensian preachers in Uruguay were helpful in establishing the Mennonite settlement at El Ombu (q.v.).

The theory of Waldensian origin of the Anabaptists was popular among Dutch and German Mennonites in the 17th-19th centuries, though never proposed by the 16th-century Anabaptists themselves. It was held by such writers as van Braght (Martyrs' Mirror of 1660), who seemingly took it over from the earlier martyr books (e.g., the 1631 Haarlem book), Herman Schijn, and Galenus Abrahamz, and from them was passed on to others. Apparently the Mennonite writers ultimately derived their authority for the theory from Sebastian Franck (Chronica, p. 483) or from a supposed similarity of teachings. It was also a convenient apologetic weapon to counter those enemies who attributed Anabaptist origins to the Münsterites. It was, however, approved by Carel van Gent (1615), and such writers as Brandt, Meshovius, and Gottfried Arnold. Modern historians all reject the theory, such as Kühler and van der Zijpp in Holland, Crous, Hege, and Neff in Germany, and Horsch and Smith in America. No actual case of a Waldensian becoming an Anabaptist has ever been adduced, and the early leaders in Switzerland, Holland, South Germany, and Austria can all be identified as either Catholic or Protestant in background. No Waldensian congregation was demonstrably in existence in German Switzerland for c100 years before the Anabaptist beginning in 1525. The same is true for Holland and South Germany.

A different situation obtained in Bohemia and Moravia. It is known that the Waldenses had great success in this area in the 14th-15th centuries; over 300 congregations are reported to have been in existence at one time. A. H. Newman held that Waldensian views were communicated to the Bohemian Brethren, and that from both groups members joined the Moravian Anabaptists in the 16th century. This still does not prove a Waldensian or Bohemian Brethren origin for the Moravian Anabaptists, since it is known that Hubmaier, Reublin, and refugees from Tirol introduced Anabaptism at Nikolsburg in 1526 ff. However, the similarity of teachings of the strict group of the Bohemian Brethren and those of the Anabaptists is sufficient ground for more careful study of the relation of the two groups, and with them of the Waldenses in this area. It is well known that a bishop of the Waldenses ordained the first bishop of the Bohemian Brethren c1460.

The tempting and romantic theory of apostolic succession from the apostles down to the Anabaptists through successive Old Evangelical groups, which has been very popular with those among Mennonites and Baptists who feel the need of such an apostolic succession, always includes the Waldenses as the last link before the Anabaptists. It has, also, no basis in fact. NEFF, H.S.B.

Ludwig Keller, Reformation; idem, Johann Staupitz und die Anfänge der Reformation (Leipzig, 1885); K. Müller, Die Waldenser und ihre einzelnen Gruppen bis zum Anfang des 14. Jahrhunderts (Gotha, 1886); idem, Die Waldenser und die Deutschen Bibelübersetzungen. Nebst Beiträgen zur Geschichte der Reformation (Leipzig, 1886); Ignaz von Döllinger, Dokumente vornehmlich zur Geschichte der Waldensier und Katharer (Munich, 1890); James Gibson, The Waldenses, 3rd ed. (London, 1909); Emile Comba, Storia dei Valdesi (1934); Menn. Life V (April 1950) contains the following articles: Bertha Fast, "Waldensians After World War II"; Albert Roland, "Waldensians—Their Heroic Story"; and Sandro Sarti, "Waldensians and the Mennonites"; Blaupot t. C., Geschiedkundig onderzoek naar den Waldensischen oorsprong van de Nederlandsche Doopsgezinden (Amsterdam, 1844); Marten Schagen, Historie der Christenen, die men gemennlyk Waldensen noemt (Haarlem, 1765); ML IV.

Waldhauser, Thomas (Thoman Waldhauser, or "Tall Thoman"), played an important role among the Anabaptists in Upper Austria. After he had become a Protestant he gave up his position as Catholic chaplain in Grein—he is often called Thoman von Grein—and accepted a position with the Lutheran barons of Hardegg in the village of Krauz. Since he was not satisfied with the Lutheranism adopted by his baron, he joined the brotherhood of the Anabaptists in Styria in 1527. From Styria he went to Bavaria with the schoolmaster of Wels (q.v.) and in Regensburg associated with Ludwig Haetzer. From Bavaria he went to Moravia. At the beginning of the next year he was in prison at Brno. In the spring of 1528 Hans Kuhn of Passau wrote that Brother Thoman von Grein was in prison. After a long imprisonment and trial he was sentenced to death with two other Brethren, called Balthasar and Dominicus in both the Hutterite Chronicle and van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror; all three died at the stake on the Friday before Easter, April 10, 1528, at Brno. A letter by Johannes of Zwola to Johannes Hess, from Tobichau, dated April 15, 1528, indicates that one of these two men was the Bohemian Brother Johann Cizek (Zeising, q.v.). Waldhauser wrote an epistle of farewell, which is found in manuscripts 163 and 190 at Pressburg, with the title, "Ein Sendbrief Thoman Waldhausers an die so Brüder gewesen sein—zu Brünn. Im 1528. Jahr gesandt aus der Gefangnis zu Brünn am Samstag vorm Palmtag genannten Jahrs."

Before they were sentenced the three warned the council against the shedding of innocent blood, for God would not leave it unpunished. One of the councillors mocked at this idea and acted as if he were washing his hands (in innocence). "But God gave him his washing," says the Chronicle. He died suddenly even before the Brethren were executed. In prison Thomas wrote a brief, moving letter of consolation to the Brethren at Brno. The report had reached him that several of the Brethren had recanted in the face of the raging dragon, which greatly grieved him and led him to write to them, reminding them that God in His great love had sent His own Son to redeem them from sin and to bring them eternal life, and urging watchfulness and steadfastness. In conclusion he besought them to pray for him, because he felt that God would soon release him from his suffering. It was his only wish that his death might bring honor to God. To all who were serving God with a pure heart he sent a sincere parting greeting. (Moravian national archives at Brno, Beck collection no. 56, pp. 1-4; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 65; Mart. Mir. D 42, E 428; see also Thomas; ML IV.) W.W.

Waldheim, a Mennonite village name found in the Molotschna settlement in the Ukraine, the West Reserve of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Cuauhu-temoc in Mexico, and in Menno, Friesland, Volendam, and Villarrica in Paraguay. (See Villages.) C.K.

Waldheim (Russian, Waltajem, later Solianka) and Dosidorf (Zabara). About 1837 twelve Swiss-Volhynian Mennonite families from Horodyszczce (q.v.), Volhynia, settled the two villages, Waldheim and Dosidorf, which were located approximately 20 miles southwest of Novograd-Volynsk. In 1843 this congregation was called the "Gemeinde in der Colonie Dosidorf," but later Waldheim became the leading village. The land was owned by the settlers, this being the first instance of ownership among the Swiss-Volhynian Mennonites. The church was served by elders Joseph and Johan Schrag and minister Christian Graber. A few families left the two villages in 1861 and joined the new settlement at Neumannovka-Kutusovka (q.v.) in eastern Volhynia. The entire Waldheim-Dosidorf group emigrated to Hutchinson and Turner counties in South Dakota in 1874. M.H.S.

Waldheim, Sask., is a town (pop. 462) situated in a Mennonite district about 35 miles north of Saskatoon. The two main churches of the town are the Canadian Conference (GCM) Church with 209 members (1957) and J. L. Zacharias as leading minister, and the Mennonite Brethren Church with 87 members and J. H. Jantzen as the leader and deacon. The town also has a Seventh-Day Adventist Church, whose members come mostly from Mennonites. There is also a hospital in the town. J.G.R.

Waldheim Mennonite Brethren Church, located in the town of Waldheim in northern Saskatchewan, a member of the Canadian M.B. Conference, was organized in 1918 with 88 members under the leadership of Elder David Dyck. Since its organization 150 members have been baptized. Following the revival under F. J. Wiens in 1930 thirty-four were baptized and after a revival in 1947 thirty-three. A church was built in 1919. The membership in 1957 was 89. Presiding ministers of the church have been Elder David Dyck, Jacob T. Ediger, G. A. Willems, and the present (1957) leader, John H. Jantzen. J.H.E.

Waldner (Waltner), a Hutterite family name stemming from Aemlach, Carinthia, Austria. Jörg Waldner was one of the Lutheran Carinthian exiles who were expelled to Hungary in 1755 because they refused to accept Catholicism. He was sent to Transylvania, and there united with the Hutterian Brethren at Alwinz (q.v.). His son Johannes Waldner, a preacher, was the chronicler of the Klein-Geschichtsbuch. He died in Russia on Dec. 14, 1824. During this time the Hutterites abandoned their practice of community (q.v.) of goods. Michael Waldner, also a preacher, reinstituted community of goods in 1859, and joined the emigration to the United States in 1874, where they established the first American Bruderhof at Bon Homme, 20 miles west of Yankton, S.D. The name is now found in the Hutterite communities in South Dakota, Montana, Alberta, and Manitoba. There are 34

Hutterite ministers with this name. The name as found in the General Conference Mennonite Church (Waltner) is of Hutterite origin. Erland Waltner is president of Mennonite Biblical Seminary, Elkhart, Ind., and Lena Waltner is instructor in art at Bethel College. Harris Waltner and James Waltner are G.C.M. pastors in Kansas. (Zieglschmid, Klein-Geschichtsbuch, 269.) D.D.

Waldner, Christian, chosen to the Hutterian Brethren ministry June 26, 1898, and confirmed by Darius Walter in Canada. After the death of Elias Walter he became the elder of the Dariusleut (q.v.), living in the West Raley Bruderhof in Canada. He died Feb. 23, 1937. D.D.

Waldner, Jakob, a minister of the Hutterian Brethren, chosen in 1875 by the Bruderhof in Bon Homme, S.D., was confirmed July 7, 1877. He died Aug. 11, 1897, at the age of 59 years, having served in the ministry for 22. By trade he was a smith and was one of the first to join the Schmiedeleut (q.v.) wing of the Hutterian Brethren, of which Michael Waldner and Jakob Hofer were ministers. Both of these men were blacksmiths in Russia. Jakob Waldner also served as a teacher for 14 years. D.D.

Waldner, Johannes (1749-1824), born near Villach, Carinthia, of Lutheran parents, with whom he migrated on the order of Empress Maria Theresa to Transylvania in 1755, along with other Lutherans. Here the entire Carinthian exile group turned Hutterite and became the very soul of a revitalization of the brotherhood. In his later years he wrote his recollections, called Denkwürdigkeiten, as a sort of continuation of the old Hutterite chronicle, the Geschicht-Buch. Thus grew a remarkable new book, the Klein-Geschichtsbuch der Hutterischen Brüder (first printed in 1947). Waldner wrote the story only to the year 1802; the remainder to 1947 was done by other writers. In this work he mentioned his own experiences at different places.

In 1767 Waldner shared the dramatic flight of the brotherhood across the mountains into Rumania (Walachia) and all their subsequent hardships until the Brethren found a new home in Ukraine, first in Vishenka (q.v.), later in Radichev (q.v.). In 1782 he was elected preacher, and in 1794 bishop of the entire brotherhood. In 1818 an unfortunate conflict arose as one group wished to give up the principle of community of goods. Waldner insisted on continuing this time-honored principle in spite of all external difficulties. "I would rather die at the stake than to abandon the old practice" (423). Thus a split occurred and Waldner moved to a new place near by called Neudorf. In 1824 he died at the age of 75.

Waldner began writing his Denkwürdigkeiten in 1793, but he prefaced this personal story by a brief recapitulation of Hutterite history as found in the larger chronicle and amplified it by records otherwise unknown. This resulted in a brilliant history of the Hutterites, more condensed than the older (Braitmichel) chronicle, and yet full and rich. Johann Loserth, who read this work for the first time c1930, considered Waldner an outstanding history writer, with a unique skill in making events live.

But this revival of the interest in history was only secondary to Waldner's more central achievements. His main concern was the revival of the old and genuine spirit of the Hutterites as it had been at the time of the great bishop Andreas Ehrenpreis (q.v.; d.1662). A major avenue to this end was the collection and rewriting of the old sermons (q.v.) which at Waldner's time had almost been forgotten. New sermon books were produced by Waldner and his co-workers, taken from old sermon notebooks. Waldner also incorporated excerpts from these sermons into the Klein-Geschichtsbuch (204-21). This made an invaluable inheritance for the brethren, which has continued alive to this day, and which is the very center of all their piety. Waldner also renewed the old Gemeindeordnungen (q.v.) and insisted on their observance. In short, he became the rejuvenator of the brotherhood at a time when it was particularly difficult to continue the tradition. That the Hutterites could survive so strongly through the ages (after the conclusion of the heroic first century) is due mainly to the work of three outstanding men: Ehrenpreis, Waldner, and Elias Walter.

R.F.

J. Loserth, "Decline and Revival of the Hutterites," MQR IV (1930) 93-112; R. Friedmann, Mennonite Piety Through the Centuries (Goshen, 1949) 113-15.

Waldner, Michael, a Hutterian Brethren minister, chosen in 1856 in Russia, and confirmed in office in 1858. With Jakob Hofer he re-established community of goods in 1859. He died Oct. 13, 1889, in the Bon Homme Bruderhof in South Dakota, at the age of 55 years, having served in the ministry 33 years. D.D.

Waldo Mennonite Church (MC), located 4 miles south of Flanagan, Ill., a member of the Illinois Conference, dates back to 1855, when the first settlers, who were all Amish, came from France and Germany. In 1860-67 the ministers were Christian Slagell, J. P. Smith, Jacob Rediger, and an Oyer, who held services in homes of members. Daniel Steinmann (ordained preacher in 1867) was bishop 1886-1908, and J. D. Hartzler (ordained preacher in 1920) was bishop 1927-59. In 1867 a meetinghouse was built, replaced in 1906 by a new building, which was destroyed by fire in 1933; the present building, still on the original site, was erected in the same year, seating capacity 300.

The first Sunday school was started in 1868. Church services and Sunday school were held on alternate Sundays until 1875, when they were joined into one service. The Waldo church was one of the first in the state to take this step. In 1957 the membership was 254, with Edwin J. Stalter as minister. J.D.H.

Waliën (Walyen, Walijen), a Dutch Mennonite family found from the early 17th century until about 1830 among the members of the congregation of Winterswijk, where some of them served as deacons and where shortly after 1600 Mennonite meetings were held in the rear of the house of Hindrick Walien. Occasionally they are also found in the congregation at Almelo and elsewhere. There was a branch of this family at Amsterdam (Lamist church) c1700-60; here too some Waliens were deacons. At Winterswijk they were textile merchants and manufacturers.

According to a family tradition the Waliëns, who are found at Bocholt, Westphalia, Germany, from the 10th century, were expelled from there in 1611 and then with other Mennonites moved to Winterswijk. According to another tradition, they received their family name from the old farm named Waljen near Winterswijk. Mennonite members of this family were also found c1600 at Vreden (q.v.) in Westphalia. vdZ.

F. C. Fleischer, De Doopsgez. gemeente te Winterswijk (1911) 10, 18, 30 et passim; church records of Amsterdam.

Walig, a Dutch Mennonite family, found since the 16th century in the Zaan district, province of North Holland. Deacons by this name are found in the Mennonite congregations of Zaandam and Krommenie. Jan Walig (1796-1868), of Zaandam, was trained for the ministry at the Amsterdam seminary and served as pastor at Krommenie 1821-64. vdZ.

Walig Dirck Luytgens, an Anabaptist martyr: see Waechlink Dirks.

Walker (Mo.) Mennonite Church (MC) had 12 members in 1958. George W. Holderman was its pastor.

Wall (de Wael, de Wale, Wahl, Waalde, Walde, van de Walle), a Mennonite family name of Prussian background. The name appeared in Danzig in 1586 and also in Tiegenghagen, Rosenort, Ladekopp, and Heubuden and was transplanted to Russia and America. It is likely that the name is of Dutch origin. In Holland the name usually appears as de Wale. Uco Wallles was a Dutch Mennonite leader. A. Wall was a physician in Halbstadt, Molotschna. Aaron Wall of Mountain Lake, Minn., was one of the founders of the E.M.B. Church. Heinrich Wall is teaching at the Canadian Mennonite Bible College. His brother Cornelius Wall has been teacher at Mountain Lake, Hesston, Winnipeg, and Basel. In 1958 there were 17 ministers bearing the name Wall, all but one in the United States, and mostly in California: E.M.B. five, M.B. ten, G.C.M. two. (Reimer, Familiennamen, 120.) C.K.

Wall, Aaron (1834-1905), a minister and cofounder of the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren, was born Jan. 1, 1834, at Pordenau, South Russia. On Jan. 30, 1858, he married Aganetha Dick. They had 5 sons and 4 daughters. They made their home in the village of Hamberg. On Feb. 20, 1871, Wall was elected as a minister and preached his first sermon on I John 4:18. In 1875 they moved with their family to North America and settled on a farm north of Mountain Lake, Minn. In 1876 he was elected as elder of the Bergfelder Church. Stressing regeneration and the new walk in Christ, he with others of like conviction separated from the church and founded the Bruderthaler Church in 1889. He was also instrumental in founding the conference of the Defenseless Mennonite Brethren in Christ of North America, now known as the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren. He had a congenial and pleasing personality. He was an earnest but loving shepherd of his flock. In his work of setting dislocated and broken bones he had many an opportunity to speak with his patients about their salvation.

Shortly before his death Wall conducted the church election in which Henry I. Dick was elected elder, and on July 18 ordained him. He died on Aug. 6, 1905. H.H.Dr.

Wall, Franz (d. 1906), a Mennonite minister and founder of the Muntau Hospital (q.v.). Influenced by George Muller of Bristol, England, he started the hospital in 1889 in order to relieve suffering. After his death his son Franz Fr. Wall (b. 1882) continued as manager, assisted by his sisters, who had received special training in the field. The building was enlarged into a two-story building, and significant doctors, e.g., E. Tavonius, were won for it. In 1930 Wall had to give up his position and the hospital was taken over by the Soviet government. He was exiled in 1936 and nothing is known about him since 1939. C.K.

A. A. Toews, Mennonitische Märtyrer I (N. Clearbrook, 1949) 318; Reimer, Familiennamen, 120.

Wall, Jacob A. (1864-1954), son of Aaron (q.v.) and Aganetha Wall, was born Sept. 24, 1864, in the village of Hamberg, South Russia. In 1875 he came with his parents to Mountain Lake, Minn. On May 31, 1885, he was married to Elizabeth Fast. They had 9 children, of whom 3 died in their childhood. In 1906 his wife died and on June 14, 1907, he was married to Katherina Flaming, who had 4 children.

Wall was ordained as a minister of the E.M.B. Church on July 20, 1902. In 1916 he moved with his family and with others to the community northwest of Wolf Point, Mont., and organized the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Church there, of which he was the leading pastor for many years. In 1938 he came to Dallas, Ore. He served as a member of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren for a period of 21 years, and 9 years on the publication committee, during which time he had a large share in making the constitution of the Defenseless Mennonite Brethren in Christ of North America, now known as the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren. He died on Oct. 7, 1954, over 90 years of age. H.H.Dr.

Wall, Johann, first elder of Köppental-Orloff Mennonite Church, Trakt, Samara, Russia. When the threat of loss of military exemption faced the Mennonites of Prussia, Johann Wall and Claas Epp, Sr., were sent to Russia in 1853 to locate a place for settlement. With the help of Philip Wiebe and von Köppen they located land for 100 families on the "Trakt" (q.v.), Samara. The settlement was established in 1854.

Johann Wall and the Prussian Mennonites that joined him and Claas Epp, Sr., to settle in Samara not only had very strong convictions regarding nonresistance, but also adhered to some pietistic-chilastic views regarding the second coming of Christ and the role which the children of God would play at that time. They were strongly influenced by Jung-Stilling (q.v.) and Clöter.

When Wall visited the Molotschna Mennonites in 1853 he was ordained elder in Orloff by B. Fast. His report of conditions found in the Molotschna settlement is interesting. He comments, "Extraordinary privileges obligate to extraordinary contributions;" and speaking of divisions among the Mennonites he paraphrases Paul's admonition to the Galatians (3:1), "Oh, foolish Mennonites, who hath bewitched you . . . ?" Wall was succeeded as elder by David Hamm (q.v.), who continued the struggle with the radical chiliastic element of the settlement. C.K.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 129; H. Dirks, Mennonitisches Jahrbuch 1907, 73; F. Bartsch, Unser Auszug nach Mittel-Asien (Halbstadt, 1907) 80.

Wallace Mennonite Church (MC), located in Wallace Twp., Perth Co., Ont. About 1860 Mennonite families began to move into this neighborhood some 30 miles northwest of Waterloo County, where homes were available at low costs. Some 15 families lived here until 1899. At first meetings were held in their homes by ministers from the organized churches. In 1871 a meetinghouse was erected on the Sixth Concession road. Isaac Weber served as minister 1869-92, and Isaac Hallman became minister in 1884. From 1876 communion was served regularly twice a year. The M.B.C. division organized a congregation in this settlement with its beginnings in 1875. At first services were alternated in the church, then the M.B.C. group came in possession of the building. The M.C. group built another church, but soon began to return to the Waterloo communities. A tidy cemetery still exists. The Evangelical Association has use of the church. J.C.F.

Walle, van de, Mennonite family name. Jan (q.v.), Joos (q.v.), Laurens (q.v.), and Lieven (q.v.) van de Walle were Anabaptist martyrs; Willem van de Walle was banished from Gent, Belgium, in 1535 because of his Anabaptist views; Geeraerd van de Walle, of Hansbeke, who lived at Gent, was baptized by Elder Hans Busschaert (q.v.) at Vlissingen in 1587. Later a van de Walle family is found at Rotterdam, where Jan Jacobs van de Walle was a deacon of the Flemish church 1647-50, later joining the Waterlanders; in this congregation his son Jacob van de Walle, a well-to-do flax merchant, was a preacher 1670-d.78. At Amsterdam Christoffel van de Walle was a preacher of the Lamist (q.v.) congregation 1683-d.1711. Jacob van de Walle, a Mennonite, probably of Rotterdam, was worshiping with the pietistic adherents of Philipp Jakob Spener at Frankfurt. (Verheyden, Gent, 2, No. 5; idem, "Mennisme in Vlaanderen," ms.; DB 1884, 72; see also Wall.) vdZ.

Wallenstein is a "country corners" 7 miles west of Elmira, in the west Woolwich area of Waterloo County, Ont., where for a few years about 1933 the Mennonite (MC) Conference of Ontario supplied ministerial and Sunday-school assistance in a small church. No organized work followed. J.C.F.

Wallertheim, a village in the Palatinate, Germany. The Wallertheim Mennonite congregation merged with Spiesheim (q.v.) in the 18th century. vdZ.

Walles, Uco (Uko, Ucke), b. 1583 at Noordbroek, d. February 1653 at Sylmönken in East Friesland, a farmer and wood dealer at Noordbroek, Dutch province of Groningen, was a Mennonite elder. He was an adherent of the very strict elder Jan Luies (q.v.), and with a great number of followers, he left the main Flemish branch in 1634; he henceforth banned all the moderate Flemish, and soon was the leader of the Ukowallists (q.v.), who had congregations in many towns of Groningen and Friesland and in East Friesland. Wallès not only rejected all other Mennonite branches, but also attacked the Reformed; in 1635 he had a dispute with the Reformed pastor à Hengel at Godlinze. This debate and his intolerance drew the attention of the magistrates to him, particularly after the sensational meeting in the spring of 1637 in which Jurjen Thomas (q.v.) was banned. On April 8, 1637, Wallès was permanently banished from the province of Groningen; thereupon he moved to East Friesland, Germany. In vain he asked that the sentence of banishment be revoked: he was only allowed to return long enough to arrange his affairs. But in 1642 he ventured to settle again on a farm at Noordbroek; when this became known he was arrested and conducted across the German border. He then lived in Neustadt-Gödens and other towns of East Friesland, where he had a large following, e.g., at Norden (q.v.).

Wallès was "a forceful personality, a man of irreproachable conduct and strong conviction, with an excellent knowledge of the Bible, and a good speaker" (Wumkes). His allegorical interpretations of the death of Christ deeply impressed his contemporaries. He annoyed his Reformed opponents especially by his belief that Judas was not forever lost, but through the blood of Christ entered upon the joys of heaven.

Wallès was attacked in books by the following Reformed theologians: L. Pimperlingh, L. Alphusius, Johannes Lubbertus, J. Barchman, and Adolf Sibelius. He published a number of writings, mostly polemical defenses of his views against his opponents Noodwendighe Verantwoordinghe . . . (n.p., 1637), Een Weemoedige Klaghende Supplicatie aan alle menschen . . . (n.p., 1645), Twee Brieven aan Laurens Pimperlingh (n.p., 1645), and Een corte leerachtige verklaringe uyt de H. Schrifture vervatet, hoe men de tijd verstaen sal, doe Christus . . . op aerden was (n.p., 1645). In the Dutch State Archives at Groningen are found five treatises by Wallès in manuscript.

His followers, the Ukowallists (q.v.), in the province of Groningen had to endure many hardships, for a few decades not even being permitted to hold meetings. But the measures of the magistrates ceased c1665; about the same time or shortly after the Ukowallists everywhere merged with the Groningen Old Flemish Mennonites. vdZ.

N.N.B.Wb. III, 1383-87; Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 139, 160 f.; idem, Groningen I, 66-80, 121, 283 ff.; II, 222 f.; Inu. Arch. Amst. I, No. 610; DB 1870, 114; 1876, 39 note 2; 1879, 8, 86-88.

Wallmann (Woleman, Wullman), a name which occurs among the Mennonites of Russia and among the Hutterites. Hans Woleman is mentioned in the Klein-Geschichtsbuch (p. 138) among the Hutterites during the Thirty Years' War. Among those who went to Russia in 1784 Jacob Waleman and Katharina Walemanin (p. 373) are mentioned. During the early 19th century Andreas Wallmann left the Hutterite group of Russia and joined the Mennonites of the Chortitza settlement. He married Katharina Lepp and worked for the well-known industrialist Peter Lepp (q.v.), later becoming a shareholder in the factories at both Chortitza and Alexandrovsk. His son became the manager of the Chortitza factory. The factories known as "Lepp and Wallmann" were renamed by the Soviets as "Fabrika No. 2." Through Andreas Wallmann this Hutterite name was transplanted to the Low German Mennonites of Russia and America. There are no Mennonite ministers by this name in the United States or Canada. C.K.

Walnut Creek Mennonite Church (MC), a member of the Ohio and Eastern Conference, is located less than a mile southeast of Walnut Creek, Holmes Co., Ohio. The first settlers were Jonas Stutzman and four young Amish couples from Somerset, Pa., in 1809-10. Church services were held in the homes, and by 1850 there were four Amish church districts in this spreading settlement. One of these suffered a division, and the liberal segment led by Bishop "Gross" Mose Miller became the nucleus of the Walnut Creek A.M. Church. In 1862 the first meetinghouse was built, replaced in 1896 by the present building, which was enlarged in 1908 and 1950. The membership in 1957 was 598. Paul R. Miller, a great-great-grandson of the founder, is the present bishop and pastor. P.R.M.

Nettie Glick, Historical Sketch of the Walnutcreek A.M. Church (Scottsdale, 1933).

Walnut Grove Amish Mennonite Church (now extinct) was formed in Logan County, Ohio, by that part of the Logan County Mennonites who adhered to the more progressive discipline of John Warye, bishop at Oak Grove (q.v.) in Champaign County, and David Plank (q.v.), preacher at Walnut Grove. They built a meetinghouse about three miles west of the South Union Mennonite Church (q.v.). David S. Yoder, farmer-schoolteacher and prominent Sunday-school worker and mission committeeman, was a member of this congregation. In 1885, when John P. King, bishop at South Union, moved to Hartford, Kan., it was decided to place both David Plank and Christian K. Yoder, preacher at South Union, in the lot and that whichever was chosen was to be bishop of both congregations. David Plank was chosen and ordained. Then for several years services alternated at the two churches, but in 1929 services were discontinued at Walnut Grove and the plot reverted to the original owners. The former church building is now an implement shed. J.S.U.

John Umble, "Early Sunday Schools at West Liberty, Ohio," MQR IV (1930) 6-50, passim.

Walnut Hill Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, located at Walnut Hill, Escambia Co., Fla., was organized in 1946 by several young homeseekers. It has had a continual growth by others moving in and by additions through baptism. The membership in 1959 was 105. The meetinghouse, which seats 180, was built in 1950. The congregation has an active sewing circle. Francis Peters and Harry Harms are the ministers, assisted by P. G. Hiebert and the newly ordained Wilbert Peters. F.P.

Walpot (Walbot), Peter (1521-78), bishop of the Hutterian Brethren in Moravia during their Golden Age, one of the outstanding leaders of the brotherhood, a creative writer and organizer, a stern and upright character, who did much to bring the brotherhood to that spiritual and moral height which attracted many converts during the second half of the 16th century. He was a Tirolean, born near Klausen, south of the Brenner Pass; when eight years old he was present when George Blau-rock (q.v.) was executed for his faith in Guffdaun near Klausen. He seems to have turned Anabaptist at an early age (like many other Tiroleans), for in 1542 he was already a minister (Diener des Worts) in Moravia. By profession he was a cloth-shearer (Tuchscherer), whence he was often called "Peter Scherer." From now on he participated in all the major activities of the brotherhood; e.g., in the important debate between the Gabrielites (q.v.) and the Hutterites in 1545 (Chronik, 252-56). It appears that Walpot was particularly well-read, not only in the Scriptures, but also in church history and in contemporary polemics and apologetics. He is probably the author of the remarkable "Fünf Artikel des grössten Streites zwischen uns und der Welt" (Chronik at the year 1547, pp. 269-316; reprinted in Glaubenszeugnisse I, 237-57), a summary of the most significant theological and practical positions of the Hutterites in which they differ from the "world," a tract apparently derived from the earlier debate with the Gabrielites. From now on the Hutterites had not only Riedemann's Rechenschaft (q.v.) but also these Fünf Artikel to give an account of their faith and life.

In 1546 Walpot and his wife were active in Silesia "in the work of the Lord," apparently among the remnants of the Gabrielites, once going as far as Danzig. After Riedemann's death (1556) Walpot was the uncontested spiritual leader of the brotherhood. When, in 1557, Lutheran theologians at Worms published their condemnation of Anabaptism in the Prozess wie es soll gehalten werden (also called Bedenken, q.v.), only the Hutterites replied (even though they were more remote from the controversy than any other Anabaptist group), and this reply became known as Handbüchlein wider den Prozess . . . (q.v., to be published in Glaubenszeugnisse II). It is a fine and highly spiritual apology of Anabaptism. To be sure, it was circulated anonymously and was approved by the entire brotherhood, but there can be no doubt that it was Walpot who formulated the points of defense and of emphasis.

In 1565 when the bishop of the brotherhood, Leonhard Lanzenzstel, died, Walpot was elected the new bishop, both of Moravia and adjacent Slovakia. This office he filled for the next 13 years (1565-78) with much energy and wisdom. While he had seen great hardship in Moravia during the 1540's, now a time of peaceful development had set in. There was no longer any persecution in Moravia (the Counter Reformation did not come to that country until the end of the century) and the brotherhood spread and flourished, numbering at that time 30,000 baptized souls. The administrative center was the Bruderhof of Neumühl (q.v.), where the bishop resided. The Brethren could now afford to have one of their most precious books printed, Riedemann's Rechenschaft, most likely by an itinerant journeyman printer by the name of Vollandt at the Neumühl Hof (see Rechenschaft), where Walpot was instrumental in this enterprise.

The activities of this excellent man must have been manifold indeed. Missioners were sent out into all German lands (as far as Denmark) and into Switzerland. Many newcomers had to be assimilated, and the discipline at home had to be carefully watched and regulated lest the community deteriorate. A wealth of epistles from this period have survived, written to the missioners abroad "in the name of the entire brotherhood," encouraging and comforting them in their hard work. No doubt most of these were drafted by the bishop himself. Kaspar Braйтмichel (q.v.) now began the first draft of what gradually became Das grosse Geschicht-Buch (greater Chronicle), assisted by Walpot. An enormous correspondence was brought in almost daily by returning Brethren (no other mail was ever used), and had to be read before the assembled Brethren and answered. Economic and social questions both in Moravia and Slovakia had to be solved; e.g., the relationship to the manorial lords and to the larger cities (many a farmer in Moravia noted with envy the thriving colonies and their enterprise). There were also the schools of the brotherhood to be managed, and on inspection Walpot found many things that needed attention. A model "school regulation" and a fine "address to the schoolmasters," Nov. 15, 1568 (see Education, Hutterite), remarkably modern for the 16th century, both by Walpot, have been preserved.

In the late 1560's and early 1570's, Polish Unitarians visited the Moravian Bruderhofs several times, in fact at one time (1569?) a number of young Poles volunteered to live for one whole year in the Bruderhofs in order to learn how to run such a collective large-scale enterprise. (They were disappointed and became severely critical, since such a Bruderhof is possible only on the basis of a specific attitude, foreign to the Poles.) These visits resulted in an exchange of letters of unusual interest; Walpot's epistles to the Poles were inserted into the Chronicle (Chronik, 443-58).

The Protocol of the Frankenthal Colloquy of 1571 claims that a certain Peter Scherer and two other Brothers attended this occasion; Wolkan and Hege assumed that this was Peter Walpot. Yet neither a Scherer nor a Walpot is listed as participating in the debate in any conspicuous way, and Walpot did not even respond when Dathenus (q.v.) asked whether Hutterites were present.

During the 1570's Walpot also drew up a catechism for the children (still in use today, to be published in part in Glaubenszeugnisse II), several prayers for children, and also some hymns to be learned in school.

With Swiss Brethren of the Rhine area a lively correspondence developed (see Schmidt, Hans), the most important epistle being the letter addressed to the Swiss Brethren of Modenbach on the Rhine in 1577, in which the distinguishing points between Hutterites and Swiss Brethren were again formulated and defended. In an earlier paper by this writer also the anonymous tract "Anschlag and Fürwenden" was attributed to Walpot, but more recent research has shown that it was drawn up by Leonhard Dax (q.v., d: 1574), doubtless with Walpot's full approval. Dax, a former Catholic priest and versed in the Latin language, soon became an important assistant to Walpot in all matters of theology and literary polemics.

The most important contribution of this busy man was still to come: the elaboration of the Hutterite program of 1545-47, i.e., the "Five Articles." Now in more peaceful times Walpot could develop the ideas of this program by adding ample Biblical and church historical references, and by elaborating on each point. Thus there developed a large work (far larger than the Rechenschaft) of basic nature, the anonymously written Ein schön lustig Büchlein etliche Hauptartikel unseres christlichen Glaubens, etc., briefly called Das grosse Artikelbuch (see Article Book), dated 1577. That it was authored by Walpot is beyond doubt; in fact one 18th-century copy (now in Montana) expressly names him as the writer. And yet it was more the result of the work of the brotherhood as a whole than was, e.g., Riedemann's Rechenschaft, which was written in a lonely prison in Hesse. Some 23 old copies of the 16th and 17th centuries still extant, and many new ones give evidence of the continued interest of the brotherhood in this work (to be published in its entirety in Glaubenszeugnisse II; one article was also published in English translation in MQR, 1957).

On Jan. 30, 1578, Walpot died, not without having first addressed all the elders of his church assembled around his bed. The Chronicle contains this last address, and then adds a special paragraph of praise and gratitude. "He was a loyal shepherd," the Chronicle says, "an outstanding teacher (i.e., preacher), and a godly ruler, etc."

Besides the tracts and epistles mentioned above, Walpot also composed two hymns (Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, 737-39). He was probably the author of the earliest known sermons of the brotherhood (see Sermons, Hutterite). Although these early sermons are anonymous, the dates indicate that this bishop was the author.

Walpot's richly filled life gave new strength and direction to the brotherhood. He was perhaps less "spiritual" (pneumatic) than Riedemann, but he was nevertheless the true continuer of the ideas of Jakob Hutter. Obedience to the Word of God, resignation (Gelassenheit) in all things secular, and loyalty to the great cause of Anabaptism—these are the forces which moved the life and activities of this outstanding Anabaptist brother. R.F.

R. Friedmann, "Eine dogmatische Hauptschrift . . .," Archiv für Ref.-Gesch. XXVIII (1931) 102-11 and 217-18; for the individual works see also the bibliographies of the articles mentioned above; Lydia Müller, Glaubenszeugnisse oberdeutscher Taufgesinnter I (Leipzig, 1938); idem and R. Friedmann, Glaubenszeugnisse II (Gütersloh, 1960); ML IV.

Walrave, Simon, b. c1570 at Alkmaar, Netherlands, licentiate of law, who after the death of his wife became a Catholic priest, serving at Kervendonk, near Goch, Germany, presumably is the author (under the initials V.P.) of Successio (q.v.) Anabaptistica, Dat is Babel der Wederdopers, printed in 1603 at Cologne. A reprint is found in Bibliotheca Reformatoria Neerlandica VII. (BRN VII, 4-87.) vbZ.

Walraven Herberts, of Middelie(?), at first a Catholic priest at Deventer, Netherlands, in 1533 joined the Dutch Anabaptists and moved to Münster (q.v.) in Westphalia, and in 1534 became a follower of Jan van Leyden (q.v.). In early 1535 he was sent out from Münster to propagate the Münsterite doctrines and to solicit soldiers for Jan van Leyden. He worked at Deventer, Zwolle, Amsterdam, North Holland, and Utrecht. To earn his living in the meantime he did not hesitate to pass as a Catholic priest and even celebrated masses. Notwithstanding his slyness he was apprehended at Utrecht and burned at the stake there on March 11, 1535. vbZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 102; DB 1892, 11; 1917, 117. No. 68; Mellink, Wederdopers, passim.

Walraven, Tanneken, an Anabaptist martyr: see Janneken Walraven.

Walsall Mennonite Church (MC), located near Johnstown, Pa., began as a mission Sunday-school outpost of the Stahl (q.v.) congregation in the Walsall school building in 1938. In 1941 a small chapel, with a seating capacity of 60, was erected by the Stahl congregation. It was organized as a congregation under the Allegheny Mennonite Conference in 1951. The membership in 1958 was 35, with David C. Alwine in charge. The community in which the church is located and from which the membership is drawn is of varied background. The congregation had a very rapid increase at the time of its organization, but since that time there has been a gradual decrease, due to the changing population and other reasons. In 1959 there were 32 members. D.C.A.

Walsh Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, now extinct, located 8 miles south of Walsh, Baca Co., Col., was organized in 1930 with A. T. Koehn as minister and Jonas W. Koehn as deacon, and a membership of 40. It reached a membership of 80. Worship services were held in schools. Since additional members moved in, a second congregation of 80 members was organized 5 miles north of Bartlett. Albert Dirks and Jesse H. Jantz were ordained to the ministry and Simon Unruh as deacon. Because of the drought and dust storms the members moved to other locations about 1936. J.J.

Waltajem, a Mennonite village in Volhynia: see Waldheim.

Walter (Walther), a Hutterite family name, the oldest such name still in existence. The earliest Anabaptist member of this family was one Franz Walter, a barber-surgeon from Oetisheim near Maulbronn, Württemberg, who emigrated to Moravia in the 1580's to join the Hutterites. In 1597 he was made preacher at the Pribitz Bruderhof in Moravia. In 1621, at the height of the Thirty Years' War and the Hapsburg persecutions, he left Moravia, first for Slovakia; then in the same year he with 183 other persons crossed through Hungary to Transylvania (q.v.), obeying an urgent invitation by Prince Bethlen Gabor. Franz Walter became the Vorsteher or bishop of the group which now settled at Alwinz (q.v.), but did not enjoy the newly found peace very long, dying in the same year (1621). Nothing more about the Walters is reported in the Hutterite Chronicle, and the Smaller Chronicle reports nothing until 1746, when a Zacharias Walter (q.v.) was made elder in Sobotiste, Slovakia, but eventually turned Catholic (1763). Of this Zacharias only one son, Jacob (1740-85), emigrated to the Ukraine in 1784, and it is from this man that all later Hutterite Walters descend. (There are still some Walters in Slovakia among the Catholic Habaners, q.v.) This Jacob had a son Jacob (1770-1855), who in 1818 changed from communal living to private property in Radichev, Ukraine. His grandson Darius Walter (1835-1903), however, was one of the few men who re-established the community of goods in Russia in 1860. In 1874 this family came to America and established the Wolf Creek Bruderhof near Freeman, S.D. In recognition of their leader this group adopted the name "Dariusleut" (q.v.). The nephew of Darius was Elias Walter Jr. (q.v.), the revitalizer of the entire brotherhood. Today the Walter family is widespread and numerous among the Hutterites, almost a clan in itself. R.F.

Beck, Geschichtsbücher; Zieglschmid, Klein-Geschichtsbuch; TA Württemberg; ML IV.

Walter, Darius (1835-1903), a Hutterite preacher, the founder of the Dariusleut (q.v.) kinship group, was born in South Russia, where he was chosen preacher in 1858. In 1860 he began to re-establish communal life after it had been discontinued among the Hutterites since 1818. This was achieved in the village of Hutterdorf in the Molotschna district; Jörg Hofer, also a preacher, immediately joined this new Bruderhof enterprise and the two men now successfully carried through the principle of community of goods against strong odds. When the great exodus from Russia began in 1874, Walter and Hofer led their group to America. Near Yankton, S.D., the farm Wolf Creek was bought in the same year, and the next spring communal life was started there again as it had been in Russia. Thus began what is now known as the Dariusleut, one of the three kinship groups of the Hutterites. Darius Walter died July 21, 1903, at the Wolf Creek Bruderhof, having been in office 45 years. Only one daughter survived him. (Zieglschmid, Klein-Geschichtsbuch.) D.D., R.F.

Walter, Elias, Jr. (1862-1938), Hutterite bishop of the Dariusleut. He was born in Russia and came to America in 1874 as a boy of 12 when the family of Darius Walter (q.v.) settled at the Wolf Creek colony in South Dakota. He was ordained preacher in 1898, and served in this capacity for forty years; in 1928 he was elected bishop of the Dariusleut. He was among the first to establish a Bruderhof in Canada (1898), and he himself migrated as the first Hutterite minister to Canada in 1918 when the harshness of the United States government during World War I drove the Brethren away from South Dakota. He then settled in the Stand-Off Colony in southern Alberta, near Lethbridge, where some of his descendants still live.

In 1888 Elias Walter came into contact with John Horsch (q.v.), forming a friendship which proved most profitable to both. It was through Horsch that the European world (see Wolkan) first learned of the existence of the Hutterites in America. In 1889 Walter discovered the original Hutterite Chronicle (Geschich-Buch) at a neighboring colony of Hutterian Brethren who had come from Russia. This Chronicle he copied not less than three times; one copy he sent later to Rudolf Wolkan in Vienna, who published the book in 1923. The title page bears as publication place Vienna and Stand-Off Colony.

Walter was a man of the greatest dedication to a revival of the old, genuine Hutterite spirit. Not since Johannes Waldner (q.v.), who died in 1824, had the brotherhood had a leader like Elias Walter. Without Andreas Ehrenpreis (q.v.) in the 17th century, Waldner in the 18th, and Walter in the 19th and 20th centuries, modern Hutteritism would be almost unthinkable. Walter was a man of indefatigable activity, a bishop in the true sense of the word, concerned at all times for the spiritual needs not only of the Dariusleut but of all Hutterites in both good and bad days. In his lifetime he copied innumerable volumes of Hutterite literature: 21 sermon books, 12 epistle books, the Handbüchlein wider den Prozess (q.v.), a commentary on the Book of Revelation (see Olivi), the Article Book (q.v.), and many more. He also began the compilation of a fairly comprehensive catalog of all Hutterite writings, which is of inestimable value for present-day scholarship.

In 1902 Walter published Riedemann's great Rechenschaft (q.v.) at Berne, Ind., using the rare copy of the library of the University of Chicago as his source. In 1914 he established a real precedent when he published the Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (q.v.) at Scottdale, Pa., since then the generally accepted hymnal of all Hutterites. This work is based on the compilation of three old hymn codices of the 16th and 17th centuries. In 1919 he published the Gesangbüchlein . . . meistens aus alten Handschriften gesammelt (Scottdale), containing other hymns than the 1914 edition, but smaller in size. In 1920 he published Andreas Ehrenpreis' Sendbrief . . . brüderliche Gemeinschaft, das höchste Gebot der Liebe, betreffend at Scottdale. In 1923 the great chronicle or Geschicht-Buch (see above) appeared, as did also the Geschichte der zwölf Patriarchen, a smaller volume also edited by Walter.

In 1930 Eberhard Arnold (q.v.), who made his first contact with him in 1926, came to America, visited all colonies, and was finally ordained preacher by Elias Walter at Stand-Off Colony. Arnold then also received from Walter a number of most valuable old codices of former centuries as well as a number of sermon books.

One special aspect of Walter's activities was his bookbinding at Stand-Off Colony. Here he bound for practically all the Hutterite preachers their (handwritten) sermon books. He bound also the Chronicle in innumerable copies, as well as hymn-books, tracts, etc., all with great skill and care. His son continues this activity.

Elias Walter was married to Elizabeth Hofer (1886). They were blessed with a large family, 7 daughters and 3 sons. The youngest son, Jacob (b. 1910), was elected preacher after his father's death in 1938, and is still serving in this capacity (see Walter Family).

John Horsch and Elias Walter carried on a long and fruitful correspondence until Walter's death. Horsch was the actual editor of all the manuscripts which were printed at Berne and Scottdale. A long list of titles of the (hitherto unknown) codices is published in Horsch's Kurzgefasste Geschichte der Mennoniten Gemeinden, sowie einem Verzeichnis der Literatur der Taufgesinnten (Elkhart, 1890). Horsch was also the liaison with Wolkan in Vienna. When the United States draft laws during World War I caused difficulties for the Hutterites, it was Elias Walter who represented the Hutterites in negotiations in Washington, and it was John Horsch who served as a go-between. A considerable file of Walter-Horsch correspondence has been preserved in the Goshen College Historical Library. The oldest Hutterite Epistle Book, a codex of 1566, existing at one Hutterite Bruderhof, was sent to Horsch in Elkhart in 1888, who published a considerable number of epistles from it in the Herold der Wahrheit (1888-89).

A series of articles by Elias Walter under the title, "Wie kamen die Hutterischen Brüder nach Amerika?" appeared in the Mennonitische Blätter for 1908, pp. 49 f., 53-55, 61-63, 70, and 87-89; Zieglschmid, Klein-Geschichtsbuch, 494. R.F., H.S.B.

Walter, Hans, is named by Wolkan as an Anabaptist song writer. This is an error, in so far as he refers to No. 64 in the Ausbund, "Herzlich tut mich erfreuen die liebe Sommerzeit," which was written by Johannes Walther, a Lutheran poet. (Wolkan, Lieder, 148.) NEFF.

Walter, Jakob, a bishop of the Hutterian Brethren in Moravia, who under the pressure of the government migrated to Little Russia in 1784, where they lived for 58 years, and then went to Russia, founding the Bruderhof Radichev (q.v.) and later also Hutterthal. NEFF.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 640, 1642; Anna Brons, Ursprung, Entwicklung und Schicksale der . . . Mennoniten (Norden, 1891) 173, 295.

Walter, Zacharias, bishop of the Hutterites in Slovakia 1746-61, a tailor by trade. He was made preacher in Sobotiste (q.v.) in 1736, and was chosen bishop of all Hutterites in Slovakia in 1746, the last one prior to their acceptance of Catholicism (see Habaner). In 1748 Walter carried on correspondence with the Dutch Mennonites and received devotional literature from them (his letters are in the Mennonite Archives in Amsterdam). When the government of Maria Theresa undertook the forcible conversion of the Brethren, Walter and other elders were seized at Sobotiste on March 21, 1761, and soon thereafter turned over to the Jesuits in Budapest. Meanwhile the work of conversion by duress went on in the different Bruderhofs (see Slovakia), mainly by taking children away. A Jesuit report of Sept. 18, 1763, claims that all attempts to convert Zacharias had failed. But eventually he, too, succumbed to the unbelievable pressure and promised to accept the Catholic faith, whereupon he was released from the monastery (1763). Of course this ended all his functions in the church. After his return he fell into such dire poverty that he appealed to the Empress for support, which the archbishop of Esztergom had to award him.

His son Jacob Walter secretly emigrated to Russia in 1784 but died the following year by drowning. Another Zacharias Walter in Russia became assistant to the Elder George Waldner in 1857.

HEGE, R.F.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 572, 3, 591, 5, 610, 7; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 419 f.; Zieglschmid, Klein-Geschichtsbuch, 230, 5, 8; 244, 263 (pp. 443 f. and 566 pertain to the other Zacharias Walter); ML IV.

Wälti: see Welty.

Waltner: see Waldner.

Walton Mennonite Church (GCM), located in Walton Twp., Harvey Co., Kan., a member of the Western District Conference, was organized on June 7, 1942, with 49 charter members. The members met in 1939-43 in the Walton School. The present church, seating 240, was built in 1943. The membership in 1957 was 154, with C. D. Boese as pastor.

C.D.B.

Waltonville, a rural hamlet on the meandering road from Hummelstown to Middletown, Lancaster Co., Pa., where in 1933 some members of the Strickler-Shope congregation held Sunday school in a member's yard. The congregation took over the work thus opened. A deserted red school, abandoned through the Derry Township consolidation, was leased for their services, and opened Oct. 15, 1933. The general attendance was 62. In 1935 it was decided to transport the children to the Strickler-Shope Sunday school and discontinue Waltonville. I.D.L.

Wanaparty Mennonite Brethren Mission station, India, located in the Wanaparty Samistan, 95 miles southwest of Hyderabad, was begun by F. A. Janzen and his wife in 1915, who erected most of the buildings. These include a mission bungalow, a church, a school, a hospital, hostels for school children, and living quarters for indigenous workers. Besides the Janzens the following missionaries have worked here: Mr. and Mrs. P. V. Balzer, Mr. and Mrs. J. N. C. Hiebert, Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Dick, Margaret Suderman, and Anna Suderman. In 1954 the station was supervised by J. J. Kasper of Nagar Kurnool. The activities on the station include the regular church worship services, a school, which has developed from a primary into a middle school; and a hospital, which is patronized by many from the surrounding villages. The Wanaparty Station Field with an area of 1200 square miles and a population of 180,000 has been a responsive field for evangelism; the indigenous M.B. Church of the Telugus numbers over 1,000 members. J.H.L.

Wandering Soul, the English (German, Wandelnde or Wandlende Seele) title of a popular devotional book, originally written in Dutch by Jan Philips Schabaelje (q.v.), a Waterlander Mennonite, and published in 1635 at Alkmaar in the Netherlands. At present the work is little known, although it remains in print in German (Berne, 1952) and in English (Scottsdale, 1958) editions, but a large number of editions in Dutch as well as in German and English translation give evidence that it appealed widely until the end of the 19th century. In the Dutch editions it is appended to Lusthof des Gemoeds, a brief devotional work by the same author, with which it had a common title page and pagination. The composite title of the 1638 edition, the earliest edition which is extant, is Lust Hof des Gemoets inhoudende verscheiden Geestelike Oeffeningen. Met noch drie Collation der wandelende ziele met Adam, Noah, ende Symeon Cleophas. It was printed by Thomas Fonteyn at Haarlem for Claes Jacobsz at De Rijp. In this early edition, probably the second, a third dialogue had been added. The earlier edition(s) contained two dialogues, those with Adam and Noah. The new dialogue, a lengthy one with Simon Cleophas, extended the book in the 12mo format to 603 pages. Some of the later Dutch editions reprinted only the two original dialogues but most contained the three, as was the case with all the German and English editions. A 1656 Dutch edition added dialogues with Jacob and Joseph, written by Schabaelje, but these were never reprinted. The number of Dutch editions is not known exactly. Maatschoen, in a footnote in Schijn (1744), estimates it "was printed at least forty or fifty times." Currently it is possible to locate 48 editions. The last known Dutch reprint appeared in 1768. All the Dutch editions contained illustrations, usually very simple woodcuts by unidentified artists, but in 1706 the book was enlarged to octavo format and enhanced by the addition of 25 etchings done by Jan Luyken (q.v.) with accompanying verses, and the title was changed to De vermeerderde Lusthof. In this form it was reprinted in 1724, 1742, and 1768.

In translation the book gained an independent character. In both German and English it was separated from the Lusthof and published as a distinct work. The earliest known German edition was 1741, Die wandlende Seel, das ist: Gespräch der wandlenden Seelen mit Adam, Noah und Simon Cleophas, printed at Basel by von Mechel (q.v.). This edition, however, is indicated as the fourth, which points to evidence that it was translated and published much earlier in the 18th century. The translator was B.B.B., possibly Benedikt Brechbill (q.v.). Two further editions, 1770 and 1811, came from the von Mechel press, and at least three editions appeared in Germany during the same period, at Frankfurt and Leipzig in 1758 and 1770 and at Stuttgart in 1860. In America Saur reprinted the same German translation at Germantown, in 1768 and 1771. Other Germantown imprints are 1794 and 1805, which were followed by 12 known editions in the 19th century at Philadelphia and Harrisburg, Pa. In 1919 the Mennonite Publishing House at Scottsdale, Pa., published a new edition to meet the demand for it among the Amish, and in 1952 the Amish publisher J. A. Raber of Baltic, Ohio, repeated. A study of the publishers of these many editions indicates that the book had an appeal beyond Mennonite circles. The English translation was made from the German translation rather than the original Dutch, by I. Daniel Rupp (q.v.), and was printed in 1834 as The Wandering Soul: Dialogues between the Wandering Soul and Adam, Noah, and Simon Cleophas. It was published by the translator and John Winebrenner at Harrisburg, Pa., and was illustrated. In 1838 Johnson and Stockton at Pittsburgh published a new edition with the title changed to The Pilgrim Soul. Two English editions came out in Virginia, at Woodstock in 1840 and at Winchester in 1841. Rupp reprinted the book in 1834 and 1840, an edition appeared at Harrisburg in 1857, John Baer's Sons at Lancaster published one in 1874, and the Light (q.v.) and Hope Press, of Berne, Ind., the last in 1958. In all at least 84 editions have appeared, 48 Dutch, 9 German in Europe, 18 German in the United States, and 9 English in the United States. It is probably the most widely read book by a Mennonite ever published.

The subject matter of the book pertains chiefly to historical events, both Biblical and secular, from the Creation to about the end of the first century after Christ. Simon Cleophas, a character taken from Eusebius, is said to have witnessed the fall of Jerusalem. Schabaelje lists the sources of his information as the Bible, Josephus, Augustine, Erasmus, and others. The work is a popular treatment and accurate for its time of composition, although there is a tendency to speculate about the origin of races and nations. Rather than a historical work, it is cast in literary form, that of the dialogue, which was prevalent and popular for a long time after the Middle Ages. The Wandering Soul, an earnest Christian desiring to finish the course of his pilgrimage, seeks admonition from Adam, Noah, and Simon Cleophas. The skillful handling of the conversation breaks the monotony of what would otherwise be an extended historical account with admonition. Some of the characters come to life and reflect a genial piety. In both conception and execution the book has some literary merit, which likely accounts in part for its wide appeal. In purpose, however, it is a devotional book, a work of spiritual edification in a practical sense. It was intended, as the German translator notes, to incite its readers to become pilgrims. The book reflects the particular piety characteristic of many Waterlander Mennonites in Holland in the 17th century, a spiritualistic fervor with a strong moral note. The concern with practical piety, however, and the concept of the Christian life as a pilgrimage, are reminiscent of the larger Anabaptist movement. I.B.H.

Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis II, 584-86; Robert Friedmann, Mennonite Piety Through the Centuries (Goshen, 1949) 111-15; Irvin B. Horst, "The Wandering Soul, a Remarkable Book of Devotion," MHB, October 1957. For a partial list of Dutch editions, see Catalogus Amst., 224-26, 355; for a list of American editions, see Bender, Two Centuries; and Horst, op. cit.

Wanger, Georg, an Anabaptist martyr: see Wagner, Georg and Wenger, Georg.

Wanner, Albrecht, an Anabaptist at Schlettstadt (Selestat) in Alsace, from where he was expelled because of Anabaptist activity, came to Strasbourg (q.v.) in 1525/6, where he was arrested with a number of other Anabaptists in 1527 and after trial banished from the city. vdZ.

A. Hulshof, Geschiedenis van de Doopsgezinde te Straatsburg (Amsterdam, 1905) 59 f.

Wanner Mennonite Church (MC), located one mile west of Hespeler, Ont., a member of the Ontario Conference, was one of the earliest Mennonite congregations of Ontario, closely associated with the Hagey (now Preston) congregation, the ministers alternating in serving the two congregations. Joseph Bechtel, who came from Pennsylvania in 1802, the first Mennonite minister in Ontario, served here; he was probably a member at Hageys, while Martin Baer (ordained preacher 1808) was a member at Wanners church. The first meetinghouse, erected in 1829, had two Mennonite and two Tunker (Brethren in Christ) trustees, and was also used as a school 1829-48. The brick meetinghouse was built in 1837, replaced by a new building in 1938. John Baer, a son of Martin Baer (ordained 1838), left the church in 1874 to follow Solomon Eby into the M.B.C. Church. David Sherk, a leading Ontario minister, served here 1838-82. Later ministers were Absalom B. Snyder 1892-1936 and S. M. Kanagy 1932-41. Merle Shantz has been pastor since 1949. In 1958 the membership was 116. ME.S.

Wanty, Sara (Mart. Mir. has "Wanrij"), the wife of Hans Pfister, was imprisoned at Zürich, Switzerland, in 1643 with two other women because of Mennonite convictions; she suffered many hardships and finally died in prison. (Mart. Mir. D 822, E 1120 f.) vdZ.

War Sufferers' Relief. American Mennonites have been particularly concerned, because of their non-resistant principles, to relieve suffering caused by war. Hence one of the major groups, the Mennonite Church (MC), gave its official relief organization, founded in 1917, the name "Mennonite Relief Commission for War Sufferers," which was changed in 1926 to "Mennonite Relief Committee" (q.v.). H.S.B.

War Sufferers' Relief Bulletin began publication in March 1945 and continued monthly for two years (two volumes with 12 issues each), published by the MCC headquarters at Akron, Pa., 6½ x 9 in., with 8 pages. The editors were Irvin B. Horst, Daniel B. Suter, John A. Hostetler, and Ernest W. Lehman. The Bulletin was intended to make MCC foreign relief news available to the constituency by publishing current news as well as detailed reports from foreign workers. In addition to disseminating relief news, the publication also gave something of the concern and spirit in which the foreign relief program was carried on. This is evident from the quotation, "Not to be ministered unto, but to minister," which appeared under the banner of each issue. In 1947 the War Sufferers' Relief Bulletin was enlarged and published under the name MCC Services Bulletin (q.v.). J.N.B.

Warden Park Mennonite Church (MC), 46 Scotia Ave., Toronto, Ont., was organized in 1955 as a result of mission work begun here in 1937. In 1958 the membership of 23 was served by John H. Hess. J.H.H.

Warden Mennonite Church (GCM), located at Warden, Wash., is a member of the Pacific District Mennonite Conference but not of the General Conference. It was first listed in the 1957-58 Handbook of Information. In 1958 it had a membership of 20. J.U.

Warendorf, a town in the district of Münster, Westphalia, Germany. In this town Bernhard Rothmann (q.v.) was rector of the Latin school 1521-23, and after leaving the town maintained contact with the mayor. An intimate friend of Rothmann's was Hermann Regewordt, pastor of the New Church and a member of a respected family of Warendorf. Beginning in March 1533, Regewordt preached Protestant sermons with the support of the city council. Francis, Count of Waldeck, bishop of Münster (q.v.), warned the town. In December 1533, Heinrich Waren came to Warendorf. As the Anabaptists gained the upper hand in Münster, he openly confessed himself as one of them. One of the converts he baptized was Pastor Regewordt. When the bishop, residing in the near-by Sassenberg, demanded the unconditional surrender of the city and the removal of the preachers, Waren and Regewordt went to Münster, arriving there on Feb. 17, 1534, with many followers, including Dusentschuer, who later became a "prophet." Dusentschuer became the willing tool of Jan van Leyden (q.v.), and promoted his elevation to the kingship as God's will. After the brilliant repulse of the attack against Münster on Aug. 31, 1534, Dusentschuer proposed that 28 apostles be sent out two by two to spread the ideas found in Rothmann's Restitution. To Warendorf were sent Johann Kloppeis (q.v.), Gottfried Straelen, Theodor von Alfien, Anton Prumeren, and Anton Ummegrove. Waren and Dusentschuer were sent to Soest. Regewordt was in the group sent to Coesfeld, all of whom were beheaded on Oct. 23, 1534, upon orders of the bishop. The five sent to Warendorf arrived there on Oct. 14, 1534. Kloppeis had for years worked as a chaplain in Wassenberg (q.v.) under the protection of the magistrate and had come to Münster in 1533. In Warendorf the apostles loudly called upon the city to repent. They were hospitably received by Erpo Holland, a councilor, in whose home baptisms were performed. Under Erpo Holland's influence the council refused to turn the apostles over to the bishop, but protected them to the uttermost. The council and most of the citizenry joined the Anabaptists, though not many baptisms were performed for the time being. When his threatening letters were disregarded, the bishop made a sudden attack on the town. The city, realizing the hopelessness of resistance, opened its doors. On October 24 three Warendorf citizens, Erpo Holland, Johann Stopenberg, and Bernd Butermann, were put to death on the market square together with the apostles Straelen, Ummegrove, Prumeren, and von Alfien. Alfien might have escaped, for he had influential friends, but he refused to do so, rejecting all offers of clemency. The Neue Zeitung reported that they thanked God the Father for making them worthy of suffering for His sake. Kloppeis (q.v.) was taken to the Iburg, then sent to the Archbishop of Cologne, and burned at the stake on Feb. 1, 1535. His last words were, "Father, into Thy hands I commend my spirit."

On the day after the execution Catholic worship was reinstated in Warendorf. All the freedoms and rights, all documents and seals, city books, and arms were taken from the city. A fortification was erected and constant surveillance by occupying troops instituted. The privileges were gradually returned in 1542-46. But a congregation of quiet Anabaptists remained in the city and the neighboring villages. It took decades to lead the people back to the Catholic Church even outwardly. The missionary work of the Jesuits and Franciscans then gradually achieved the objectives of the Counter Reformation.

Warendorf was the home town of Hermann (Harmen) Heilinc, the wealthy cloth merchant who equipped a warehouse as a meeting place for the Flemish Mennonite congregation in Amsterdam (ML I, 60), and gave it to the Mennonites as a gift. J.W.A.

Warendorf Blätter (1902-10); L. Keller, Geschichte der Wiedertäufer und ihres Reiches zu Münster (Münster, 1889); Rembert, Wiedertäufer; W. Zuhorn, Kirchengeschichte der Stadt Warendorf (Warendorf, 1918); Friedrich Brune, Der Kampf um eine evangelische Kirche im Münsterland, 1520-1802 (Witten, 1953); ML IV.

Warendorp, Harmen Hendriksz van (d. April 1632, a son of Hendrik He(i)linck Seelslager, a shoemaker at Warendorp in Westphalia, Germany, and Elsen Heyteman, was born about 1560 at Warendorp. He started a cloth shop at Aachen, Germany, probably living at Burtscheid (q.v.) where there was a Mennonite congregation. In 1593 he married Christine Rasselaers of Cologne (d. May 11, 1632). Their three daughters died at an early age. In 1607 van Warendorp, who had become wealthy, moved to Amsterdam, Netherlands, where he joined the Flemish Mennonite congregation. On June 28, 1607, he bought a plot of ground on the Singel canal, near the brewery "Het Lam," on which he had built a meetinghouse for the Flemish congregation. He also bought two houses on the Heerengracht and two on the Singel, and lived at the house called "Aken" (i.e., Aachen), which now is the office of the A.D.S. and the living quarters of the sexton of the church (Singel 454). He let the congregation use the meetinghouse rent free, but made some strange stipulations, e.g., that no hymns should be sung but the Psalms of David; whenever another hymn was sung the preacher was to be fined. After the death of van Warendorp April 1632 his heirs for more than a century remained the owners of the meetinghouse, which occasionally led to difficulties. In 1740 the Lamist Mennonite congregation, after a lawsuit, became the owner of the church and the adjacent houses. K.V.

F. Muller, "Omstandig verhaal van de stichting der tegenwoordige vergaderplaats van de Vereenigde Doopsgez. Gemeente te Amsterdam," DB 1863, 1-42; 1900, 85; N.N.B.Wb. III, 1393; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 703; II, Nos. 131-34, 162-209; Kühler, Geschiedenis II, 185 f.; F. Kuiper and N. van der Zijpp, Bij 't Lam 1608-1958 (Amsterdam, 1959) 12, 25-30.

Warffum, a village in the Dutch province of Groningen, where in early 1535 the cloister of the knights of St. John was attacked by a group of 70 revolutionary Anabaptists, led by Jacob (q.v.) Cremer. The attack, however, was repulsed and the Anabaptists put to flight by the soldiers of stadholder Karel van Gelre. (BRN VII, 369; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 169 f.) vDZ.

Warga, a village in Friesland, where Leenaert (q.v.) Bouwens baptized 21 persons in 1563-65 and 39 in 1568-82. The founding of the Warga Mennonite congregation may date from this time. About its history there is not much information, though church records have been preserved since 1732. In 1695 it joined the conference (Sociëteit) of Friesland, founded in that year. Until 1826 it was served by ministers chosen from their own members. The first minister serving here who was educated at the Amsterdam seminary was Sine J. van der Goot, 1826-33, followed by C. Cardinaal Jr. 1834-38, Joh. Pol 1839-47, D. Plantinus 1847-49, Taco Kuiper 1850-52, R. J. Bakker 1853-57, F. J. Klaasz 1858-d.65, J. H. Uiterwijk 1866-67, J. P. van der Vegte 1868-74, B. Haga 1875-81, R. Kuiken 1882-91, P. Sybolts 1892-94, A. K. Kuiper 1895-99, Corn. Vis Jr. 1899-1905, F. W. W. Braak 1906-9, M. Onnes Mzn 1909-11, R. J. de Stopelaar 1911-38, Miss S. E. Doyer 1943-46. After the resignation of Miss Doyer the pulpit remained vacant; Pastor F. H. Sixma, first at Terhorne, then at Giethoorn, took care of the Mennonites in Warga until August 1954, when it made an arrangement with the congregations of Irnsrum-Poppingewier to be served by the preacher of these congregations.

The baptized membership of the Warga congregation numbered about 65 in 1695; 55 in 1779, increasing to 159 by 1838; 186 in 1861; from then a decrease: 183 in 1901; 180 in 1926; 160 in 1930; 102 in 1940, and 75 in 1958.

Of the first meetinghouse nothing is known except that it was replaced c1865. When this church became too large for the diminishing membership and moreover was dilapidated, a new meetinghouse was erected with the help of a Mennonite voluntary service group, dedicated on Nov. 18, 1956. Church activities now include a ladies' circle. vDZ.

Blauptot t. C., Friesland, 89, 93 note 72, 189, 248, 254, 306; DB 1890, 84; 1900, 93; DJ 1958, 36-39.

Warkentin (Warckentien, Warckentyn, Workentyn), a common Mennonite name of Prussian background found in Tiegenghagen, Ladekopp, Rosenort, Fürstenwerder, Heubuden, Danzig, and Königsberg as early as 1667. From Prussia the name spread to Russia and America. Cornelius Warkentin (q.v.) helped the early Russian Mennonites in their religious problems. Bernhard Warkentin (q.v.) was instrumental in the settlement of the Mennonites from Russia in Kansas and the introduction of hard winter wheat. Abraham Warkentin (q.v.) taught at Bethel College and was the first president of Mennonite Biblical Seminary. John W. Warkentin of Hillsboro, Kan., is active in M.B. church and college work. Cornelius J. Warkentin is an elder at Waldheim (GCM), Sask., and active in conference work. There was a total of 25 Warkentin ministers in North America in 1957, 15 M.B. (all but five in Canada) and 10 G.C.M. (all in Canada). (Reimer, Familiennamen, 120; Who's Who Among the Mennonites, 1943.) C.K.

Warkentin, Abraham (1885-1947), a Mennonite (GCM) minister and educator, was born in Ladekopp in the Molotschna Mennonite settlement of South Russia, on Aug. 22, 1885, the son of Gerhard Warkentin. After attending the Zentralschule at Ohrloff 1899-1900 and at Halbstadt 1900-2 and the normal school at Halbstadt until 1904, he taught in the Alexanderwohl school until 1912. In 1912-15 he attended the Baptist Theological Seminary at Hamburg, Germany, then taught at the Realschule at Wilhelmsdorf, Württemberg, Germany, 1916-20. He served as secretary of the Deutsche Mennonitenhilfe (q.v.) in Germany 1920-23. In Russia Warkentin was a member of the Lichtfelde Evangelical Mennonite Church. He married Elizabeth Unger of Alexanderwohl, Aug. 24, 1912. Four children were born to them. In 1920 Abraham Warkentin was ordained minister and elder by the Conference of South German Mennonites. In 1923 the family emigrated to the United States. After a brief stay in Hillsboro, Kan., they moved to Newton, Kan., where he became assistant pastor of the First Mennonite Church and instructor in languages and Bible at Bethel College. During 1927-29 he earned his A.B. and A.M. degrees at the University of Kansas, then returned to teach at Bethel College. In 1933 he entered the University of Chicago where he received the Ph.D. degree in 1935. His dissertation, Die Gestalt des Teufels in der deutschen Volkssage, was published in 1937.

From 1935 until 1943 Warkentin continued as professor of Bible and German at Bethel College. He was also principal of the Bethel College Mennonite Bible Academy and coeditor of the Bethel College Monthly (1925-27). In addition he was editor in chief of the G.C.M. Sunday-school quarterly 1937-42, a member of the MCC 1933-40, secretary of the G.C.M. Placement Committee 1941-43, and member of the G.C.M. Historical Committee 1941-47.

Among Warkentin's significant achievements was the revitalizing of the Mennonite Historical collection at Bethel College. He laid the foundation for the present Bethel College Historical Library (see Mennonite Historical Library of Bethel College). In 1943 he suffered a stroke and was forced to resign from his duties in connection with Bethel College and the First Mennonite Church. After his health was sufficiently restored he accepted the assignment of establishing the Mennonite Biblical Seminary (q.v.) in Chicago which started functioning in 1945 and of which he was the first president. He died on Aug. 30, 1947. Warkentin's contribution in education, in strengthening basic Mennonite and Christian convictions within the church, in the production of Christian literature, relief work, and the training of the ministry was of great significance. He also wrote Who's Who Among the Mennonites (N. Newton, 1937, 1943) (with Melvin Gingerich); Der Eid (G.C.M. Committee on Doctrine and Conduct, n.d.); Extracts from Mennonite History in Outline Form (n.p., n.d.); A Harmony of the Kings (North Newton, 1939 and 1942); The Oath (G.C.M. Committee on Doctrine and Conduct, 1937). He was also a regular contributor to various periodicals and an appreciated Bible and conference lecturer.

C.K.

Cornelius Krahn, "Dr. A. Warkentin," The Mennonite, Sept. 16, 1947, p. 3.

Warkentin, Bernard (1847-1908), a General Conference Mennonite leader, was born in the village of Altonau, Molotschna Mennonite settlement of Russia, on June 18, 1847. He attended the secondary school in Halbstadt and a business college in Odessa. His father was a miller and had made a trip to Siberia to investigate settlement possibilities there. When the Mennonites of Russia became restless around 1870 about the prospective loss of certain privileges, America became a favorite topic of conversation. Bernhard Warkentin, Philip Wiebe, Peter Dick, and Jacob Bähr, all young men with well-to-do parents, made a trip to America in 1872. In 1872 they arrived at Summerfield, Ill., where Warkentin made his headquarters at the home of Christian Krehbiel. He was in constant touch with his friend David Goerz (q.v.) back in Russia. He traveled extensively, investigating Manitoba, Minnesota, the Dakota territory, Kansas, and Texas, always reporting his findings. Railroad agents contacted him as soon as it became known that a considerable number of Mennonites were considering coming to America. He settled in Halstead, Kan., in 1873 with the Summerfield Mennonites under the leadership of Christian Krehbiel, after attending McKendrie College of Lebanon, Ill., for one year.

In 1875 Warkentin married Wilhelmina Eisenmayer. His father came from Russia to attend the wedding. In 1873 he built a gristmill at Halstead on the Little Arkansas River. In 1878 the Halstead Mill and Elevator Company was organized, of which his father-in-law was principal stockholder and president. In 1885 Warkentin made a trip to Europe, particularly South Russia, and after his return moved to Newton in 1886 and established the Newton Milling and Elevator Company. In 1900 he established the Blackwell (Okla.) Milling and Elevator Company. The milling industry which he started with a daily capacity of 10 barrels grew to a capacity of 1700 barrels, the flour being sold throughout the United States and Europe.

Warkentin's greatest public service was probably the introduction of the hard winter wheat to Kansas. Hard winter wheat or red Turkey wheat had been sown by the Mennonites immediately after their arrival in Kansas. It was Warkentin, however, who experimented with the various varieties of wheat in co-operation with Mark A. Carleton, a representative of the U.S. Department of Agriculture. In 1885 Warkentin made arrangements in South Russia for a large shipment of hard winter wheat to Kansas for distribution among the farmers. He was assisted by his brother-in-law Johann Philipp Wiebe and his nephew Bernhard Enns. In 1900 the Kansas State Millers Association and the Kansas State Dealers Association asked Warkentin to arrange for a large-scale importation of seed wheat. About 15,000 bushels were imported as a result. Carleton went to the Ukraine in 1898 to study the red Turkey wheat in its native country and experimented with some 300 varieties of wheat near Halstead (see Wheat).

Warkentin organized the Halstead State Bank and the Kansas State Bank of Newton, of which he was director and president. He held numerous other public offices and was active in the founding of Bethel College, the Bethel Deaconess Hospital, and the Mennonite Mutual Fire Insurance Co. at Newton.

Death came to Warkentin on April 1, 1908, in Beirut, Syria. While he and Mrs. Warkentin were traveling from Damascus to Beirut, a pistol accidentally discharged in the adjoining compartment killing Warkentin. He was buried in the Greenwood cemetery at Newton. Bernhard Warkentin's significance goes far beyond his instrumentality in bringing Mennonites to America. He was a pioneer of Kansas in helping to establish numerous institutions and businesses and making Kansas a "bread basket."

C.K.

Kansas (Chicago, 1912) Part II, 1098 f.; William E. Connelley, A Standard History of Kansas and Kansans V (New York, 1918) 2291 f.; Cornelius Krahn, "Some Letters of Bernhard Warkentin Pertaining to the Migration of 1873-1875," MQR (1950) 248-63; idem, ed., From the Steppes to the Prairies (1874-1949) (Newton, 1949) 8-12; "Milling Industry—A Monument to Bernhard Warkentin, Founder," The Newton Kansan (Aug. 22, 1922) 100 f.; "Bernhard Warkentin," Mennonite Year Book and Almanac (1909) 24-26; "Ueber den Heimgang unseres früheren Direktors Bernhard Warkentin," Monatsblätter aus Bethel College (Newton, May 1908) 54-57; Letters of Bernhard Warkentin to David Götz and Mark A. Carleton and his "Diary" are in the Bernhard Warkentin Collection, BeCL.

Warkentin, Cornelius (1740-1809), an elder (ordained preacher Jan. 6, 1775, elder Oct. 11, 1795) of the Rosenort Mennonite Church (q.v.), West Prussia, Germany, and one of the most outstanding men of his time in the West Prussian brotherhood, played a significant role in the organization and establishment of the Chortitza Mennonite Church (q.v.) in Russia. He and Cornelius Regier, elder of the Heubuden Mennonite Church (q.v.), made a trip to Chortitza in 1795 upon invitation of the congregation to settle a difficulty which had arisen during the early years and because of the death of the elder, Behrendt Penner (q.v.). The two worked with great success, but before the task was accomplished Cornelius Regier died after ordaining Cornelius Warkentin to the office of elder. Warkentin continued the work and returned to his church, stopping on the way at various places. He received from the Czar a gold medal accompanied by a letter dated 1804, in recognition of the service he had rendered to the Mennonites. Warkentin's account of the trip was published in the Mennonitische Rundschau

(No. 4, 1897) and by P. M. Friesen (134). He and Regier did much to help the settlers to overcome their early difficulties. He kept a detailed diary of the trip, which has been preserved. Friesen describes the man and his work in Russia as follows (p. 47): "He was an impressive and heart-winning personality. . . . He writes, speaks, functions in office, and acts before the high or the lowly like a man with a good general theological training. The Mennonites as well as the Lutheran and Catholic clergy, imperial Russian colonial officials, governors, and highly placed persons treat him with honor and affection. His visit to the Chortitza Mennonite settlement is a continuous Pentecost for the orphaned settlers, his departure a heartbreaking grief." C.K.

D. H. Epp, Die Chortitzer Mennoniten (Odessa, 1889) 85; Peter Hildebrand, Erste Auswanderung der Mennoniten aus dem Danziger Gebiet nach Südrussland (Halbstadt, 1888) 67; Ernst Regehr, Geschichts- und Predigertabelle der Mennoniten-gemeinde Rosenort (2d ed., Elbing, 1939); Friesen, Brüderschaft, 134; ML IV.

Warkentin, Dirk (d. 1869), was chosen minister of the Lichtenau-Petershagen Mennonite Church (q.v.), Molotschna, South Russia, in 1841, and succeeded Jacob Warkentin as elder in 1842 when Jacob Warkentin was forced to resign. C.K.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 113, 119, 704; H. Görz, Die Molotschnaer Ansiedlung (Steinbach, 1951) 58 ff.

Warkentin, Gerhard (1837-1902), was born in Tiengehagen, Molotschna, South Russia. He came to Zagradovka in 1873, farming in the village of Blumenort; he then taught school for a number of years. He was elected minister by the Nikolaifeld Mennonite Church in 1873, and became the assistant of Elder Voth; upon Voth's retirement in 1895, Warkentin succeeded him in that office. He died May 28, 1902. G.L.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 710; G. Lohrenz, Sagradowka (Rosthern, 1947) 70.

Warkentin, Jacob, was elected minister of the Ohrloff-Petershagen (q.v.) Mennonite Church, Molotschna, South Russia, and became elder of the Lichtenau-Petershagen congregation when a group separated under his leadership in 1824. Bernhard Fast (q.v.) was the more progressive elder of the smaller remaining Ohrloff congregation. The controversy about this division has been related in the articles under the respective churches. Warkentin was extremely conservative and objected to higher education, to supporting Bible societies, and to sitting around the table at the Lord's Supper. Later Warkentin encountered difficulties with the progressive Johann Cornies (q.v.), and the Fürsorgekommite (q.v.) forced him to resign from his office in 1842. The large congregation was now broken up. Heinrich Wiens (q.v.) became elder of the Margenau-Schönsee Church, Dirk Warkentin (q.v.) became elder of the Petershagen Church, and Heinrich Töws elder of the Pordenau Church. C.K.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 113, 119, 704; H. Görz, Die Molotschnaer Ansiedlung (Steinbach, 1951) 58 ff.

Warkentin, Johann (1859-1948), minister of the Mennonite Brethren Church, son of Jacob and Helena (Dyck) Warkentin, was born at Nieder-Chortitza, South Russia, on Sept. 29, 1859. In 1879

the family emigrated to Canada, settling on a farm southwest of Winkler, Man. Through private study he gained a fair education and for eight years he taught school in the new Mennonite settlements. On Oct. 23, 1881, Warkentin married Sarah Loewen and established a farm home. They had ten children. In 1890 he was converted, baptized, and joined the M.B. Church. He soon became an active Sunday-school worker and director in singing. The Winkler M.B. Church elected him to the ministry and ordained him in 1895. In 1906 he was entrusted with the pastoral leadership of the church, a work he fulfilled until 1930. In addition he also frequently ministered in surrounding churches. Warkentin was active in the M.B. Conference, serving for some time on the Board of Directors for Foreign Missions. His daughter Helen became a missionary to India. After the death of his first wife he married Mrs. Elizabeth (Hooge) Dyck. He died at his home at Winkler on May 18, 1948, and was buried in the local M.B. cemetery. J.H.L.

Warnen Mennonite Brethren Mission, located at Warnen, a village approximately 16 miles northeast of Saskatoon, Sask., began in 1939, and has been under the guidance of the M.B. Missions of Saskatchewan since 1944. The Mission Church was organized in 1953 with Norman Fehr as the pastor. In 1939 the M.B. District Conference was asked to assume the responsibility of serving the group and in 1940 built a church. The membership in 1957 was 18. J.H.E.

Warnaars (Warnaers, Warners, Warnaer, Warner, Werner, Warnaertsen), a Dutch family, originally living in the district of Twente (q.v.), province of Overijssel, where some of its members by marriage became Mennonites c1640. Until c1875 some were members of the Mennonite congregation of Almelo (q.v.), and some also of Enschedé. At first they were weavers and lumber and linen merchants; later some were wholesale dealers. Many of them served the church of Almelo as deacons, and Gerrit Warnaars (1663-c1728) was a lay preacher, serving at Almelo until 1697 and 1697-1728(?) at Haarlem. Lourens Warners, a preacher of the Groningen Old Flemish church at Emden, East Friesland, 1721-60, may also have been a member of this family. A side branch of this family, found at Amsterdam from c1670, was engaged in business, banking, and insurance, and furnished some deacons, while two of them were trustees of the A.D.S. (q.v.). vñZ.

Nederl. Patriciaat IV (1913) 431-35; J. H. Warnaars, Het Geslacht Warnaars (Amsterdam, n.d., -1920).

Warneke Chapel (MC), Pedro, Ohio, was established in 1952 under the Ohio Mennonite Mission Board. In 1958 it had 25 members. Chauncey Grieser was its pastor. M.G.

Warner Tute, a Dutch Anabaptist, baptized c1535 at Deventer by Hendrick Kistemecker (q.v.) of Zutphen, and beheaded at Kampen, is a typical example of early Dutch Anabaptist chiliasm, declaring that one Johan had told him "there would be an assembling [of the elect Anabaptists], at a place unknown to him [Warner] but provided by God, and then the trumpets from heaven would blow and at this moment everyone should be prepared." He obviously belonged to the revolutionary wing of Anabaptists. (DB 1875, 62 f.) vDZ.

Warns, a village in the southwest of the Dutch province of Friesland, the seat of a Mennonite congregation, of which—unlike most Dutch rural congregations—there is good information, at least since c1650. The congregation has a rather well preserved archives, containing cash books from 1652, which minutely mention the amounts paid out to the poor members of the church, a baptismal and disciplinary book from 1655, and a number of old documents. From these materials G. E. Frerichs (q.v.) published a short history of the congregation in Doopsgezinde Bijdragen of 1874, and H. Bakels (q.v.) published interesting particulars in a somewhat novelistic form in Doopsgezinde Bijdragen of 1900, 1901, 1902, and 1904, and later separately in Het Volk van Menno (Leiden, 1908).

Concerning the founding of the Warns congregation accounts are lacking. According to an old tradition it existed already in 1570, meetings then for safety's sake being held at night on a small island in the swamps about two miles north of the village. About 1600 there seems to have been a High German congregation whose members were scattered over the villages of Warns, Hemelum, and Bakhui-zen. This congregation, however, had dissolved (or merged) by 1647. In this year there was at Warns only one congregation, belonging to the Water-lander (q.v.) branch, which had a simple meeting-house, a former barn, standing alone in a field. It became too small for the growing congregation and in the winter was difficult to reach because of the high level of the water from the adjacent lakes, and so, with the consent of the magistrates, a new meeting-house was built in the town in 1664-76. This was replaced by the present church, dedicated Nov. 18, 1877 (organ of 1896; front of the church renovated in 1950). A parsonage was built in 1826, replaced in 1932.

The baptized membership numbered 232 in 1654, about 210 in 1710, 90 in 1792, 108 in 1838, 147 in 1861, 149 in 1900, 106 in 1926, and 100 in 1958.

Until the 18th century the village of Warns did not subsist on farming, as it does for the most part now, but largely on navigation. Particularly among the Warns Mennonites of the 17th and 18th centuries there were many skippers and sailors, concerning many of whom the church records note that they drowned or died as far away as Sweden and Russia. This sociological structure of the congregation influenced church life in three points: (a) The seamen usually being absent from the end of February until October or November, baptism and communion services, preceded by church discipline, were not held shortly before Easter as was usual in Dutch Mennonite congregations, but in January or early February. (b) The number of widows and orphans in the 17th and 18th centuries was extremely large, and consequently high demands were made upon the funds of the deacons; in 1695, for example, about 50 members, one fourth of the total membership, received more or less of their livelihood from the church, in 1709 even 95 of the 215 members. This financial support was given liberally. (c) Through the decline of navigation because of wars, particularly in 1665-85 and in the early 18th century, many towns on the former Zuiderzee (now IJssel Lake) lost their wealth; this, for example, was ruinous for the Mennonite congregations of Molkwerum (q.v.) and Hindeloopen (q.v.). Warns also declined; many who had been engaged in navigation moved elsewhere. This accounts for the rapid decrease of the membership in the 18th century.

The congregation of Warns formerly was rather conservative. Church discipline was strictly maintained. Plain dress was found until the early 19th century.

Though the finances of the church were continuously saddled with considerable amounts for the needs of its own members, the congregation contributed liberally to many needs, both Mennonite and non-Mennonite. In 1727 and 1733 offerings were taken for the needs of the Prussian Mennonites, in 1736 for the Swiss Brethren.

In former times the church was led by the deacons, usually seven, from whom were chosen the preachers and the elder. A striking practice of the 18th century was to call elders from outside to perform baptism and administer the Lord's Supper and to exercise the church discipline, obviously because an outsider had more authority than their own elder, who was related by ties of blood and often by financial dealings to many of the members. Until 1700 the ministers served without remuneration. When the elder Ruurd Dirks in this year was granted a "liberal gift" by members of the congregation, the aged preacher Auke Feltjers was greatly incensed by this innovation; the dissension was stilled when Ruurd Dirks gave his "gift" to the poor of the church. But gradually a salary for the ministers became usual. The last of the lay ministers were Jan Cornelisz (q.v.), elder at Warns 1716-50, noted for his eloquence, who received an annual salary of 150 Dutch guilders, Atse Wytjes (van der Zijpp), serving 1750-1808, and Wolter Maakal (q.v.), serving 1810-16. After his resignation N. Pott, who also was a lay preacher, was called in from outside. He served 1816-25, followed by H. J. Smit 1825-30, Pieter Veen, who was the first pastor trained at the Amsterdam Mennonite seminary, serving here 1830-35, Douwe S. Gorter 1835-50, L. van Cleeff 1854-57, P. Brouwer 1857-63, G. E. Frerichs 1863-78, A. C. Leendertz 1879-82, A. H. ten Cate 1883-93, H. Bakels 1896-1901, J. D. van Calcar 1902-6, P. M. Heringa 1906-12, W. H. toe Water 1912-16, P. Ens 1916-41, W. Broer 1941-49, J. Nielsen 1953-57, and J. S. Postma 1957-.

In 1830-64 and 1953-57 the pastors of Warns also served at Staveren (q.v.). The small congregation of Hemelum (q.v.) merged with Warns c1700, Bakhui-zen in 1799, Molkwerum (q.v.) in 1948. Until about 1915 and again since 1958 services have also been held in the neighboring village of Hemelum.

Church activities at present (1958) include two ladies' circles, a youth circle, ages 18-25, and a Sunday school for children. vDZ.

Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 168, 169, 185, 188, 248, 254, 306, 324, 325; Naamlijst 1829, 59; DB 1874, 85-114; 1900, 38-70; 1901, 57-126; 1902, 29-86; 1903, 81, 90 f.; 1904, 30-65; H. Bakels, Het Volk van Menno (Leiden, 1908).

Warns, Johannes (1874-1937), founder of the Wiedenest Baptist Bible School, was the son of a clergyman in East Friesland, Germany, studied Protestant theology in the universities of Greifswald, Halle, Berlin, and Bonn, but did not accept a pastorate, preferring to serve the Lord in his own way. He joined the Baptists and in 1905 founded in Berlin the Bible School for home and foreign missions, which was transferred to Wiedenest, Rhineland, in 1919. Warns made twenty-five extended journeys, visiting many countries. He was especially closely attached to English circles. But the Mennonites of Russia also received his warm interest. Many refugees found shelter for a longer or shorter time with him. Warns wrote the book, Die Taufe. Gedanken über die urchristliche Taufe, ihre Geschichte und ihre Bedeutung für die Gegenwart (Bad Homburg, 1913; second ed. Cassel, 1922). In 1920 he wrote the book, Russland und das Evangelium; in 1919, Staatskirche? Volkskirche? Freikirche? In 1909 he published the missionary magazine Offene Türen; in 1920 Mitteilungen der Bibelschule; in 1926, the evangelization paper Der Wegweiser. He died at Wiedenest, Jan. 27, 1937. He is the author of the article Kindertaufe in the Mennonitisches Lexikon II, 487-94, and also the article Warendorf in this ENCYCLOPEDIA. K.R.A.

Dein Reich Komme (1937) 62-64; Nach dem Gesetz und Zeugnis (1935) 70.

Warren Street Mennonite Church (GCM), located in Middlebury, Ind., a member of the Central Conference, had its origin in 1923, when Simon S. Yoder, a minister, withdrew from the Indiana-Michigan Mennonite Conference (MC), taking about 100 members with him. The congregation remained independent of any conference affiliation until 1926, when it was received into the fellowship of the Central Conference of Mennonites. In 1957 the membership was 59, with Elmer A. Wall as minister. For a meetinghouse the congregation in 1923 bought from the town the former "opera house" and remodeled it. J.C.W.

Warte-Jahrbuch für die Mennonitische Gemeinschaft in Canada (2 issues, 1943 and 1944), edited and published by Arnold Dyck, Steinbach, Man., was the continuation, after a 5-year gap, of Mennonitische Volkswarte (q.v.), portraying the culture of the Mennonites of Prusso-German background in Canada. Historical articles and original fiction and poetry by Mennonite contributors appeared on its pages. Lack of support and small circulation forced it to discontinue. C.K.

Wartena, a Dutch family name, originally of Friesland. In its Mennonite branch the following were ministers: Abe Ruurds Wartena, a preacher of the Wieringen congregation 1807-d.9 (DB 1891, 53 f., 57), Sjoerd Wartena (Grouw, 1843-Lochem, 1917), educated at the Amsterdam seminary, served as pastor at Wolvega 1868-73, Rottevalle 1873-80, Bovenkijpe 1880-84, Workum 1884-86, and Hallum from 1886 until he retired in 1908. His son Sjoerd Dirk August Wartena (Wolvega, 1871-Doorwerth, 1953), educated at the university and the seminary at Amsterdam, served at Terschelling 1894-97, Veenwouden 1897-1902, Zutphen 1902-9, Heerenveen 1909-22, and Hallum from 1922 until he retired in 1936. He is the author of a paper on "Jan Thomas," DB 1896.

Johannes Aeschinus Wartena (b. 1869 at Grouw) was a pastor of the Midwolda-Beerta-Meeden congregation in 1891-1901, when he resigned. Sjoerd Wartena, a loyal member of the church, was a physician at Hindeloopen in 1839-89. Another Sjoerd Wartena, b. 1897 at Nijland, rector of the Gymnasium at Leeuwarden since 1931, was a member and moderator of the board of the Leeuwarden Mennonite congregation 1935-38. vdZ.

Wartenberg in the Palatinate, Germany. Until c1780 the present congregation of Sembach (q.v.) was sometimes—as in the Dutch Naamlijst—called either simply Wartenberg or Wartenberg-Sembach, since some of the elders and preachers lived at Wartenberg. vdZ.

Warwick, Va. Warwick County was incorporated as the City of Warwick in 1953, and in 1958 the city of Warwick and Newport News consolidated to become Newport News. The city of Warwick had a population of nearly 40,000 in 1956. It is located on the southwestern shore of the Virginia peninsula along the James River. Two Mennonite churches, the Warwick River (q.v.) Mennonite Church (MC) and the Providence (q.v.) Amish Mennonite Church (MC), with a total membership of 371, are located within its limits. The first Mennonite settlers came to this area in 1897. (See Denbigh.) C.N.K.

Warwick River Mennonite Church (MC), located on the Virginia peninsula 12 miles north of Newport News in the City of Warwick (q.v.) near Denbigh. In 1897 Isaac D. Hertzler of Long Green, Md., and David Z. Yoder of Smithville, Ohio, purchased a tract of 1,200 acres from the Young plantation, and five families moved into the area, purchasing plots from this original tract. The early settlers came from Michigan, Ohio, Rockingham County, Va., Tennessee, and Maryland. The community is predominantly rural.

The congregation, including both Mennonites and Amish, was organized in the spring of 1898 under the leadership of the original settlers, I. D. Hertzler (1852-1936), Jacob Hahn (1839-1926), and D. Z. Yoder (1849-1929), all of whom were ministers. In 1900 D. Z. Yoder withdrew with several Amish families and organized the Providence congregation (q.v.). Daniel Shenk (1853-1943) of Allen County, Ohio, was then ordained minister of the new congregation. George R. Brunk (1871-1938), who moved into the community from Kansas in 1910, was the first resident bishop. He was succeeded by his son Truman H. Brunk (b. 1902) in 1940. The other ministers in 1957 were George R. Brunk (b. 1911) and John H. Shenk (b. 1911). The membership in 1957 was 277. It has been affiliated with the Virginia Conference since 1904.

In 1899 a frame building 20 x 30 ft. was erected to serve as a schoolhouse and meetinghouse. In 1908 it was replaced by a larger building, which has been remodeled and enlarged to seat 350. A mission outpost was established in Newport News in 1928, which is now the Huntington Avenue (q.v.) Mennonite Church. In 1952 the Madison Avenue Chapel (q.v.) was organized as a mission among the Negroes of Newport News. In 1951 the Rock of Ages Broadcast, presently heard over stations in Richmond, Va., and Tangier, Africa, was organized as a congregational project. An elementary school was opened in 1942, and a four-room tile schoolhouse was built in 1949. The Warwick River Tide, a bi-weekly community paper, has been published since 1945 as an adjunct to the school. C.N.K.

The Warwick River Tide, Phebe Kraus and Eva Carper, editors, 1945-; J. H. Yoder, Fifty Years Building on the Warwick (Denbigh, c1947).

Wasen, one of the larger villages in the Emmental, Switzerland, to which the Anabaptist movement found early entry. In the 16th century there was a considerable congregation there, which held its meetings in a lonely spot in the forest known as the Täuferloch (Anabaptist Hollow), back in the valley of the Kurzenri, between cliffs. Their leader, Hans Meister, a close friend of Hans Haslibacher (q.v.), for many years evaded his captors in a hiding place in his own house. He was buried in his house; for when the house was rebuilt in the 19th century his skeleton was found there. A mason, Peter Ritter, who made fun of the skull, was immediately stricken with violent pains and died soon after. (The Zionspilger of 1890, No. 18, p. 3, reprints an article on Wasen from the Berner Tagblatt of Sept. 1, 1890.) S.G.

Washington, a state in the northwest corner of the United States, with an estimated population of 2,600,000 and an area of 61,192 square miles. Its Puget Sound area is a great commercial center and the nearest American gateway to the ports of Asia. The state produces much wheat, fruit, and forest products. The first Mennonites to settle in Washington came to Whiteman County in 1886, from Pulaski, Iowa. In 1893 these early settlers organized what is now the Onecho Mennonite Church (q.v.). In 1900 a congregation, formerly from Freeman, S.D., moved to Adams County from Lane County, Ore., and is now the Menno Mennonite Church (q.v.). In 1918 the First Mennonite Church of Monroe (q.v.) was organized by settlers from Pretty Prairie, Kan., and Corn, Okla. The Newport Mennonite Church, known as Spring Valley (q.v.), was organized in 1928 by settlers who began coming to this area in 1922. In 1944 the Mennonite Country Church east of Monroe was organized, and in 1945 the Glendale Mennonite Church (q.v.) of Lynden. The latest congregation to be established was Warden. There are thus seven G.C.M. churches in the state. The one Mennonite Brethren church in Washington is the Whitehorn M.B. Church, near Blaine (q.v.), which was organized in 1937. Of the eight churches, one is in the northeast, one in the southeast, two in the east central, two near Seattle, and two not far from Vancouver. Total membership in 1957 was 752—M.B. 187, G.C.M. 565. W.W.W.

H. D. Burkholder, The Story of Our Conference and Churches (North Newton, 1951).

Washington County, Iowa, in the southeastern part of the state, has Mennonite settlements in two areas, i.e., in the northern and the southern tiers of townships. The Johnson County (q.v.) settlement to the north has spread south into the northern Washington County townships of Lime Creek, English River, and Iowa. In Lime Creek are Wellman (q.v.) and Daytonville, each with a Mennonite church. Kalona (q.v.) is in English River and the location of the Kalona Mennonite Church and the Pleasant View Home for the Aged (q.v.). A short distance east of Kalona is the Sunnyside Conservative Mennonite Church (q.v.). The Old Order Amish settlement of Johnson County has also expanded into the northern part of Washington County. Near the center of the county is the county seat of Washington, in which a number of Mennonite families reside. The Mennonites in Marion Township in the southern tier of counties are a part of the Henry County (q.v.) settlement bordering Washington County on the south. In Marion Township are the Bethel Mennonite Church (q.v.) and the Eicher Emanuel Mennonite Church (q.v.). In 1958 Mennonites began to hold services in the Eureka church in Marion Township. The Eicher church is a G.C.M. congregation, while the others in the country are M.C. and C.M. The total Mennonite and Amish membership living in the county is c600. (See map of Johnson County, Vol. III, 116.) M.G.

Washington County, Md., is the third county from the western end of the state. The Mennonite community is located in the vicinity of Hagerstown, the county seat, where Mennonites had settled as early as 1776. They now number about 850, all members of the Mennonite Church (MC). This includes those who are members of the Washington Co., Md., and Franklin Co., Pa., Conference, together with a small group who have united with the Ohio and Eastern Conference. Most are descendants of settlers from Lancaster County, Pa.; there are also some converts resulting from missionary efforts. There are six churches in the district, three mission projects in the county, and one at Flintstone in Allegany County, Md.; the Old People's Home is located at Maugansville. M.K.H.

Washington County Mennonite Mutual Association of Wayland, Iowa, is a subsidiary of the Mennonite Aid Plan (q.v.) of Freeman, S.D., organized in 1950 to comply with the insurance laws of Iowa. Re-insurance is carried with the Freeman parent organization. It serves all Mennonites of Washington County and bordering counties with mutual fire and storm insurance. In 1953 it had 130 members, with a property coverage of $1,580,000. H.S.B.

Washington County (Maryland) and Franklin County (Pennsylvania) Mennonite Conference (MC). The earliest reference to this conference is found in the November 1865 issue of the Herald of Truth, where it is called semiannual; however, only annual sessions are known to have been held.

By earliest reports the moderator of Lancaster Conference served here also, and the Lancaster discipline and actions were used without change until 1915. However, beginning in 1912 additional actions were passed by the Washington County, Md., and Franklin County, Pa., Conference. Separate rules and discipline were adopted in 1922, revised in 1930 and 1957. About 1909, 9 congregations and 732 members were reported. Its congregations are all located in the two counties included in its name. Mission outposts are also conducted in Allegany County, Md., and Fulton County, Pa.

The Conference operates nine mission stations and through its District Mission Board the Maugansville Home for the Aged. Its Brotherly Aid Plan is very simply organized but functions efficiently in case of loss by fire or storm.

The Confession of Dordrecht of 1632 and the Doctrinal Statement of the Mennonite General Conference (MC) have been accepted as the basic doctrinal statements. In practice it is among the most conservative of the Mennonite conferences, with most of the men wearing the "plain" coat, and women the "cape" dress. The woman's veiling is worn at all times. Life insurance, lodge membership, attendance at farm shows, and possession of television are not allowed. A strong home life without radio is encouraged.

This conference belongs to the group related to the Mennonite (MC) General Conference, but has never been organizationally connected with it, though it supports many of its projects, and proportionately has contributed largely to the medical, teaching, missionary, and preaching personnel of the church. Since the adoption of the English language at the turn of the century and the use of more aggressive methods the conference has grown. Today (1959) there are 14 congregations, 9 mission congregations, 4 resident bishops, 20 ministers, and 1,645 members. J.I.L.

Washington, D.C., capital of the United States, 1950 pop. 802,178, located in and identical in territory with the small federal district known as the District of Columbia with 69 sq. mi., although the metropolitan area extends into the neighboring states of Maryland and Virginia on both sides of the Potomac. The area is the home of two small Mennonite congregations. The one inside the city limits is Woodridge Mennonite Church (MC) with 40 members belonging to the Allegheny Conference, founded in 1945, and the other just outside, in Maryland, is the Cottage City Mennonite Church with 36 members founded in 1922, belonging to the Lancaster Conference. It has also been the location of the office of the National Service Board for Religious Objectors (q.v.) since its creation in 1940. H.S.B.

Washita Arapaho Mennonite (GCM) Mission Station, Okla., located 5 miles west and 2 south of Corn (q.v.) on the Washita River, was started among Arapaho Indians in July 1889 by J. J. Kliever. Washita was originally called Shelly. When a large Mennonite settlement originated in this area the Indians gradually moved away. J. J. Kliever became a minister of the Bergthal Mennonite Church which arose here, and the General Conference Mission Board discontinued this station around 1900. C.K.

Marvin Kroeker, "Mennonites in the Oklahoma 'Runs,'" Menn. Life X (July 1955) 115; H. P. Krebiel, The History of the General Conference (Canton, 1898) I, 3, 10; II, 14.

Washita County, located in the southwestern part of Oklahoma, is bisected by the Washita River. There are about 1,300 Mennonites living in the northeast section of Washita County, and a few families in adjacent Custer County. Of these about 900 are Mennonite Brethren and about 400 General Conference Mennonites. Washita County, a part of the Arapaho-Cheyenne Reservation, was opened to settlement in 1892. The first Mennonite settlers came in the latter part of 1892, filing for land with the intention of moving here the following year. In the spring of 1893 the first families moved into the county from Kansas. There are four Mennonite churches in the county, two each of M.B. and G.C.M. A number of Mennonite Brethren families and a few Mennonites started the Calvary Baptist Church a few years ago. The M.B. Church has a four-year accredited academy, located in Corn (q.v.), which draws students from all over Oklahoma and beyond. H.H.

Washita Gemeinschaft: see Corn Bible Academy.

Wassenberger Prädikanten, the intellectual leaders of the district of Wassenberg in the duchy of Jülich 1528-32, under the protection of the bailiff (Drost) Werner von Pallant (q.v.), who zealously worked for the Reformation. They did not have a unified system of thought, but were quite independent of each other. The unifying factor was their antipathy to the Catholic Church. Most of them rejected infant baptism and were in many respects akin to Anabaptism. When Werner von Pallant was threatened with loss of his position—the threat became fact in 1533—most of them betook themselves to Münster, where they joined the Anabaptists and found an early death. Rembert, who gives the most detailed and reliable account of them (Wiedertäufer, 149 f.), describes them as follows: "Prädikanten was what they called those 'heretical' preachers who streamed together there [at Wassenberg], Joh. Campanus, Kloppeis, Dionysius Vinne, Slachtscaep, Roll, and others. They preached busily in the neighborhood and won a considerable following, especially in Dremmen, Hückelhofen, Breeberen, also in Süstern and Höngen. . . . Since the preachers concentrated their work in northwestern Jülich, but especially in Wassenberg as their center, they were commonly called 'the Wassenberger Prädikanten.' For more than three years most of them could continue their work undisturbed before the government took action against them. During this time significant and dubious changes took place in the theology of these men." (See Henric Rol, Johannes Campanus, Johann Kloppeis, Hendrik Slachtscaep, Dionysius Vinne.) (Rembert, Wiedertäufer; ML IV.)

HEGE, H.S.B.

Watchful Pilgrim, a "Religious Monthly Journal Devoted to the Interest of the Mennonite Church, the Exposition of Gospel Truth, and the Promotion of Practical Piety among all classes," published by Abraham Blosser (MC) at Dale Enterprise, Va., first issue August 1881, as a 24-page 8½ x 11½ in. paper. At least by September 1884 it was appearing as an 8-page semimonthly. GCL has scattered numbers, the last being March 1, 1888. An interesting feature of the last years was the "Meeting Calendar" for the Virginia Mennonite congregations. H.S.B.

Water, Adrianus Pieter van de (1896-1951), a Mennonite minister, serving the congregations of Leermens-Loppersum 1925-27 (1927-35 pastor of the Dutch Protestant Union at Baarn and active with the International School of Philosophy at Amersfoort), Oldeboorn 1935-39, Zwolle 1939-42, Apeldoorn 1942-45, Hallum 1945-48, and St. Anna-Parochie 1948-50, was appointed in June 1950 by the trustees of the A.D.S. (q.v.) as a minister at large among the Dutch Mennonites, particularly to build up the work of "special needs" (see Stichting voor Bizondere Noden). He could devote his great intelligence and organizational ability to this work for only one year, dying on June 7, 1951. Van de Water also was a promoter of the children's home Oud Wulven (q.v.) at Houten (since 1958 at Schoorl), was active in the care of Jewish refugees from Germany in the Nazi period shortly before World War II and of the displaced persons from Eastern Europe after the war. He published two papers in Doopsgezind Jaarboekje: "Het Protestantisch-Joodsche Vluchtelingenwerk" (1940) and "Moelijkheden en mogelijkheden voor de financiën in onze Broederschap" (1950). His address given at the fifth Mennonite World Conference is found in the Proceedings of this conference (Akron, 1950). (Algemeen Doopsgez. Weekblad of June 16, 1951; DJ 1952, 13 f.)
vdZ.

Water, W. H. toe: see Toe Water.

Watergang, a hamlet in the Dutch province of North Holland, where Elder Leenaert (q.v.) Bouwens baptized 14 persons in 1563-65; they may have joined or founded a congregation in the neighborhood such as Uitgeest (q.v.), for there was never a congregation at Watergang.
vdZ.

Waterhorne. Menno Simons wrote a letter c1558 to the brethren in the Waterhorne; this probably means Terhorne (q.v.) in the Dutch province of Friesland. The letter is found in Opera Omnia, 399, Writings, 1055.
vdZ.

Waterland is called a district in the Dutch province of North Holland, approximately bounded by the Zaan River on the south and the west, by the Zuiderzee (now IJssel Lake) on the east, and on the north by the former lakes south of the line Alkmaar-Hoorn. In this territory as early as 1534 there were numerous Anabaptists, and after c1555 because of their progressiveness "Waterlander" became the name of a branch of the Dutch Mennonites. (See Waterlanders.)
vdZ.

Waterlanders, a branch of the Dutch Mennonites, deriving their name from Waterland, a region in the province of North Holland.

After most of the Mennonite elders, e.g., Dirk Philipsz, Menno Simons, and particularly Leenaert (q.v.) Bouwens, in 1555-57 proceeded to a more strict practice concerning the ban (q.v.) and avoidance (q.v.; see also Swaen Rutgers), some less strict Mennonites protested, and a conference of South German Anabaptists held at Strasbourg in 1557 condemned this rigorism and turned from Menno and his coelders. Before this some groups of moderates at Emden, Franeker, in Waterland, and elsewhere, had separated from the main body. Fortunately this controversy, unlike the later schisms among the Dutch Mennonites, did not include the ban of the separated, but for two centuries or more the more liberal took their own course. By Leenaert Bouwens and his adherents they were called "Scheedemakers" (after Elder Jacob—q.v.—Jans Scheedemaker; the word "scheedemaker," however, also has the derogatory meaning of schismatic), or "De Drekwagon" (q.v., garbage wagon). At first they are found under different names like Franekers, or Franekeraars (after the town of Franeker, q.v., where they had many followers), Joriaen-Heynsvolk, or Naelde-mansvolk (q.v.), but soon they were generally known as Waterlanders.

Among the Dutch Mennonites until c1665 they were the least strict and most progressive and liberal branch. From the very beginning they were not as averse to contacts with "the world" as the strict Mennonites. Intermarriage with non-Mennonites, though denounced in the conference meetings as "evil and impure," was practiced and tolerated. They soon permitted their members to hold some lower magisterial offices. Though the principle of nonresistance was emphatically taught, two Waterlander brethren (see Bogaert, P. W.) in 1568 visited the Prince of Orange in his army camp to offer him a considerable sum of money which they had collected in their congregations to enable him to fight the Spaniards then dominating the Netherlands, and from c1630 church discipline slackened against members who served on armed ships. They did not use the name "Mennisten," thinking it inappropriate to be named for a man, preferring to be called "Doopsgezinden" (q.v.). They rejected the doctrine of the Incarnation (q.v.) as taught by Menno Simons and Dirk Philipsz and by c1620 they are said not to have rebaptized members of the Reformed Church (who had been baptized in infancy) who joined a Waterlander congregation. They admitted to the Lord's table members of other Mennonite branches and even of other churches, and were on friendly terms with kindred spirits like Coornhert (q.v.). Yet they were not the garbage wagon as Leenaert Bouwens had decried them: they decidedly refused to accept the Socinian (q.v.) teachings of the Polish Brethren Ostorodt (q.v.) and Voydovsky shortly after 1600, and their Prussian congregations firmly resisted Socinian infiltration (see Moscovius). They were not so liberal as to enter into a union with some English nonconformists who taught believers' baptism and who wanted to merge with them; the fact that these English "Anabaptists" had no objections to swearing an oath prevented the union (see Coventry, and Tookey, Elias).

At first the local church among the Waterlanders had great authority and was entitled to choose its own ministers, "leeraers tot den vollen dienst" (elders) and "vermaners" (preachers) as well as "armendienaers" (deacons), but by 1581 it was usual for the elders and often the preachers to be appointed by the leaders, i.e., by Hans de Ries (q.v.), who was a powerful leader of the Waterlanders from 1577 until his death in 1638. By his authority the Waterlanders, unlike all other Mennonite branches, held their communion services seated around a table. De Ries also introduced the singing of Psalms, and undoubtedly it was also due to him that after c1580 silent prayer was gradually replaced by a prayer spoken by the minister, though silent prayer was still found in a few Waterlander churches as late as 1660.

It is hard to imagine that these individualistic, partly spiritualistic Waterlanders wanted a common confession; yet the Waterlanders were the first Dutch Mennonites to have a confession of faith. It was drawn up in 1577 by Scheedemaker and a few other ministers, including de Ries, and contains 25 articles (it was reprinted in DB 1904).

The Waterlanders were also the first to hold a kind of more or less regular conference meeting, the first of which was held at Emden, East Friesland, in September 1568 (the interesting minutes are published in DB 1877, 69-75). A following delegates' meeting was held March 4-7, 1581, at Amsterdam (minutes in DB 1877, 80-87). Twelve congregations were represented—Gent and Antwerp in Belgium, Amsterdam, Rotterdam, Purmerend, Zaandam, Jisp, Schermerhorn, Graft, De Rijp, Westzaan, and Wormer. As in 1568, a number of practical church matters were regulated, "not as new laws, but as good advice," as the final clause states.

Apart from de Ries outstanding leaders were the elder Scheedemaker, Lubbert Gerritsz (q.v.) at Amsterdam and Jan Gerritz (q.v.) van Emden at Danzig.

After the High German and (Mild) Frisian Mennonites had merged shortly after 1591 on the basis of the Concept (q.v.) of Cologne, a number of Waterlander congregations joined this union c1600, henceforth called "Bevredigde Broederschap" (q.v.). But since the Waterlanders in this union proved to be more liberal in church matters than particularly the High Germans, a number of High Germans and some Frisians withdrew from the Bevredigde Broederschap in 1613 (see Afgedeelde). Some Bevredigden thereupon were absorbed by the Waterlanders.

The Waterlanders were very active in collecting accounts of martyrs; shortly after 1600 they even sent a brother to Germany, Austria, and Moravia, to make inquiries; de Ries in 1615 published a new martyr book, entitled Historie der Martelaren . . . with a Preface which is typically Waterlander.

Though exact figures of the number of their congregations and membership are not available, the Waterlanders in the early 17th century had a considerable following. In Friesland the number of their brethren in 1666 was 882, somewhat more than one sixth of all the Mennonites. In North Holland, where they had their own conferece (see Rijper Sociëteit), the Waterlanders c1650 outnumbered all other branches; in Amsterdam the baptized membership in 1615 numbered more than 1,000. At a conference held in September 1647 at Amsterdam 58 delegates were present, representing 41 churches, 22 of them from towns in the present province of North Holland, 6 from South Holland, 10 from Friesland, 2 from Groningen, and Emden in East Friesland. At this meeting it was resolved "to offer peace" to (i.e., to propose a merger with) the united Flemish, High German, and Frisian group.

It is noteworthy that the Waterlanders, who, unlike the strict groups, did not consider their own church as the (only) true Mennonite church, which, as is pointed out by de Ries in the preface to the martyr book, fervently hoped for and ardently acted in behalf of a general union of all Mennonites, were not involved in several endeavors "to make peace"; the forementioned request of 1647 to the Flemish was dropped. Obviously the other branches did not appreciate the liberal views of the Waterlanders. A meeting of Flemish delegates at Leiden in 1660 (see Leidsche Synode) emphatically disapproved their lax church discipline, their marriage with non-Mennonites, their acceptance of Reformed and even unbaptized persons in their communion services, and their neglect of proper ordination for the ministers, not clearly distinguishing between the offices of elder and preacher. Moreover they were censured for their friendly interest in the Collegiants (q.v.).

It was not until the Lammerenkrijgh (q.v.) had in 1664 regrouped the Dutch Mennonites into two new branches—the progressive Lamists (q.v.) and the conservative Zonists (q.v.)—that in many towns the Waterlanders merged with the Lamists—at Amsterdam in 1668, at Haarlem in 1672, at Rotterdam in 1700, and at Leiden in 1701. But on the other hand a number of rural Waterlander churches in North Holland joined the Zonist conference (Sociëteit) in 1674. This was due to the influence of some of their elders like E. A. van Dooregeest (q.v.), P. J. Stapper (q.v.), D. S. Moeriaen(s), and Jan Maertensz Mol, who strongly emphasized maintaining the confession of faith drawn up in 1610 by de Ries and Lubbert Gerritsz, and who rejected the "unlimited toleration" of the Collegiants. As a consequence of this influence some Waterlander churches like De Rijp, Oostzaandam, Westzaan, and others resolved to maintain the confession, to admit to communion services only those who were baptized upon the confession of faith, and to refuse the pulpit to those ministers who worshiped with the Collegiants at Rijnsburg (q.v.). This meant the dissolving of the Waterlander branch, their churches partly merging with the Lamists, partly with the Zonists. The (Waterlander) Rijper Conference however continued its activities, and many of the congregations retained the name of Waterlander until the 19th century.

vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 465, 471-76, 478-91, 507, 510-14, 517, 524, 526-33, 537 f., 540-43, 546-54, 556, 575, 579, 774, 776 f., 890-96, 899-911; II, No. 2626; DB 1872, 55, 57-59, 67 f.; 1876, 21-25; 1877, 66-93; 1892, 99-101; 1894, 34; 1897, 91 f., 97-105, 109 f., 113, 119; 1898, 55; 1903, 57-77, 80-85; 1904, 138-59; Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 163 et passim; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, passim; II, passim; III, 9, 17-20, 44.

lies, arrived on the banks of the Grand River in what was then Upper Canada, from Franklin County, Pa. They were the first white settlers in this county. The settlement grew steadily until by 1828 there were 1,000 Mennonite members and 2,000 hearers. The land was taken from the Beasley Tract, this being 94,012 acres of Six Nations Indians' lands in the Grand River Basin purchased from them by one Richard Beasley through the government of Upper Canada which acted as trustee. In November 1803 an agreement was signed between the German Company on the one hand, representing the Mennonites, and Beasley, on the other hand, for the purchase of 60,000 acres of his land for the sum of 10,000 pounds. On this land there was a mortgage of $20,000. Precisely when this fact was discovered is a matter of some doubt. Suffice it to say that Joseph Sherk and Samuel Bricker went to Pennsylvania to procure this money. In April 1803 a joint stock company was organized in the home of "Hannes" Eby in Lancaster County to raise the mortgage money. This was done within two years, for on June 29, 1805, the deed for the 60,000 acres was executed in the Registry at Berlin, Ont. Mutual faith and co-operation motivated this transaction. Most likely it was "Hannes" Eby who persuaded his brethren in Lancaster to aid their brethren in Waterloo. Most of the early settlers came from Lancaster County, Pa., and some from the Franconia area—Bucks, Montgomery, and (a few) Franklin counties. In 1957 there were 18 active M.C. congregations in the county with a membership of 2,899. Dates given are those of the erection of church buildings, as closely as can be determined, although in many cases services were held in homes prior to the building of a church. Names of congregations are listed as in the Mennonite Yearbook, being both family and place names. The former are the survival of the pioneer custom of naming a church after the family from whose land the property was secured, either by purchase or donation. These congregations are First Mennonite, 1813; Snyder (Bloomington), 1826; Wanner (Hespeler), 1829; Detweiler (Roseville), 1830; Geiger (New Hamburg), 1831; Cressman (Breslau), 1834; Latschar (Mannheim), 1839; Blenheim (New Dundee), 1839; Weber (Strasburg), 1840; Shantz (Baden), 1840; Hagey, now called Preston, 1842; St. Jacobs, 1844; Waterloo (David Eby), 1851; Biehn (New Hamburg), 1865; Floradale, 1896; Baden, 1913; Elmira, 1924; Hawkesville, 1950. With the exception of Kitchener, which is 70 per cent urban and 30 per cent rural, and Waterloo, which is 50 per cent of each, these are all rural congregations. Each of these churches, except Hawkesville, has its own cemetery. Following are some of the most typical family names in these congregations, although many of these have disappeared from the rolls of active memberships: Betzner, Schoerg (Sherk), Reichert, Gingerich, Bechtel, Kinsey, Rosenberger, Biehn, Clemens, Bear, Sararas, Shupe, Livergood, Wismer, Ringler, Correll, Saltzberger, Bricker, Erb, Groh, Stauffer, Kraft, Hammacher, Bergey, Scheirich (Shiry), Bauman, Eby, Schneider, Cress, Brech, Blihm, Shantz, Rotharmel, Strohm, Cressman, Bretz, Brubacher, Weber, Eckert, Pannebecker, Eschelman, Springer, Herner, Bock, Bowman, Martin, Burkholder, Good, Burkhard, Musselman, Shoemaker, Detweiler, Hallman, Huber, Lichty, Schlichter, Wanner, Hagey, Risser, Clemmer, Groff, Shuh, Wenger, Hurst, Hoffman, Moyer, Bingeman, Fried, Kolb, Gehman, Schiedel.

Three schisms resulted in the formation of other Mennonite groups. The first was that of the Mennonite Brethren in Christ (q.v.) in the early 1870's. This was a division on the progressive side, the points at issue being mainly the conducting of prayer and revival meetings and Sunday schools. In 1953 this group had 5 congregations in the county with a total of 666 members. In 1948 they changed their name to United Missionary Church (q.v.), thus abandoning entirely the name Mennonite. In the late 1880's occurred the second division, this time on the conservative side, when the Old Order (Wisler) Mennonites seceded. They are now subdivided into three groups, namely, the original Old Order, the Waterloo-Markham conference, and the David Martin group. The difference in these factions concerns the ownership and use of modern inventions, together with some points of attire. No points of faith are involved since all adhere to the Dordrecht Confession (q.v.) of 1632. Of these three factions the first has five congregations with a total of 1,061 members, the second five congregations and 630 members, and the third three congregations with 116 members, a total of 1,807. None of these factions hold revival meetings. Instead a public invitation is given each year from their pulpits. Those accepting the invitation are then instructed in the Dordrecht Confession and in their own group discipline. The third division occurred in the First Mennonite Church (q.v.) of Kitchener in 1924 and resulted in the formation of the Stirling Avenue (q.v.) G.C.M. Church, which in 1957 had 476 members.

The remaining Mennonite groups in the county are the Amish Mennonites, Reformed Mennonites, and the "Russian" Mennonites. The Amish Mennonite settlement is located in Wilmot Township. It was begun in 1824 by Christian Nafziger (q.v.), who came from Bavaria to America and arranged with Governor Maitland of Upper Canada for the purchase of lands in this township. In 1826 the Ropp family emigrated from Alsace and settled in Wilmot Township. Thus the Amish Mennonites are of both Bavarian and Alsatian origin. Reasons for emigration were desire for new land and exemption from military service. Typical family names among them are Nafziger, Steinman, Bender, Ropp, Lichty, Jantzi, Schwarzendruber, Roth, Jutzi, Mayer, Schultz, Wagler, Gascho, Miller, and Brenne-man. In 1957 there were five congregations of this group in Waterloo County and five just outside in Perth and Oxford, all those in Waterloo County being in the Ontario A.M. Conference. The total membership in the county is 1,103. The main difference between them and the M.C. group is in social customs. In addition to this main group of Amish Mennonites there is a small congregation of Old Order Amish (q.v.) in the county with 140 members. They worship only in private homes. In 1956 a schismatic group at Milverton under Valentine Nafziger withdrew from the Ontario A.M. conference.

The Reformed Mennonites are a small, closely knit group with two meetinghouses (Hostettters near New Hamburg, 1844, and Kingwood near Wellesley, 1850) and 77 members in the county.

Two Mennonite churches were formed in Waterloo County by emigrants from Russia (q.v.) in 1922-25, the United Mennonite (GCM) with 407 members, in the city of Waterloo, and the Mennonite Brethren, with 405 members, in Kitchener. In both, services are still conducted in German. The other emigration from Russia, that of the 1870's, left no churches in Waterloo County, but Jacob Y. Shantz (q.v.), then a leading member of the Mennonite Brethren in Christ, was the guiding spirit in settling these people in the Red River Valley in Manitoba, and the whole movement received solid financial support from the Mennonites of Waterloo County.

The Mennonites have the following institutions in Waterloo County: Rockway Mennonite School (MC, 1945) and Golden Rule Bookstore (MC, 1938), both in Kitchener, Fairview Mennonite Home (MC, 1943, 1956) in Preston, and the Mennonite Brethren Bible School in Kitchener. The MCC Canadian headquarters office has been in Waterloo since 1948 (1944-48 in Kitchener). The United Missionary Church established Emmanuel Bible College here in 1940.

The Mennonites of Waterloo County are chiefly an agricultural people. There is, however, no communal organization to aid in the purchase of land. Most Mennonites who come to the cities of Kitchener and Waterloo are industrial workers. The percentage of business and professional people is small. The Mennonites (MC) have a fire insurance organization called the Mennonite Aid Union (q.v.), founded in 1867. Rates are low and membership is limited to adherents of this branch of Mennonites and their families. Waterloo County was the first Mennonite community of any real size in Canada, and contains more Mennonites than any other county in the Dominion, 7,836 members (not counting the UMC), and has had and continues to exert a marked influence on Mennonite religious and cultural life.

J.B.C.

L. J. Burkholder, A Brief History of the Mennonites in Ontario (n.p., 1935); Ezra E. Eby, A Biographical History of Waterloo Township and Other Townships of the County, Being a History of the Early Settlers and Their Descendants Mostly all of Pennsylvania Dutch Origin, and also Other Unpublished Historical Information Chiefly of a Local Character, 2 vv. (Berlin, Ont., 1895-96); G. Elmore Reaman, The Trail of the Black Walnut (n.p., 1957); Waterloo Historical Society Annual Report, 1912.

Waterloo (Ont.) Mennonite Church (MC): see Erb Street Mennonite Church.

Waterloo-Kitchener United Mennonite Church (GCM), 15 George St., Waterloo, Ont., a member of the Canadian District Conference, was organized in 1925 under the name "Die mennonitische Flüchtlingsgemeinde in Ontario." In 1926 this name was changed to Waterloo-Kitchener Mennonite Church, and the word "United" was placed before Mennonite in 1927. The 52 charter members had come to Canada from Russia in 1924. Because of the influx of immigrants the membership rose to 302 within six months. The leadership was entrusted to J. H. Janzen. At first the congregation met in a rented hall. In 1927 a church building was rented, which was purchased in 1932, constructed in 1888 of stone and brick. An addition of similar building material was made to the church in 1952, doubling its size and providing seating accommodation for 375. Since World War II many Mennonite immigrants who came to Waterloo have joined the fellowship of this group.

This congregation was the first one to be organized in Ontario by the immigrants of 1924. From here the groups at Essex, Vineland, Port Rowan, and Virgil have originated. The first missionary to be sent to the foreign field by the Ontario G.C.M. churches came from this congregation, viz., Rudolph Martens and his wife Dr. Elvina Martens. The congregation is predominantly urban. In 1957 the minister was Henry H. Epp, and the membership was 407.

H.P.E.

Waterloo-Markham Conference of Old Order Mennonites was formed in 1939 by the more progressive faction of the O.O.M. in the Wisler communities of Ontario. They use the same meetinghouses as the Old Order at Martins (St. Jacobs), in North Woolwich (Floradale), and in West Woolwich (Elmira). They have purchased the Goshen church in Peel Township and have built a new church in East Woolwich near West Montrose. Their bishop is Amsey M. Martin for the Waterloo section, with ministers Urias Martin, Noah B. Martin, Ira S. Brubacher, and George Brubacher. In the Markham section they worship at Altona, Almira, and the Reesor church, with Bishop Abram Smith and ministers Fred Nighswander and Cecil Reesor. They have a few members at Rainham and at Zurich. This conference takes an active part in the relief program and the peace testimony and has an awakening interest in evangelism and in missions. In 1957 there were 638 members, of whom 530 were in Waterloo County in two major congregations, 105 in Markham in two major congregations, and three at Rainham.

J.C.F.

Watonswan County is located in the southern part of Minnesota. It is the fourth county east of the South Dakota line in the second tier of counties above the Iowa border. Most of the Mennonites are found in the western and northwestern parts of the county. Three hundred Mennonites, members of ten congregations, eight of which are, however, centered in Cottonwood County (q.v.), live in Watonswan County. The Mennonite settlement extends solidly westward into Cottonwood County, with a few living in surrounding counties. There are 289 G.C.M., seven E.M.B., and four M.B. members living in Watonswan County. The first Russian Mennonites in the county settled in Butterfield Township in 1875; the first Galician Mennonites came in 1881. The two Mennonite churches in Watonswan County are the Mennonite Church (GCM) of Butterfield and the First Mennonite Church (GCM) north of Butterfield. There are no other Mennonite institutions in the county.

W.L.

Watrous (or Philadelphia) Mennonite Brethren Church, located northeast of Watrous in north Saskatchewan, was organized under the leadership of P. D. Janzen as an Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Church in 1927 with 40 members. In 1935 the church, with a membership of 150, joined the Canadian M.B. Conference. As elsewhere in Saskatchewan, large numbers moved out of the province, so that the membership in 1957 was 68. In 1948 a new church building was erected. Leading ministers who have served the church are P. D. Janzen, Frank Wiens, Jacob D. Dick, and Dan Klassen, who was the pastor in 1957.

J.H.E.

Watt, Joachim von: see Vadian(us).

Wauseon (Ohio) Evangelical Mennonite Church was organized in December 1948 by 106 charter members who transferred from the Archbold (Ohio) E.M.C. congregation, which had helped finance the building project and authorized the new congregation. Gordon G. Zimmerman was the first pastor. Its meetinghouse was dedicated Jan. 29, 1949. On Dec. 31, 1958, the congregation had 278 members, with Arthur Enns as pastor.

H.A.Dr.

Wawasee Lakeside Chapel Mennonite Church (MC), Syracuse, Ind., founded in 1947, is a mission church under the Indiana-Michigan Mennonite Mission Board and is located on the east side of Lake Wawasee. In 1958 it had 15 members, with Herbert L. Yoder serving as pastor. M.G.

Way, The, first published in January 1913 by the Mennonite Publishing House, Scottsdale, Pa., began as an 8-page, 6 x 9 in., illustrated monthly. The paper was intended to be purchased by individuals, organizations, or congregations of the Mennonite Church (MC) for free distribution as a missionary project. Editors (until 1938 there were two co-editors) of the Way have been John H. Mosemann, Sr., and J. A. Ressler 1913-23, Mosemann and John L. Horst 1923-38, Horst alone 1938-48, Harold Breneman 1948-57, and Urie Bender 1957-. In July 1943 the size was changed to 4 pages and somewhat later to 5½ x 8 in. Since its beginning most of the articles, stories, and poems have been selected from other papers and have constantly maintained a strong emphasis on evangelism. The monthly circulation in 1957 was 240,000. E.D.Z.

Way to the City of Peace, in Which Is Shown How to Obtain Peace, by Pieter Pietersz (1574-1651), a book of considerable popularity first published about 1625, 5th edition 1642, at least eight editions in Dutch, in addition to at least three editions in his Opera Omnia (two 1715 and one n.d. in GCL), a German edition (1790 alone), and two editions of his Ausgewählte Schriften (1865 at Stuttgart and 1901 at Elkhart, both in GCL). The book depicts the Christian's journey to the heavenly Jerusalem, the city of peace. Its remarkable similarity to Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress from This World to That Which Is to Come (1678) suggests dependency of Bunyan on Pietersz, which however has not been proved. (See Pieter Pietersz for fuller discussion.)

H.S.B.

A detailed account is given by J. J. Honig in "Reizen naar de Eeuwigheid," DB 1896, 1-35, esp. 18-26; see also R. Friedmann, Mennonite Piety Through the Centuries (Goshen, 1949) 106-9.

Wayland, Iowa, a town in northwestern Henry County, near the Washington County line, is located in the southeastern part of the state. It was at first known as Marshall. Mennonites have lived in its vicinity since the late 1840's. Its estimated population in 1958 was 660, when approximately 115 Mennonite families lived in the town. Mennonites operated 22 businesses within Wayland, and among the professional men were a Mennonite doctor, a veterinarian, and a dentist. The Wayland Mennonite (GCM) Church (q.v.), with 345 members, is located in the town, while the Sugar Creek Mennonite (MC) Church is situated 2 miles southeast of town.

The Eicher Emmanuel (GCM) Mennonite Church (q.v.), 4 miles northeast of Wayland, is in Washington County, as is also the Bethel Mennonite (MC) Church (q.v.), 3 miles north of the town. M.G.

Wayland (Iowa) Mennonite Church (GCM), a member of the Middle District, is largely an outgrowth of the Eicher Emmanuel Mennonite Church (q.v.) near Wayland. The present wood structure, dedicated in 1900, was enlarged in 1911 to seat about 250. The church was organized with 56 charter members on March 8, 1900, with Peter E. Stuckey as the first pastor. Loris A. Habegger has been the pastor since June 5, 1954. The membership in 1957 was 345. The members are largely of Swiss, Alsatian, and French background, but have intermarried with other ethnic groups. Secret orders and military participation are no longer deterrent to membership. L.A.H.

Wayne County, Ohio, established in 1796, was the third county formed from the original Northwest Territory and originally included parts of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, and all of Michigan. It now contains an area of 540 square miles, lying 30 miles south of Cleveland and 50 west of the Pennsylvania boundary. The soil, a deep clayey loam, is well adapted for growing wheat. The surface is mostly rolling, and formerly was heavily forested.

The earliest trail from east to west led from Pittsburgh, Pa., south of Wooster to Sandusky, Ohio. This may account for the early settlement of the area east of Wooster in Green Township and in Chester Township west-northwest. Although a few Amish ventured into Holmes County to the south as early as 1809 and Mennonites settled farther east in the state about the same time, neither Amish nor Mennonites attempted settlement in Wayne until the end of the War of 1812-14 had made the region relatively free from the danger of Indian raids. Amish from Somerset and Mifflin counties, Pa., arrived first and founded, in the townships lying east and northeast of Wooster, what later developed into the Oak Grove and Pleasant Hill Amish Mennonite congregation (q.v.). Swiss Mennonites from the Bernese Jura founded Sonnenberg (q.v.) in 1819 and Chippeway (now Crown Hill, q.v.) in 1825. Mennonites from Lancaster County, Pa., founded Martins (q.v.) southeast of Orrville in 1824. Another group of Mennonites from Bucks County, Pa., settled in Chester Township during the late 1820's and early 1830's. They were akin to some of the Mennonites who founded the Guilford congregation (q.v.) in Medina County (q.v.).

Several Wayne County congregations have become extinct or the members have moved away. The original Amish settlement in Green and Milton townships gradually became Amish Mennonite (q.v.) during the second half of the 19th century and are known as the Oak Grove (q.v.) and Pleasant Hill (q.v.) congregations. The small group who withdrew before the middle of the century to maintain an Old Order Amish congregation disappeared soon after the death of their bishop, Hannes Yoder. The present Old Order Amish in the county have within recent decades been moving into the southeastern townships from the expanding congregations in Holmes County to the south. They now number 11 districts with 823 members. (See Wayne County, Ohio, Amish.) The Rich and Krabill families who left the Oak Grove congregation in 1869 and who later founded the Sterling, Ohio, Mennonite Church (q.v., GCM) united with the Wadsworth Mennonite Church (q.v., GCM) about 1920. A small Brethren in Christ congregation, proselyted from the Amish and Mennonites in the county about the middle of the century, and though served by the highly respected elder Elias Schrock, became extinct before the end of the century. The John Holdeman Church, later called Church of God in Christ, Mennonite (q.v.), was founded in Chester Township in 1859 and erected a meetinghouse there, but moved west about 1883. The city congregations in Orrville (founded 1909) and Wooster (founded 1942) are composed of families with varying background. The Conservative congregations at Maysville and East Union are of recent origin out of the Old Order Amish.

All but one of the original Mennonite congregations (Martin's, q.v.) became Old Order Mennonite (q.v.) during the Wisler (q.v.) controversy in Elkhart County, Ind., about 1871-72. Some of these are nearing extinction. A few Milton Township Swiss Mennonites helped to found the Apostolic Christian Church in that township about 1855. The Sonnenberg Swiss Mennonite congregation has suffered considerable loss: first, in 1886 to the Salem congregation (q.v., GCM); in 1893-94 several members to the "Russelites," i.e., Jehovah's Witnesses; in 1917-19 to the Kidron Tabernacle, which is now losing most of its young people to the Missionary Church in Dalton; in 1935 to the Kidron congregation (q.v., MC); and within the past few years 40 members to a new independent Bethel congregation near Apple Creek, formerly meeting in the Frog Pond school-house.

Of the Mennonite congregations active in the county at present the following have an Amish (Amish Mennonite) background: Oak Grove (MC), 398 members; Pleasant Hill (MC), 180; Salem (MC), 45; Orrville (MC), 265; Wooster (MC), 115; Maysville (CAM), 180; East Union (CAM), 90. The following were originally Mennonite: Martins (MC), 186; Wayne County (OOM), 3; Eight Square (OOM), 5; Chester (OOM), 40; County Line (OOM), 160; Chestnut Ridge (MC), 44. Those with a Swiss Mennonite background are Sonnenberg (MC), 168; Crown Hill (MC), 144; Salem (GCM), 204; Kidron (MC), 509; Bethel (MC), 50; Marshallville, Reformed Mennonite, 24.

All of the M.C. congregations are members of the Ohio and Eastern Conference except Oak Grove and Bethel which are independent, and Sonnenberg, a member of the Virginia Conference. Chestnut Ridge also is a member of the Virginia Conference.

The total membership of all branches in the county in 1957 was 3,393, distributed as follows: Mennonite Church (MC), 12 congregations with 2,134 members; Old Order Amish, 14 with 1,061; Old Order Mennonites, 4 with 208; General Conference Mennonite, 1 with 204; Reformed Mennonite, 1 with 24. J.S.U.

Wayne County (Ohio) Amish congregation, founded in Green Township in 1818 by David Stutzman, Henry Yoder, and Peter, Abraham, and Jacob Schrock from Somerset County, Pa., and by David Zook, Christian Lantz, Jacob Yoder, and Christian Brandt from Mifflin County, Pa. Plank families were also prominent in the settlement at an early date. In 1834 David Zook moved to Fairfield County, Ohio (q.v.), leaving the congregation in charge of Jacob Yoder and Hannes Yoder, bishops. The settlement grew rapidly. Before 1850 the 300 members organized a northern and a southern district and soon after that date began to adopt a more liberal discipline later known as Amish Mennonite. In protest Hannes Yoder, bishop, and Emanuel Hochstetler, preacher, with a small following withdrew to maintain the strict Old Order until the former's death about 1860. After 1855 a large majority of the congregation followed the more progressive leadership of John K. Yoder, bishop (q.v.), to found what eventually became the Oak Grove Amish Mennonite Church (q.v.). When the Oak Grove congregation built a meetinghouse in 1862, a small number under the leadership of Emanuel Hochstetler again withdrew, but the little band became extinct even before his death.

During the early years of the present century Amish from the overcrowded Amish settlement in Holmes and Tuscarawas counties began to move into southeastern Wayne County. The first year in which the Mennonite Yearbook lists Amish preachers with a Wayne County address is 1913. In that year Samuel E. Yoder, formerly a preacher in Tuscarawas County but ordained bishop before 1906, and Daniel Wengerd and B. J. Yoder, preachers, give Fredericksburg, Wayne County, as their address. This is the first year that either Wengerd or B. J. Yoder is listed as a minister. Within recent years the expansion from Holmes and Tuscarawas continues northward and northeastward into Wayne and southward into Coshocton County. At present (1957) Wayne County has fourteen "districts" or congregations with a total baptized membership of 1,061 in seven districts around Fredericksburg, one each near Dalton and Mt. Eaton, three at Apple Creek, and one north, one south of Orrville. Eleven bishops, thirty ministers, and ten deacons serve the fourteen Wayne County Amish districts. J.S.U.

John Umble, "The Oak Grove . . . Mennonite Church," MQR XXXI (July 1957) 156-73.

Wayne County (Ohio) Old Order Mennonites. In the division of 1872 between the Mennonites who remained with the Ohio Conference (MC) and those who followed Jacob Wisler (q.v.), two congregations of Wisler Mennonites were formed in Wayne County: (1) Chester (q.v.), northwest of Wooster, which worshiped in the meetinghouse in the center of Chester Township in Section 16, and which simply left the Ohio Conference as an entire congregation, and (2) Orrville, which worshiped in two meetinghouses east of Orrville, viz., Chestnut Ridge (q.v.) in Section 32, and County Line (q.v.) in Section 36, which borders on Stark County. (1) In 1872 the leading ministers in the Chester congregation were Bishop John Shaum (1797-1882) and Preacher Peter Troxel (1804-95). The group built a new house of worship in 1873, but this was not an internal schismatic move, for the entire congregation became Wisler Mennonite. The division within the Wisler Conference in 1907 involved the Chester congregation, the progressive group becoming increasingly strong numerically in the following decades, while the Old Order group almost died out. The latter, known as the Eight Square (q.v.) congregation, had only 5 members in 1958, served by William H. Brubacher, 66, while the Wisler congregation numbered 50 members. The Wisler ministry consisted of Bishop Carl J. Good and Deacon Amos Martin. (2) The County Line meetinghouse was built in 1891 by the Wisler Mennonites who had withdrawn in 1872 from the Pleasant View (MC) congregation. The Chestnut Ridge meetinghouse was built in 1908 by the Wisler Mennonites who had withdrawn in 1872 from the Martins (MC) congregation. Both Wisler groups had alternated in the use of old meetinghouses with the congregations from which they withdrew, until the building of the two Wisler houses of worship. The two groups of Wisler Mennonites at Orrville, however, composed but one congregation. The strong leader of this congregation was Bishop Henry Hursh (1839-1916), ordained preacher in 1873 and bishop in 1878. He led the progressive portion of the Ohio and Indiana Wisler Conference in 1907, while Bishop John W. Martin (1852-1940) of Elkhart County, Ind., led the more conservative portion of the conference. Almost the entire Orrville congregation followed Hursh in the 1907 division. In 1953 Deacon Harry A. Landis and about 40 former members of the Orrville Wisler congregation affiliated themselves with the Virginia Conference (MC), and were granted the ownership of the Chestnut Ridge meetinghouse by the Wisler congregation. Frank E. Nice of the Franconia Conference was ordained preacher to serve the group. The remaining Orrville Wisler congregation worships in the County Line meetinghouse and has a membership of 160. It was served in 1958 by preachers Elmer Good, Cleophas Steiner, and Jacob Neuenschwander (who transferred as a preacher to the Wisler Mennonites in 1954 when his Sonnenberg congregation united with the Virginia Conference, (MC). The tiny Old Order group of Wisler Mennonites in Wayne County has but three members, served by Daniel Brubaker (1873-), who was ordained in 1905. J.C.W.

Waynesboro, a city (pop. 12,357) in Augusta County, Va., is the trading center for an Amish and Mennonite population of 788 members. There are six congregations of the Southern District (q.v.) of the Virginia Conference (MC) with a total of 602 members in the neighborhood: Springdale 5 miles south, Hildebrands 5 miles north, Mt. View 15 miles south, Stuarts Draft 15 miles southwest, Greenmonte 20 miles southwest, and Lynside 6 miles south. The Mt. Zion Beachy Amish church with 81 members is located 12 miles west, and an Old Order Amish group with 105 members 10 miles west near Stuarts Draft. H.S.B.

Waynesboro (Ga.) Mennonite Church (MC), a member of the Lancaster Conference, was established in 1957 and had 7 members in 1958, with Noah H. Hege as pastor. M.G.

Waynesboro (Pa.) Reformed Mennonite Church began in 1827 at Ringgold, Md., but when many members moved to Waynesboro, Pa., the congregation was transferred and built a meetinghouse there in 1876, which was replaced by a new house in 1900. In 1957 the membership was 24. H.S.B.

Wayside Mennonite Church (MC), since 1957 called the Crossroads Bible Church, 4 miles north of Gulfport, Miss., is a member of the South Central Conference. The congregation was organized May 13, 1948, with Edward J. Miller as pastor, who was still serving in 1958. The members are largely natives of South Mississippi. In the spring of 1945 a CPS camp was established in the area of Gulfport, the men of which assisted in a union Sunday school in the camp church. In the fall of 1947 J. W. Hess held revival meetings at the Gulfhaven church. In just a little more than a year from the time the first members were baptized, a building was erected and a pastor placed in charge of a growing congregation, which in 1958 numbered 25 members. P.H.

Wayside Mennonite Church (MC), near Brimley, Mich., is located 15 miles southwest of Sault Sainte Marie. It was established in 1948 as a mission station under the Indiana-Michigan Mennonite Mission Board. It had 32 members in 1958, with Ralph Birkey as pastor. M.G.

Weatherford (Okla.) Mennonite Brethren Church, organized Jan. 17, 1954, located at 712 North Broadway. It had 61 members in 1957, with B. W. Vogt as its pastor. M.G.

Weaver (Weber), an old Mennonite family of Swiss origin. As early as 1664 the Palatine Mennonite Census Lists reported two Webers, Peter at Oberflörsheim and Christian at Spiesheim; in 1685 Peter Weber was still living at Oberflörsheim (6 sons and a daughter), a second Peter Weber at Waltzheim, Johannes Weber at Osthofen, and Heinrich Weber and Dietrich Weber at Gundersheim. In 1732 Peter Weber was a minister at Oberflörsheim. In 1738 in addition to the Weber families at Oberflörsheim (Peter Sr., Peter Jr., Dietrich, and Christian), Gundersheim (Peter), Spiesheim (Johannes), Wolfsheim (Mathias, Johannes), there were at Heppenheim near Alzey four Weber families (Johannes, Heinrich, Martin, and Matthäus). All of these locations were in the Palatinate west of the Rhine. The Webers have ever since been well established in this region. In 1940, according to the Franz Crous lists, there were 67 Mennonite Webers (including children) in the South German Mennonite churches (only one elsewhere in Germany, at Crefeld), of whom 46 were in the Palatinate (Monsheim congregation leading with 22, Kühbörncheshof 8, Neudorferhof 7, Uffhofen 5, three other congregations 4), plus one in Frankfurt and two in the Ingolstadt congregation in Bavaria. Outstanding among the Webers in the 18th century was Peter Weber of Kindenheim (q.v., 1731-81), a very influential preacher and a strong Pietist.

Several Webers emigrated from the Palatinate to Lancaster County, Pa., in the early 18th century. At least four are known to have arrived before 1718, all brothers—Jacob, Henry, George, and John. The first three established a settlement in the rich bottom land between Blue Ball and Conestoga, which came to be known as Weberthal or Weaverland, and from which the present Weaverland (q.v.) Mennonite Church (MC) takes its name. Among their descendants were two bishops serving the Weaverland-Groffdale district (George, served 1854-83, and Benjamin 1902-8) and a host of ministers serving both in the Weaverland district (MC) and elsewhere, chiefly Virginia, Indiana, and Kansas, as well as in the Old Order Mennonite group in the Blue Ball-New Holland area. M. G. Weaver, himself a descendant, listed in his Mennonites of Lancaster Conference in 1931 a total of 32 ordained (10 being deacons) men bearing the name (3 Weber, 39 Weaver), of whom 31 were serving in the Mennonite Church (MC) including four bishops, mostly in the Lancaster Conference and the Virginia Conference. In addition there were four O.O.M. ministers with the name Weaver, and seven O.O.A. ministers, and one G.C.M. minister. J. W. Weaver (d. 1944) was a prominent Lancaster Conference evangelist and founder and manager of the Weaver Book Store at New Holland, Pa. Edwin Weaver was a missionary bishop in India. U. K. Weber was long pastor of the First Mennonite and Stirling Avenue Mennonite churches in Kitchener, Ont. H.S.B.

Ezra N. Stauffer, Weber or Weaver Family History (Nappanee, 1953); Esther Weaver, Descendants of Henry B. Weaver (Ephrata?, 1953); M. G. Weaver, Mennonites of Lancaster Conference (Scottsdale, 1931); Franz Crous, "Mennonitenfamilien in Zahlen," Gesch.-Bl. V (1940) 26-44; Paul Peachey, Die soziale Herkunft der Schweizer Täufer (Karlsruhe, 1954); Delbert Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottsdale, 1953); ML IV.

Weaver, Benjamin (Nov. 27, 1853-Sept. 3, 1928), the second child and oldest son of Isaac Weaver and Catherine Witwer, was a direct descendant of both Henry Weaver and Deacon Michael Widower, Weaverland, Lancaster Co., Pa., Swiss pioneers. Benjamin Weaver's brother, John Weaver, was a Mennonite evangelist-pastor, and both George Weaver and David Weaver were elders in the Church of the Brethren. Benjamin married Barbara Sauder (1851-1916). They had seven children; Benjamin Weaver, a preacher of Bowmansville, is a grandson. Four children, 32 grandchildren, and 15 great-grand-children survived him.

In 1882 Benjamin Weaver bought the Upper Windsor gristmill from his father and successfully operated it for many years. His integrity was unquestioned, and his wit in crises was quite medicinal. He retired near Union Grove, then to Terre Hill, and spent his last days in Goodville.

Benjamin Weaver's first active church work was as the first Sunday-school superintendent in the Churchtown congregation in 1894. In 1898 he was appointed to the board of the Welsh Mountain Mission. In 1899 he was ordained as minister of the Weaverland circuit, and on Jan. 23, 1903, as bishop for the district from Groffdale to Allegheny. He became familiar with the Bible as a boy; in fact he memorized many stories before his eighteenth birthday. With his genial disposition, warm handshake, and oratorical ability in both the German and the English, he held a large circle of friends, both within and without the church, gaining most of the children of members and also many whose fathers and grandfathers had left with the schism of 1893. Entering the Bishop Board when Jacob N. Brubacher, Isaac Eby, and Martin Rutt were the influential trio, he soon became a valuable asset. He was an organizer of both the Oreville Old People's Home and the Millersville Children's Home. He served as moderator of the Conference 1922-28. Noah H. Mack was his assistant bishop 1919-26, and John M. Sauder from 1926, who succeeded him when he died in 1928. I.D.L.

Weaver, John W. (July 4, 1870-Feb. 18, 1944), was the ninth of the eleven children of Isaac Weaver and Catherine Witwer, east of Union Grove, Lancaster Co., Pa. Bishop Benjamin Weaver (q.v.) was a brother. He was reared in a godly home, was well acquainted with the Bible, and able to quote much from it as a young man. He was very modest. His home was not affected by the division of 1893, even though he had been baptized by Jonas Martin in 1888. On Nov. 15, 1891, he married Anna M. Nolt (1868-1946). He became a saddler in Union Grove and in 1895 started a bookstore. In 1897 he became a member of the Mennonite Book and Tract Society and two years later secretary-treasurer. In 1915 he was coauthor of a book on the ministry and in 1940 of Talks with Young People. He also wrote the tracts, A Letter to Young Church Members and A Message to Young People. His greatest work was the Conference Meeting Calendar, which he published for forty years. John W. Weaver's son David is also a minister.

John W. Weaver, the first chairman of the Conference Library Committee, the first Sunday-school superintendent at Lichty in 1897, a member of the Weaverland Missions Committee in 1907, was ordained to the ministry by his brother Benjamin on Aug. 19, 1909. That fall he held revival meetings at Red Well. He was a promoter of the Millersville Children's Home, a charter member of the Eastern Board of Missions and Charities, and became its first field worker. As such he nurtured many new missions, especially Diamond Rock and Miners Village. He was a very successful evangelist throughout the Lancaster Conference and beyond. His extensive evangelistic effort practically closed in 1926, when he collapsed in the pulpit at East Petersburg. I.D.L.

Weaver Mennonite Church (MC), located on State Route 56, two miles east of Johnstown, Pa., in Cambria County just across the border from Somerset County, a member of the Allegheny Conference, had its beginning before 1800 when the Weaver, Baumgardner, Keim, Blough, and other families, including some Amish and some Dunkers, settled in this fertile region underlaid with good coal. The first services were held (date unknown) in a log schoolhouse deeded on May 7, 1817, to Christian Lehman and Jacob Whetstone as trustees. In 1855 a log meetinghouse (30 x 36 ft.) was erected beside the schoolhouse, replaced in 1878 by the present frame meetinghouse (40 x 50 ft.), which has been remodeled twice. For many years the congregation had no resident minister, and was served once in four weeks by a minister from the Blough (q.v.) church in Somerset County, 10 miles to the south. In 1854 Samuel Blough was ordained as the first resident minister, who also served as bishop 1878-83. In 1879-80 Sunday school was begun. The first sewing circle in the Johnstown district was established here in 1910. Alexander Weaver was long a minister here, 1893-1952. In 1957 the membership was 51, with Harold E. Thomas as pastor and Hiram Wingard (1914-) as assistant. H.S.B.

Ammon Kaufman, "Weaver Church," Southwestern Pennsylvania Conference News VI (November-December 1947) 3.

Weaver Mennonites. In the spring of 1916, when Bishop Aaron Sensenig was physically handicapped, the Stauffer members of the Pike (q.v.) congregation, near Hinkletown, Pa., wanted other leadership and favored a stricter observance of shunning. After his death that fall John A. Weaver, a preacher, tried to restore peace, but failed, and the resultant schism divided the congregation into equal parts, 101 and 102. Following the Stauffer (q.v.) division of 1846 there had been peace until about 1870, when Samuel Bowman, Jacob Weber, and Philip Rissler led a small schismatic group who felt that children who were not in the church and its order should be obliged to leave the parental home. After the division of 1916 this Rissler group joined the Stauffer group again for five years, then separated and divided again, so that today the only remaining members of the Bowman-Rissler group are three men and the wife of one of them. Jesse Bowman, of the Iowa (q.v.) Experiment, came to Lebanon County, Pa., and was given the bishop oversight of the new Lebanon County group and the Pike congregation. (He with his group joined the Old Order Mennonites, q.v.) Then Elam C. Martin, of Michigan, was ordained bishop at the Pike church. After his death in 1928 John A. Weaver served until his death on March 25, 1953. Thereupon Weaver W. Zimmerman was chosen bishop. Peter L. Weaver and Martin S. Weaver are the ministers. Membership of the Weaver group meeting in the Pike church (exclusively) is 60 (including the four Risslers). Services are conducted in German and last two hours; they have no evangelistic meetings, Sunday schools, or youth activities. They use only horses for transportation and farming. In the 1916 division Deacon Levi Zimmerman went with the Stauffers. Bishop John Stauffer, of Snyder County, then ordained David Stauffer and Jacob Stauffer and later Joseph O. Brubaker. The Stauffers in Snyder County had numerous divisions. In addition to these two places of worship, they also have a congregation near Loveville, Md. At the Pike church where they are strongest, Jacob S. Stauffer is bishop and Joseph O. Brubaker minister. At the three places, inclusive of all the splinter groups, the Stauffer Mennonites have a total membership of 223. I.D.L.

Weaverland Mennonite Church (MC), in eastern Lancaster County, Pa., has been a strong Mennonite center since the days of David Martin and the coming of George, Henry, and Jacob Weaver from West Lampeter Township in 1723. A congregation was organized by 1733. Peter Shirk (d. 1770), one of the first ministers, mentions Henry Martin (later bishop), John Witwer, Martin Huber, and John Sensenig as "elders of the Mennonite meeting." A church-schoolhouse may have been built, but by 1766 there was a 34 x 50 ft. stone church with a seating capacity of about 240. The sexton lived on the west end. The new addition in 1853, with its two ten-plate stoves in the central aisle, seated about 400. In 1883 a new stone church, 50 x 78 ft., seated 600. The present brick church, 60 x 120 ft., was erected in 1926.

This was the home congregation of bishops Henry Martin (1741-1825), Jonas H. Martin (1839-1925), John M. Sauder (1864-1939), and J. Paul Graybill; preachers Peter Shirk (d. 1770), Daniel Witwer (1767-1819), Tobias Wanner (1813-87), Samuel B. Witmer (1861-1909), I. B. Good (1861-1946). It has been the central church for a circuit which includes Martindale, Lichty, Goodville, and Churchtown. The three Mennonites arrested for sheltering Hessian soldiers overnight were from this congregation. Deacon John Weber (1786-1854), Abraham Weber (1787-1867), Peter Martin (1769-1831) and fourteen of his children, Daniel Weber (1797-1864), and others from this congregation helped to settle Ontario in 1809-19. The first Sunday school, organized by Samuel H. Musselman and Isaac W. Martin in the spring of 1893, precipitated the O.O.M. schism in the fall of that year. The Weaverland Missions Committee (1906-28) founded permanent work at Diamond Rock (now Frazer) and Red Run. In 1912 I. B. Good promoted the Weaverland Young People's Meeting "distinctly for young people." This congregation, long the largest in the Lancaster Conference (now second), listed 575 members in 1957, with J. Paul Graybill as resident bishop and D. N. Weaver, Alvin G. Martin, and A. H. Hollinger as ministers. I.D.L.

Weaverland Old Order Mennonite Church was organized by Bishop Jonas Martin in 1893. The following summer they built a stone meetinghouse 50 x 78 ft., an exact replica of the one built by the united church in 1883 and reserved by the Lancaster Mennonite (MC) Conference. Since the division into the Groffdale and Weaverland groups in 1926, both have been using this meetinghouse. The Groffdale group, with Aaron Z. Sensenig as bishop, and George G. Horst and Harry H. Martin as ministers, serves a membership of 275. Their preaching is exclusively in German, with no night services; for transportation they use horse and buggy. It is a part of the Martindale-Weaverland circuit. The Weaverland Conference, meeting on the alternate Sundays, have Joseph O. Weaver as bishop and John B. Weaver as minister, with a membership of 280. They are in the German-English transition, have no Sunday school nor official church activities, and travel mostly in automobiles with the bumpers painted black. Both groups are growing in this area. I.D.L.

Weavers Mennonite Church (MC), located 2½ miles west of Harrisonburg, Va., on the Rawley Pike in the Middle District of the Virginia Conference, is the largest congregation in the conference. The congregation was first known as the Burkholder church because of the part played by Bishop Peter Burkholder in the early 19th century in building the meetinghouse. Later Samuel Weaver bought and occupied land west of the church. He became its lifelong sexton and in time the church was called Weavers after him. The first meetinghouse, built in 1827, was a small log church covered with weatherboards, which stood broadside to the highway. It was replaced in 1881 and again in 1941, this time on the south side of Rawley Pike, built of native limestone. The first church was used by Union soldiers in the Civil War as a camping place. Cuts or scars made by the spurs worn by the soldiers on the long open pulpit indicated that it was used as a sleeping bunk.

Two schoolhouses have stood on the church grounds; one was built by the Mennonites, the other later by the county.

The first session of the Virginia Conference was held here in 1835. John S. Coffman (q.v.) held the first series of revival meetings in the Virginia Conference at Weavers in 1888.

Since 1900 the Weavers church has served as the center of the Harmonia Sacra singing movement in the Shenandoah Valley; more than fifty annual singings have been held here on New Year's Day.

In 1958 Oliver Keener and Isaac Risser were serving as pastors of the church, with D. W. Lehman as bishop and a membership of 302. H.A.B.

Weavertown Amish Church (Beachy Amish), located in central and east-central Lancaster County, Pa., was organized in 1910 with about 35 families by John P. Zook and Samuel Beachey of the Kishacoquillas Valley. The main issue was on avoidance and the ban. Christian L. King was the first bishop, followed by John A. Stoltzfus and George W. Beiler. Elam L. Kauffman and Aaron S. Glick were the ministers in 1957. In 1928 the group acquired the Molasses Hill Brethren meetinghouse near Bird-in-Hand on Route 1, and remodeled it for their own use. The services are mostly German. Sunday school without helps is held all forenoon on every second Sunday. Young people's meeting is held Sunday evenings once a month. On Ascension Day in 1958 the Beachy Amish young people of the United States held an all-day conference with Weavertown as the host. In conjunction with the Norfolk (Va.) Beachy Amish, Elam L. Kauffman, as the Weavertown representative, opened a mission in Berlin, Germany. Kauffman also is the conferee on the Mennonite Central Committee. The membership in 1958 was 275. I.D.L.

Webb School, in Pickering Twp., Ontario Co., Ont., was an outpost of the Mennonites of York County (MC), begun as a Sunday school in 1939. This outpost was a short-lived summer venture when World War II broke out. Altona and Markham families helped to befriend this neglected neighborhood for a few years, and then later at Coronation Gardens, several miles farther east, by Sunday school and summer Bible school for about five years. The work was closed for want of suitable housing.

J.C.F.

Weber: see Weaver.

Weber, Gregor, of Pflaurenz in the Puster Valley, Tirol, a friend and teacher of Jakob Hutter (q.v.), died a martyr's death at Michelsburg (q.v.) in 1529. (ML IV.)

Weber, Peter (1731-81), a Mennonite preacher of the Palatinate, Germany, who played a leading role in German pietistic circles, was born probably at Hardenberg near Dürkheim a.d.H. He experienced an early conversion through reading the writings of Johannes Deknatel (q.v.). About 1750 he married Katharina Schmidt, establishing himself in Hardenberg as a weaver. In 1757/8 he was chosen preacher in the congregation at Hönningen. His influence began to widen, having a marked almost revivalistic effect, but also meeting opposition. On Dec. 30, 1758, Weber and three other preachers were removed from their office. Soon Adam Krehbiel (q.v.) was also removed from office. Serious division threatened the Palatinate congregations on the issue of Pietism. From the Deknatel group in Holland came support and encouragement for Weber, who had visited Amsterdam in 1757. The division was deepened by Weber's publication of a sharply polemic tract, Vermahnendes Bekenntnis, wie die Lehrer nach der Schrift geartet sein müssen, aus Menno gezogen und in den Druck gegeben von einem Freund der Wahrheit. Weber continued to hold private Bible study meetings and even public meetings, which led to the fear he would start a new Mennonite group. A second "silencing" of Weber by the churches resulted in complete cessation of all his activities. In 1763 peace was finally restored, partly through the efforts of Lorenz Friedenreich (q.v.), the influential elder of Neuwied. In 1778 Weber moved to Kindenheim, where he died Sept. 8, 1781. He shared in the publication of the 1780 edition of the Martyrs' Mirror at Pirmasens.

Peter Weber was an unusually powerful preacher, widely used in the Palatinate Mennonite churches and beyond, with an extensive acquaintance and wide correspondence with Pietist leaders. H.S.B.

Christian Neff published a very appreciative biographical sketch of Weber, with extensive extracts from his letters in Gem.-Kal. 1930, 61-102; ML IV.

Weber, Philipp, the name of two early Anabaptists, both named for their profession. One was Philipp Plener (also called Blauärmel), the founder of the Philippite brotherhood (q.v.) in Moravia. The other was Philipp Jäger, the assistant of Jacob Wiedeman (q.v.), leader of the Stäbler (q.v.) in Moravia 1528-35. Of this Philipp Jäger we learn only, through the Hutterite chronicle, that he helped Wiedeman establish the new Bruderhof in Austerlitz. R.F.

Weber, Valentin, one of the Swiss Brethren to whom Pilgram Marpeck's Verantwortung was given for criticism. On Aug. 26, 1559, he wrote a letter in Augsburg to Leupold Scharnschlager, the leader (Vorsteher) of the Grisons brotherhood, thanking him for all his trouble and effort in connection with Weber's epistle concerning the Judgment (Gericht). The rest of the letter deals with the joy and blessedness of being permitted to belong to the church of the elect and of being separated from the evil world. W.W.

Ztscht des Vereins f. d. Gesch. Mährens u. Schlesiens, 1925, Nos. 3 and 4, 48-50; ML IV.

Weber Mennonite Church (MC), located 4 miles southwest of Kitchener, Ont., a member of the Ontario Mennonite Conference, was organized in 1838. The first meetinghouse was built in 1842; it was replaced by a brick building in 1895, seating capacity 150. Simon Martin served as pastor 1931-58 and in 1958 was still serving as bishop, with Lester Bauman as pastor since May 25, 1958. The membership was 73. S.B.M.

Weckh, Hans, a Hutterite martyr, was executed with his brother-in-law Heinrich Adam (see Adams, Heinrich) at Aachen on Oct. 21, 1558. (In ML I, 148, and ME I, 11, he is erroneously called Hans Beck.) Weckh was one of a company of twelve, six brethren and six sisters, led by Han Schmid (q.v., Raiffer), who were sent on a missionary tour to the Netherlands and were all arrested in Aachen on Jan. 9, 1558, when a meeting was surprised by the authorities. Five of the men were executed, Schmid on Oct. 19, 1558, Matthias Schmidt and Tillman Schneider on Jan. 4, 1559, and Weckh and Heinrich Adam(s) on Oct. 21, 1558. The sixth brother apostatized and was released, but later repented and joined the church again. The six women were severely scourged and released. (Mart. Mir D. 209-11, E 588-90.) H.S.B.

Wedel, a city and Mennonite settlement near Hamburg, Schleswig-Holstein, Germany. Mennonite refugees from Danzig and West Prussia have been settled here in 12 homes which in 1958 housed 133 persons. The building was done primarily by Pax boys. A church was built and dedicated in 1958. The minister of this group and others is Arthur Goetzke. C.K.

Otto Regier, "Neue Heimat in Schleswig-Holstein," Gem.-Kal., 1957, 39-43; ML IV.

Wedel (Wedell, Weedel, Wedler, Wiedel, Wadel), a family name which was found among the Mennonites of Prussia particularly at Schönsee, Przechowka, and Konopat, and also occurring in Thiendorf and Montau-Gruppe. Schroeder assumes that the ancestor of this family came from East Friesland. According to the Alexanderwohl church record the first representative of the Przechowka or Alexanderwohl church in Prussia was Frantz Wedel, who was present when the village was leased in 1640. Some early members of the group were Benjamin Wedel (1766-1813) and Peter Wedel (1792-1871). Jacob Wedel (1754-91) was elected elder in 1785. He started the Alexanderwohl Mennonite Church record, probably the oldest American Mennonite church record, entitled Die Erste stamm Nahmen Unserer Bisher so genante Oude Vlamingen oder Groningersche Mennonisten Sozietaets alhier in Preussen and going back to 1669.

From Prussia the name Wedel was transplanted to Russia where it was found primarily in the Alexanderwohl church, and from there to the Alexanderwohl (q.v.) church at Goessel, Kan. C. H. Wedel (q.v., 1862-1911), the first president of Bethel College, was born in this community. Theodore O. Wedel, an Episcopal clergyman in Washington, D.C., is his son. In this group are Cornelius C. Wedel, minister of the Alexanderwohl Mennonite Church (1898-1957); his son, David C. Wedel, president of Bethel College since 1952; Frank F. Wedel, former manager of Salem Deaconess Hospital (q.v.).

In Prussia a Low-German-speaking Wedel of the Przechowka group married into the Swiss Volhynian group which later settled near Moundridge, Kan. Of this line of Wedels are Peter J. Wedel (1871-1951), professor of Bethel College; his son Waldo Rudolph Wedel, archaeologist; Peter Philip Wedel, minister of the Alexanderwohl Mennonite Church; the late Edward B. Wedel, professor of the University of Wichita; and his son Arnold Wedel, professor at Bethel College, all of the G.C.M. group. In the M.B. group there are Herbert Wedel of Fresno, Cal., and J. Wedel at Abbotsford, B.C., and Ruben Wedel at Premont, Tex., all ministers. C.K.

Reimer, Familiennamen, 120; H. H. Schroeder, Russlanddeutsche Friesen (Döllstädt, 1936) 99; J. A. Duerksen, "Przechowka and Alexanderwohl," Menn. Life X (April 1955) 79-82.

Wedel, Benjamin (c1700-59), was born near Schwetz, West Prussia, Germany, and lived in the village of Terespolna. His second wife was Sarcke Pankratz of Konopat. He was a second known elder of the Przechowka Mennonite Church near Schwetz. He was likely the host of Hendrick Berends Hulshoff of Holland, who visited the congregation in 1719. Wedel died in November 1759. J.A.D.

J. A. Duerksen, "Przechowka and Alexanderwohl," Menn. Life X (April 1955) 76.

Wedel, Benjamin (1742-85), was born Oct. 27, 1742, the son of Peter Wedel and Maricke Richert, and lived in the village of Przechowka, West Prussia. He was baptized at the age of 17 and on Nov. 4, 1760, married Trincke Schmidt of Konopat. He was minister and elder of the Przechowka Mennonite Church near Schwetz. Two of his sons, Benjamin and Peter, were also elders of the same church. He died Jan. 4, 1785. J.A.D.

J. A. Duerksen, "Przechowka and Alexanderwohl," Menn. Life X (April 1955) 76.

Wedel, Benjamin (1766-1813), was born Aug. 7, 1766, the son of Benjamin Wedel (1742-85) and Trincke Schmidt. He was baptized at the age of 17 and on Nov. 13, 1785, was married to Sarcke Ratzlaff. He served the Przechowka Mennonite Church as minister from 1791 and as elder 1794-1809. He died in September 1813. J.A.D.

J. A. Duerksen, "Przechowka and Alexanderwohl," Menn. Life X (April 1955) 76.

Wedel, Cornelius Heinrich (1860-1910), a Mennonite (GCM) minister, educator, historian, and first president of Bethel College, was born at Margenau, Molotschna Mennonite settlement, May 12, 1860, the son of Cornlius P. Wedel, who was a teacher. He lost his mother at the age of six. His father taught first at Margenau, then at Alexanderwohl, where Cornelius received his first education. In 1874 the family migrated to the present Goessel, Kan., with the Alexanderwohl group. In 1876-80 he taught school in this community. During some summers he attended schools in Marion Centre and in Hillsboro to learn English and to acquire a teacher's certificate. At the age of eighteen he was baptized in the Alexanderwohl church where he organized and taught Sunday school and mission studies. In 1881 he received a call to the Darlington, Okla., mission. In 1882 he gave up the work because of eye trouble.

In 1883 he attended McKendry College, Lebanon, Ill., and the following years Bloomfield Theological Seminary, N.J., where he particularly studied under George Seibert and taught 1898-1900. Numerous class notebooks kept by Wedel give an insight into the instruction he received and into his studies. Here he was also in close touch with N. B. Grubb. In 1890 he accepted the call to the Halstead School, Halstead, Kan., where he taught for three years. On Aug. 17, 1890, he was ordained minister in the Alexanderwohl Mennonite Church. On March 30, 1891, he married Susanna Richert. He continued his study for two more years at Ursinus College, Collegeville, Pa., where he received his M.A. degree. In 1893 he became president of Bethel College and professor of Bible, which position he held until his death in 1910.

In 1896 and 1898 Wedel made extensive trips to Germany, the Netherlands, Switzerland, and Russia for research in Mennonite history. His notebooks ("Reise nach Europa") and his printed reports give good insights as to what he looked for and what he found. He became a close friend of Samuel Cramer of Amsterdam and many other leading Mennonites. After his return he published "Aus der Reisemappe" and "Reiseskizzen und Randglossen," which were reports about his trip (School and College Journal, 1897 and 1899). In 1898 he published his first book, entitled Bilder aus der Kirchengeschichte für mennonitische Gemeindeschulen (q.v.), which has been reprinted many times and also appeared in English in 1920 as "Sketches from Church History for Mennonite Schools."

As an educator Wedel made an outstanding contribution among the Mennonites of America. He taught Bible, church history, Mennonite history, and German literature. The numerous notebooks which originated in his classrooms and have become a part of a C. H. Wedel Collection mirror his achievements. He was president of Bethel College 1893-1910 and served repeatedly at Bethel College Mennonite Church as pastor 1897-1910. In the Monatsblätter aus Bethel College, of which he was coeditor, and the School and College Journal, he published 182 articles on Mennonite history, literature, and other areas, besides his articles for other periodicals. A most outstanding work is the four-volume set, Abriss der Geschichte der Mennoniten (Newton, 1900-4), which constitutes the first general and comprehensive history of the Mennonites written and published in America. Other books are as follows: Randzeichnungen zu den Geschichten des Alten Testaments (1899); Randzeichnungen zu den Geschichten des Neuen Testaments (1900); Geleitworte an junge Christen zunächst in unsern mennonitischen Kreisen (1903); Kurzgefasste Kirchengeschichte (1905); Briefliche Blätter an einen Lernenden über Bildung, Gesellschafts- und Heiratsfragen (1906); Meditationen zu den Fragen und Antworten unseres Katechismus (1910). All of these books except Meditationen were published by Bethel College. Wedel died March 28, 1910, and was buried in the Greenwood Cemetery, Newton. C.K.

C. H. Wedel, Tagebuch, 2 vv., 1885-1910; C. H. Wedel, "Reise nach Europa," 1898; H. R. Voth, "Prof. C. H. Wedel," Christlicher Bundesbote (April 21 and 28, 1910) 5; H. R. Voth, "Prof. C. H. Wedel. Kurze Lebensskizze," Bethel College Monthly (May and June, 1910) 6 and 1; Peter J. Wedel, The Story of Bethel College (North Newton, 1954); David C. Wedel, "The Contribution of C. H. Wedel to the Mennonite Church Through Education" (Th.D. dissertation, Iliff School of Theology, Denver, 1952); C. H. Wedel, "Mein Lebenslauf" (1881); term papers by Richard Schmidt, John P. Loewen, and Dorothea Franzen.

Wedel, Jacob, was born Jan. 20, 1754, the son of Peter Wedel and Sarcke Ratzlaff. He lived in the village of Przechovka. At the age of 18 he was baptized, and on Feb. 21, 1779, married Lencke Ratzlaff. At the age of 21 he was elected minister and in 1785 he succeeded Benjamin Wedel (c1742-85) as elder. Jacob Wedel is the originator of the Przechovka-Alexanderwohl church record. He endeavored to trace every family back to the place of origin. He died on Sept. 5, 1791. J.A.D.

J. A. Duerksen, "Przechowka and Alexanderwohl," Menn. Life X (April 1955) 76; ML IV.

Wedel, Peter (1769-?), was born Feb. 4, 1769, the son of Benjamin Wedel (1742-85) and Trincke Schmidt, and a brother of Benjamin Wedel (1766-1813). At the age of 16 he was baptized and in 1791 married Maricke Bethcken, of Neu-Dessau near Driesen. At the age of 30 he was elected minister and in 1809 elder of the Przechovka Mennonite Church near Schwetz. He lived at Konopat.

J.A.D.

J. A. Duerksen, "Przechowka and Alexanderwohl," Menn. Life X (April 1955) 76.

Wedel, Peter (1792-1871), was born at Przechovka, Prussia, on May 26, 1792, to Benjamin Wedel (1766-1813). He was chosen minister in his home congregation in 1813 and elder in 1814. On Sept. 21, 1817, he married Elscke Buller (d. 1832). In 1820 Wedel led his congregation from Prussia to the Molotschna settlement, where they established the village and congregation of Alexanderwohl in 1821. On Jan. 24, 1833, he married Anna Richert (b. 1811). Six children were born of the first marriage and eleven of the second. In 1832 he made a trip to Poland to visit Mennonite congregations and serve as minister. Peter Wedel preached his last sermon on June 22, 1871 (John 3:16), and died July 8, 1871. He was succeeded by Jakob Buller (q.v.), who led the Alexanderwohl church (q.v.) to America.

The letters of elder Wilhelm Lange (q.v.) of Breckenhoffswalde, Prussia, to Peter Wedel in 1817-20 (preserved in BeCL) are of great significance regarding the spiritual and social conditions of the Mennonites of that time, the contacts of the group with pietistic circles, as well as their migration to Russia. Wedel was the leader of a moderately progressive group during the days of the Klaas Reimer (q.v.) and Bible society controversies, the revival and the founding of various Mennonite groups. He was in contact with Moravians and promoted missions. C.K.

Jakob Brandt, "Kurze Notizen aus dem Lebenslauf des verstorbenen Aeltesten Peter Wedel" (BeCL); Friesen, Brüderschaft, 75, 108 f., 117, 167, 305; J. A. Duerksen, "Przechowka and Alexanderwohl," Menn. Life X (April 1955) 76.

Wedel, Peter H. (c1865-97), an evangelist and missionary of the Mennonite Brethren Church, was born in Alexanderwohl, Molotschna Mennonite settlement, South Russia, about 1865, the son of Cornelius P. Wedel, who emigrated to America in 1874 with his family, settling near Goessel, Marion Co., Kan. Cornelius Wedel became elder of the M.B. Church there in 1886. Their son Peter, a very gifted boy, received his education partly in Russia and partly in America and became a country school-teacher.

Wedel was converted at an early age and joined the M.B. Church through baptism and became an active member. The Mennonitischer Schulverein (q.v.) supported Wedel at the Baptist Theological Seminary, Rochester, N.Y., for some time, hoping that he would later establish a Mennonite Brethren church school.

Upon the completion of his course Wedel, however, decided to enter evangelistic work. In 1888-95 he was exceedingly active and effective in conducting evangelistic campaigns in the M.B. congregations of Kansas, Nebraska, South Dakota, and Minnesota.

Wedel felt called to serve as a foreign missionary. Since the M.B. Church at that time had no foreign mission field, he decided to go under the German Baptist Missionary Society. After his marriage to Martha Liebig he left for Cameroons, Africa, stopping in Germany and also making a visit to the Mennonite settlements of South Russia, in both countries conducting very effective evangelistic campaigns. After two years of effective service on the mission field his health required him to leave. He died on the voyage to Europe on Aug. 10, 1897, and was buried at sea. His short service and early death had a profound effect upon the Mennonite Brethren Church and was a powerful influence in beginning its own foreign mission work J.H.L.

Wederdo(o)pers (German, Wiedertäufer) is the name formerly often given to the Mennonites in Holland, e.g., by Guy de Brez (q.v.) and Calvinist opponents of the Dutch Mennonites until the 18th century. Mennonite authors used the word "Wederdopers" only to denote the revolutionary Anabaptists, particularly those of Münster (q.v.) (See Anabaptist.)
vdZ.

Weduwfonds van Doopsgezinde Predikanten in de Provincie Groningen (Fund for pensioning widows of Mennonite ministers in the Dutch province of Groningen) was founded in 1835. (DJ 1837, 31 f.)
vdZ.

Weduwfonds voor Noord- en Zuid-Holland: see Fonds tot Ondersteuning.

Weduwenfonds voor Doopsgezinde Predikanten: see Zwolsche Weduwenfonds.

Weekday Bible School, a name given to an arrangement whereby the public schools, especially high schools, in some American communities have at times permitted or invited representatives of the local churches to teach Bible to volunteer classes in the school building, either at a regular period in the daily class schedule, after the last period of the regular schedule, or during a noon or recess period. At times pupils have been released to attend classes conducted at near-by churches. Sometimes teachers have been provided by single churches, at other times by co-operating churches, at times by colleges or seminaries near by. Often the salary of the Bible teacher is paid by the church or churches, at times even by the school. Not often have Mennonites taken up this type of religious instruction because of lack of teachers or distance from the school. A notable exception has been Elkhart and Lagrange counties in Northern Indiana, especially Goshen, Topeka, Nappanee, Wakarusa, and Millersburg, where Mennonite churches have shared in supporting such a program and some Mennonite teachers have served, and where a number of students of the Goshen College Biblical Seminary have taught in the high schools on practical work assignments from the seminary. This program has been discontinued.

Another meaning of the weekday Bible school refers to a congregational evening Bible study meeting not connected with the public school. The first appearance of this weekday Bible school in the Mennonite Church (MC) was c1930, when J. D. Miner established a school at the Kansas City Mennonite Mission, which was one of a large number of such schools co-operating in an interdenominational community school planned to serve the children of school age. Weekday Bible schools found sufficient interest also in the Lancaster Mennonite Conference that a weekday Bible school course was prepared by a Conference committee to meet local needs. In 1940 the Curriculum Committee of the General Sunday School Committee built an enlarged curriculum based on the Lancaster course. In the next decade a considerable number of congregations introduced the weekday Bible school, but attached it to the Wednesday evening congregational meeting. This was something quite different from work in the public schools. The greatest flourishing of this movement was in the Franconia Conference, where for a decade large numbers enrolled in the Wednesday evening Bible study classes.

Between 1946 and 1954 little work was done in preparation of a weekday Bible school curriculum. The Lancaster materials for twelve grades (two preschool, grades 1-10) continue to be available and have gone through several editions. During the summer of 1954, however, outlines for a weekday Bible curriculum were prepared to supplement the projected graded Sunday-school curriculum. Weekday Bible school promotion has been carried on by the Mennonite Commission for Christian Education through its Weekday Bible School Secretary, Noah G. Good, Lancaster, Pa.

H.S.B., P.M.L.

Paul Lederach, "History of Religious Education in the Mennonite Church" (unpublished doctoral dissertation at Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary, 1949) 257-60.

Weekly Echo, edited and published by D. G. Gehman, Bally, Pa., was an 8-column, 4-page newspaper, 22 x 15½ in., with the stated purpose of supplementing the Herald of Truth by reporting news of particular interest to every Mennonite family and more particularly to Mennonites in Eastern Pennsylvania and Washington County, Md. The first issue appeared April 24, 1902. Publication ceased with the ninth issue, June 19, 1902, the paper having failed to receive the expected support and encouragement from "the Mennonite people at large." In addition to purely personal items from Mennonite communities in eastern Pennsylvania, it contained inspirational articles, home and farm features, a weekly discussion of the Sunday-school lesson by D. M. Stearns, articles on Mennonite history, and a few advertisements. The last five issues included the "Calendar of Meetings at all the Mennonite Congregations in Eastern Pa." for the following Sunday. The Goshen College Library has issues 5, 6, 8, and 9.
N.P.S.

Weenig(h)em, Bastiaan (Sebastiaan) van, b. c1625, d. March 24, 1697, was a merchant at Rotterdam, Holland, and a minister of the local Flemish Mennonite church from 1655 and elder from 1659. He was a man of great power and authority, somewhat imperious, prompted by great love for the church and the desire to maintain its strictly basic principles, a fervid opponent of Collegiantism (q.v.) and other liberal movements in the Dutch brotherhood which he often fought with more vigor and ability than courtesy. In 1659 and again in 1668 he dropped the proposal of the Rotterdam Waterlanders (q.v.) to merge with the Flemish. In 1660 he was the instigator and secretary of a conference of conservative Flemish leaders held at Leiden (see Leidsche Synode) to take measures against Galenus

(q.v.) Abrahamsz and his progressive adherents. In July and August 1661 he was one of the seventeen ministers called in to mediate in the dissensions in the Utrecht Flemish congregation between a strict and a moderate group. They solved the matter by suspending the progressive preachers (see Maurik, W. van). Van Weenigem led the Flemish congregation of Schiedam (q.v.) in 1674 to a stricter church discipline, excluding from the pulpit preachers who did not agree with the confessions of faith, and refusing the Lord's Supper to such members as worshiped with the Collegiants or the Remonstrants (q.v.). After the great schism among the Dutch Mennonites in 1664 when the Lammerenkrijgh (q.v.) divided them into liberal Lamists (q.v.) and strict Zonists (q.v.), van Weenigem visited many churches persuading them to side with the Zonists, in this way preparing the Zonist conference called the Verbondt (q.v.) van Eenigheydt.

He often served in other Mennonite congregations and was very active in supporting a number of small churches in the neighborhood of Rotterdam like Zevenhoven and Sommelsdijk (q.v.); in Sommelsdijk he settled a quarrel in 1676. Several times he preached and administered baptism and communion at Hamburg and in 1663 he ordained Gerrit Roosen (q.v.) as an elder of the Hamburg-Altona congregation.

In the struggle against the growing liberalism van Weenigem was supported by the well-known elder of Dordrecht and composer of the great Martyrs' Mirror, T. J. van Braght (q.v.). Together they drew up a new confession of faith in 1661, which was, however, never officially approved, but became the basis of the Verbondt van Eenigheydt. The Amsterdam Library has a copy of Bastiaan van Weynich—Om uyt last van Tieleman van Bracht, Bisschop van Dort. Copia van een ernstige Vermaen-Brief, geschreven aen Samuel Apostool (q.v.) cum Sociis. Dordrecht den 20 Jan. 1664 (n.p., n.d.), an anonymous booklet which severely criticizes van Weenigem's conservatism.

When gradually a less strict and more tolerant attitude arose in the Rotterdam Flemish congregation, van Weenigem was deeply disappointed; he then resigned as elder on Jan. 13, 1686.

In July 1663, when in Hamburg, he met with representatives of the Hamburg Dompelaars (q.v.) church, who had separated from the Mennonites. This conversation was followed by a correspondence which lasted until 1667 and by the publication of a number of books on baptism. Van Weenigem published Nootwendige Verantwoording van zeventien Redenen (Rotterdam, 1666), and De Maniere van Doop, Voetwasschingen en Avontmael, soo by de Dompelaars tot Hamborg gebruyckt wert, wederleyt (Rotterdam, 1666). He was opposed by the Hamburg Dompelaar preacher Jan Arents in Eindeelijke Verklaringe der gedoopte Christenen . . . (n.p., 1668), then wrote Antidotum ofte Tegengif op eenen Brief, geschr. uyt Hamborgh, van Samuel Stockmann-Isaacksz. . . . En op seker Boeckjen genaemt: Eyndelijke Verklaringe . . . (Rotterdam, 1669). This latter book by van Weenigem was refuted by W. D. Redoch, Antidoti Wenigani Vanitas, of Ydelheydt van Bastiaans van W.'s laatste uyt- gegevene Tracktaatie . . ., 2 vv. (Haarlem, 1672 and 1673).

Besides these polemics van Weenigem published Kruys-poorte of Lydens-schoole (Rotterdam, 1664), Gansche Natuere des Doops (Rotterdam, 1668), 't Gelukkig Afsterven der Rechtveerdige (Rotterdam, 1684), a catechetical booklet, called Catechisatie ofte Vragen en Antwoorden over het . . . heylich Euan-gelium van Mattheus (Rotterdam, 1684), and his farewell sermon Afscheyds-Reden gedaen tot Rotterdam (n.p., 1686).

In his old age (June 1694) van Weenigem was temporarily excluded from the communion service because as a minor public official he had sworn an oath. Though he was somewhat disappointed, he remained a loyal member of the church. At his death he left the Rotterdam congregation a large legacy.

Van Weenigem, who (judging by his family name) stemmed from Flanders, married Liesbet van Hemelcoers. Both he and his wife were baptized in 1649 into the Rotterdam Flemish congregation. They had two daughters, one of whom was Elizabeth Catharine, b. in 1647, who in 1674 was married to Pieter van Beeck, a wealthy Mennonite merchant in Amsterdam.

In Amsterdam (Zonist church) there were also some van Weenigems. A Sebastiaan van Weenigem was baptized there in 1713. vdZ.

N.N.B.Wb. III, 1397; K. Vos, Geschiedenis der Doopsgez. gemeente te Rotterdam (1907, repr.) 18-20, 42; DB 1896, 55, 58; 1900, 188; 1908, 107; 1909, 159; 1916, 150 f., 170, 172, 181; B. C. Roosen, Gesch. der Mennoniten-Gemeinde zu Hamburg und Altona I (Hamburg, 1886) 43, 46 f., 60; K. Vos, "Sebastiaan van Weenigem en het Eedsvraagstuk," in Ned. Archief v. Kerkgeschiedenis II (1908) 137 f. (1909).

Weeping Water, Neb., Civilian Public Service Camp No. 25, located 35 miles east of Lincoln, was opened in April 1942 and closed in April 1943. It was a soil conservation camp operated by the Mennonite Central Committee. M.G.

Melvin Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, 1949) 121.

Weesp, a town in the Dutch province of North Holland, some ten miles east of Amsterdam, formerly the seat of a Mennonite congregation, concerning which there is only scant information. The year of founding is not known. Elder Leenaert (q.v.) Bouwens baptized seven persons c1575 at Weesp (not 55 as is stated by Blaupot ten Cate). Originally the congregation of Weesp was more or less connected with that of neighboring Muiden (q.v.). In the 17th century there were two congregations at Weesp, one Flemish and one Waterlander; the latter, which was represented in 1647 at the Waterlander conference at Amsterdam by Johannes Verlaen, merged before 1675 with the Flemish congregation, which was then also called Weesp and Overmeer (q.v.). In 1655 it contributed liberally to the needs of the congregation of De Rijp (q.v.), which had suffered considerable damage by a great fire. In 1675 Weesp joined the (Lamist) Conference of South Holland. Since the pulpit was from this time on mostly vacant, the congregation was supported by the Lamist congregation of Amsterdam, both financially and with ministerial service. The membership was very small, in 1686 numbering hardly a dozen baptized members. The church books of the Weesp congregation, which are now in the Amsterdam Mennonite archives, cover the years 1692-1761. From these it is known that the congregation had died out by 1760, but it is not mentioned in the Naamlijsts of 1743 and later. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 814; II, Nos. 2288, 2342 f.; II, 2, Nos. 376, 643-50; DB 1872, 61, 67; 1892, 124, 125, 126; 1918, 3, 50, 52; Blaupot t. C., Holland I, 24, 222, 330; II, 45.

Weetdoener was the name of the man who during the 16th-century period of persecution of the Anabaptists-Mennonites announced to the members of the church the place and hour of meetings, which varied because of danger of being surprised. Weetdoeners who thus made the rounds of the entire congregation are known in Amsterdam and Antwerp, and probably also functioned in other larger towns. At Strasbourg in 1540 a "Büttel" performed these services. vdZ.

Wegh na Vreden-stadt: see Way to the City of Peace.

Wehrfreiheit der Altpreuussischen Mennoniten, Die. Eine geschichtliche Erörterung (Marienburg, 1863), by Wilhelm Mannhardt (q.v.), was the first comprehensive documented history of the Mennonite principle of nonresistance. The book consists of 202 pages and 95 pages of appendices. In the first chapter the author treats the "dogma" of nonresistance among the various Mennonite groups; in the second chapter, the major part of the book, he presents the relation of the Mennonites of Prussia to the state. In an appendix he quotes from the writings of Menno Simons and from Mennonite confessions of faith, catechisms, and official documents by the governments to prove that the Mennonites traditionally have adhered to the principle of nonresistance and that this has been honored by rulers and governments.

The reason for the writing of this book was a Prussian cabinet order in preparation according to which the Mennonites of Prussia, who had enjoyed complete exemption from military service, were now expected to do alternative service. In spite of the book the cabinet order was passed March 3, 1868. This book designates the last definite stand on nonresistance by a large group of Prussian Mennonites. Those who were not willing to accept alternative noncombatant service migrated to Russia and America. The majority, however, stayed and accepted this service and gradually also full military service. By 1933 no German Mennonites claimed exemption from full military service. Mannhardt also wrote the Danzig Gedenkbuch der Gemeinde, vol. III, in which he relates this development in great detail. Later he somewhat modified his position on nonresistance, and wrote a series of articles in Mennonitische Blätter, "Zur Wehrfrage," 1868, 75 f., and 1869, 5-8, 12-15, 31-34, 37-41, 48-50. (See also Nonresistance and Mannhardt, Johann Wilhelm.) C.K.

H. G. Mannhardt, Die Danziger Mennonitengemeinde (Danzig, 1919) 124 ff., 175 ff.; ML IV.

Weierhof, a hamlet at the foot of the Donnersberg (q.v.) near Marnheim, Palatinate, Germany, the center of a Mennonite congregation. It was originally (from 835) the property of a monastery, was secularized in 1564, destroyed in the Thirty Years' War, and in 1682 given in hereditary lease to the "Mennonist" Peter Crayenbühl (Krehbiel). In his letter to the elector negotiating for the estate, Crayenbühl requested that he and his family be permitted to perform their worship unmolested. The position taken by the Protestant state church council to this request states, "The church council is of the opinion . . . that what the petitioner wants to read and pray in his house with his children cannot be refused him, but it would have to be done with the express restriction that he will not take on any Anabaptist help or admit any other persons of the Anabaptist sect and under any pretext or appearance form a congregation of them. Otherwise he shall lose even this particular concession and be expelled." This was in principle the attitude of the time toward the Mennonites who were settling in the region. According to the lists of Mennonites in the Generallandesarchiv in Karlsruhe the following are named in 1685 in the territory now included in the Weierhof congregation: Elbisheimerhöfe, Braun Herbach with five children, and Christoffel Gohl with three children; in Marnheim, Martin Tempel's widow and seven children; in Weierhof, Peter Crayenbühl with nine children, six of them sons; two were married and living on the home place, viz., Ulrich with three children and Peter with one child; on Heyerhof, Ulrich Burkard with one daughter, Jacob Trinkener with two sons and a daughter, Felix Berky with two sons; Peter Brubacher, no children; in Immesheim, one family; in 1686 in the Bolanden district 10 families with 32 children; in 1687 at Marnheim and Elbisheimerhof, one family. But very soon a decided change took place. In 1706 the Weierhof with other estates and villages passed into the jurisdiction of Nassau-Weilburg, whose rulers were less intolerant toward the Mennonites than the Catholic electors of the Palatinate. It is probable that a congregation was organized at this time, though the contract as late as 1770 stipulated that the lessee was permitted to worship with his own family, but not to admit anybody else. An almsbook, which goes back to 1716, indicates that the congregations of Weierhof and Erbesbüdesheim (q.v.) held their services together, alternating between the two places. Christel Krehbiel was the deacon. As far as is known there were many Mennonites living in the villages and farms of the vicinity, as in Albisheim, Bennhausen, Bolanderhof, Donnersbergerhof (q.v.), Froschauerhof, Gundheimerhof, Marnheim, Münsterhof, Neuohof, Niederwiesen, Rosenthalerhof, and Rüssingen. In 1748 the Erbesbüdesheim congregation became independent. In 1835 it resumed the former bonds with Weierhof, but was then known as the Uffhofen congregation; the two congregations jointly engaged Weierhof's first professional minister, Hermann Reeder (q.v.), and have continued this practice ever since.

A list of Mennonites left of the Rhine drawn up in 1732 names twenty families on the Weierhof. The preachers were Rudolf Kägy at Niederwiesen and Hans Ellenberger; Jakob Hagmann was the deacon. A list of 1762 gives Ulrich Ellenberger, Hans Bürcky, Abraham Künzi, and Jakob Haury as elders and preachers.

The Dutch Naamlijst (q.v.) of 1766 for "Rheingrafenstein, Erbesbüdesheim, and Weierhof" lists Ulrich Ellenberger, elder 1743; Christian Moser (1787 mentioned in the Rheingrafenstein congregation), Jakob Galle (in 1787 in the Erbesbüdesheim congregation, from Uffhofen), Jakob Herr (?), Adam Krehbiel, Christian Krehbiel. The 1787 list (partly in contradiction with the above, based on Reeder's report) names for the now independent congregation of Weierhof "bei Kirchheimbolanden": Adam Krehbiel 1758, Michael Krehbiel 1762, Rudolf Ellenberger 1766, Ulrich Krehbiel 1783.

After the death of Ulrich Ellenberger (c1765), Jost's son Adam Krehbiel took charge of the congregation. His faithful service and the love and devotion with which he always performed the duties of his office are attested again and again. Even today his name "Adamvetter" lives on in tradition. He was a friend of Peter Weber (q.v.) of Hardenberg and shared his experience. It is possible that the petition of 1767 to the authorities of Nassau-Weilburg, requesting permission to hold services in their homes, originated with him. This request was apparently granted, for on Sept. 4, 1769, another request was addressed to the prince by Heinrich, Adam, and Christian Krehbiel and Jakob Kägy, requesting permission to build a dwelling house with a room large enough for their services. This request apparently received no answer. Nevertheless they began to build the following spring, but had to stop upon government orders. Through the intervention of La Poirie they, however, soon received the desired permission upon payment of a fee. In the same year, perhaps in October 1770, the meetinghouse, known as "Die Lehr" was put into use, with the assistance of Jakob Galle of Uffhofen and Johannes Krehbiel of Wartenberg. In 1777 Christian Krehbiel took over the function of the deacon and treasurer.

To support Adam Krehbiel, Michael Krehbiel of Donnersberg was ordained to the ministry in 1781 and Rudolf Ellenberger of Rüssingen in 1783. But in the 1790's they died, leaving Adam alone again. In consequence of the French Revolution the chapel was used as a soldiers' barracks, and was badly damaged. During this time the congregation again met in the home of Adam Krehbiel. The aged "Adamvetter" had by this time become quite feeble. Assistants chosen to support him were Johannes Krehbiel, his son-in-law, Johannes Stauffer of Bolanderhof (he died after preaching only two sermons), Jakob Brubacher of Albisheim, and Jakob Krehbiel, a grandson of Adam. Adamvetter died in 1794, mourned by the entire congregation as well as others who had a high regard for him. Now Johannes Bürcky of Albisheim and Michael Krehbiel II of Donnersberg were chosen as preachers; but Jakob had the burden of the responsibility.

The Ibersheim conferences of 1793 and 1795 were attended by Jakob Krehbiel and his father Johannes representing Weierhof.

In 1812-13 the congregation acquired a cemetery.

A plague-like epidemic carried by the soldiers fleeing from Russia struck many people, including Jakob Krehbiel and Johannes Bürcky. The congregation was then in a rather orphaned state. For a time the preachers of the neighboring congregations, especially Jakob Neff of Kriegsheim, looked after the elder's work, until a new election was held in 1816. Jakob Krehbiel of Pfrimmerhof and Georg Neukumeter of Bennhausen were chosen. The former in particular worked with devotion and fluency until he emigrated to America in 1827. As is shown in a booklet, he had drawn a small salary. The preachers then chosen had difficulty in consenting to take upon themselves the entire duty; also some dissensions had arisen within the congregation.

Hermann Reeder (q.v.), the preacher of the Neuwied congregation, made a visit at Weierhof and was chosen the first professional minister of the Weierhof congregation in 1835. He had received some training with the English Baptists and was therefore considered an educated man. The religious life of the congregation grew under his care. Church attendance increased to such an extent that a new church had to be built. On Nov. 1, 1837, the new church, built on the plans of a Baptist chapel in Tottenham, England, was dedicated by Risser of Sembach (q.v.), Jakob Ellenberger of Friedelsheim (q.v.), and Molenaar of Monsheim. The entire cost was met by voluntary contributions. The contractor or supervisor of the erection was Jakob Krehbiel, a miller. In 1848 Reeder returned to Neuwied.

Reeder's successor was Michael Löwenberg (q.v.), who was in addition a teacher in the village. Upon his death in 1874 his son Thomas was chosen, who made a contribution especially in choral work. He served the congregation until 1882, when he accepted a call to Ibersheim (q.v.). Shortly before he left he had begun a parsonage according to plans of his own. It was completed after his departure and acquired by the congregation. Until Johannes Krehbiel of Weierhof could complete his education, S. Blickensdörfer of Sembach looked after the congregation. In 1886 Johannes Krehbiel took over his work. But soon afterward he succumbed to a mysterious disease. The new choice fell upon Christian Neff of Ludwigshafen, who was ordained in the winter of 1887. He served the congregation without intermission until 1938, when his assistant, Paul Schowalter of the Kaplaneihof of the Deutschhof-Geisberg congregation (q.v.), became his successor. During World War II Neff had to take charge of the Weierhof congregation once more until Schowalter's discharge from the army.

During the long and blessed service of Christian Neff the Weierhof parsonage was a frequent center for visits by brethren from Germany and other countries. Americans, French, Dutch, Russian, and Swiss brethren came here to visit or to study. As preacher and pastor of his congregation, for decades as chairman of the Conference of South German Mennonites (q.v.) and many other Mennonite associations, as a competent scholar in Mennonite history, as a pillar of all German Mennonitism and beyond its borders, he will not be forgotten. He died on Dec. 30, 1946, at the Weierhof.

Weierhof very early (c1800) had its own school, a sort of ministerial training school, which was after a period of interruptions built up by Michael Löwenberg and was finally to be developed into a secondary school with a boarding school. Known as the "Realanstalt am Donnersberg" (q.v.), under the leadership of Ernst and Gustav Göbel, it became known far beyond the Palatinate among Mennonites and non-Mennonites. Its music teacher, Lorenz Wettschureck, edited the musical part of the hymnal of the Conference of the South German Mennonites in 1910 and added four-part harmonization.

Conferences of the Palatine and Hessian Mennonites were held at the Weierhof in 1830, 1873, 1882, 1890, 1900, 1911, 1925, 1933, and 1940. On April 3 and 4, 1918, there was a conference of Russian Mennonites, attended by about 20 persons, at which the question of the resettlement of Russian Mennonites was discussed in the light of the Revolution. Also the conferences of the leaders and ministers of the Palatinate and Rhenish Hesse were held annually in near-by Marnheim.

Of special value to the religious life of the brotherhood were the Bible courses held at the Weierhof 1907-14 by Jakob Vetter. After World War I they were resumed (with a few intermissions) by Jakob Krockner (q.v.), with the co-operation of the preachers of the Palatine-Hessian congregations as well as those of Switzerland. There were often visitors from many German congregations present.

The Weierhof congregation is a member of the Konferenz der pfälzisch-hessischen Mennonitengemeinden, the Konferenz der süddeutschen Mennoniten, the Vereinigung der Deutschen Mennonitengemeinden, and the "funds" connected with this Vereinigung, and also of the Vereinigung der bairischen Mennonitengemeinden.

The membership of the Weierhof congregation varies in number between 350 and 400, inclusive of unbaptized children. The baptized membership in 1957 was about 450 adults, besides 85 children. The members live in 50 different villages. Of these, 107 adults and 57 children are refugees, most of them from West Prussia, who moved into the area in 1948-49.

NEFF, C.G.

Christian Galle, "Der Weierhof im Wandel der Zeit," Menn. Jahrbuch (Newton, 1955) 9-16; Gem.-Kal. 1958, 47-60; ML IV.

Weigel, Valentin (1533-88), a Protestant pastor in Zschoppau, Saxony, Germany. His important writings, which did not become generally known until after his death, reveal a remarkable similarity in spirit to Tauler (q.v.) and Sebastian Franck (q.v.). They had a strong influence upon Jakob Böhme, Gottfried Arnold (q.v.), and Johannes Arndt. His ideas are closely related to those of the Anabaptists and he is therefore often erroneously reckoned among them. (See Spiritualists.) (ML IV.) NEFF.

Weil, Alexander, author of Histoire de la guerre des Anabaptistes (Paris, 1875). The author presents Anabaptism as a war similar to the Peasants' War, the political and social aspects of the latter corresponding to the religious and social aspects of the other. He shows little understanding for the essence of Anabaptism. Though he makes an (unsuccessful) attempt to distinguish the radical Anabaptists from the peaceful ones, he sees in the former only the logical outcome of the latter. In the introduction he tries to present the fundamental principles of Anabaptism. The chapter headings indicate the nature of the book. Part I: (1) The Anabaptists in Zwickau and Wittenberg; (2) The Anabaptists at the Head of the Revolting Peasants; (3) The Anabaptists in Switzerland; (4) The Anabaptists in Sweden; (5) Persecutions and Martyrs. Part II: Peaceful Attempts: (1) The Hutterian Brethren; (2) The Gabrielites; (3) Hutterite Customs. Gabriel's Death; (4) Confession of Faith of the Anabaptists After the Reaction and Persecution; (5) Melchior Hofmann and Matthijssen. Part III: (1) Münster; (2) The First Conflicts with the Bishopric; (3) Knipperdolling; The English Plague; (4) Rottmann; (5) Struggle Between Rottmann and the Bishop of Waldeck; (6) Consequences of the Conflict and the Beginning of Hostility; (7) Letters of Luther and Melancthon; (8) Repressalien and the Treaty of Peace; (9) Rottmann, Anabaptist; (10) Jan Bockelson van Leiden. (ML IV.) NEFF.

Weilertal (Val-de-Ville) in Alsace, a valley where the Mennonite congregation of Markirch (q.v.), also called Chateinois (q.v.) or Kestenholtz, held its meetings in the early 20th century. In 1941 the baptized membership numbered about 20. During World War II this congregation was dissolved, the few remaining members joining the Le Hang (q.v.) church.

vdZ.

Weischenfelder, Hans, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Bamberg (q.v.), Bavaria, on Jan. 30, 1528, with Endres Weiss, Else Koch, Margaret Petz, and Katharina Rosner. Weischenfelder was a miller of Uetzing, Upper Franconia, Germany. In his cross-examination he said that he was on his way to Moravia to join the Hutterites, that he was baptized by Hans Hut (q.v.), and made brief statements on some points of doctrine, such as the sacraments. But instead of going to Moravia he stayed behind at Passau "to tend the flock" there. In March 1527, under pressure, he turned against Hut and testified that Hut had been guilty of revolutionary teachings, although Mertain Weischenfelder (q.v.) and others denied this.

H.S.B.

Wappler, Thüringen, 273-82; Herbert Klassen, "Some Aspects of the Teaching of Hans Hut" (M.A. thesis, University of British Columbia, 1958); ML IV.

Weischenfelder, Mertain and Veit, Anabaptists of Uetzing, Upper Franconia, Germany, were baptized by Hans Hut in October 1526. Their three cross-examinations, March 16-18, 1527, are of importance to the history of the Anabaptists of Franconia and the work of Hans Hut (q.v.). Mertain testified that Hut never preached revolutionary doctrine. (Wappler, Thüringen, 236-43; ML IV.) NEFF.

Weiss, Endres, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on Jan. 30, 1528, at Bamberg, Germany, with four other Anabaptists. (See Weischenfelder, Hans.)

Weisse, Michael, a native of Silesia, Germany. He was a Roman Catholic priest who in 1531 became a minister of the Moravian Brethren in Moravia. He occupies a position of honor in the history of German hymnology by his hymnal, Ein New Gesangbuchlen. Five hymns of this hymnal also appear in the second part of the Ausbund (q.v.), first printed in 1583, where four of them are attributed to Anabaptists and one to John Hus. These five hymns are: "Als Christus mit seinr waren lehr," by Michael Sattler (q.v.) (Ausbund, No. 46); "Du glaubigs hertz, so benedeey," by Walpurga von Pappenheim (q.v.) (Ausbund, No. 409); "O Jesu, der du sehlig machst," by Lorentz Ringmacher (q.v.) (Ausbund, No. 407); "O Gott Schöpffer, Heilger Geist," by Christof Bifel (Ausbund, No. 274); and "Jesum Christus Gottes Sohn," by John Hus (Ausbund, No. 216). Wolkan, however, considers all these attributions erroneous, and says that all five of these hymns were written by Weisse. These songs are also found in Wackernagel, Kirchenlied III, Nos. 405, 334, 386, 320, 318. W.W.

J. Theodor Müller, Geschichte der Böhmischn Brüder II (Herrnhut, 1931) 28-30; ML IV.

Weissenheim am Berg, in the duchy of Leiningen, Palatinate, Germany, is mentioned in the Dutch Naamlijst of 1767 as the seat of a Mennonite congregation of Swiss refugees, with Christian Jotter (Yoder) (later elder until c1785) and Christian Schwartztrauben (until c1785) as preachers. The Mennonites of Weissenheim, who under the counts of Leiningen (q.v.) worshiped undisturbed, later formed the congregation of Altleiningen (q.v.).

vdZ.

Welcome Tidings, a weekly 4-page 6½ x 10½ inch tract paper for use in Sunday schools, published by the Mennonite Publishing Company at Elkhart, Ind. The first issue was about April 1, 1887, the last December 1895, when the Words of Cheer became a weekly (January 1896) taking its place. GCL has an almost complete file. (The German issue was Angenehme Stunden; q.v.) In the first period it suspended publication during the winter months since few Sunday schools operated "evergreen." H.S.B.

Weldy: see Wety.

Wellesley, Ont. The Mennonite Conference (MC) of Ontario in 1865 provided preaching services every four weeks for scattered families of Wellesley Township northwest of Waterloo County. Regular appointments were listed for twenty years. No communion service was reported. Since 1900 only a cemetery remains. The nearer Mennonite churches now are Shantz north of Baden, Hawkesville to the east, and Maple View A.M. westward. J.C.F.

Wellesley Maple View Amish Mennonite Church: see Maple View.

Wellesley Old Order Amish congregation had its origin in 1886 as a schism of five families from the Maple View A.M. (q.v.) congregation in opposition to the use of a meetinghouse for worship. They were under bishop oversight from Holmes County, Ohio, until 1891, when they became an organized separate congregation, but they alternate services in close fellowship with the Mornington (q.v.) O.O.A. group. The Lichti A.M. Church (q.v.), located a mile north of the village of Wellesley, broke off in 1912; it has a meetinghouse. The Mornington O.O.A. group in the same neighborhood was formed by a schism from the Poole A.M. (q.v.) congregation in 1886, also because of objections to a meetinghouse. The Poole A.M. group suffered a second schism in 1904, when the Nafziger O.O.A. congregation separated, which is now parallel to the Lichti A.M. congregation, having its own meetinghouse.

In 1958 the Wellesley O.O.A. congregation had 48 families with 140 members. The ministers were Amos Z. Albrecht bishop, and Menno Lichti, J. K. Jantzi, and J. N. Jantzi as preachers. J.C.F.

Wellesley (Ont.) Reformed Mennonite Church: see Kingwood Meetinghouse.

Wellington County, Ont., borders Waterloo County on the east and on the north. In Puslinch Township reside a few families of the Wanner Mennonite Church. Puslinch Center was a Mennonite outpost (MC) about a century ago. There are some families of the Bethel (Elora) Mennonite (MC) Church and of the O.O.M. Church of West Montrose, an active Mennonite (MC) congregation at Glen Allen, and an O.O.M. congregation at Goshen. An M.C. congregation in Maryborough Township has died out. Other M.C. congregations with meetinghouses are located at Moorefield and at Berea (Bosworth Corners) west of Parker and 7 miles west of Alma. Guelph is the principal urban center of Wellington County. J.C.F.

Wellman, Iowa, in northwestern Washington County (q.v.), had a population of 1,126 in 1958, among whom were at least 40 Mennonite families. Twelve Mennonite families lived in adjoining Daytonville. Nine Mennonite businesses are operated in the town. Although not exclusively Mennonite, the widely known Maplecrest Turkey Farms, long the largest independent turkey processing corporation in the world, was established by a local Mennonite, A. C. Gingerich. This organization has created many economic opportunities and considerable employment for the town and community. In 1953, for instance, 125 farmers were raising turkeys for processing in the Maplecrest plant. The Wellman Mennonite Church in the northern part of the town had a membership of 330 in 1957, and the near-by Daytonville Mennonite Church had 81. Wellman is a shopping center for a large Mennonite population living mostly north of the town. (See map of Johnson County.) M.G.

Wellman Mennonite Church (MC), formerly called the Daytonville Mission, located in Wellman, Iowa, a member of the Iowa-Nebraska Conference, began in 1906 as a Sunday school in Daytonville Schoolhouse conducted by members of West Union congregation. The meetinghouse was acquired in 1911. W. S. Guengerich was first resident minister, ordained in 1925, followed by Edward Diener in 1926. The congregation was organized May 6, 1935. A new church with seating capacity of 650 at the north edge of Wellman was dedicated Nov. 10, 1940. The ministers in 1957 were George S. Miller and J. Max Yoder; the bishop was Simon Gingerich. The membership was 335. G.S.M.

Wells Tannery, Pa., Civilian Public Service Camp: see Sideling Hill.

Welmoet (Welmoed, Welmüt, Weynken) Jans (dochter), an Anabaptist martyr, executed on June 7, 1535, at Hoorn, Dutch province of North Holland, together with four other victims, three men and one woman. They had been arrested in March 1535; apparently the city magistrates of Hoorn (q.v.) hesitated to sentence these five persons, who had a good reputation with their fellow citizens, and it was not until the Court of Holland at The Hague insisted on immediate and rigorous punishment that they were sentenced to death. They all died steadfast. The men were decapitated and the women "were led to the sea, where heavy stones were tied to their necks, and they were cast in, and drowned. Their bodies were ignominiously left to float about for a long time until the rulers were moved to have them taken out and buried." vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 36 f., E 443 f.; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 131; Mellink, Wederdopers, 168 f.

Wels, a town in Upper Austria, the seat of an Anabaptist congregation in 1528, which was, however, soon violently suppressed by the government. A number of members fled from the town when persecution set in. In 1528 Luther sent a warning concerning them to Wenzel Link, a clergyman in Nürnberg. Those who remained were arrested and those who did not recant were executed. At least twelve suffered martyrdom. (See Haslinger, Leonhard for an account of the trial and other particulars.) The captain's report, dated June 8, 1528, gives their names as Hans Neumair (q.v.), Leonhard Haslinger (q.v.), Hans Steinpeckh, Jörg Zacherle, Ulrich Perger, Jörg Kneuzinger, Peckenknecht, and two shoemaker's apprentices, both named Sebastian (Wastl). On the following Monday the wives of Haslinger and Zacherle, both named Barbara, were drowned. Madlen, the wife of Steinpeckh, was pregnant and was not executed until after the birth of her child. Six persons proffered the required oath and were released. HEGE.

J. Jäkel, Zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in Oberösterreich . . . (1889) 43 f.; Bernhard Raupach, Evangelisches Oesterreich . . . (Hamburg, 1772) 51; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 280; ML IV.

Welsh (Wälsch), Antonius: see Rizzetto, Antonio.

Welsh Mountain Industrial Mission (MC), near New Holland, Pa., grew out of an effort to help the Negroes who had settled on the Welsh Mountain. Because of low moral standards they had become shiftless and many of them outlaws. The Lancaster County Sunday School Mission held at Kinzers, in 1898 appointed twelve directors to establish an industrial mission. Samuel H. Musselman was the first chairman and Noah H. Mack secretary. Mack also served as superintendent until 1910. People were given an opportunity to work and were paid in provisions. The scope of activities included a store, school, truck and general farming, a shirt factory, broom making, carpet weaving, and, above all, preaching the Gospel. On Jan. 24, 1924, Arthur T. Moyer, who had served as superintendent from April 1, 1913, was fatally shot by a resident of the community who was caught stealing corn. The mission has been sponsored by the Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities since 1917.

The industrial phase was gradually discontinued and was closed c1924 and the property was converted into the Welsh Mountain Samaritan Home. The spiritual ministry was continued by the home staff until 1938, when the Welsh Mountain Mission was organized. A stone building 24 x 40 ft., originally built as a shirt factory, is used for meetings.

The program continues on an interracial basis. This was probably the first organized effort in the Mennonite church on behalf of the colored race. The total membership in 1957, including some workers, was 38, with Ira J. Buckwalter as superintendent and pastor. I.J.B.

Welsh Mountain Samaritan Home, located near New Holland, Pa., and sponsored by the Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (MC), is the successor of the Welsh Mountain Industrial Mission (q.v.), which was converted into an old people's home and the name changed in 1924. The first guests were received soon afterward. Benjamin Buckwalter and wife of Newton, Kan., were assigned as the first superintendent and matron in charge. Extensions to the building were built in 1929 and again in 1940. The guest capacity is 32, with a staff of about 10. The location is healthful and many have found this a pleasant retreat to spend their closing days. Jesse Yoder and wife of Belleville, Pa., are the present superintendent and matron. I.J.B.

Welsing (Welsingh, Welsinck, Welzing), a Dutch Mennonite family, originally from Rees (q.v.) in the Rhineland, Germany, living there until the 18th century. Jakob Welsing, of Rees, was married in 1680 to Helena, a daughter of preacher Hendrik van Voorst, of Emmerich, and was a preacher of the Rees Mennonite congregation, as was his son (?) Isaack Welsink 1727-c35. Hendrik Welsing served the Rees congregation 1735-61/2 as its last preacher.

In 1657 a certain Jan Wolsingh (Welsinck) became a citizen of Nijmegen, Netherlands, and was soon after chosen as deacon or preacher of the Mennonite congregation, for in 1664 he was among the representatives of the Nijmegen congregation to sign the Verbondt van Eenigheydt (q.v.). Though it is not stated where he came from in 1657, it may be surmised that like most immigrants of Nijmegen in this period, he had moved in from the duchy of Jülich (q.v.), in which the Mennonites were not tolerated at that time.

About the same time some Welsinges, probably from Rees, settled in Amsterdam, Holland, where they were members of the Lamist (q.v.) congregation, of which church Jan Welsing Is.zn was a deacon 1691-96, 1701-7, and 1713-18, and François Welsing 1734-40 and 1744-50. Their descendants are still found in the Rotterdam congregation.

Abraham Welsing, of Rees, moved to Cleve (q.v.) where he obtained citizenship in 1671 and started a linen weaving business, which had by 1716 grown into a considerable enterprise. vdZ.

Dutch Naamlijst; church records of Amsterdam and Rotterdam; P. C. G. Guyot, Bijdragen tot de Gesch. der Doopsgezinden te Nijmegen (Nijmegen, 1845) 75; MQR XXV (1951) 250 f.; ML III, 440.

Welty (Wälti, Weldy, Welty), a Mennonite family name of Swiss origin meaning Walter, i.e., Ruler. The family originated in the communes of Rüderswil and Lauperswil in the canton of Bern. As early as 1534 a member of the family, Stoffel Wälti, was brought before the Bernese authorities for listening to Anabaptist sermons. Bernhard Wälti of Rüderswil met a martyr's death in Bern on July 7, 1537, for his Anabaptist faith. In 1672 the records reveal that a Hans Wälti was imprisoned in Bern and flogged for being an Anabaptist. He is probably the Hans Wälti listed in the Palatinate as a refugee a short time later. In 1703 Hans Wälti (called "Rot Hans") and others were imprisoned and sent to Bern. As early as 1738 an Uli Wälti and family of Rüderswyl were living in the Jura in Chaluët, near Moutier, having fled the intolerance of their Emental home. Ulrich Weldy was listed in 1762 as a minister in the Palatinate. Niklaus Wälti of Lauperswil (1764-1834) and his family lived at Wintersingen, canton of Basel. His son John (1787-1855) became the progenitor of the family that settled in Putnam County, Ohio.

The ancestors of the Wälti families who settled in Wayne County, Ohio, in the 1830's and 1840's were Ulrich (1750-1834) of Rüderswyl and Christian (1767-?) of Lauperswil. Their descendants are also found at present in Moniteau County, Mo., as well as other Mennonite communities.

Another family of Wältis came to America in the fore part of the 19th century and settled in Westmoreland County, Pa. In 1851 they moved to northern Indiana where they changed their name to Weldy. Abraham Welty () was the first Mennonite (MC) minister and bishop in Tuscarawas County, Ohio. Henry Weldy (1862-1934) served as a minister in the Holdeman Mennonite Church (MC), Elkhart County, Ind., as did also Silas L. Weldy (1877-1955). Dwight E. Weldy (1918-) joined the Goshen College faculty in 1948. D.L.G.

Samuel H. Baumgartner, Brief Sketches of Eight Generations. Descendants of Ulrich Welty born 1728 (Indianapolis, 1926); Daniel Kauffman, Mennonite Cyclopedic Dictionary, 392.

Welty and Sprunger, a bookstore and later a publishing agency, at Berne, Ind., the forerunner of the Mennonite Book Concern (q.v.), was organized as a partnership in 1884, named for the brothers Joel and Daniel Welty, and S. F. Sprunger, the pastor of the Berne (q.v.) Mennonite Church. The Welty brothers had opened the bookstore on May 9, 1882, with chief emphasis on religious books. In the fall of 1884 the General Conference (GCM) established a conference publication agency, called the "Christliche Central-Buchhandlung der Allgemeinen Konferenz der Mennoniten." It used several bookstores as outlets, among them the firm of Welty and Sprunger, and the firm name continued to appear on the title page of some publications immediately following the conference publishing agency name. In 1893 the name was changed to Mennonite Book Concern and Welty and Sprunger disappeared. Joel Welty was the manager from 1884 on. In the fall of 1884 Welty and Sprunger loaned the conference $1,000 for three years as a capital fund with which to establish the conference publishing agency. In 1889 Welty and Sprunger appeared without the conference publishing agency as the publishers of the Sonntagschul-Lektionen. H.S.B.

Wendel Ravens, an Anabaptist martyr: see Ravens, Wendel.

Wendelmoet Claesdochter, a Sacramentist martyr: see Weynken Claes.

Wengeln, a village in Poland. In 1604 some Hutterian Brethren of Moravia sought permission to settle in Elbing (q.v.), West Prussia (q.v.). They had a lengthy talk with the mayor and the councillors, but in spite of the intercession of the Mennonites their petition was refused. They then settled in Wengeln, rented nine hides of land, and lived there under the protection of the Polish government according to the dictates of their conscience. In spite of protest by the Elbing city council, they were not molested. In the course of time this settlement was absorbed into the Mennonite settlement. W.W.

L. Neubaur, "Mährische [Hutterite] Brüder in Elbing," Ztscht für Kirchengeschichte, 1912, 447-55; ML IV.

Wenger (Wanger, Winger), a Swiss Mennonite family name occurring among the Swiss and American Mennonites, especially in the M.C. branch. The progenitor of large numbers of American Wengers was Christian Wenger, who came to Philadelphia in 1727 and located in Lancaster County, where he married Eva Grabill. Two of his sons settled in the Shenandoah Valley of Virginia; from this branch of the family came the well-known evangelist and college president Amos D. Wenger (1867-1935) and Old Order Mennonite bishop John Dan Wenger, son-in-law of Bishop John Geil (1799-1899). In the Pennsylvania branch of the family a rather large number of ministers and deacons have served, almost all of them in the Lancaster Conference. Jonas G. Wenger (1840-1922), of Lancaster County, Pa., was a superintendent of the Old People's Home at Marshallville, Ohio. Martin D. Wenger (1841-1901), of Lancaster county, did his lifework at Elkhart, Ind., working for John F. Funk's Mennonite Publishing Company. John C. Wenger has taught in Goshen College Biblical Seminary since 1938, and served as deacon, preacher, and bishop in the Indiana-Michigan Conference (MC). His great-uncle, blind John S. Wenger (1843-1916), of Weaverland, Lancaster County, was widely known for his mechanical ability and for his devotion to the church; his biography is included in the booklet Overcoming Handicaps. Samuel S. Wenger (1903-) is an attorney at Lancaster, Pa. Paul A. Wenger (1889-) is a missionary in India. Frank and Harry Wenger are leaders in the C.G.C. Church. J.C.W.

J. G. Wenger et al., Descendants of Christian Wenger (Elkhart, 1903); Delbert Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottsdale, 1958).

Wenger, Amos Daniel (1867-1935), a Mennonite (MC) educator and leader, was born Nov. 25, 1867, in Rockingham County, not far from Edom, Va., the eighth of the eleven children of Jacob and Hannah Brenneman Wenger.

The summer he was eighteen he took a three weeks' normal course at Broadway, Va., and secured a teacher's certificate. In 1890-91 he taught the Perry School near South English, Iowa. In 1894 he was graduated from the Warrensburg Normal, Warrensburg, Mo. In the summer of 1894 he attended Moody Bible Institute. After teaching the Sugar Creek School in Cass County, Mo., during which year he was ordained to the ministry by Bishop David Kauffman, he attended Penn College at Oskaloosa, Iowa, during the winter of 1895-96. Plans for more education were canceled as he became engaged in evangelistic work. The years 1894-1908 marked his greatest evangelistic effort.

After his trip around the world in 1899-1900, he published his book, Six Months in Bible Lands. Among the tracts he wrote as tract editor are: "Jesus Christ Is Coming," "Why I Do Not Join the Lodge," "Buried with Him in Baptism." His pamphlet, "Who Should Educate Our Children," was published in 1926. He also wrote the articles "Baptism" and "Temptation" for the first Bible Doctrine book (1914).

Wenger was pastor at Bethel, Cass Co., Mo., 1894-95, Keokuk Co., Iowa, 1896, Millersville, Pa., 1897-1908, Fentress, Va., 1908-22, and Harrisonburg, Va., 1922-35. He served on the Mennonite Publishing Committee and for several years was contributing editor to the Gospel Herald. In 1901-15 he was a member of the board of Elkhart Institute. He was tract editor for the Mennonite Publishing House, secretary of the General Mission Committee, a member of the Mennonite Board of Education. He served as a teacher and as president at Eastern Mennonite School (now E.M. College) 1922-d.35. He was also treasurer of its Board of Trustees.

He married Mary Hostetter (d. 1898) of Millersville, Pa., July 1, 1897. On Sept. 27, 1900, he married Anna May Lehman, also of Millersville, who was the mother of his eight children, one son of whom died in infancy. His three sons, Amos D. Wenger of Fentress, Paul L. Wenger of Waynesboro, Va., and Chester L. Wenger of Ethiopia, Africa, are (MC) ministers. Two daughters are ministers' wives, one a deacon's wife, and the fourth daughter is Rhoda Wenger, a missionary in Tanganyika (q.v.), Africa.

A. D. Wenger died Oct. 5, 1935, at Harrisonburg, Va., and was buried at the Mt. Pleasant Mennonite Church, Fentress, Va. M.W.K.

Wenger, Georg (George Wagner in van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror), an Anabaptist martyr, who was beheaded in 1591 at Lorentz in the Puster Valley in Tirol, Austria, after he had been imprisoned more than a year. In spite of torture he refused to betray his brethren, and all attempts to convert him to the Catholic faith failed. He was sentenced to death for leaving the Catholic Church, practicing a different baptism, and leading others to his heretical sect. When the sentence was read he replied that it was not a heretical sect that he belonged to, but the divine truth and the right way to the kingdom of God. Many followed to the site of execution, and many wept. He asked that his hands be untied that he might raise them in praise to God and to pray for strength to the end. Wolkan includes a song written in commemoration of his death and that of Jacob Platzer (q.v.), "Ihr Liebhaber der Wahrheit guet, lassts euch erzählen mit freiem Muet." John Horsch mentions three epistles written by him. NEFF.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 308; John Horsch, The Hutterian Brethren . . . (Scottsdale, 1928) 133; Wolkan, Lieder, 236; Mart. Mir. D 778 f., E 1080-82, with picture; ML IV.

Wenger Mennonites. At first, after their organization in Lancaster County in 1893, the Old Order Mennonites under J. H. Martin prospered. But by 1926 Joseph Wenger and his element disagreed and some formed a separate unit. This separate unit, the Groffdale Conference, has no evening services, uses horses and carriages, and the same type of agricultural practices. Their language is German exclusively in the pulpit and considerably in the homes. They advised their boys in World War II days to go to jail rather than accept the CPS alternative. They use the singing table and the German hymnal. They number over 1200, mostly in eastern Lancaster County, Pa. They co-operate with the Addison Gingrich group at St. Jacobs, Ont., and some Wisler Mennonites in Indiana. I.D.L.

Weniger, Martin, one of the chief spokesmen for the Anabaptists at the Zofingen (q.v.) disputation.

Wensing (Wenzing), Christoffel Alberts, of Groningen, Netherlands, d. there Aug. 23, 1703, married in 1682 to Antje Mennes of Appingedam, was a member of the local Groningen Old Flemish congregation. When he began to attend Collegiant (q.v.) meetings he had to answer before the elders of the church (Feb. 15, May, June 2, 1685, Jan. 17, July 25-28, Oct. 24, 1686). In several meetings Wensing defended Collegiant views, particularly on baptism by immersion, denying that the Old Flemish were the only true church, objecting to marital avoidance as practiced by the Old Flemish and the ban in case of marriage with a nonmember. Gradually other members of his congregation also began to worship with the Collegiants. Finally Wensing was banned on May 30, 1687, and the other adherents of Collegiantism soon after. Wensing, who is said to have been highly esteemed by his friends, wrote an account of his relations with the Collegiants and his banning by the Old Flemish; this manuscript is found in the Amsterdam Mennonite Archives. vDZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 2945; DB 1879, 12 f.; 1883, 73-86; 1891, 25 f.; J. C. van Sleec, De Rijnsburger Collegianten (Haarlem, 1895) 222-28.

Werder (Danzig Werder, Grosses or Marienburg Werder, Elbing Werder, Grosswerder): see Marienburg Werder.

Werner, Hans (also called Distler), an Anabaptist of Iphofen in Franconia, Germany. Because he had sheltered Jörg von Passau (see Nespitzer, Georg), an Anabaptist preacher, and been baptized by him (c1527), he was punished with a fine and the loss of two fingers. In addition he was obliged to remain in the region the rest of his life, without freedom to dispose of his property. W.W.

Ztscht für bayrische Kirchengeschichte XVI (1910) 172; ML IV.

Wernersville, Pa., the location of Western State Hospital, a mental hospital in which Civilian Public Service Unit No. 118 served from November 1943 to June 1946, with the Mennonite Central Committee as the operating organization. The unit consisted of 30 men. M.G.

Melvin Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, 1949) 239.

Wernlin (Wern, Werlin, Werner), Jörg (d. c1559), called Scherer, the son of Georg Wernlin of Esslingen (q.v.), who was a student at the University of Heidelberg in 1483 and was in 1523 the notary and secretary of the monastery at Adelberg. Jörg Wernlin studied the profession of barber-surgeon in Ulm, presumably with Nikolaus Launer, a physician suspected of Anabaptist sympathies. In 1530 Wernlin was arrested as an Anabaptist and chained in the hospital; then he was transferred to the prison as a dangerous preacher who led many astray; and finally, in spite of the pleas of his pregnant wife, he was expelled from the town because he refused to render the required oath. As Jörg Werlin Gunzenhofen (?), probably from Gunzenhausen, he tried to return to Ulm in 1531-32; he probably succeeded. He then became the doctor of the poor in the hospital and almshouse. In 1533 he apparently went to Moravia, but finding himself in disagreement with the Hutterites he returned to Ulm. In 1537 he was again expelled because of his Anabaptism. He betook himself to the Remstal, lived in the hamlet Wieler zum Stein, district of Marbach, in 1539, and as Jörg Schere served as a wound doctor. In 1540 he was in Esslingen and Stetten in the Remstal, which belonged to Hans Konrad Thumb of Neuburg, who sheltered Anabaptists and Schwenckfelders. In 1544 Wernlin became acquainted with Pilgram Marpeck and Schwenckfeld. He worked zealously in the Anabaptist cause. He was in Kirchenkirnberg in 1552. As Vorsteher of the Swiss Brethren he gathered from 70 to 100 people once a month for religious services in the woods around Esslingen, baptized, and in isolated homes served communion as late as 1557. He joined Pilgram Marpeck in resisting Schwenckfeld's attacks on the Anabaptists. G.Bos.

City Archives of Ulm, Rats- und Religionsprotokoll; Blätter für Württembergische Kirchengesch. 1897, 118; TA Württemberg; ML IV.

Wervik, a town in the Belgian province of West Flanders close to the French boundary, is known in Mennonite history as the birthplace of the martyr Peter (q.v.) van Olmen (van Wervik). Here the martyrs Jelis (q.v.) Strings and Jelis (q.v.) and Pieter (q.v.) Potvliet were executed in 1562. The inquisitor Titelman (q.v.) listed Wervik among the Flemish towns in which there was strong Anabaptist activity in 1561. Whether there was a congregation or not is unknown. About 1558 elder Jacob (q.v.) de Rore preached and baptized here. vdZ.

Wesbus(ch), van, a former Mennonite family at Haarlem, Holland. Passchier van Wesbus (d. c1630), his son Hans Passchiers, his grandsons Jan (d. 1704) and Isaac, and his great-grandson Frans (b. 1700) were publishers and book printers at Haarlem, from whose presses appeared more than forty Mennonite books in 1601-72, including the Martelaers-Spiegel of 1631, writings of Dirk Philips, Hans de Ries, Jacques Outerman, Vincent de Hondt, Pieter Pietersz, Pieter Jansz Twisck, Pieter Verkindert, and others, and also some Mennonite hymnals. Hans Passchiers van Wesbus also published about 1630 a portrait of Menno Simons engraved by J. van (der) Velde. vdZ.

Wesel, a town (1953 pop. 22,000) on the Lower Rhine in Germany, in the 16th century belonging to the duchy of Cleve (q.v.). Adolf Clarenbach (q.v.) was active here in 1524. In 1534, when Anabaptists from the Netherlands and from Cleve streamed into Münster, active contacts were maintained between Wesel and Münster. Heinrich Santes, a coppersmith of Wesel, was made a duke by Jan Bockelson. There were rumors that there were large numbers of Anabaptists in Wesel. The council arrested suspect wanderers. Heinrich Graess, one of the "prophets" sent out by Münster, was imprisoned and confessed his mission in Wesel and also betrayed his brethren in the town. Eighteen persons were imprisoned in 1535, whose names are given in the records. Some of them had been expelled from other places and had come to Wesel as refugees, e.g., Karl of Süstern, a cobbler, who was banished from Liège in 1534. Wolter Teschemacher, a native of Kuilenborgh, had reputedly just arrived from Münster to gain adherents and procure food for the besieged town. There were Wesel citizens among these Anabaptists: Otto Vink and his wife, Wilhelm Schlebusch and his wife, and Lijntgen Bottermanns. They were also arrested, although they belonged to the first families of the city and had been on the city council. The names of the prisoners, to whom 16 were added later, show that they came from all classes. Vink, Schlebusch, their wives, and four others were executed on Mt. Calvary and buried there in the presence of the Duke of Cleve. One woman was drowned, some were banished, and others pardoned. Several years later, when quiet Anabaptist groups were found in the city, the city council was less severe. But the radical wing of Anabaptists was not yet eradicated. In the early years of the Dutch War of Liberation the cobbler "King" Jan (q.v.) Willemsz, of Roermond, wandered through the country with a band of 300 companions, robbing and plundering in the region of Emmerich, Wesel, and Kalkar. No wonder that the Mennonites as late as 1700 were haunted by the specter of the Münster atrocities.

When the Reformed creed became dominant in Wesel, the Mennonites could maintain themselves only in smaller numbers in near-by Cleve and were not able to organize a congregation. The city council prevented any Mennonites from the outside from settling in the city. On Jan. 12, 1638, Johann Rebber, a Mennonite from Hamm, who had settled in Wesel without knowledge of the city council, was permitted to remain until Easter. The Reesen and Crämer families stayed longer. Maurice of Orange, the Stadholder in Cleve, requested of Frederick William, Elector of Brandenburg, that the Mennonites be tolerated and not be burdened with the oath. Nevertheless Jan Reesen and his brother had to obtain permission to retain the rights which they as citizens had enjoyed for 40 years. In 1694, when the Mennonites were expelled from Rheydt, Gottschalk Dietrichs of Elten came to Wesel with his family. He died here in 1701, and his wife in 1710. His three daughters remained in Wesel. After this nothing more is heard of Mennonites in Wesel.

HEGE.

K. W. Bouterwek, "Bekäntnus einiger persohnen, so der Widdertauff und des Munsterischen Unwesens halben alhie zu Wesel im Jahr 1535 eingezogen worden," Drey Stück aus den Weselischen Wiedertäufer-Acten (Fortges. Sammlung v. alten u. neuen theol. Sachen, n.p., 1739) 409-24; Ztscht des Bergischen Gesch.-Vereins I, 360-84; Rembert, Wiedertäufer; ML IV.

Wesley Chapel Mennonite Church (MC), Newark, Del., was founded in 1950. In 1957 it had 52 members, with Herman N. Glick as pastor. The congregation is a member of the Ohio and Eastern Mennonite Conference.

M.G.

Wessenmiller (Wyssmüller?), Peter, from Wimmis, an Anabaptist martyr, executed on Sept. 17, 1538, at Bern, Switzerland.

vbZ.

Delbert Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottsdale, 1954) 23, No. 28.

West Abbotsford Mennonite Church (GCM), King Road, Abbotsford, B.C., had 395 members in 1958, with A. A. Harder as elder. Peter Derksen, a Mennonite missionary in Japan, is a member of this church.

M.G.

West Chester Mennonite Church (MC), in West Chester, Pa., was established in 1953. A mission station of the Lancaster Conference, it had 30 members in 1957, with Joseph M. Kennel as pastor.

M.G.

West China Mennonite Brethren Mission. H. C. Bartel and his wife, members of the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church and founders of the China Mennonite Mission in Shantung and Honan provinces, left this field in 1941 and went to West China. Here they began to do mission work in the rugged and mountainous area of Shensi and Kansu provinces. Some time later Paulina Foote, who had formerly worked with the Bartels, escaped from the Japanese occupied area in China and joined them. Through these events many in the M.B. Church became interested in this part of China, sent contributions for these workers, and created a sentiment to begin an M.B. Mission in West China.

Through co-operating with H. C. Bartel the M.B. Board of Foreign Missions found a way to begin a mission in West China and presented a plan to the 1945 M.B. General Conference. With the approval of the Conference a field lying partly in Shensi Province and partly in Kansu Province was taken over. Provision was also made for collaboration with the Krimmer M.B. Church, so that each church would work a part of the field.

To this field the M.B. Board of Foreign Missions sent the following missionaries: Mr. and Mrs. P. D. Kiehn, Bena and Emma Bartel in 1946; Mr. and Mrs. P. P. Baltzer and Mr. and Mrs. Harold Baltzer in 1947. These workers occupied the field with headquarters at Shuang Shih Pu and a second station at Huei Hsien. Several Chinese were converted and baptized and an indigenous church was organized.

Due to ill health the P. D. Kiehns returned to America in 1948. The two Baltzer families returned in the summer of 1949 when the onslaught of Communism began to threaten this area, and the others followed when the work had to be closed. J.H.L.

West Clinton Mennonite Church (MC), located 2 miles southeast of Pettisville, Fulton Co., Ohio, began as an outgrowth of the Central congregation, and until 1943 operated with Central and Lockport as one congregation under a common ministry with circuit preaching. The meetinghouse was enlarged in 1935, and seats about 500. The congregation was separately organized in 1943 under the leadership of Edward B. Frey, who was ordained minister in 1925 and bishop in 1933.

On Oct. 22, 1944, D. L. Sommers, who moved in from Oklahoma, was installed as minister. The congregation opened the Holland Mission in 1945 and also supported the missions at Bancroft, Toledo, and Cloverdale, Ohio. In 1947 Olen Nofziger was ordained minister, and in 1950 Raymond Richer was ordained minister with special charge at Holland. The congregation has three foreign missionaries, Vesta (Nafziger) Miller in India and Carl Beck and Ruth (Frey) Shenk in Japan. In 1956 the congregation built the North Clinton meetinghouse, where about one third of the members began to meet for services in January 1957. Later in the year Olen Nofziger was made minister in charge. In 1958 William Nofziger was ordained as minister at West Clinton. The membership in 1957 was 440; the ministers were Edward B. Frey, bishop, and D. L. Sommers and Olen Nofziger.

E.B.F.

West Fairview Mennonite Church (MC), located near Beaver Crossing, Seward Co., Neb., is a member of the Iowa-Nebraska Conference. It began as an extension Sunday school of the East Fairview Mennonite Church prior to 1904, for the benefit of members who lived too far away from the church. These members met in various schools until 1905, when a meetinghouse was built about five miles from the East Fairview meetinghouse. Joe Whitaker from Parnell, Iowa, became the first minister. Other ministers who have served are John Steckley, Chris Steckley, Fred Gingerich, Jacob Oswald, John R. Troyer, Ezra Roth, Lloyal Burke, Dale Oswald, and William R. Eicher (ordained as minister in 1916 and as bishop in 1932), the bishop-pastor in 1959. The membership in 1959 was 110. A new church, 72 x 42 ft., was dedicated in 1956. W.R.E.

West Friesland is (a) a district in the present Dutch province of North Holland, in which are found the Mennonite congregations of Enkhuizen, Hoorn, Twisk-Abbekeerk, and Medemblik, and the former congregations of Bovenkarspel and Venhuizen, now extinct; (b) in German literature the present Dutch province of Friesland, to distinguish it from the German province of East Friesland. vbZ.

West Liberty, Ohio, a village of c1400, located almost on the boundary between Logan and Champaign counties, is the center of a Mennonite (MC) community of three congregations with a total of some 700 baptized members: Bethel in town, Oak Grove to the southeast, and South Union to the north. In the village is the Adriel School for retarded children, formerly the Mennonite Children's Home. The community was settled c1850 and has grown steadily. H.S.B.

West Liberty Mennonite Church (MC), located in southwestern McPherson County, Kan., 4 miles west and 4 north of Inman, Kan., a member of the South Central Conference, the third oldest M.C. congregation in Kansas, was organized in 1883 by Daniel Brundage with nine charter members, who had come from Indiana and Illinois. They purchased the Liberty School in 1884 and moved it to the present building site. The church was first officially named the West Liberty Mennonite Association. In 1892 when a new building was erected the present name was adopted. This meetinghouse was replaced by a new one in 1949.

When the first settlers arrived they attended the Union Sunday School at the Liberty schoolhouse. The Sunday school has continued to serve the people of the community. By 1900 the membership reached 87, and has since then always been around 100.

The following bishops have served this congregation: Daniel Brundage, Daniel Wismer, B. F. Hamilton 1883-1900, S. C. Miller 1900-10, T. M. Erb and D. H. Bender 1911-23, Harry A. Diener 1923-25, and J. G. Hartzler 1925-55; among the ministers were George R. Brunk 1893-1907, Charles D. Yoder 1895-1923, and Menno M. Troyer 1927-, pastor since 1955. The membership in 1957 was 91. M.M.T.

West New Hopedale Mennonite Church (GCM), located 4 miles north of Ringwood, Okla., is a member of the Western District Conference. In 1958 it had 63 members, with Edward J. Wiebe as pastor. This congregation is a neighbor to the New Hopedale Mennonite Church (q.v.), of Meno, Okla., having separated from it with over 50 members. It organized in 1947 as a fully separate congregation. M.G.

West Park Mennonite Brethren Church is located at 3279 West Jensen Street, Fresno, Cal. In 1957 it had a membership of 43, with J. K. Isaak as pastor. M.G.

West Point (Iowa) Mennonite (GCM) Church, now extinct, in Lee County (q.v.), was organized in December 1849, by immigrants from the Palatinate and other points in Germany, when John C. Krehbiel and Jacob Ellenberger were chosen preachers.

Their first building, a log structure, was located 1½ miles east of the present village of Franklin and 4 miles from West Point. The first service in the new church was held on Pentecost of 1850 and on the next Pentecost they observed their first communion service. In 1855 services were alternated between the log structure and buildings in West Point. Finally on July 26, 1863, the new Mennonite church in West Point was dedicated. In 1879 its membership was 59, whereas it had been as high as 79. John C. Krehbiel, who died in 1886, was the last preacher, but one of the deacons, Henry Weber, conducted services by reading sermons for perhaps 10 years after Krehbiel's death. In a meeting of the West Point church and the near-by Zion Mennonite Church on March 21, 1859, the two congregations decided to work for a union of all Mennonites in America and agreed to invite other Mennonite churches to join their union and meet with them at West Point on the second day of Pentecost 1860. The meeting, which marks the beginning of the General Conference of Mennonites, was largely the result of the leadership of Daniel Krehbiel, a member of the West Point church. M.G.

M. Gingerich, The Mennonites in Iowa (Iowa City, 1939) 67-92; H. P. Krehbiel, The History of the General Conference of the Mennonites of North America (Canton, Ohio, 1898) 30-77.

West Prussia was the region on both sides of the lower Vistula between Danzig and Thorn. As the western part of the possessions of the Teutonic Knights it was ceded to Poland in 1466, where it remained until it was made a part of rapidly expanding Prussia in 1772. The Mennonite population of this province probably never exceeded 15,000 souls. Nevertheless West Prussian Mennonitism is the mother soil from which nearly half the Mennonites of the entire world were transplanted to Russia, Asia, and North and South America. East Prussia, the territory immediately to the east of West Prussia, consisting largely of the eastern part of the former territory of the Teutonic Knights, was made a secular duchy in 1525 by Duke Albrecht. The history of the Anabaptists and Mennonites in this area is given in the article East Prussia. The city of Danzig (q.v.) was a free city, under Polish suzerainty 1466-1722, and from 1722 under Prussian suzerainty, and was never actually a part of West Prussia. (See Danzig for the history of the Mennonites in this area.)

The West Prussian congregations were built largely by refugees from the Netherlands. Since the Reformation in that country took on an Anabaptist character after the appearance of Melchior Hofmann (c1530), the opposition of the authorities was directed principally against the Anabaptists. Charles V refused to tolerate any heretics in his hereditary lands, Holland, Zealand, and the southern Netherlands. In the territories later added east and south of the Zuiderzee (Utrecht in 1527, Overijssel 1528, Friesland 1534, Groningen 1536, Drenthe 1537, and Gelderland 1543), persecution never reached such excesses and did not become severe until the rule of the Duke of Alva.

In 1535 a proclamation was issued against the Anabaptists in the Netherlands, because some radical elements among them, incited by the example of Münster, had made an attack on the Oldeklooster (q.v.) in Friesland and on the city hall of Amsterdam. Revolutionary or peaceful, the Anabaptists were henceforth without discrimination subject to severe persecution with fire and sword. Some Anabaptists escaped to Prussia via the North Sea and Baltic Sea routes. In 1534 the Danzig city council wrote the harbor cities of Amsterdam, Antwerp, zur Fähre, Enkhuizen, and Emden, requesting that no Anabaptists be permitted to board the boats to Danzig. Especially from the crown lands Anabaptists came to Prussia in the first fifteen years after Melchior Hofmann's activity; the Duchy of Albrecht of Hohenzollern (East Prussia), Protestant since 1525, offered them refuge. In Polish Prussia (West Prussia) the Reformation was violently suppressed in the early years; in 1526 several citizens of Danzig were put to death as Protestants on royal orders. But after 1543 the Protestant creeds enjoyed a certain measure of freedom, since otherwise the possession of West Prussia would have become uncertain for the kings of Poland, for the estates of West Prussia would not have submitted to religious suppression. This freedom also benefited the Anabaptists, though they were, to be sure, merely tolerated.

On Feb. 1, 1539, the first Mennonite (Anabaptist) settlement in the general area of Prussia was begun by two preachers from the Netherlands—Hermann Sachs and Hugo Mattheissen (q.v.)—in Schönberg in the Oberland of East Prussia, where 4,250 acres were made available for settlers. Hugo was a preacher of the Danzig Mennonites during the years when Menno (q.v.) Simons and Dirk (q.v.) Philips organized the West Prussian congregations. Herman van Bommel (q.v.) also became a preacher of the Danzig Anabaptists. It was rumored that young Stadholder Karl was favorably inclined to the Anabaptists. Before 1549 Thonis Barbier of Emden and Michel Janszoon of Oisterhout, Brabant, served as deacons in the Danzig congregation. Apparently the only Anabaptist congregation before Menno's (he visited Prussia not later than 1549) time was that at Danzig, though some of the members lived in and around Elbing. Scattered Anabaptists must have settled in Danzig and Elbing in the early 1530's.

When it was discovered that the Dutch settlers differed from the Prussian church constitution in the matter of baptism and the Lord's Supper, the unofficial toleration was annulled, and the great majority of the settlers were expelled. Thus the first Anabaptist settlement in the duchy of Prussia was destroyed. The settlers found new homes in West Prussia, and in the free cities of Elbing (q.v.) and Danzig (q.v.), where the Polish authorities had to give religious toleration to their German subjects, who for the most part had accepted the Reformation.

The Anabaptists who settled in the Vistula Delta before 1547 were almost exclusively from the crown lands of the Netherlands, especially from the provinces of Holland, Zeeland, and Brabant. Although all these immigrants were settled as farmers, some of them had previously been in other trades or professions. From the regions acquired after 1524, in which the imperial edicts were laxly executed, there were few emigrants to Prussia until 1547. About 1570 Johann de Mepschop den Ham of Ommelanden (Groningen) united with the Danzig congregation. The Epp, Ens, and Tgahrt families very likely came from the province of Groningen, and the Wiebes from West Friesland. The Janszoon, Rosenfeld, and Momber families came from Flanders, and the Sudermanns from Rotterdam.

In the case of many of the immigrants of the first 100 years the country of origin is given. Thirty-six persons, perhaps with their families, came from the present Netherlands (from Limburg 1, Gelderland 2, Utrecht 3, Friesland 10, Groningen 3, Drenthe 1, Overijssel 2, North Holland 8, South Holland 5, North Brabant 1). From what is now Belgium there were 18 persons by 1640 (from Brabant 10, Antwerp province 4, Flanders 2, and elsewhere 2). From Germany there were nine (Emden 4, Oldenburg 1, Holstein 2, Westphalia 1, Rhineland 1), from Luxembourg one, and from the High German congregation in Moravia two. Most of the immigrants had come from the cities. Later investigation may show a greater participation by Westphalia and the northern Rhineland. But there were also scattered instances of immigration from all the North German regions as far as Mecklenburg. It is not yet known how strong the immigration from South Germany or Moravia was.

In the spring of 1535, 200 Anabaptists (60 families) expelled from Moravia, in part of Silesian origin, came to the region of Thorn, Graudenz, and the Duchy of Prussia. They constituted the initial core of the Anabaptist congregations in the lowlands of the Vistula near Culm (q.v.) and Graudenz (q.v.).

A new phase in the West Prussian Anabaptist movement now developed in 1547-50, which was to make it permanent. The great drainage enterprise was initiated to drain the Vistula Delta, which covered an area forty miles in width from Drausen Lake to Ellerwald and included the two great delta areas east of Danzig, an undertaking which was to require three to four generations. About 1550 the Anabaptists began their work at two points: at Wengeln on Drausen Lake and near Elbing in the Ellerwald (q.v.) area. In 1547 the territory of Tienhof, commonly called the "Unterwerder" (Lower Delta), was acquired by the Danzig banker Loysen, who used Mennonite settlers from Holland in the following years for the work of drainage. In the same year two prominent Anabaptists who had been living in the duchy, Herman van Bommel (q.v.) and Tönnis Florissen, acquired large areas in the Danzig Werder (lowlands) for settlement.

For these extensive undertakings the number of Anabaptists already living in Prussia was quite inadequate. Accordingly, Philip Edzema, a Frisian, went to Holland with a letter of recommendation from the Danzig council to enlist "people of his nation." Somewhat earlier similar enterprises were begun by the Anabaptists in the Vistula Valley at Culm, Graudenz, and Thorn.

From the religious point of view the years 1547-50 were also a turning point. It is only from this time on that one can really speak of Mennonites in West Prussia. By 1550 a large Anabaptist congregation had been established in West Prussia, with its center in Schottland just outside the walls of Danzig, since the Anabaptists were not permitted to settle in the city proper. Here they had their worship and established their shops for the manufacture of fine textiles and brandy. Hugo Mattheissen and Herman van Bommel were the ministers of the Danzig Anabaptist congregation c1550. The church also had two deacons, Tonas Barbier, a native of Emden, and Michel Janszoon of Oisterhout in Brabant.

In the summer of 1549 Menno Simons came to Prussia with Dirk Philips to establish the church in Prussia in permanent form. It was no doubt at this time that the influence of the Sacramentists, which was being felt among the Anabaptists in Prussia, was rooted out. Menno Simons' loving concern for the "brethren in Prussia" is evidenced by a letter he wrote to them on Oct. 7, 1549, from his home in the west, closely following his visit to them.

The significance of the refugee group here was so great that Menno's most intimate co-worker, Dirk Philips (q.v.), assumed the leadership of the congregation in Danzig for the rest of his life. In 1567 he made a trip to Emden to mediate in a controversy between the Flemish and the Frisian Mennonites in Holland. He died in Emden.

From this time on there were both Flemish (q.v.) and Frisian (q.v.) congregations in West Prussia. It is due to the influence of Dirk Philips that the stricter Flemish party won the upper hand, both in Danzig and in the northern coastal area near Elbing, particularly in what is known as the "Grosswerder," i.e., the Great Delta. In the Kleinwerder and in the valley of the Vistula the Frisian party was dominant. In Danzig also there was a small congregation of the United Frisian, Waterlander (q.v.), and High German (q.v.) groups in addition to the large Flemish group. The Frisian congregations had an able leader in Jan Gerritsz, who came from the Netherlands in 1607. Since in that year the ruthless destruction of the great Anabaptist congregations in Moravia also began, he, as elder of the United Church in Danzig, which included the High German group, visited the High German congregations in Moravia and brought back with him to Danzig a preacher by the name of Wall. In 1604 the Swiss Anabaptist preacher Joseph Hauser with seven other brethren and their families, a total of 37 persons, had already emigrated from Moravia to Prussia. After an unsuccessful attempt to settle in Elbing, they finally located in the Mennonite settlement in Wengeln on Drausen Lake. At this time also apparently a number of Anabaptist families of Swiss Brethren origin settled in the Vistula Valley.

In the first decades of the 17th century the dominant position of the Danzig city church in West Prussian Mennonitism gradually declined, and the rural Mennonites began to develop both ecclesiastically and economically into strong groups. In 1613 the Mennonites of the Danzig Werder refused on conscientious grounds to obey the demand of the city council for military service, and received exemption from this service on the basis of a money payment. This is the first appearance of the problem of nonresistance (q.v.) in the history of the West Prussian Mennonites, a problem which was to be so important in their later history. In 1622 there occurred another significant development, namely, the formation of a fire insurance organization covering all the Mennonite farmers in the Danzig Werder and the Grosswerder. Through this co-operative organization a farmer who had lost his buildings by fire recovered his loss by money payments from the other farmers by a prorated charge on their acreage. The near neighbors also helped in the work of clearing away the ruins and erecting new buildings.

During this time the Mennonites suffered grievously under the attacks of a hostile environment. Their "defenselessness" was exploited, and enormous sums of money were extracted from them, until finally King Wladislaus IV granted them a "privilegium" or charter in 1642, which promised them a large measure of toleration as well as protection and a guarantee of their old privileges for all time. (This was granted naturally also on the basis of a money payment.) This charter refers with high praise to their great services to the country in the matter of drainage and recovery of land in the Werder. It was repeatedly confirmed and renewed by the later kings.

About this time, that is, one hundred years after the beginning, the basic work in the drainage of the three Werders had been completed, with windmills, dikes, sluices, and countless drainage ditches. Fat cattle pastured on the fertile meadows. The extensive polders of the three Werders were completed. However, this tremendous achievement was accomplished at a very high cost in human life. Eighty per cent of the settlers are said to have died of marsh fever.

The newly settled area in the Grosswerder was included in the territory of the Flemish congregation, since the unity in colonization work was accompanied by unity in church work. The center of this congregation, the congregation of the "Niederung," later became the Rosenort (q.v.) congregation. In 1639 Jan Siemens was chosen as the first elder of this congregation. Up until this time the elder of the Danzig church had served the group in the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's Supper. A smaller Frisian congregation was organized in the neighborhood with the name Orloffersfelde (q.v.). Other Frisian congregations were organized at Markushof (q.v.), Montau (q.v.), and Schönsee (q.v.), while a smaller Flemish congregation was organized at Culm and a larger one in Elbing-Ellerwald.

In 1638 Johann Jakobsen van Geltema, who was in close contact with the settlers, at least through the marriage of his daughter to a Mennonite, took possession of the Tiegenghof area through mortgage. Thereby the position of the Mennonite settlers was made more secure, and in the following decades there was further immigration into the Grosswerder from the Danzig region. The causes of this immigration were not only the unfriendly attitude of the Danzig council toward the Mennonites, who had a difficult time during the period when the shoemaker Georg Hansen (q.v.) was their elder, but also the inundation of the Danzig Werder in 1656 at the time of the war between Sweden and Poland. After 1700, however, there was no more room for the surplus population of the growing Mennonite settlement. Consequently, when the great plague of 1709 in the eastern part of East Prussia wiped out the greater part of the population there, the Prussian government offered the Mennonites land for settlement in the delta of the Memel River. But in 1724 the militaristic king of Prussia, Frederick William I, ordered the nonresistant Mennonites expelled, since they refused to take up arms. The returning settlers from the Memel territory naturally increased the already excessive population in the West Prussian area.

Two possibilities now offered themselves for the acquisition of new land for settlement by the Mennonites. One was the purchase of scattered surplus parcels of land belonging to the villages of the former Teutonic Knights. By this method a considerable number of individual farms were secured, on each of which a single family was settled, living on its acreage under one roof with the cattle and the produce from the fields. The stables were attached next to the dwelling and the barn to the stable. The barnyard was usually surrounded by high trees and gardens were filled with flowers; all was kept scrupulously clean. The people observed the most conscientious cleanliness and simplicity in clothing and in their furniture.

The second possibility of land purchase arose when the distribution of the scattered farms and meadows which formerly belonged to the Teutonic Knights in the Marienwerder region and in the "Oberwerder" were offered for sale. A small group of Mennonites had settled as early as 1554 in the Oberwerder in and around Heubuden. Now Heubuden (q.v.) became a very large congregation, whose members were settled on the extensive grazing lands which had formerly been used for the enormous number of horses required by the knights. This new area extended from the former Order estates of Kalthof and Warnau near Marienburg through Heubuden to Leske. As a result the membership of the Heubuden congregation increased greatly during the first half of the 18th century. In 1711 there were only eleven candidates for baptism, but in 1743 three times as many. In 1728 the congregation, which for 60 years previously had had no ministers of its own, now chose Jakob Dyck as its first elder. Another Frisian congregation was established on the grazing lands of the Marienwerder area south of Marienburg, called Tragheimerweide (q.v.), chiefly by returning settlers expelled from the Memel district.

Meanwhile, growth in membership finally compelled the Grosswerder congregation to subdivide into four new congregations. In 1735 Tiegenghagen (q.v.), Fürstenwerder (q.v.), and Ladekopp (q.v.) were organized, Rosenort remaining as the central congregation. Church buildings were permitted by the authorities in the Vistula Delta only after a long delay. The dates of the first two churches are 1728 at Thiensdorf (q.v.) and 1754 at Rosenort. The other congregations built their churches in 1768. The services had previously been conducted in barns.

The church records give evidence of active spiritual life in the Grosswerder congregation. In July 1741, in the stable of the widow Suckau in Mausdor-ferfeld, baptism was administered to 51 candidates in the presence of 1,000 people. On March 2, 1775, the Lord's Supper was celebrated in the new church at Rosenort with 1,566 participants. On July 6, 1755, the newly elected elder, Abraham Penner, was ordained by a Danzig elder, Hans van Steen (q.v.), in the presence of a crowd of 2,500-3,000. "The floor of the building was removed, some sat in the balcony, others stood on ladders which were placed against the windows from the outside, while others stood on carriages" (Regehr).

Hans van Steen was the last elder who strongly urged the use of the Dutch. From 1600 to 1750 there was frequent contact between Danzig and Holland, not only correspondence (the Amsterdam Mennonite Archives contain a large number of such letters), but also by personal visits. The wealthy members, especially those in Danzig, preferred to send their sons to Amsterdam to complete their schooling and learn commercial practice. Marriages back and forth were also not uncommon. The country congregations, however, could not continue this regular personal contact with Holland, since they had adopted the Low German dialect known as "Werderplatt" much earlier than in Danzig for use in everyday life, and even in preaching introduced the High German one to two decades earlier than in the city. Previous to this apparently all Anabaptist-Mennonites had used only Dutch in home and in church.

As to education, the Mennonite farmers had their own schools even in the 16th century. From 1700 on the charters almost universally mentioned the right of the Mennonites to have their children educated by their own teachers. Another important feature of the West Prussian Mennonite church life in earlier times was the hospital or old people's home which each congregation erected beside the church. Brotherly aid in various forms was considered to be a chief duty of the Mennonites.

The last years of the Polish period were marked by a considerable loss of legal protection. In 1765 two hundred Mennonites, forced to emigrate from the Vistula Valley for religious reasons, settled in the Neumark (q.v.). The first partition of Poland in 1772, by which West Prussia became a part of the Kingdom of Prussia, meant at first an advantage for the Mennonites, since Frederick the Great had a high regard for superior farmers. Accordingly, when the ceremonial honoring of the new king was to take place in the autumn of 1772 in the mighty old castle of the Teutonic Knights in Marienburg, the Mennonites of the region delivered for the festival meal two fat oxen, 400 pounds of butter, 100 ducks and hens, and 20 cheeses. At the same time they showed the king their Polish charters with privileges, and requested him to give them a similar charter, which they actually received in 1780. In this charter, among other things, their exemption from military service was confirmed.

But it soon became clear that the Mennonites were now subjects of a military state. According to the Prussian army code the obligation of military service derived from the ownership of property. Accordingly, the purchase of property by Mennonites, whose number was constantly increasing, would reduce the number of men available for military service, and could not be in the interest of the state. But Frederick the Great was generous in this point, and in 1781-84 alone granted permission for the purchase by Mennonites of 296 new tracts of land never held by Mennonites before. However, all Mennonites in West Prussia and East Prussia had to pay for military exemption by contributing annually (from 1773) a total of 5,500 talers to the support of the military academy in Culm.

Outside Danzig and Thorn the Mennonites at that time numbered 13,500 souls and owned approximately 150,000 Prussian "Morgen" of the best lowlands in the Delta of the Vistula. After Frederick's death the generosity of the government came to an end. The Lutheran pastors of the Werder, concerned for the future of their congregations, as well as the government officials responsible for providing recruits for military service, urged the king to prohibit further extension of Mennonite landholdings. For this reason Frederick William II issued a special decree in 1789 bearing the title "Edict Concerning the Future of Mennonitism," which guaranteed freedom of conscience in regard to military service but restricted sharply the opportunity to purchase land and obliged the Mennonite landowners to pay the regular church tax required of members of the Lutheran churches. Thus began an eighty-year struggle by the West Prussian Mennonites to maintain their practice of nonresistance. In 1801 the edict of 1789 was further sharpened to make the purchase of any further land impossible.

Under these conditions the surplus Mennonite rural population had only one outlet—emigration. This emigration was now undertaken in the form of a large-scale movement to South Russia. The ancient migration route up the Vistula to the broad steppes of the Black Sea area, which the Goths had once traveled, was now again traveled by countless farm wagons loaded high with furniture, beds and household goods. But it was not only the landless and poorer Mennonites who sought a new home in the Ukraine. Many others who were not satisfied with the new conditions in West Prussia sold their farms and joined the migrants. In 1787-1866 the surplus population of the West Prussian Mennonites migrated to Russia, as is evidenced by the fact that the population figure in the homeland remained static at about 13,000 souls. A considerable number emigrated to the Samara region of Russia in 1859 to found the Alexandertal (q.v.) settlement.

In the time of Prussia's distress during the Napoleonic Wars (1806-14) the Mennonites who remained in West Prussia gave their loyal support to the government, but nevertheless were subjected to a renewed and vigorous attack on their freedom from military service. In 1806 the Mennonites made a voluntary grant of 30,000 talers to Frederick William III on the occasion of his visit to Königsberg. In 1810 they added another voluntary contribution of 10,000 talers to the compulsory war tax which all Prussians had to pay. When the king issued his famous "appeal to my people" in 1813, love for the enslaved homeland was strong in the hearts of the Mennonites, but their spiritual duty to God, which forbade military service for them, still held first place in their consciences. Accordingly, they did not furnish any soldiers, but delivered 500 horses and paid 25,000 talers tax. In addition they made a voluntary contribution of 60,000 guilders and 6,000 ells of linen. All attempts to force them into active military service, however, met a stubbornly successful resistance which was expressed in the following statement: "Although we are prepared to support in every way possible the state which protects and tolerates us, it is impossible for us to have any part in military service as long as we are Mennonites and remain so." A number of their young men, to be sure, accepted military service, who were then excommunicated. Although official pressure was brought occasionally to force the churches to receive these young men back into fellowship after their return from the front, the churches held their position and refused. Again, when the military reserve corps (Landsturm) was established by the army and universal military service was introduced in September 1814, new attempts were made to persuade the Mennonites to accept military service. All such attempts failed. As a substitute the Mennonites paid a certain sum per acre into the military treasury to support the Landsturm. The Alexandertal (Russia) settlement was founded in 1859 by a group who wanted to maintain full nonresistance.

A crucial time for the congregations came when the North German Confederacy passed a law on Nov. 9, 1867, which annulled the Mennonite privilege of exemption from military service. The crisis was alleviated somewhat by a modification of the law by an Order of Cabinet dated March 3, 1868, which authorized noncombatant service by those Mennonites who could not conscientiously serve with arms, offering service as hospital orderlies, clerks, and in transportation. They were also released from the military oath of loyalty and permitted to substitute a simple handclasp. However, a great number of Mennonites could not conscientiously accept even noncombatant military service. The elders of the congregations at Heubuden, Elbing, and Obernessau emigrated soon thereafter with a part of their congregations to Kansas (q.v.) and Nebraska (q.v.).

For those who remained behind the previous restrictions in the purchase of land naturally fell away. Mixed marriages with other faiths became more frequent. Mennonites now became better citizens. To achieve this position, however, they had to surrender one of the two fundamental articles of faith. This meant that their separation from the world and their peculiar character as Mennonites was in part eliminated. Until World War I something of this typical Mennonite character as different from the surrounding world remained in the sense that a large percentage of the Mennonite men still took noncombatant service. The Versailles treaty of 1920, following World War I, imposed considerable difficulties upon the Mennonites of this region, who were divided by the new boundaries into three almost equal blocks, Danzig Free State, Poland, and East Prussia.

In World War II the Mennonites of West Prussia took regular military service along with other Germans. The Bolshevik flood from the East now took from them their homeland and their existence as a settlement. When the Russian army in 1945 marched into the Vistula Delta, where the great majority of the Mennonites of West Prussia lived, the great emigration began. On Jan. 24, 1945, the endless columns of wagons and trucks began to move the Mennonites out of the Werder territory which had been their home for 400 years. This was no organized movement. Part of the group succeeded in getting across the Oder River before the Russian army encircled Danzig. The remainder finally fled by sea to save their bare lives, and many of these finally reached Denmark. A large part of those who remained behind were transported into the interior of Russia, or suffered severely in their old home territory. Some 1,800 were finally located in camps in Denmark, where elders Bruno Ewert of Heubuden and Bruno Enss of Orlofferfeld took charge of the group. In September 1945 a commissioner of the Mennonite Central Committee, C. F. Klassen (q.v.), visited the group in Denmark and initiated the relief work of the American Mennonites for them. Some 691 persons of this group were settled in Uruguay, Oct. 7, 1948, by the MCC. In October 1951 another group of 431 was settled there. In Germany Gustav Reimer, a former deacon of Heubuden, secretary of the conference of the former West and East Prussian congregations, was assigned the task of re-establishing contact among the widely scattered members in Germany and aiding them in their attempt to find a new homeland elsewhere.

At the present time some 5,500 West Prussian Mennonites are living as refugees in the northern and Rhine provinces of Germany and another 1,000 in Württemberg, Baden, and a large number in the Palatinate. The number in the Russian Zone is not known, but is probably also nearly 1,000. The largest concentration in any one area in Germany is in Schleswig-Holstein and around Hamburg, where 2,700 are located. In 1959 the baptized membership of the former West Prussian (including Danzig and East Prussia) congregations was distributed as follows: North Germany—4,000, of whom 2,100 are in nine new refugee congregations widely scattered and an equal number in the eight established congregations; South Germany—600, of whom two thirds are in the Palatinate. Only two new refugee congregations have been established in the South—Enkenbach in the Palatinate and Backnang near Stuttgart. In Uruguay (q.v.) there were in 1957 four congregations with a total of 809 members—El Ombu (q.v.), Gartental (q.v.), Montevideo, and Colonia Delta. The nine congregations in North Germany are organized under a conference committee called "Aeltestenausschuss der Konferenz der west- und ostpreussischen Gemeinden." In Uruguay the four congregations form a conference which is affiliated with the General Conference Mennonite Church in North America. H.P.

M. Beheim-Schwarzbach, Hohenzollernsche Kolonisation (Leipzig, 1874); Hans Alenson, Tegen-Bericht op de voor-Reden vant groote Martelaer Boek (1630, in BRN VII, 1910); Blaupot t. C., Groningen; Erich Kevser, "Die Niederlande und das Weichselland," in Deutsches Archiv für Landes- und Volksforschung VII (1942); Emil Händiges, Beiträge zur Geschichte der Mennonitengemeinde Elbing-Ellerwald (Weierhof, 1938); H. G. Mannhardt, Die Danziger Mennonitengemeinde (Danzig, 1919); H. Wiehler, "Aus der Geschichte der Vereinigten Mennonitengemeinde Thiensdorf - Markushof," in Menn. Bl., 1928, 92-94, 99 f., 108 f.; Wilhelm Mannhardt, Die Wehrfreiheit der Altpreussischen Mennoniten (Marienburg, 1863); Kurt Kaenhoven, ed., Mitteilungen des Sippenverbandes der Danziger Mennonitenfamilien Epp-Kaenhoven-Zimmermann (Göttingen, 1935-43); H. Nottarp, Die Mennoniten in den Marienburger Werdern (Halle, 1929); Horst Penner, Ansiedlung Menn. Niederländer im Weichselmündungsgebiet von der Mitte des 16. Jahrhunderts bis zum Beginn der preussischen Zeit (Weierhof, 1940); Horst Quiring, "Die Beziehungen zwischen holländischen und westpreussischen Mennoniten," in Menn. Bl., 1936, 39-41; idem, "Aus den ersten Jahrzehnten der Mennoniten in Westpreussen," in Gesch. Bl., 1937, 32-35; Reimer, Familiennamen; Ernst Regehr, Geschichts- und Prediger-tabelle der Mennonitengemeinde Rosenort (Elbing, 1939); A. Driedger, "Aus der Geschichte der Mennonitengemeinde Heubuden," in Menn. Bl., 1939; Ernst Crous, "Vom Pietismus bei den altpreussischen Mennoniten im Rahmen ihrer Gesamtgeschichte 1772-1945," in Gesch. Bl., 1954, 7-29; Felicia Sperl, Niederländische Niederzettingen in West-Prussen gedurende der Poolschen tijd (Enkhuizen, 1913); B. Schumacher, Niederländische Ansiedlungen im Herzogtum Preussen zur Zeit Herzog Albrechts (Leipzig, 1913); Unruh, Hintergründe; Reiszewitz und Wadzeck, Beiträge zur Kenntnis der Mennonitengemeinden in Europa und Amerika (Berlin, 1921); idem, Beiträge zur Kenntnis der Taufgesinnten Gemeinden oder der Mennoniten . . . (Breslau, 1829); Max Schön, Das Mennonitentum in Westpreussen (Berlin, 1886); Herbert Wiebe, Das Siedlungswerk niederländischer Mennoniten im Weichselland zwischen Fordon und Weissenberg bis zum Ausgang des 18. Jahrhunderts (Marburg, 1952); B. Schumacher, Geschichte Ost- und Westpreussens, 3d ed. (Würzburg, 1958); Hermann Epp, "Die westpreussischen Mennoniten von 1933 bis zum Untergang," Der Mennonit, 1948, 4 f., 20; Horst Penner, "Anabaptists and Mennonites of East Prussia," MQR XXII (1948) 212-25; idem, "West Prussian Mennonites Through Four Centuries," MQR XXIV (1950) 124-29; B. H. Unruh, "Dutch Backgrounds of Mennonite Migration of the 16th Century to Prussia," MQR X (1936) 173-81; Robert Friedmann, "Devotional Literature of the Mennonites in Danzig and Prussia to 1800," MQR XVIII (1944) 162-73; Ernst Crous, "Mennonites in Germany Since the Thirty Years' War," MQR XXV (1951) 235-62; Bruno Ewert, "Four Centuries of Prussian Mennonites," Menn. Life III (April 1948) 10-18; Horst Penner, Weltweite Bruderschaft (Karlsruhe, 1955); Horst Quiring, "Die Auswanderung der Mennoniten aus Preussen 1788-1879," Menn. Life VI (April 1951) 37; Bruno Ewert, "Four Centuries of Prussian Mennonites," Menn. Life III (April 1948) 11; Hermann Epp, "From the Vistula to the Dnieper," Menn. Life VI (October 1951) 14; Kurt Kaenhoven, "Mennonite Artists—Danzig and Koenigsberg," Menn. Life IV (July 1949) 17; Zdzislaw Ludkiewicz, Osady Holenderskie na nizinie Sartawickp-Nowskiej (Thorn, 1934); B. H. Unruh, Hintergründe; Peter J. Dyck, "Only Memory and Monuments," Menn. Life XIV (January 1959); ML IV.

West Raley Hutterite Bruderhof of the Dariusleut (q.v.) near Cardston, Alberta, had a population of 117 in 1950, with Christian C. Waldner as minister. vdZ.

West Reserve, Man., located west of the Red River and north of the United States border, was set aside like the East Reserve (q.v.) for a Mennonite settlement. When Mennonite delegates inspected the land of Manitoba, the Bergthal and the Kleine Gemeinde delegates, Jacob Peters, Heinrich Wiebe, David Classen, and Cornelius Toews, who had chosen Manitoba for their constituency, investigated this land with the other Mennonite delegates in 1873. All twelve delegates went first to the East Reserve; in 1874 the four delegates of the Bergthal and the Kleine Gemeinde immigrants came to Winnipeg and chose the East Reserve for settlement. Thus the East Reserve became the settlement of the Bergthal Mennonites (q.v.). Bergthal in Russia was a daughter colony of the Chortitza or Old Colony Mennonite settlement.

In 1875, when the first Mennonites of the Chortitza settlement and its daughter settlement Fürstenland under the leadership of Elder Johann Wiebe arrived in Manitoba, they settled on the West Reserve. A total of 580 families or 3,240 persons left the Chortitza and Fürstenland settlements. With few exceptions, all of them settled on the West Reserve. Of this total, about two thirds came from Chortitza and one third from Fürstenland (Epp, Chortitzer Mennoniten). By 1877 they had established the following villages: Hoffnungsfeld, Eichenfeld, Schantzenfeld, Grünfeld, Ebenfeld, Reinland, Hochfeld, Rosengart, Waldheim, Neuendorf, Neuenburg, Blumengart, Blumenstein, Kronthal, Chortitza, Osterwick, Schönfeld, Schönwiese, Rosentort, Rosenhof, Schöndorf, Rosenfeld, Neuhorst, Blumenhorst, and Blumenfeld.

The West Reserve, located between Emerson and Mountain City, and eighteen miles north of the United States boundary, was (according to E. K. Francis) the first permanent agricultural settlement in the open prairies of Western Canada without direct access to a major body of water. This turned out to be some of the best farm land in Manitoba. It was set aside for the "exclusive use of the Mennonites from Russia" by Order-in-Council of April 25, 1876. At that time the East and West Reserves included 25 townships consisting of over half a million acres. The West Reserve consisted of 17 townships. The land was extremely level and trees for fuel and lumber had to be hauled from the Pembina Mountains. During the summer and fall of 1875, while the settlers were living in immigration houses, they staked out their villages and homesteads and began to construct their primitive, tentative shelters. In the spring of the following year they planted 1,475 acres of wheat and potatoes. In 1876 over 800 persons joined the settlers of the West Reserve. In the next four years the number of families coming directly from Russia gradually decreased.

Barely had the Chortitza-Fürstenland Mennonites established themselves when a movement of the Bergthal Mennonites from the East Reserve to the West Reserve set in. Around 1880 Hespeler reported that some 300 families had moved to the West Reserve, leaving some 400 on the East Reserve. The reason given was primarily that the East Reserve suffered more during the wet years. In addition to this, it was discovered that the land of the West Reserve was better. Some of the villages established by the Bergthal people on the West Reserve were Gnadenfeld, Schönhorst, Sommerfeld, Halbstadt, Altona, Bergfeld, and Schönthal. The Dominion Land's Act made it possible for those from the East Reserve to acquire a second homestead in the West Reserve. They settled mostly on the fringes of the area occupied by those who had come directly from Russia to the West Reserve.

The Bergthal Mennonites moving in and establishing homes for the second time in Manitoba were inclined to give up some old practices brought along from Russia and to adjust themselves more fully to the Canadian environment. Thus they introduced a disrupting element into the fixed pattern and way of life of the Old Colony Mennonites of the West Reserve. Some of them discarded the practice of living in closed villages from which each farmer would work his narrow strip of land adjacent to the village and by which they would share the community pasture. This village plan constituted a closely knit civic entity which was the nucleus and foundation for the self-government, parochial schools and the traditional, total way of life. Many felt that deviation from this pattern would introduce a breakdown of the cultural and religious life cherished for generations.

In 1880, when the Canadian provincial government replaced the Mennonite self-government of the Schulze and Oberschulze by the regular civic government, the Bergthal Mennonites of the West Reserve were ready to accept this, while the Old Colony-Fürstenland Mennonites were determined to retain their system of self-government. The Bergthal Mennonites were mostly located in the Douglas municipality (now Rhineland) and the Old Colony Mennonites in the Rhineland municipality (now Stanley). From now on among the Old Colony Mennonites the unofficial Oberschulze functioned beside the official reeve of the municipality. The Old Colony Mennonites also became guardians of the old school system which they wanted to keep in their own hands when some Mennonites started to campaign for improvement of educational facilities and standards and were willing to accept aid from the government and thereby exchange their parochial schools for public schools. The school question became one of the chief reasons why the Old Colony Mennonites of the West Reserve later moved to Mexico.

These differences were some of the factors that made it impossible for the original Mennonite settlers of the West Reserve who had come from Chortitza and Fürstenland under the leadership of Elder Johann Wiebe to have full fellowship with the Bergthal Mennonites who moved in later. The former had organized as the Reinland Mennonite Church, which later became known as the Old Colony Mennonite Church, while the newcomers, under the leadership of Elder Gerhard Wiebe of the Bergthal Mennonite Church (q.v.) of the East Reserve, founded the Bergthal Mennonite Church of the West Reserve, with Johann Funk as elder. The latter group retained the name Bergthal Mennonite Church, while the one on the East Reserve became known as the Chortitza Mennonite Church, since its elder resided in the village of Chortitz. In 1890 the larger part of the Bergthal Mennonites started a new church, which became known as the Sommerfeld Mennonite Church (q.v.), since its elder Abraham Dörksen lived in the village of Sommerfeld. The progressive minority, under the leadership of Elder Johann Funk, retained the name Bergthal Mennonite Church (q.v.).

In the beginning the Mennonite villages covered only part of the West Reserve, gradually expanding within the limits of the reserve actually set aside. In the course of time they yielded portions of reserved land to non-Mennonites and acquired other parcels outside their boundaries. The word "Reserve" eventually became attached to land actually occupied by the Mennonites, particularly after the original grants had expired. At the time when the municipalities of Rhineland and Douglas were incorporated only a few non-Mennonites lived within the Reserve. As time went on more and more of the villages were abandoned. In some instances today only a grove of trees indicates the site of a former village. Some of the villages have become significant communities and business centers. Other places originally established by non-Mennonites have grown into towns primarily occupied by Mennonites today. Among the Mennonite villages which have become trade centers are Reinland, Sommerfeld, Neubergthal, Krongart, and Rosenfeld. Among those started by non-Mennonites after 1890 the following have become railroad and trade centers: Altona, Winkler, Gretna, Plum Coulee, Horndean, and Lowe Farm. Of particular significance as industrial centers are Altona (q.v.), Winkler (q.v.), and Gretna (q.v.). (For a complete history of the West Reserve see articles Manitoba, Old Colony Mennonites, and the towns mentioned.) C.K.

E. K. Francis, In Search of Utopia (Altona, 1955); Cornelius Krahn, "Adventure in Conviction. Russia, Canada, and Mexico" (manuscript); C. A. Dawson, Group Settlement; Ethnic Communities in Western Canada (Toronto, 1936); D. H. Epp, Die Chortitzer Mennoniten (Odessa, 1889); C. Henry Smith, The Coming of the Russian Mennonites (Berne, 1927); ML IV.

West Richwoods (CAM) Conservative Mennonite Church, Mountain View, Ark., was established in 1954. Valentine J. Headings was the bishop of the 12 members in 1957. M.G.

West Salem Mennonite Brethren Church: see Kingwood Bible Church.

West Sterling Mennonite Church (MC), Sterling, Ill., was established in 1928. It had 57 members in 1957, with Vernon Schertz as pastor, and was a mission congregation sponsored by the Science Ridge Mennonite Church. M.G.

West Swamp Mennonite Church (GCM), located between Milford Square and Steinsburg in Milford Twp., Bucks Co., Pa., about 4 miles northwest of Quakertown, a member of the Eastern District Conference, was organized before 1727. It is possible that it was organized in 1717, when Felty (Valentine) Clemmer, the first minister, arrived in America. According to tradition, the first meetinghouse was erected in 1735 on land owned by William Allen. A marker was erected in 1944 at a spot which is thought to be the site of this meetinghouse, about midway between the present East and West Swamp churches. In 1771 a meetinghouse was erected a mile east of the first building. This is the site of the present East Swamp church. Services were held alternately in both buildings. In 1790 another building was erected about one-half mile west of the original meetinghouse on the site of the present West Swamp church. It was replaced in 1819 and again in 1873.

In 1847 John H. Oberholtzer began to organize Bible instruction classes in this church. In the Oberholtzer division of that year the congregation joined the new movement, later joining the Eastern District Conference (GCM). As the number of members increased separate congregations were organized (1877), which are known as East Swamp (q.v.) and West Swamp; they continued to be served by the same minister until 1921. West Swamp is largely a rural church, though there are quite a few who live in near-by towns. The present (1958) minister is Arthur S. Rosenberger, and the membership is 281. A.S.R.

J. C. Wenger, History of the Mennonites of the Franconia Conference (Telford, 1937); Menn. Life II (1947) 33-37.

West Terschelling: see Terschelling.

West Union Mennonite Church (MC), a member of the Iowa-Nebraska Conference, located at Parnell, 9 miles north of Wellman, Iowa, was organized Dec. 11, 1897, by part of the group which worshipped at the Union Meetinghouse northwest of Kalona and which had left the Old Order Amish in 1884 with Christian Warey as minister. They worshipped at the Greene Center Schoolhouse until their church was completed and dedicated June 5, 1898. In 1917 the present building with a seating capacity of 400-500 was erected. Approximately 50 members worship at the Parnell Mission Church, which was started by West Union in 1948. In 1906 West Union started a mission Sunday school near Wellman, which became the Wellman Mennonite Church in 1935. The membership in 1957 was 386, with Herman Ropp as bishop and Paul T. Guengerich and Amos Gingerich as ministers. Bishops Christian Warey, A. I. Yoder, J. K. Yoder, A. G. Yoder, and John Y. Swartzendruber have served this congregation. P.T.G.

West Union Mennonite Church (MC), Rexville, N.Y., was established in 1954 under the Lancaster Mennonite Conference. It had 17 members in 1957, with Carl E. Christman as pastor. M.G.

West Virginia. The territory of this state, located west of Virginia, was a part of Virginia until April 20, 1863. On that date West Virginia was declared a separate state by President Lincoln. This action was the result of the refusal of the northwestern counties of Virginia to accept the secession from the union decreed by the majority of the counties.

A few Mennonite (MC) families settled within the bounds of West Virginia near the close of the 18th century. These early settlements were made in Greenbrier and Rockbridge counties. Since the formation of the new state in 1863 the witness of the Shenandoah Valley Mennonite churches has been effectually brought to the people of Pendleton, Randolph, Tucker, and Hardy counties of West Virginia, which are over the mountains just across the Virginia border. In these areas there were in 1957 a total of 21 congregations, missions, or preaching points, with a total of 533 baptized members. The oldest of these was Salem at Needmore, started in 1868, now with 113 members. These congregations are all Virginia Conference and are served by the bishops of two of the Shenandoah Valley districts. H.A.B.

West Woolwich Old Order Mennonite Church, situated just on the western limits of the town of Elmira, Waterloo Co., Ont. In 1854 land was acquired and a frame building erected, enlarged in 1880 and again in 1908, and land added in 1908 and in 1919. The ministers who served at this place are Peter Martin, David B. Martin, Amos Gingerich, and Jesse Bauman. Those responsible in 1955 were Edward Martin (1903-), minister, ordained 1940; and Clarence Martin (1907-), deacon, ordained 1954. The membership was approximately 250.

In 1939 a part of this group separated and affiliated with the Markham-Waterloo Conference of Mennonites. In 1954 these held a membership of 217, served by George Brubacher (1897-), minister, ordained 1942, and Ivan S. Martin (1907-), deacon, ordained 1942. Both groups use this same church. J.C.F.

West Zion Mennonite Church (GCM), located in Moundridge, McPherson Co., Kan., a member of the Western District, was organized on March 4, 1888, by members from the First Mennonite Church of Christian (now Moundridge). Most of these first members had moved to Kansas from Lee County, Iowa, in the 1870's and named the new congregation after the mother church, the Zion Mennonite Church of Donnellson, Iowa. The names of the charter members were Galle, Rupp, Eymann, Ruth, Schowalter, and Krehbiel. William Galle was elected the first elder and served until his death in 1920, although he was assisted after 1909. The congregation first met in a schoolhouse, which was remodeled and enlarged in 1896. In 1907 a new church building was dedicated. A basement was added to this in 1937. That same meetinghouse, seating approximately 350, is used today.

In 1957 the congregation had 266 members, approximately one third of whom live on farms. The first families were mostly of South German ancestry. Today the congregation is heterogeneous in background, including members from various Mennonite and non-Mennonite groups. Men who have served as pastors of this congregation are William Galle, J. M. Suderman, J. P. Baehr, D. J. Brand, P. K. Regier, W. F. Unruh, John B. Graber, and Harris Waltner. H.WAL.

West Zion Mennonite Church (MC), located near Carstairs, Alberta, approximately 40 miles north of Calgary, a member of the Alberta-Saskatchewan Conference, was organized in 1901. The first Mennonite to settle in the Carstairs-Didsbury district was Andrew Weber, who came west from Ontario in 1894. A few others came later, but the main settlement was made in April 1901. A meetinghouse was built in the fall of 1901. It was replaced by a new church in 1932. This congregation is unique in that approximately half of the membership is of British origin. Ordained men who have served or are serving the West Zion Church are the following: Israel R. Shantz, Amos Weber, Moses H. Schmitt, Noah R. Weber, Henry Weber, Allan Good, Norman Buschert, Alvin Steckly, Abe Reist, Ezra Stauffer, Linford Hackman, Henry J. Harder, and Gordon Buschert, the last two of whom were the ministers in 1957; the membership was 78. E.S.

Westerburg, Gerhard (d. 1558), for a short time an Anabaptist leader in the region of Cologne, Germany. He attached himself to various movements at different places, always however in the sincere desire to improve religious, political, and social conditions. He was the son of a patrician family, born probably at the end of the 15th century, studied at the University of Cologne (in the Bursa Montana) 1514-15 and at the University of Bologna 1515-17, devoting himself to general cultural as well as legal studies. At Cologne he secured the M.A. degree, and at Bologna the degree of doctor in both civil and ecclesiastical law. A trip to Rome introduced him to the evil conditions of the church at the top.

Westerburg was introduced to the Reformation by Nikolaus Storch (q.v.) of Zwickau, whom he entertained in his home and whom he then accompanied to Wittenberg, where he met Luther and Cellarius (q.v.) in 1522. Through Storch he became acquainted with the emerging opposition to infant baptism. Soon he was attracted to Andreas Carlstadt (q.v.) in Wittenberg and then in Orlamünde, whose teachings concerning the Lord's Supper he adopted, and whose sister he married. He even moved to Jena in the neighborhood of Orlamünde in 1523-24 to be nearer to him. He began his literary career as an enthusiastic advocate of Carlstadt's views in 1523 with an eight-page pamphlet entitled Vom Fegfeuer, which was the occasion for his nickname "Dr. Fegfeuer." He was expelled from Saxony along with Carlstadt in the autumn of 1524, and in October of that year he appeared in Zürich and Basel, bringing several pamphlets written by Carlstadt on the Lord's Supper, baptism, etc., which he gave to a printer in Basel for publication. All were printed, except the pamphlet against infant baptism. At this time Westerburg became acquainted with Conrad Grebel and his circle in Zürich, and Felix Manz is known to have secured a quantity of the Carlstadt pamphlets in Basel and distributed them in Zürich.

In the spring of 1525, when Carlstadt was becoming involved in the Peasants' War during his stay in Rothenburg ob der Tauber, Westerburg appeared in Frankfurt am Main as the leader both of a Reformation group and of a little civil rebellion, the latter in assistance to the peasants who were at that time moving to the north and were seeking sympathy in the cities. The forty-two "Frankfurt Articles" were based on a brief draft of eleven articles which had probably been prepared a week earlier (April 13) by "several Christian brethren of the city of Frankfurt and Sachsenhausen," which means a group led by Westerburg. The forty-two articles, which included religious, political, and social demands and represented the desire of the lower classes in the city and its suburbs to improve their economic and political lot, were focused on a program of improving the entire life of the city on the basis of the Gospel. They were moderate demands, and in no sense radically revolutionary. For the general forward movement in the cities of West Germany, their significance is comparable to that of the Twelve Articles for the Peasants' War. Except for these Twelve Articles, they were the only set of articles of this sort printed and they became the model for similar statements in various other towns and cities. In this manner they promoted the spread of the movement as far south as Speyer and as far north as Münster and Osnabrück. The articles were accepted by the Frankfurt city council, although they were the occasion of much confusion and many difficulties in the city. It must, however, not be forgotten, as Steitz (p. 95) says, that these articles revived the Reformation movement in Frankfurt which had been begun in 1522 through the sermons of the preacher Ibach, but which had come to a standstill because of the defeat of the Imperial Knights, who had assumed the protectorate of the movement.

At this time Westerburg lived in Frankfurt with his wife and child in the home of Hans Brommen in Gallengasse. After the defeat of the peasants he was expelled from the city in the middle of May on the very day of the battle at Zabern. He thereupon returned to Cologne, but again ran into difficulties. He reports his experiences of this time in a booklet of 56 pages, printed at Marburg in 1533 by Franz Rhode, in which he describes "how the learned men of Cologne, doctors of divinity and heresy hunters, in March 1526 condemned and damned as an unbeliever Dr. Gerhard Westerburg on account of his teaching regarding purgatory." But the lawyer Westerburg succeeded in securing for himself such a favorable decision by the imperial governmental office in Esslingen in the same month that in spite of published attacks against him, among others by Johannes Cochlaeus (q.v.), his university comrade in Italy, he could continue his residence seven years longer in Cologne. He was not spared attacks by the city council and the Elector, and he could not take part in the trial of Adolf Clarenbach (q.v.) and Peter Fliesteden and could only witness their execution on Sept. 28, 1529.

Now Westerburg, his brother Arnold, and their two wives became Anabaptists, and in a short time Westerburg became the very soul of the Anabaptist movement in Cologne. Enthusiastically he watched the development of the left wing of the Reformation, in which he had years before become deeply interested. He was immediately drawn by the "New Jerusalem" arising in Münster, with its professed purpose to create a new social order based on the pure teaching of the Gospel. In Münster as well as in Cologne several Anabaptists testified, after they had been condemned to death, that the two Westerburg brothers were intimately connected with the Anabaptist movement in Cologne and Münster, Gerhard and Arnold having gone to Münster in the winter of 1534, where they were rebaptized by Heinrich Roll in Knipperdolling's home. Westerburg did not remain long; by Fastnacht he was back again in Cologne diligently promoting the Anabaptist movement. On Feb. 15, 1534, in his house in the Herzogstrasse, he baptized the glazier Richard von Richrath, as well as his own wife. Later he baptized Michael, the servant of a canon of Aachen (born in Brabant), also Peter, the brother of Richard von Richrath. Accompanied by Richard he went to Mörs, where he sought to win converts for the new way. But when he was notified by the bailiff that he would not be tolerated in the district of Mörs he returned to Cologne without having baptized a single person.

The Anabaptist congregation in Cologne at first developed vigorously, but Gerhard Westerburg soon fled the city, although his brother Arnold continued steadfast and suffered both in Cologne and in exile for the Anabaptist cause. A minute in the record of the city council of Strasbourg dated April 22, 1534, states that Roll in the company of Westerburg preached and baptized in the house 'zum gerten fisch.' In Cologne, however, on Nov. 7, 1534, Richard von Richrath, a second glazier named Gothard, and Johann Mey, a blacksmith, were executed, the first burned at the stake at Galgenberge, the last two beheaded in the Junkern churchyard.

Although no information is available concerning Westerburg during the years 1535-41, he apparently left the Anabaptists to join the Reformed Church at this time. Later he did not like to remember this Anabaptist interlude. In 1542-43 he appeared in Königsberg at the court of Albrecht, Duke of Prussia, and later in Emden. He also spent some time in East Friesland under the protection of Countess Anna. According to a report which is probably not altogether reliable, which appears in the "Ostfriesisches Predigerdenkmal" of Reershemius, he served in his last years as preacher in Neustadt-Goedens and died there in 1558. E.C.

Biography by Adolf Brecher in ADB 42 (1897, 182-84); H. S. Bender, Conrad Grebel (Goshen, 1950) 180 f., 122 f., 123, 192, 258 f., 273; Corpus Reform., Opera Melancthonii V, 41; Leonhard Ennen, Geschichte der Stadt Köln IV (Cologne and Neuss, 1875) 337-53; Günther Franz, Der deutsche Bauernkrieg, 4th ed. (Darmstadt, 1956) 228-30; Abraham Hulshof, Geschiedenis van de Doopsgezinden te Straatsburg van 1527 tot 1557 (Amsterdam, 1905); Friedrich Nippold, review on Gerhard Westerburg in Jenaer Literaturzeitung III (Jena, 1876) 385-90; Rembert, Wiedertaufer, 18, 33 f., 45, 62, 65, 81, 114, 116, 137 f., 216 f., 232, 265, 319, 332, 381, 475, 476; Georg Eduard Steitz, Dr. Gerhard Westerburg, der Leiter des Bürgeraufstandes zu Frankfurt a. M. im Jahre 1525; Archiv für Frankfurts Gesch. u. Kunst V (Frankfurt, 1872) 1-215; Paul Tschackert, Urkundenbuch zur Reformationsgesch. des Herzogthums Preussen III (Leipzig, 1890) 17 et passim; ML IV.

Westerdijk, Pieter Bernard (Assen 1869-Amsterdam 1954), a Dutch Mennonite pastor. After completing his studies at the university and the Mennonite seminary at Amsterdam, he served the congregations of Dantumawoude 1892-99, Enschedé 1899-1911, and Amsterdam 1911-35, in which year he retired. In 1914-41 he was a trustee of the A.D.S., its secretary 1914-21, and its moderator 1929-35. He published a number of theological articles in Tijdspiegel and Nieuw Theologisch Tijdschrift, some sermons, including his sermon of dedication of the Gronau (q.v.) church (Enschedé, n.d.), some booklets like Ons godsdienstig zedelijk leven (Assen, 1903), Waarom wij aan persoonlijke onsterfelijkheid gelooven (Assen, 1906), and De Doopsgezinden (Lochem, n.d.), and a book Bijbelsche Gestalten (Amsterdam, 1935). (DJ 1955, 11 f.) vdZ.

Westeremden, in the Dutch province of Groningen, formerly the seat of a Mennonite congregation belonging to the Groningen Old Flemish and in the 17th century temporarily to the very strict Ukowalists (q.v.). The congregation existed from the early 16th century; by the early 17th century it was more or less united with that of Middelstum. The relations to Middelstum, however, are not quite clear; in the 18th century Westeremden was independent again until it merged in 1783 with Huizinge (q.v.), the name of the congregation then being Huizinge and Westeremden. There was a small meetinghouse at Westeremden, but after a new meetinghouse was built in Huizinge in 1815 no meetings were held at Westeremden. The membership at Westeremden was always very small, in 1800 only seven. The Groningen Old Flemish elder Luit Luits (q.v.), who was very influential c1655-74, was a farmer at Westeremden. vdZ.

Blaupot t. C., Groningen I, 52, 149, 199-201; DB 1872, 2; 1879, 5; Groningsche Volksalmanak 1921, 97 ff.

Westergeest, a hamlet in the northeastern part of the Dutch province of Friesland, where Leenaert (q.v.) Bouwens baptized five persons in 1563-65, and ten in 1568-82. Since there was never a congregation at Westergeest, the converts may have joined a neighboring congregation like Dokkum or Dantumawoude. vdZ.

Westerhove(n), van, a former Mennonite family at Haarlem, Holland. Some of its members served as deacons and as trustees of the Mennonite orphanages. Jan van Westerhoven, a deacon of the Flemish Den Blok (q.v.) congregation, was banned from this church in 1662 because he had taken the Lord's Supper in the Waterlander church. He thereupon joined the Haarlem Waterlander Peuzelaarsteeg congregation, which he also served as a deacon and soon after as a preacher. When this congregation in 1672 merged with the moderate Flemish (Lamists, q.v.), he became an elder of the united church. On March 7, 1683, he dedicated the new Peuzelaarsteeg meetinghouse. He published De Schepper verheerlijkt door de Schepselen (1700), a devotional book, which was popular for three generations. Jan van Westerhoven had Collegiant (q.v.) leanings as did also his son Jacob. vdZ.

DB 1863, 139, 141, 148; 1892, 108 note 2; Blaupot t. C., Holland I, 346.

Westerkwartier is the southwest district of the present Dutch province of Groningen (q.v.), in which are found the congregations of Grijpskerk (formerly Pieterzijl), Den Horn (formerly Zuidhorn), and Noordhorn (formerly Humsterland) and the extinct congregation of Visvliet. A short history, particularly on the southern part of the Westerkwartier, is found in S. K. de Waard, Aantekeningen uit de Geschiedenis van Doopsgezinden in 't Westerkwartier (Groningen, 1901). vdZ.

Westermaier, Veit, a member of the Augsburg (q.v.) Anabaptist congregation, was baptized in the home of Scolastica Stierpeurin, and on Jan. 28, 1528, was burned through both cheeks and expelled from the city on account of various "misdemeanors" as an Anabaptist. HEGE.

F. Roth, "Zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in Oberschwaben," in Ztsch. des hist. Vereins f. Schwaben u. Neuburg XXVIII (1901) 51; ML IV.

Western Book and Publishing Company was organized by H. P. Krehbiel when he moved the Review (q.v.) to Newton, Kan., from Canton, Ohio, in December 1900 and bought the rights to Das Kansas Volksblatt from the Kansan Company which had acquired this periodical from W. J. Krehbiel and David Goerz in 1899.

H. P. Krehbiel, manager, was joined by C. E. Krehbiel in 1901, who served as secretary of the company. The Review was continued through 1904. The Post und Volksblatt began publication in 1904 with H. P. and C. E. Krehbiel as editors. In 1909 the Post und Volksblatt was discontinued and the Western Book and Publishing Company reorganized as the Herold Book and Publishing Company (q.v.). J.F.S.

Newton Kansan, Fiftieth Anniversary Number, 1922; Post und Volksblatt, 1904-9; The Review, 1899-1904.

Western Children's Mission was established and incorporated c1935 by an interdenominational group, including members of the Mennonite Brethren Church in Saskatchewan, as an evangelistic agency to reach unchurched children, operating in the three western Canadian provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, and Saskatchewan. In 1952 the Western Children's Mission was broken up into three provincial agencies. The West Coast Children's Mission took over the work in British Columbia; the Rand Mission, which was taken over by the M.B. Alberta Conference, continued the work in Alberta; and the Saskatchewan work was taken over by the M.B. conference of that province under the name Mennonite Brethren Mission of Saskatchewan, with headquarters at Hepburn, Sask. J.S.Ad.

Western District Amish Mennonite Conference was the counterpart of the Eastern Amish Mennonite Conference (q.v.) and included Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, Arkansas, Kansas, Oklahoma, Nebraska, Colorado, and Oregon. Following the discontinuance of the Amish ministers' meetings of 1862-78 (Diener-Versammlungen, q.v.), the more progressive Amish leaders met occasionally for counsel and fellowship. One such informal meeting was held in Illinois around 1882 and another one in the Sycamore Grove church in Cass County, Mo., in 1883. In 1884 these western Amish ministers held a conference in Henry County, Iowa, at which time it was agreed to hold annual conferences, a plan which was followed from that date on. The earliest complete list of congregations belonging to the conference is the 1905 summary, which names 32 churches. A booklet entitled Western District A.M. Conference. Record of Conference Proceedings from the Date of its Organization begins with a report of the conference of 1890 held in the Sycamore Grove church, and ends with the conference of 1912, near Wayland, Iowa. Although conferences were held before 1890, evidently it was in 1890 that the conference became completely organized. Subsequent annual reports end with 1920, the year in which a merger was effected between the Mennonite (MC) conferences west of Indiana and the Western A.M. Conference. (This latter term was used interchangeably with "Western District A.M. Conference.") The five conferences affected by the merger were the Western A.M., Pacific Coast (MC), Illinois (MC), Missouri-Iowa (MC), and Kansas-Nebraska (MC). As a result of the merger the following five new Mennonite conferences appeared: Illinois, Iowa-Nebraska, Missouri-Kansas, Dakota-Montana, and Pacific Coast.

At the time of the dissolution of the Western A.M. Conference in 1920 the membership of that body was 4,388, in the following 32 congregations: Illinois (9)—Hopedale, Goodfield, Roanoke, Metamora, East Bend, Willow Springs, Ohio Station, Waldo, Pleasant Grove; Iowa (6)—Sugar Creek, Lower Deer Creek, West Union, Daytonville, East Union, Cedar Creek; Missouri (2)—Sycamore Grove, Fairview; Arkansas—Stuttgart; Nebraska (7)—East Fairview, Salem, Plum Creek, Wood River, West Fairview, East Fairview (Chappell), Slocum; Kansas—Crystal Springs; Oklahoma (2)—Pleasant View, A.M. of the Center Township at Pryor; Colorado—Thurman; Oregon (3)—Fairview, Zion, Bethel.

Ten outstanding leaders of the Western District A.M. Conference were Joseph Schlegel of Nebraska (1837-1913), in Iowa Sebastian Gerig (1838-1934) and Daniel Graber (1858-1930), in Missouri John J. Hartzler (1845-1936), and in Illinois John Smith (1843-1906), John C. Birky (1849-1920), Daniel Orendorff (1838-1918), Samuel Gerber (1863-1929), Andrew A. Schrock (1863-1939), and Chauncy A. Hartzler (1876-1947). M.G.

M. Gingerich, "Ten Leaders of the Western District Amish Mennonite Conference," MHB, October 1940, pp. 1, 2, 3; J. S. Hartzler and Daniel Kauffman, Mennonite Church History (Scottsdale, 1905).

Western District Conference of the General Conference Mennonite Church in 1957 comprised 67 churches with a membership of 13,561 located in Colorado, Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma, and Mexico. The name "Western District" was formerly applied to what later became the Middle District Conference (q.v.). Since Kansas was somewhat remote from the Middle District area of Iowa, Illinois, and Ohio, Mennonites of Kansas organized themselves into a local conference called the Kansas Conference (q.v.). With the realignment and renaming of district conferences as recommended by the General Conference the Western District became the Middle District and the Kansas Conference became the Western District. The last session of the Kansas Conference and the first session of the Western District Conference were held at Newton on successive days, Oct. 26-28, 1892.

Nineteen churches were represented at the first session of the Western District. First elected officers of the Conference were David Goerz, president; W. J. Ewert, secretary; and Andreas Wiebe, treasurer. Early concerns of the Conference dealt with the Halstead Preparatory School (q.v.), home missions, especially as it involved the visitation of smaller groups in outlying areas, and the promotion of orderly and fruitful activity within the churches.

The Committee for Church Affairs exercised a pastoral concern over the churches, arbitrating differences, counseling with leaders, and exercising disciplinary measures. The Committee on School and Educational Concerns promoted Sunday-school work, parochial and daily vacation Bible schools, and encouraged the Mennonite or German Teachers' Association (q.v.) and the German Teachers' Institute (q.v.).

In 1893 a committee for relief of the poor, later known as the Charity Committee (q.v.), was established to give financial assistance to needy members. A Deaconess Committee was added in 1905 to promote the deaconess cause among the churches of the Conference.

Auxiliaries of the Conference, sometimes reporting directly to the Conference and later through established committees, are the Sunday School Convention, the Christian Endeavor Convention, the Youth Fellowship, the Women's Missionary Association, the Ministers' Conference, the Oklahoma Convention, the Men's Brotherhood, the Oklahoma Bible Academy, and some of the hospitals.

Upon the establishment of Bethel College it reported to the Conference, and after 1920 the Conference named a majority of the College corporation.

The entry of the United States into World War I gave rise to the creation of the Exemption Committee, which later became the Peace and Service Committee. Its primary concern was the status of men drafted for military service, while later it was concerned with all phases of peace education and promotion.

The Education Committee continues to promote daily vacation Bible schools, sponsors Sunday school and youth workers' institutes, and the Western District Loan Library and submits reports of Bible schools and Conference auxiliaries.

Home mission projects have included such churches as the Grace Mennonite Church, Enid; the Meadow Mennonite Church, Colby; the Lorraine Avenue Mennonite Church, Wichita; and more recently churches in Topeka, Kansas City, and Denver.

J.F.S.

Western District Tidings was a quarterly 8½ x 12 in. periodical varying from 4 to 8 pages, published by the Western District Christian Endeavor Convention (GCM) to provide a medium of exchange for ideas of local C.E. Societies, to promote the projects of the Western District C.E. Convention, particularly the various retreats for young people, and to provide the young people with inspirational reading material. It was begun in 1939 under the editorship of William Juhnke who was succeeded toward the end of 1944 by Rosella Reimer (Mrs. Harold Duerksen). It discontinued publication after the June 1946 issue.

J.F.S.

Western Gospel Mission, an interdenominational undertaking, was organized in early 1944 by members of the Prairie Rose Evangelical Mennonite Church (Kleine Gemeinde) near Steinbach, Man. In June 1946 it was reorganized when three congregations of the E.M. Church—Steinbach, Kleefeld, and Prairie Rose—united in the project. Four years later, because of the great needs and many open doors, other groups of evangelical Christians were invited to take part. Incorporated in 1956, with a federal charter, it now operates in three of the ten Canadian provinces—Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Ontario, with headquarters in Steinbach, Man. The work is carried on from seven main stations, from which resident missionaries operate the outstations. The main stations at Weekes, Canora, Kamsack, Wynyard, Pelly, and Danbury in Saskatchewan also serve Mozart, Neely Lake, Haglof, Veregine, White Beech, Stenen, and Arabella. In Manitoba, Dominion City, Grand Marais, and Mafeking are main stations serving also Victoria Beach, Beaconia, Falcon Beach, Roseau Indian Reserve, Balsam Bay, Baden, Bellsite, and Noora. In Ontario a work was started early in 1958 at Kenora. The purpose of the mission is to bring the Gospel into the neglected areas of Canada. The aim is to establish indigenous Sunday schools and churches as soon as possible. The board of directors of eleven members, three from the Rudnerweide Mennonite Church and eight from the Evangelical Mennonite Church, are chosen by the board themselves, except for the three founding churches which elect their own representatives. Since 1957 the mission has published a 6-page Bulletin.

B.D.R.

Western Mennonite Church (MC), Salem, Ore., was established in 1948. It meets in the chapel of the Western Mennonite School. It had 78 members in 1957, with Marcus Lind as its pastor and bishop. It is a member of the Pacific Coast Conference.

M.G.

Western Mennonite School is a standard high school committed to the cause of training the youth of the Pacific Coast Conference District (MC). A Committee appointed by the Conference in 1944 and composed of Milton R. Martin, Marcus Lind, and Gabriel D. Shenk, proposed that the Conference take necessary steps for opening and operating such a school. This proposal was accepted by Conference June 21-22, 1945. At this same time, Oregon passed the School Attendance Law which raised compulsory school age to sixteen, a circumstance that created much pressure in favor of a church high school. In September 1945 classes were held in the Bellevue school building located between Sheridan and McMinnville, Ore. In the second year school opened on the permanent campus located 10 miles north of Salem on the Wallace Road, Route 221. F. J. Gingerich of Canby, Ore., was the first president of the school board, serving for six years. He donated 12 acres of land which comprise the immediate campus. Later the board purchased an additional 32 acres.

Marcus Lind of Salem, Ore., served as its first principal 1945-52, followed by Clayton Swartzentruber 1952-57, C. J. Ramer 1957-58, and E. L. Keener 1958-59. At present the physical plant includes an administration building with classrooms, boys' dormitory, dining hall, and chapel; girls' dormitory; auditorium-gymnasium; industrial arts building; and a new administration building. The enrollment in 1959-60 was 129, with Paul E. Yoder as principal.

C.L.S.

Western Publishing Co., at Halstead, Kan., was organized in 1875 and chartered under the laws of Kansas with 1,000 shares of stock. Its purpose was to publish and distribute Christian literature among Mennonites. Thus it took over the publication of Zur Heimath (q.v.) from the Mennonite Board of Guardians in January 1876 and continued its publication with David Goerz as editor.

Members of the first board of directors were Wilhelm Ewert, David Goerz, John Lehmann, Peter Wiebe, and Bernhard Warkentin. In addition to these Christian Krehbiel, Heinrich Richert, and Hermann Sudermann served at various times until the company was dissolved in 1882.

In addition to Zur Heimath (q.v.) the Western Publishing Co. also published Nachrichten aus der Heidenwelt (q.v.) for the General Conference 1877-81. It also published some books, and operated a bookbindery and bookstore. David Goerz, secretary of the company throughout its existence, was the moving spirit of the organization. In its last year (1882) there were stockholders in eight states, Indian Territory, Germany, and Russia. The General Conference, the Western District Conference, and the Kansas Conference also were shareholders. (Zur Heimath, 1875-81.)
J.F.S.

Westfield (Tex.) Mennonite Brethren Church, located 15 miles north of Houston, was started in 1897 when nine families from Kirk, Col., and some from Kansas organized a small M.B. church here under the leadership of H. Berchtold. They had a very prosperous beginning, starting also a Christian day school. The unhealthy climate, however, forced them to leave this place in 1900. Most of the families moved to Corn and Enid, Okla.
M.A.K.

West-Graftdijk: see Graftdijk.

Westheimer Mennonite Church (GCM), located near Rosemary, Alberta, was established in an abandoned, weedy irrigation area in the fall of 1928, when four families settled there. The land in the area was owned by the Canadian Pacific Railroad, which had spent millions of dollars to develop the Eastern Irrigation District. When the Mennonites, like earlier settlers in the district, were unable to make a living on this land, the railroad in 1935 gave the land to a corporation of farmers, to which the farmers made yearly payments. Under this arrangement the farmers of the area have prospered.

On Feb. 6, 1930, the Mennonites living at Rosemary, Countess, and Gem organized the Westheimer Mennonite Church. In February 1935 the congregation built a church in Rosemary. The building was enlarged in 1947 and in 1949 when the Mennonites in the Clemenceau school district united with the Westheimer congregation. In June 1957, 51 members at Gem, Alberta, organized the independent Gem Mennonite Church. In February 1959 the Westheimer congregation was renamed the Rosemary Mennonite Church. In 1959 its membership was 278, with J. D. Nickel as elder. P.P.D., J.D.N.

Westhofen, a market town in the Worms district in Germany. Before Lutheranism found entry into Westhofen in 1540, Anabaptism was represented here in the 1520's by Wolf Fuchs. The priest Jakob Ebersmann states that according to the court records Wolf Fuchs was charged with Anabaptism and heresy before the court of the Inquisition at Alzey, and was excommunicated. He had been baptized by "Master Jacobus in Worms." E.H.C.

Jakob Ebersmann, Geschichte von Westhofen, Monzernheim und Blödesheim (Worms, 1909) 27; ML IV.

Westland, a district in the Dutch province of South Holland, south of The Hague, where in the fall of 1535 and early 1536 fanatical Anabaptism was active in the villages of Terheide, Naaldwijk, and Poeldijk. At the end of February 1536 a meeting of these revolutionary chiliasts in the house of Jutte Eeuwouts at Poeldijk was surprised by the police. For particulars see Jutte Eeuwouts and Poeldijk. After this there are no traces of Anabaptism in the Westland. VDZ.

E. van Bergen, "De Wederdoopers in het Westland," in Bijdragen voor de Geschiedenis van het Bisdom Haarlem XXVIII (Haarlem, 1903) 269-88.

Westmoreland County, a large county in southwestern Pennsylvania, with an area of 1,025 square miles and a population of over 300,000, was organized in 1773. At that time it embraced about one fourth of the state. It was later divided into fourteen additional counties or parts of counties. Mennonite settlers came into this county in the last decade of the 18th century from Bucks, Chester, Berks, Lancaster, Northampton, Bedford, and perhaps other counties. The first-known Mennonite settler was George Mumma, who purchased land near Scottsdale in 1794. Other early settlers bore the names of Fox, Overholt, Funk, Welty, Rosenberger, Tintman, Yothers, Stoner, Fretz, and Loucks. Mennonite settlers had located in the part of Fayette County adjacent to the Scottsdale area a few years earlier. A log church was erected at Stonerville, now Alverton, about 1799, and a similar building at Pennsville, Fayette County, which provided places of worship for the fairly large Mennonite community in this area in the first half of the 19th century. These churches were merged into one congregation at Scottsdale when that church was built in 1893. Two additional organized congregations have grown out of the Scottdale Church, one at North Scottdale in East Huntingdon Township, about a mile north, and another at Kingview, about a mile east in Fayette County. J.L.H.

J. W. Jordan, History of Westmoreland County, Pa. (1906).

Westphalia (Westfalen), a former province (area 7,806 sq. miles, 1939 pop. 5,200,000) of Prussia, Germany, of which the chief cities are Münster, Bielefeld, Hamm, Bocholt, Paderborn, and those of the Ruhr Valley. The geographic boundaries of the territory called Westphalia have in the past been flexible and often changed according to the political and religious constellations of the day. Anabaptism in Westphalia has primarily become known in connection with the radical Münsterite Anabaptism (q.v.). Less known is the fact that after the end of the Münsterite movement in 1535 Anabaptism survived in various cities and communities in Westphalia. These Anabaptists, commonly known as "Mennisten" or "Tibben" (q.v.), had very little or nothing in common with the radical Münsterites. At the time of the Reformation Westphalia had three bishoprics, Münster, Minden, and Paderborn, and the abbeys Korvey and Herford, which were religious territories subject directly to the emperor. Secular entities were Cleve and the Duchy of Westphalia. Many of the cities of the province enjoyed great freedom. These territorial conditions determined to a large extent the outcome of the denominational lines of the province, in accordance with the principal cuius regio eius religio. In 1947 the province of North Rhine-Westphalia was formed.

The Lutheran reform movement reached Westphalia, particularly the eastern parts, in the early days of the Reformation. In the western part in places like Jülich and Cleve the Reformed influences became more noticeable. In the Duchy of Westphalia the Reformation came to a stop when Hermann von Wied, Bishop of Cologne, abdicated in 1547. Philip of Hesse exerted considerable influence in some parts. In the city of Münster (q.v.) various forces paved the way for the Reformation, some coming from Luther, others from the Lower Rhine and the Netherlands until the city was converted into a radical Anabaptist "New Jerusalem" which was liquidated in 1535 by the Bishop of Münster, Franz von Waldeck. All Anabaptism, everywhere, even if it had nothing to do with the "New Jerusalem," had received a setback from which it never recuperated, particularly in Westphalia. Keller's three-volume work, Die Gegenreformation in Westfalen und am Niederrhein, is to a considerable extent a record of the heroic struggle for survival by peaceful Anabaptism in the province of Westphalia. The Reformed and the Lutheran churches were, of course, witnessing in a similar way. Yet in his presentation of Der Kampf um eine evangelische Kirche im Münsterland 1520-1802, Friedrich Brune finds the evangelical movement closely interwoven with Anabaptism, particularly in the beginning, and his book is therefore also to some extent a history of Anabaptism in the rural areas of Münster seen from a Lutheran point of view.

(1) After "Münster." In the city of Münster, Catholicism was fully restored after 1535, but Philip of Hesse insisted that at least one or two evangelical ministers be permitted to preach. Anabaptists, of course, were not permitted in the city. Münster, however, had lost the political, intellectual, and religious liberties it had enjoyed under the guilds which were now forbidden. In the surrounding towns and communities of Ahlen, Warendorf, Dülmen, Coesfeld, Ahaus, Vreden, Bocholt, Borken, and Freckenhorst, not only Protestantism but also Anabaptist congregations survived at places for a century.

In Warendorf (q.v.), where Anabaptism found entry in 1534, one of the Anabaptist preachers was Johann Klopeis (q.v.). More than fifty persons were baptized here. The city council was sympathetic toward Anabaptism until Franz von Waldeck interfered. The monastery Freckenhorst (q.v.) near Warendorf, which became Protestant in 1532, was an Anabaptist stronghold. In Coesfeld Anabaptism was established in 1534. Some followers went to Münster. In Dülmen the evangelical movement and Anabaptism were started through the preaching of Bernhard Rothmann. Two ministers from Münster were invited to promote the preaching of the Gospel there but were stopped by the bishop. In Vreden there were "several sects" who met outside the city in the barns and groves and practiced "their unusual baptism" (Brune).

Bocholt also had special significance for the Anabaptists: a meeting of the surviving groups took place in 1536 in which David Joris (q.v.) seems to have been dominant. Adam Pastor (q.v.), for a while a co-worker of Menno Simons, came from "Dorpen" in Westphalia, evidently the village of Dörpen on the Ems in the northern part in the bishopric of Münster. On Menno Simons' journey from East Friesland to Cologne in 1545 and also when he returned to Lübeck in 1546 he may have passed through Westphalia.

(2) Cleve-Mark. The persistence of the Anabaptists in Cleve and Mark is verified by the edicts issued by Count Wilhelm to his officers. On March 9, 1560, he gave detailed instructions as to the techniques to be used to win them back to the church. On June 10, 1560, the circulation of Anabaptist books was forbidden. On Jan. 23, 1565, he addressed the mayor and the city council of Soest demanding that they proclaim nontolerance of the Anabaptists. On July 28, 1576, he again issued an edict against the Anabaptists of Cleve-Mark, and on Aug. 16, 1576, another for the city of Soest. Again on Sept. 24, 1580, he decreed "that Anabaptists, Calvinists, and other sects" should be forbidden and that their ministers should be imprisoned; strangers were to carry passports. On Oct. 1, 1585, he again issued an edict against "Corner-baptists and Anabaptists, Sacramentists," and other sects, calling attention to the previously published edicts.

The third synod of Berg, Jan. 3, 1590, states that Anabaptists were forbidden in the city of Elberfeld. On Feb. 25, 1619, it was reported that the city of Sittard had a number of citizens who were Anabaptists, and on April 9, 1619, it was reported that "the Anabaptists are increasing" in the country of Löwenberg (the only place that has thus far been fully investigated). (Keller I, 90, 92, 119, 245, 247, 259; II, 75, 102; III, 253 f.)

(3) Bishopric of Münster. The minutes of the Cathedral Chapter of Münster of 1596-97 deal extensively with the Anabaptists at such places as Wüllen, Borken, and Vreden. Special attention was to be paid to the "Tibben" or Anabaptists who were penetrating cities here and there.

The Anabaptists of Bocholt (q.v.), it was reported to the council of Münster on Dec. 18, 1599, had not left the city on the specified date. On June 6, 1607, the council of Münster asked the officers of Bocholt, Ahaus, and other places to expel the Anabaptists immediately. On July 18, 1607, the Anabaptists writing "to the Council of Münster" referred to themselves as "All fellow believers, commonly known as Mennisten." They declared that they had nothing in common with the Münsterites of 1533; everybody could testify that they were quiet citizens; for this reason they requested that the edicts against them be annulled. A similar petition was sent to the Elector Ernst on Aug. 18, 1607, and also on Sept. 12, 1607, by citizens of Vreden. The negotiations concerning the exile of the Anabaptists at Ahaus, Bocholt, Vreden, and Borken continued.

In an edict of Oct. 20, 1611, Anabaptists of Horstmar, Borkelo, Bevergern, Kloppenburg, Dülmen, Werne, Wolbeck, Sassenberg, and Stromberg are mentioned. From that date until June 19, 1612, numerous reports were issued on the subject. Places like Freckenhorst and Harsewinkel still had Anabaptists. A list of Anabaptists at Vreden and Ahaus was submitted on June 6, 20, and 22, 1612. On Sept. 2, 1614, it was reported that the Anabaptists who had been exiled from Borken, Vreden, Bocholt, and Ahaus had returned. Negotiations concerning the Borken Anabaptists continued through Oct. 24, 1622.

In 1612 Warendorf, Freckenhorst, Harsewinkel, Beelen, Bocholt, Ahaus, Ottenstein, Wessum, Wüllen, Vreden, and other places still had some Anabaptists, particularly Vreden. Gradually, however, they had to leave these places, moving to Gronau, Hamm, Emmerich, Emden, Winterswijk, and Zutphen. However, during the official Catholic Church inspection of 1613-16 numerous Anabaptists were still found in various places. Borken still had six or seven members who met regularly. (Keller II, 334 ff., 345, 354, 389, 407 ff.; III, 398, 404 ff., 429 ff., 491 ff., 512, 527, 535, 570 ff., 581 ff.)

The various records give impressive information on the number and the steadfastness of the Anabaptists in Westphalia. However, they reveal little regarding their basic beliefs and practices. There is no trace of revolutionary activities. Brune, a Lutheran author, speaks very highly of them in his study of the Lutheran church, designating them as pious, industrious, and reliable citizens, highly honored by their neighbors. In Warendorf even a Catholic priest, Boethorn, is said to have sympathized with the Anabaptists in the early 17th century.

(4) Other Areas. The Martyrs' Mirror reports under the year 1601 that Johann von Stein, Count of Wittgenstein, Lord of Homburg, executed four Anabaptists, Hybert op der Straeten, his wife Trynken, Pieter ten Hove, and Lysken van Linschoten. At the beginning of the 18th century there was a small Mennonite church in Hamm, gravure of Mark, and at the end of the century there was a small Amish Mennonite church at Petershagen (q.v.) near Minden.

(5) Later Period. To what an extent, if any, the membership of the Mennonite Church of Gronau (q.v.) is of old Westphalia Anabaptist stock is not known. In any event this is the oldest Mennonite church in Westphalia. It was organized Feb. 4, 1888, in Gronau, 32 miles northwest of Münster, by about 20 Mennonite families living in Gronau and Ahaus, where a large Mennonite industrial center has since developed. After World War II a number of Mennonite refugees joined the congregation. It was also the gateway for thousands of others who went to Canada.

After World War II numerous Mennonites from Eastern Germany and some from Poland and Russia settled in Westphalia, and have organized churches in several places. The Bergisches Land (q.v.) congregation was organized in 1948 in Niederar-Ahe; it includes also the Sauerland area and has a baptized membership of 199. The elder of the church is Fritz Marienfeld. The congregation at Espelkamp (q.v.), organized in 1952, has its own meetinghouse and a baptized membership of 150.

Another congregation, the Mennonite Church of Westphalia, meets at various places, such as Osnabrück, Münster, Recklinghausen, Bielefeld, Brakel, and Detmold, and has a membership of 600. C.K.

For the literature on the Münster Anabaptists see that article. "Westfalen," RGG V (Tübingen, 1931) 1883; Friedrich Brune, Der Kampf um eine evangelische Kirche im Münsterland 1520-1802 (Witten, 1953); Robert Stuperich, Das Münsterische Taufertum (Münster, 1958); Ludwig Keller, Die Gegenreformation in Westfalen und am Niederrhein, 3 vv. (Leipzig, 1881-95); Gem.-Kal., 1958, 82-85; W. Risler, "Täufer im bergischen Amt Löwenburg, Siebengebirge," Gesch.-Bl., 1955; in "Mennoniten in Duisburg," Gesch.-Bl., May 1951, Risler presents an introduction and list of Mennonites of Duisburg; Ernst Crous, "Auf Mennos Spuren am Niederrhein," Der Mennonit VIII (1955) 187; idem, "Die rechtliche Lage der Krefelder Mennonitengemeinde im 17. u. 18. Jh.," Beiträge zur Gesch. rhein. Mennoniten (Weierhof, 1939) 40; ML IV.

Westzaan, a village in the Dutch province of North Holland (1947 pop. 3,318; 204 Mennonites), was at a very early date an important center of Anabaptism. During the winter of 1533-34 no less than some 200 are said to have been (re)baptized here. This early congregation had a strong tendency toward radical chiliasm; many of its members were among the Anabaptists who sailed from Amsterdam for Münster (q.v.) in March 1534, some of whom were pronounced revolutionary and were executed. After the Münsterite period a peaceful Anabaptism developed clandestinely in Westzaan. Concerning this period there is not much information. At the end of the 16th century there were two Mennonite congregations here, a Waterlander (q.v.) in the northern part of the village, and a Frisian (q.v.) in the southern part; they did not merge until 1949.

The Waterlander congregation, later usually called Westzaan-(op het) Noord, was represented at a Waterlander conference at Amsterdam in 1581. Of its history there is only scanty information. Shortly after 1600 it obtained a meetinghouse, which was remodeled several times. Though the Dutch Waterlanders were in general rather liberal, Waterlander churches in North Holland in the later 17th century took a more conservative attitude, rejecting Collegiantism (q.v.) and strictly maintaining the confession of faith by Hans de Ries (q.v.), also refusing to hold government offices (mentioned in 1628). The membership numbered 150 in 1760, 70 in 1827, 114 in 1861, 146 in 1900, 156 in 1929, and 134 in 1949. Until 1876 this church was served by untrained preachers, some of whom were outstanding;

e.g., Willem Bruin 1786-1826 and Jacob Hartog Jansz 1828-76. The first minister trained at the Mennonite seminary was C. R. van Dokkum, serving in the Westzaan-Noord congregation 1877-1902; he was followed by R. Schuurmsma 1903-10 and M. Onnes Mzn 1911-29. In 1930, both churches of Westzaan being vacant, they called A. A. Sepp as a pastor for both congregations. He served here 1930-34, followed by M. A. Hijlkema 1935-47, E. Daalder 1947-51, J. Wieringa 1952-58, and A. H. Swerms 1958-. In 1949 a complete merger was made by the two churches.

The Westzaan-(op het) Zuid church was the mother congregation of the Frisian church of Zaandam (q.v.), which became an independent congregation c1700. Until then the preachers of the Westzaan-Zuid congregation often lived at Zaandam. Westzaan-Zuid has a fine old meetinghouse built in 1695; it is one of the few remaining frame churches, which were formerly rather common in North Holland. This building, well preserved, acquired a pipe organ in 1881. The membership, though exact figures are missing, was presumably rather large in the 17th century, but since c1780 there has been a considerable decrease, mostly because many members moved from Westzaan to Zaandam. In 1725 the baptized membership numbered 210, 252 in 1769, only 75 in 1830, 144 in 1861, 116 in 1900, 98 in 1929, and 81 in 1949. Until 1843 the Westzaan-Zuid congregation was served by lay preachers. In that year Chr. Sepp, who had been educated at the Amsterdam Seminary, was called, serving here 1843-48. He was followed by J. A. J. Verstege 1848-58, A. Ballot 1860-64, H. Cremer 1866, S. Kutsch Lojenga 1866-72, A. G. van Gilse 1872-78, S. K. de Waard 1878-84, C. N. Wybrands 1884-86. After the pulpit had been vacant for three years, Pastor van Dokkum of the Westzaan-Noord congregation was asked to take on the congregation "op't Zuid"; he served here 1889-1902. After his retirement both Westzaan-Noord and Westzaan-Zuid again called pastors of their own; in Zuid this was J. W. van Stuyvenberg, serving here 1903-21, followed by W. Mesdag 1924-29. In the next year (as mentioned above) both churches called Pastor Sepp, and finally in 1949, then together numbering 215 baptized members, they completely merged.

The Westzaan-Zuid congregation formerly operated an orphanage, which was closed about 1890 for lack of orphans. At present there are ladies' circles in both northern and southern parts of Westzaan, and a Sunday school for children. The present baptized membership is 170. vpZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 14, 110, 413, 865, 892, 896; DB 1861, 163; 1872, 57; 1877, 80; 1889, 134; Blaupot t. c., Holland I and II, passim; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 87, 92; S. Lootsma, Het Nieuwe Huys (Zaandam, 1937) 188 ff.

Westzaandam: see Zaandam.

Weydmann, Ernst (1837-1903), a Mennonite preacher of Crefeld. He was the son of Leonhard Weydmann, and like his father he studied at the University and Mennonite Seminary of Amsterdam, where at this time the professors were Samuel Muller (q.v.), conservative and a powerful personality; Sytse Hoekstra (q.v.), a prominent Dutch Modernist; Jan van Gilse (q.v.), and J. G. de Hoop Scheffer. Ernst Weydmann succeeded his father and served his home congregation from 1866 to 1903. Like the former ministers, he worked in close co-operation with his Protestant colleagues; sometimes they exchanged pulpits. He was seriously interested in a union of the German Mennonites. In Ebensheim in 1874 an attempt at union failed, but in Berlin in 1886 the Vereinigung (q.v.) was organized. In that year Weydmann became the Crefeld representative of the Vereinigung and in 1896-1902 he served as chairman of its Consistorium. Weydmann published a new edition of the Christliche Lehre written by his father (see Weydmann, Leonhard). Ernst Weydmann's Geschichte der Mennoniten bis zum 18. Jahrhundert was published posthumously in 1905. E.C.

Dirk Cattepoel, Die akademisch vorgebildeten Prediger der Krefelder Mennonitengemeinde (Weierhof, 1939); F. C. Fleischer, in Zondagsbode, Aug. 16, 1903; Gem.-Kal., 1906, 115-18; ML IV.

Weydmann, Leonhard, a Mennonite preacher in Monsheim and Crefeld, b. March 15, 1793, at Crefeld, d. April 13, 1868, at Crefeld, the son of a Reformed father and a Mennonite mother. He was educated in Basel. In Amsterdam he witnessed the establishment of the A.D.S. (1811). The Mennonite professors at Amsterdam at that time were Gerrit Hesselink (q.v.), who was a natural scientist rather than a theologian, and Rinse Koopmans (q.v.), who stressed the divine authority of revealed doctrine. In 1812 Weydmann wrote a paper on the "Excellence of Mathematics," in 1814 a paper on "Baptism, as It Was Practiced by the Apostles and the Superstitious Practices That Were Later Connected with It," and another work about the "Authenticity of the Books of the New Testament." He studied briefly then at the University of Berlin and in 1816 became the minister in Zutphen and after that in Friedrichstadt.

After several months in Crefeld he received a call to the Kriegsheim congregation and then in 1820 a call to Monsheim. Here he witnessed the establishment of the Palatine-Hessian Conference (1824), which was accompanied by an increased interest in missions. He was the first trained minister in the Palatinate and rendered valuable service there in the matter of their hymnal (1832) and their catechism (1836).

In 1836-66 he served in his home congregation of Crefeld. Here too he did some literary work. In 1850 he published the book Luther, ein Charakter- und Spiegelbild für unsere Zeit, and in 1852 Christliche Lehre, zunächst zum Gebrauch der Taufgesinn-ten in Deutschland. E.C.

Weynken (Wyneken, Wijnken) Jans, a revolutionary Anabaptist of Friesland. She sailed with an Amsterdam group in March 1534 en route to Münster (q.v.), but was apprehended at Bergklooster (q.v.) in the Dutch province of Overijssel. On May 11, 1534, the Court of Holland sentenced her to be burned at the stake. The sentence was apparently executed at The Hague. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 745; DB 1917, 121, No. 143; Mellink, Wederdopers, 245.) vdZ.

Weynken Claes (Wendelmoet Claesdochter), a martyr of Monnikendam in the Dutch province of North Holland, burned at the stake at The Hague on Nov. 20, 1527, after she had been in prison for half a year. On Nov. 15, 1527, she was conducted from the castle of Woerden to The Hague to be tried before the stadholder and the Court of Holland. Weynken Claes was not an Anabaptist in the strict sense, since Anabaptism did not arise in Holland before the fall of 1530, but a Sacramentist (q.v.). The ideas she defended in her trial were the Sacramentist views—rejecting and attacking the Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation, the power claimed by the Catholic Church to forgive sins, and the seven Catholic sacraments, but not infant baptism. This explains why she is listed in the Lutheran (Rabus, q.v.) and the Reformed (van Haemstede, q.v.) as well as in the Mennonite martyr books from the Offer des Heeren to van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror. That she was not an Anabaptist is also shown by the fact that though she was executed in 1527, she was not listed in the first three editions of Offer des Heeren, but was first inserted in the appendix of the 1570 edition.

Yet there was adequate reason to list her among the Anabaptist martyrs. First, Monnikendam was by 1534 predominantly Anabaptist, and later a considerable Mennonite congregation was found here, among whose members there may have been descendants of Weynken or relatives or friends. Secondly, the objections of later Anabaptism to the doctrines and practices of the Catholic Church are identical with those of Weynken Claes, Anabaptist martyrs again and again expressing their rejection of transubstantiation, etc., with Weynken's very words. She valiantly, freely, and ably defended her views; her somewhat crude expressions show that she was of the common people. Concerning the sacred host, she said that it is merely bread and water; concerning the extreme unction she answered, "Oil is good for salad or to oil your shoes with"; and when a monk showed her a wooden crucifix, saying, "See, here is your Lord and your God," she answered, "This is not my God; the cross by which I am redeemed is a different one. This is a wooden god; throw him into the fire, and warm yourselves with him." She firmly confessed her faith in Christ as her only Saviour; she confidently believed in the grace of God; the glow of the burning pile near the stake did not frighten her, and she died steadfast.

The source for the trial and death of Weynken Claes used by several martyr books was a pamphlet printed at Antwerp in 1528 (no copy has survived). An account in German, entitled Ein wunderliche geschycht, newlich geschehen in dem Hag in Holland im iar MDXXXVII den XX tag Novembris, von einr frawen geheissen Wendelmut Clausen dochter, einr witwe, die do verpendt ist (copies in the libraries of Munich and Vienna), obviously a translation of the Dutch pamphlet of 1528, was used by Rabus.

In the Offer des Heeren this account is followed by a hymn on Weynken, beginning "De Heer moet zijn ghepresen/Van zijn goedertierenheit." vdZ.

BRN II, 422-29; Mart. Mir. D 11-13, E 422-24; Inv.

Arch. Amst. I, No. 1a-d; Bibliographie I, 82-91, 651 f.; II, 671, No. 135; Wolkan, Lieder, 68; ML I, 358.

Wheat has been raised by Mennonites in Russia and America in large quantities. In the pioneer days in the Ukraine (q.v.) the Mennonites engaged in small-scale diversified farming, and wheat production played no significant role. (See Agriculture.) Gradually the Mennonites concentrated on wheat raising. Originally they primarily raised summer wheat. Gradually they shifted to hard winter wheat, which was grown in the Black Sea and Mediterranean areas, which was known as Red Turkey, Crimean, Odessa, Bulgarian, Hungarian, Russian, and Mennonite wheat. That this variety was introduced into the Ukraine by the father of Bernhard Warkentin (q.v.) is not likely. It was generally sown by German and Greek settlers and Russian farmers in that area, and it is likely that he promoted it. Around 1850 the London wheat market began to appreciate this hard wheat. The increased production of wheat went hand in hand with the development of improved machinery and the opening of ports along the Black Sea and Sea of Azov, which made the Ukraine the granary of Europe. The ports of Berdyansk and Mariupol near the Mennonite settlement shipped the best quality of wheat. Cornelius Jansen stated that the Mennonites of the Molotschna produced nearly half a million bushels of wheat in 1855. In 1874 Senator Windom, of Minnesota, urged Congress to promote the immigration of Mennonites to the prairie states to enable America to meet the competition of wheat shipments from Russia and Canada on the world market.

When the Mennonites arrived in the prairie states and provinces, they brought with them, along with household goods and furniture, various seeds they had been planting in the steppes of the Ukraine, including smaller quantities of varieties of wheat. The various stories in circulation about how this wheat was selected and who brought it cannot be taken too seriously. It is possible that Kansas raised some hard winter wheat varieties prior to the coming of the Mennonites. However, the fact remains (even Malin, who has questioned many claims, confirms it) that the counties in which the Mennonites lived and those in the immediate surroundings were the first to raise the hard winter wheat varieties on a larger scale (162-78).

Bernhard Warkentin, whose father was a miller in Russia and who was among the first to come to America in 1872, immediately saw the agricultural and milling possibilities in the prairie states and built a mill in Halstead with his father-in-law. He demonstrated on his farm and in his mill the great superiority of winter wheat over the soft varieties still in use. He imported a large shipment of winter wheat from the Crimea in 1885-86 for distribution among the farmers. Soon after this Mark A. Carleton, the noted cerealist, probably became acquainted with Warkentin and the Mennonites when he was teaching at Garfield University at Wichita (1889-91). In 1896 when he experimented with wheat and oats in Salina, he called on Warkentin, and in 1899 he secured through Warkentin a plot of land for further experiments in some 300 varieties. The correspondence between Warkentin and Carleton (copies in BeCL) reveals clearly the role of the Mennonites in introducing the hard winter wheat to the prairie states. Carleton states in an article in the Yearbook (1914) that each Mennonite "family brought over a bushel or more of Crimean wheat for seed, and from this seed was grown the first crop of Kansas hard winter wheat" (399), and that the "good qualities of Turkey wheat were not generally appreciated much before the close of the last century, 25 years after its introduction into Kansas by the Mennonites" (401). In 1898 Carleton, with the help of Warkentin, went to the Ukraine to get some hard winter wheat varieties. In 1901, upon the request of the Kansas State Millers Association, Warkentin had about 15,000 bushels imported and distributed. Among the hard winter wheat varieties which have been developed from this original hard wheat, the best known are Kan-red, Black Hull, and Tenmarq.

Although the hard winter wheat is limited to the states of Oklahoma, Kansas, and Nebraska, the Mennonites of other areas have made a similar contribution in other kinds of wheat, especially in Manitoba.

Malin's book, Winter Wheat, is a valuable source of information, but needs to be checked and brought up to date. He did not make use of some of the valuable sources such as the Carleton-Warkentin correspondence and the notices which regularly appeared in the Weekly Kansan of Newton. The study of the contribution of the Mennonites in the promotion of winter wheat is still to be made.

C.K.

T. R. Schellenberg, "Correspondence Between Mark A. Carleton and Bernhard Warkentin Regarding Turkey Wheat," excerpts from the National Archives and the Department of Agriculture (BeCL); James C. Malin, Winter Wheat in the Golden Belt of Kansas (Lawrence, 1944); Mark A. Carleton, "Successful Wheat Growing in Semiarid Districts" and "Hard Wheats Winning Their Way," Yearbook of the Department of Agriculture, 1900, pp. 529-42; 1914, pp. 391-420; Cornelius Krahn, ed., From the Steppes to the Prairies (Newton, 1949); William E. Connelley, "Bernhard Warkentin," in A Standard History of Kansas and Kansans V (Chicago-New York, 1918) 2291; H. D. Seymour, Russia on the Black Sea and Sea of Azov . . . (London, 1855) 315 ff.; A. Ehrt, Das Mennonitentum in Russland von seiner Einwanderung bis zur Gegenwart (Berlin, 1932); D. G. Rempel, "The Mennonite Colonies in New Russia . . . 1789-1914" (unpublished doctoral dissertation at Stanford University, 1933); S. P. Sorokin, Semenovodstvo v semennykh tovarishestvakh Vserossiyskovo Mennonitskovo Selsko-Khozyaystvennovo Obshestva (Moscow, 1926).

White Cloud Mennonite (MC) Church, located one mile southeast of White Cloud, Mich., is in the Indiana-Michigan Conference. Mennonite families from the Shore congregation in Lagrange County, Ind., began moving into the area in 1896. Regular Sunday-school services were started in a schoolhouse in 1898 and the next year Bishop P. Y. Lehman of Indiana organized a congregation of 22 charter members. In 1900, when the congregation had grown to 35 members, Bishop John F. Funk (q.v.) ordained Jacob P. Miller (1850-1927) to the ministry. On May 1, 1901, P. Y. Lehman ordained him as bishop. In 1903 the congregation began to worship in a building known as the Union Church, and for a time was known by this name. After 1910 J. P. Miller was no longer located at White Cloud, and T. U. Nelson (1870-1950) became the long-time preacher, having been ordained by Miller on Dec. 5, 1910. The pastor of the church in 1958 was Edward D. Jones, and the membership was 54. J.C.W.

Winifred Nelson Beechy, "History of the White Cloud Mennonite Church," MHB, July 1952, 1-4.

White Hall Mennonite (MC) Church, now extinct, near Oronogo in Jasper County, Mo., was last listed in the 1953 Mennonite Yearbook, with 15 members. In 1936 the church had its largest membership of 69. Joseph Blosser and family of Virginia, who arrived in Jasper County in 1867, were the first Mennonites in the area; by 1892 the church had grown to some 20 members. The congregation worshiped in the White Hall school until 1897, when it built a church across the road from the school. The first minister was Joseph Weaver, from Virginia, who was ordained in Missouri. Andrew Sherk, from Ohio, became the minister of the church in 1895. Another well-known preacher of the congregation was E. J. Berkey. M.G.

Whitehorn Mennonite Brethren Church, Blaine, Wash.: see Blaine Mennonite Brethren Church.

Whitehouse (Ohio) Reformed Mennonite Church at Whitehouse, Lucas Co., Ohio, was established in 1852. In 1957 it had 6 members. H.S.B.

Whitemouth Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church is located 3 miles northwest of Elma, Man. In 1959 it had 45 members, with M. P. Barkman as minister. The congregation was first listed in the Yearbook (CGC) for 1950. M.G.

Whitewater, Kan., is located in Butler County southeast of the center of the state. Established in 1878, it had a population in 1957 of 510. In the town is found the Swiss Mennonite Church (GCM); three more churches (all GCM), Emmaus, Grace Hill (Gnadenberg), and Zion at Elbing, are within a ten-mile radius of Whitewater.

The first settlement of Mennonites in this area was made in the Grace Hill community in the winter of 1874-75, by Mennonites coming from Michalin (q.v.), Polish Russia. This church had a membership of 210 in 1957. The postal center of the community in 1875 was Sheldon, half a mile east and one mile south of the Grace Hill church. After a few years it ceased to exist. In 1876 a group from the Heubuden congregation in Prussia arrived, founding the Emmaus church, located southeast of Whitewater. In 1957 this church had a membership of 367. Seven miles north of Whitewater another group from Prussia organized a church in 1883. Later the Rock Island Railroad was built and the village here was called Elbing, after Elbing in Prussia. The Zion Mennonite Church in Elbing had a membership of 155 in 1957. Elbing became the location of Berean Academy, an independent Christian high school opened in September 1946. The Swiss Mennonite group settled in the area immediately north of Whitewater in 1883. Until 1953 the church was located north of Whitewater, but is now in the town. In 1957 it had a membership of 146. J.F.S.

Whitewater (Man.) Mennonite Church (GCM) was organized April 18, 1927, by Mennonite families from Russia who had settled in that community starting in 1924. The first elder was Franz F. Enns (q.v.), of Lena, Man., who had been elder of the Terek Mennonite Church in Russia. On June 16, 1938, the present elder, G. G. Neufeld, succeeded him.

In 1958 the congregation had 565 members and a total population of 1,209 in 257 families; it had six branch congregations: Whitewater 162, Rivers 96, Ninga 63, Lena 80, Crystal City 135, Manitou 29. Five of these groups have their own meetinghouses in which they worship every Sunday. Worship is conducted in German. All branches have Sunday school, choirs, youth groups, evangelistic services, and women's mission groups. There is an annual conference for the 24 ministers and deacons. The elder baptizes and observes the Lord's Supper four times annually with all groups. Footwashing has been dropped. G.G.N.

Wichita, county seat (pop. 250,000) of Sedgwick County, Kan., lies near the eastern end of the Great Bend Prairie, in the south-central section of Kansas, 25 miles south of Newton. Most of the strong Mennonite communities of central Kansas lie within shopping distance. There are two Mennonite Brethren churches (128 members), two Mennonite (MC) (one with 23 members, the other a Negro mission, not yet organized, but with church dedicated in 1959), and one General Conference Mennonite Church (410) within the area of Greater Wichita, with a total membership of 561. The Mennonites are scattered over all areas of the city and the suburban fringe outside the city limits. Wichita schools hire many Mennonite teachers. Some Mennonite students take graduate work at the University of Wichita. Nurses and doctors study and intern in the city's hospitals. Wealthy homes desire the domestic services of Mennonite girls. The varied industries, including the large airplane factories, offer employment for both men and women. G.S.S.

J. H. Langenwelter, "From Whence Came the Mennonites of Wichita"; G. S. Stoneback, "Mennonites of Wichita Live and Work"; Orlando Harms, "Mennonites of Wichita Worship"; all in Mennonite Life VIII (January 1953).

Wichita (Kan.) First Mennonite Brethren Church, a member of the Southern District Conference, had its beginning in 1942. A church at 1702 West Second Street was purchased and on May 16, 1943, the congregation was organized with 19 charter members, mainly from the M.B. and K.M.B. conferences. In 1958 the membership was 96. In addition to considerable renovating and remodeling of the church, a new parsonage was built in 1950. In 1958 plans were in progress for the construction of a church in another area of the city. Serving the church as pastors have been Estil Schale 1943-46, Orlando Harms 1946-53, George A. Vogt 1954-56, and Victor E. Becker, the pastor in 1958. O.H.A.

Wickersham Schoolhouse, located in West Donegal Twp., Lancaster Co., Pa., is a two-story brick building which was used as a union Sunday school with Mennonite personnel intermittently in 1892-1915; then most of the pupils were moved to Bossler's, a few miles away. In 1935 it was reopened as an outpost of Bossler's; in 1951 it was taken over by an independent group. I.D.L.

Wickrath, an imperial district on the Niers River, south of Rheydt, Rheinland, Germany. The baron of Quadt-Wickrath accepted in his domain the Mennonites who had been expelled from Holland in 1652. In September 1663 he received an imperial demand to "deliver the Anabaptists taken in by him who had been expelled from other territories, of whom there were about 50 in the Wickrath domain," in the space of three months, because "this forbidden sect was everywhere making inroads into the empire." At first this command was disregarded, but ten years later the Mennonites had to leave Wickrath. Most of them went to adjacent Rheydt, where until 1694 they enjoyed the protection of the barons of Rylandt-Rheydt and then were expelled by John William, the Palatine Elector. (ML IV.) W.N.

Wideman (Wiedemann, Widman), Jakob (d. 1535/6), an early Moravian Anabaptist leader, often called the "one-eyed Jakob," was born in Memmingen (q.v.), Swabia, and seems to have been converted to Anabaptism in 1527, probably in Augsburg. From here he went to Nikolsburg, where at that time the conflict between the Schwertler (q.v.) and Stäbler (q.v.) was becoming more and more acute. In 1528 Wideman separated from the Schwertler (the former Hubmaier group, now headed by Hans Spittelmaier, q.v., and supported by the lords of Liechtenstein), rallying, together with Philipp Jäger (or Weber, q.v.), the nonresistant Stäbler around him. When this group was no longer permitted to live on the Liechtenstein territory at Nikolsburg, the Brethren moved away in great poverty, not knowing where to turn. It was a group of about 200 adults and many children. In this predicament several men laid a cloak on the ground upon which everyone voluntarily put whatever he possessed of money or goods, in order to support the needy according to the teachings of the Book of Acts. Fortunately the manorial lords of Austerlitz (q.v.), viz., the four Kaunitz brothers, were willing to accept this group on their estates. Thus began the first fully communal Anabaptist settlement. Since they lived in Austerlitz, they became known all over the country as the "Austerlitz Brethren." Wideman was the Vorsteher (elder) of the group, which from now on grew steadily by new accessions from South Germany and Tirol. In 1531 another split took place; the Tiroleans under Jörg Zaunring (q.v.), a co-worker of Jakob Hutter, moved away to Auspitz, where they started their own communal Bruderhof, leaving Wideman with the Austerlitz group.

Unfortunately the Hutterite Chronicle shows little interest in the Austerlitz group and other sources are scanty. The Philippites (q.v.) also settled in Austerlitz on the same estate, but as a separate people under Plener. There were now four groups in Moravia living in community: in Austerlitz the Wideman group and the Philippites, the Gabrielites in Rossitz, and the Tiroleans (under Zaunring and later Schützinger) in Auspitz. Unfortunately they did not always live in brotherly peace. Jakob Hutter wrote in 1533: "I know these Austerlitzers very well, they do not walk according to the rule of Christ; nevertheless I believe that there are good, God-fearing people among them." When Ulrich Stadler (q.v.) came from Tirol to Moravia, he joined the Wideman group and remained with it until the hardship year of 1535. Whether or not Wideman was always their bishop cannot be stated with certainty. Beck (50) claims that in 1530-31 Wideman was in Strasbourg, then a center of Anabaptism, but was expelled from that city, and very likely returned to Austerlitz.

In 1535 King Ferdinand of Hapsburg ordered all the nobles to expel the Brethren from Moravian soil (see Moravia). The lords had to comply, and thus also the Austerlitz group was dispersed as the Philippites had been. Ulrich Stadler and his group went to Poland; others went back to Germany; Wideman, however, together with several Brethren, apparently went to Vienna in Austria. Here the group was caught, tortured, and eventually martyred (1535 or 1536). This we learn, almost incidentally, from a letter of Jeremy Käls (q.v.), himself a prisoner in Vienna and soon to be a martyr. In his cell he learned of the fate of his fellow believers, but gives no particulars. No writings and no hymns by Wideman seem to have been preserved. R.F.

Zieglschmid, Chronik; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 50; F. Roth, Augsburgs Reformationsgeschichte II (Munich, 1901) 232; ML IV.

Wideman Mennonite Church (MC), located 3 miles north of Markham, York Co., Ont., is named after its first minister, Henry Wideman (d. 1810), of Bucks County, Pa., who arrived in 1803, and across from whose homestead the first meetinghouse was erected c1812. The first log church was replaced by a brick structure c1857 and again in 1928 by a 38 x 65 ft. brick building. Among the early families were Hoovers, Stouffers, Reesors, and Sherks. The second minister, Martin Hoover, arrived in 1804. Bishop Abraham Grove (d. 1836), who had been ordained in Pennsylvania prior to coming to Markham, arrived in 1808. Jacob Grove (d. 1863), son of Abraham, was ordained minister in 1836 and bishop in 1837. Christian Reesor (d. 1915) was ordained bishop in 1887; he withdrew with the Old Order (Wisler) schism in 1889. Other ministers were Joseph Barkley (ord. 1864), S. R. Hoover (1888), L. W. Hoover (1914), A. L. Fretz (1920, moved to Rainham in 1931), A. D. Grove (1932), Elmer H. Burkholder (1947). Sunday school was begun c1876, closed in the eighties, permanently opened in 1892. Wideman's was the center and largest congregation of the York County settlement.

A substantial part of the congregation followed its bishop, Christian Reesor, into the Old Order (Wisler) movement in 1889 or soon thereafter. The Mennonite Brethren in Christ (q.v.) movement (1875 ff.) also drew away a number of members and led to the establishment of substantial M.B.C. congregations in Markham and Stouffville. In 1958 the congregation had 151 members, with Aaron Grove and Elmer Burkholder as ministers.

H.S.B.

Widemann, Michael (or Beck), an Anabaptist martyr, who was seized at Ried in Allgäu, Bavaria, Germany, with a group of followers in 1538. The others were released. When he was admonished to recant, he replied, "I have become converted once and have renounced all unrighteousness, and in this conversion I will persevere unto the end." After six months in prison he was beheaded and burned. (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 141; Mart. Mir. D 43, E 449; ML IV.)

NEFF.

Widertoufferen vrsprung (Der), jürgang, secten, wäsen, fürnemme vnd gemeine irer leer artickel, ouch ire gründ und warumb sy sich absünderind, vnnnd ein eigne kirchen anrichtind, mit widerlegung vnd antwort vff alle vnd yede ire gründ und artickel, sampt Christenlichem bericht vnd vermanen, dass sy ires irrthumbs vnd absünderens absündind, und sich mit der kirchen Christi vereinigind, abgeteilt in VI Bücher, und beschriben durch Heynrichen Bullingern dienern der kirchen zu Zürich. Was in disen Büchern gehandelt sye, wirst hienach in einem kurzen Register vff die Vorred finden. So ist zum end gethon der Töuffern Büchli, mit dem sy vrsach anzeigend, warumb sy nit zur kirchen gon wöllind (2nd ed., Zürich, 1561), pp. 28, 231. The last section mentioned in the title covers pp. 214-31, under the title Verantwortung etlicher die man Töuffer nennt, vff die fragen warumb sy nit zuo kirchen gangind, though the folio lines read Der Töufferen verantwortung lrer von der kirchen absünderung. This is the title of the second book against the Anabaptists by Heinrich Bullinger (q.v.), written between Nov. 24, 1559, and March 8, 1560, in print (first edition) in March 1560, introduction signed March 15. The history of its beginnings is a rather long one.

After the first book, Von dem unverschampten fräfel (q.v.), had been so great a success, Bullinger planned to write a new version dealing with the further development of the Anabaptist movement. He took the first step in 1542. For some years he had corresponded with the preacher Hermann Aquilomontanus in Oldersum, East Friesland (q.v.), who twice a year traveled to the book fair in Frankfurt and served as a messenger between North Germany and Switzerland. Urged by the North German friends Bullinger in 1542 wrote the Latin draft of a systematic refutation of Anabaptism entitled Contra anabaptistas consignata quaedam. It was never published; the manuscript lies in the Central Library in Zürich. It is not known why he discontinued the work for 17 years, but when he took it up again in 1559 his experiences, his interests, and the occasion, had changed. With great sorrow Bullinger saw the disunion between the Lutheran and the Zwinglian churches. Not only was it in his eyes un-Biblical, it was also politically a great disadvantage to the Reformation. Bullinger was particularly incensed by the Lutheran charge identifying the Swiss churches with the Anabaptists and calling them "Schwärmer" or sacramentists. Indefatigably he affirmed that the Zwinglian church had nothing to do with such "heresies," that it was orthodox and could never be looked upon as a sect. This was the purpose of his second book against the Anabaptists.

The volume has more than 500 pages and is divided into six "books" and an appendix. However, the following outline is more helpful. (A) The origins of Anabaptism in Saxony, and its rise and history in Switzerland to 1532 (f. 1-17a); (B) The Anabaptist groups—(1) the "general Anabaptists," and (2) the "special Anabaptists" (f. 17a-75); (C) The refutation of the "general Anabaptists" (f. 76-236); (D) Appendix, with comments on an Anabaptist tract on separation from the state church (f. 237-56; Verantwortung etlicher, die man Töuffer nennt).

Though parts (C) and (D) comprise most of the book they are the least important, because they are largely repetitive of his first book. The historical parts (A) and (B), however, are new and of great significance. Bullinger here claims that the origin of Anabaptism was due to the activity of Nicolaus Storch (q.v.) and Thomas Müntzer (q.v.) in Saxony (q.v.), and that Zürich Anabaptism was only an offspring of the Middle German radical movement. Its rise in Zürich was the result of some rebellious elements whom Zwingli had tried in vain to pacify. On this view and on many other historical details Bullinger was soon considered the authoritative witness, and, though he was not the first to advocate the theory mentioned, he was the most influential one.

Bullinger intended his historical portrayal of Anabaptism to prove the main thesis of the book, that the Zwinglian Reformation originally had nothing to do with Anabaptism. This very intent casts doubt on the historical construction. Bullinger's trustworthiness must be seriously called into question for another reason. He did not record the beginnings of Anabaptism as an eyewitness, although he had seen many things himself. Instead he rather uncritically depended on what other authors had written on the subject before him, deviating only where he could underline his main theory. In most cases not Bullinger, therefore, but his sources must be examined and evaluated. Where, however, firsthand sources contradict Bullinger's account neither he nor his predecessors can claim reliability. Such is the case with his theory on the dependence of Zürich Anabaptism on Müntzer.

The first edition of the book was sold within a few months. Bullinger himself sent it to 98 persons, of whom the most prominent were Duke Christoph of Württemberg, Elector Frederik III of the Palatinate, Prince Philipp of Hesse, King Maximilian II of Bohemia, and Queen Elizabeth of England. In his still extant letters of dedication he recommends the Swiss churches as being orthodox and peaceful followers of the Gospel and supporters of the magistracy. The second German edition appeared with hardly any alterations in January 1561. By August 1560 a Latin translation by Josias Simler had been printed in Zürich: H. Bullingeri adversus anabaptistas libri VI. . . . During the same year also a Dutch translation was begun; it did not, however, appear until 1569, in Emden (q.v.); Teghens de Wederdoopers, ses Boeckē Henrici Bullingeri. . . . The translator was Gerard Nicolai (q.v.), a Reformed preacher in Emden and Norden (q.v.), who also inserted valuable comments on the history of Anabaptism in the Netherlands and Northern Germany (see BRN VII, where Nicolai's Inlasschingen are reprinted). This translation was issued a second time in 1617 in Amsterdam. In 1665 the appendix appeared as a separate print at the same place. Plans even were made to translate the book into French, but nothing is known of such an edition.

H. S. Bender has made a careful study of Bullinger's deliberate and false reconstruction of the history of the origins of Anabaptism in Conrad Grebel (Goshen, 1950). H.F.

E. H. Correll, Das schweizerische Täufermennonitentum (Tübingen, 1925); A. Bucher, Die Reformation in den Freien Aemtern und in der Stadt Bremgarten (bis 1531), Supplement of the Jahresbericht der Kantonalen Lehranstalten Sarnen (1949/50 dissertation at the University of Freiburg, Switzerland, pp. 136-42, "Die Täufer in den Freien Aemtern"); H. S. Bender, "Die Zwickauer Propheten, Thomas Müntzer und die Täufer," Theol. Zeitschrift VIII (Basel, 1952) 262-78; H. Fast, Heinrich Bullinger und die Täufer, Ein Beitrag zur Historiographie und Theologie im 16. Jhdt. (Weierhof, 1959); J. H. Yoder, Täuferium und Reformation in der Schweiz I (Weierhof, 1959); W. A. Schulze, "Die Lehre Bullingers vom Zins," Archiv für Reformationsgeschichte XLVIII (1957) 225-29; ML I, 291-94.

Widholz, Endres (Andreas), an Anabaptist of Augsburg, Germany, was arrested in September 1527 and expelled from the city on Oct. 17, 1527, with Hans Langenmantel (q.v.), Hans Kiessling (q.v.), and Gall Fischer (q.v.). Widholz was a master in the guild of grocers. After his banishment his wife put their home at the disposal of the congregation for meetings. HEGE.

Fr. Roth, Augsburgs Reformationsgeschichte II (Augsburg, 1901) 229, 234; TA Württemberg; ML IV.

Widlingmaier, Anna (Stixanna), of Hohrain, Württemberg, wife of Michael Widlingmaier (Billinger), was an "obstinate Anabaptist" of Stauffen. After joining the group she was taught to read by a young boy. She was arrested several times. At her last examination, Sept. 23, 1597, she was charged with having been an Anabaptist 23 years, during which she had not attended (the established) church or communion, but instead had run to meetings in the woods. She had already been imprisoned and expelled from the country (1576), but had returned contrary to the strict prohibition to do so. Now she was 60 years old and had been blind for six years, and had misled two young girls to join her group. Johann Fabri argued with her for five hours, refuting 32 Anabaptist errors. She replied that she could of course not answer all those articles, but she would nevertheless not be converted to his opinion. She had made the covenant of a good conscience with God, and would abide by it even if she had to give her life. Her husband asked the magistrate to let her leave the country, but was refused. She died 10 days later, apparently in prison. (TA Württemberg; ML IV.) W.W.

Widmaris, Abdias, a Reformed clergyman (1591-1668), educated at the universities of Heidelberg and Marburg, was preacher at Altdorf near Speyer and Neuhausen near Worms, Germany. During the Thirty Years' War he found refuge in Holland. He preached at Uitgeest, Gouda, and taught in the universities of Harderwijk and Groningen. The records he kept in Uitgeest are of value to Anabaptist history, especially his information on discussions with the Mennonites and his account of the debate at Alkmaar in 1597. (DB 1907, 36-77; ML IV.) NEFF.

Widmer: see also Witmer.

Widmer, Christian, b. Dec. 24, 1796, the son of Hans Widmer (q.v.), is one of the genuine Mennonite patriarchs. He lived in Epiquez, Clos du Doubs, in the Bernese Jura, close to the French border. His wife was Verena Eicher of Buchholterberg (Emmental), married at Montbéliard on Sept. 25, 1821. The patriarchal figures of Christian Widmer and his wife, who with their ancient costumes and simplicity are a monument of a former time, represent the customs, the piety, and the industry of the old Mennonites. The numerous descendants of this Widmer family are now competent farmers in the region of Montbéliard and in Alsace. Several of these descendants have been successful preachers and elders. S.G.

Widmer, Hans, the son of Johann Jakob of Sumiswald in the Emmental, Switzerland, fled during the persecution of the 18th century to Voverence near Vaufrey, Doubs, in France. His wife was Katharina Graber of Huttwil. Hans Widmer was the progenitor of the widely ramified Mennonite Widmer families. Five sons and two daughters left numerous progeny, some of whom emigrated to America. His oldest son, Johannes, had 8 children; Peter 11, Christian 14, Daniel 13, and Jakob 8. Hans Widmer died at the age of 103. S.G.

Widmer, Joseph, a Mennonite preacher in the Emmental (q.v.), Switzerland, was seized in February 1649 in the territory of Signau, sent to Bern upon government order, and there placed in solitary confinement. On account of his advanced age, Widmer was soon released upon the promise to refrain from preaching and to attend church services regularly. The Signau magistrate was to keep a close watch over him. It has not yet been shown whether or not the Widmers who settled in France are descendants of this Joseph Widmer. (Bern Archives, Ratsmanual 1649, 102:119; 102:131; 102:210.) S.G.

Widow of Thomase de Schrijnwerckere, an Anabaptist martyr, was executed about 1538 at Utrecht, Netherlands, because of Anabaptism. Particulars are lacking. (Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 444; XIV, 16 f., No. 168.) vDZ.

Wiebe (Wieb), a Mennonite family name of Dutch origin derived from the Christian name Wiebe or Wiebke, which spread to Prussia, Poland, Russia, and America. In 1616 Adam Wiebe came to Danzig from Harlingen, Holland. The name was found in Tiegenhagen, Ladekopp, Rosenort, Fürstenwerder, Heubuden, Elbing, Neunhuben, and Königsberg. Horst Penner has written a detailed account of the early history of this family. According to Franz Crous the name Wiebe ranked second to Penner in frequency among the Prussian Mennonites (366 bearers) before World War II. Herbert Wiebe was the author of Das Siedlungswerk niederländischer Mennoniten im Weichseltal . . . (Marburg, 1952). The name was also very common in all the Mennonite settlements of Russia and is so today among the Mennonites of Canada, and United States, and South America. Dietrich Wiebe was a well-known bone-setter of Lichtfelde, Molotschna, Russia.

Who's Who Among the Mennonites (1943) listed 14 ministers by this name in the United States and Canada, among whom were D. V. Wiebe, K.M.B. minister and educator; Frank V. Wiebe, late pastor of the Gnadenau K.M.B. Church and missionary in China; Henry D. Wiebe, late M.B. pastor at Shafter, Cal.; J. F. D. Wiebe, late K.M.B. minister, Herbert, Sask., and John A. Wiebe, M.B. missionary in India. A. J. Wiebe was a pioneer G.C.M. minister at Paso Robles, Cal. Peter Wiebe is a bishop (MC) near Goshen, Ind.; Orlando Wiebe (EMB), a teacher at Grace Bible Institute; Arno Wiebe, an E.M.B. pastor at Dallas, Ore.; and H. P. Wiebe an E.M.B. pastor at Abbotsford, B.C. G.C.M. pastors include Abe Wiebe at Freeman, S.D., Willard Wiebe at Mt. Lake, Minn., and Ed Wiebe at Ringwood, Okla.; and M.B. pastors are J. J. Wiebe at Kelowna, B.C., W. J. Wiebe at Morden, Man., Anton Wiebe at Niverville, Man., H. G. Wiebe at Leamington, Ont., and J. P. Wiebe at Hepburn, Sask. In 1957 there were 40 active ministers in North America bearing the name, 23 in Canada and 17 in the United States distributed as follows: British Columbia 7, Saskatchewan 5, Manitoba 9, Ontario 2, California 8, Oregon 2, Kansas 2, and one each in Indiana, Oklahoma, Nebraska, Minnesota, and South Dakota. The M.B. conference had 24 ministers with this name, G.C.M. 7, E.M.B. 4, K.M.B. 1, M.C. 1, and C.G.C. 3. C.K.

Reimer, Familiennamen, 120; H. H. Schröder, Russlanddeutsche Friesen (Döllstädt, 1936) 99; Franz Crous, "Mennonitenfamilien in Zahlen," Gesch.-Bl. (August 1940) 41; A. A. Töws, Mennonitische Märtyrer I (N. Clearbrook, 1954) 86-89; Horst Penner, "Die Wiebes," Menn. Jahrbuch 1951 (Newton, 1951) 14-20.

Wiebe, Gerhard (1827-1900), elder of the Bergthal Mennonite Church (q.v.) in South Russia, was born July 25, 1827, in the village of Heuboden, one of the five comprising the Bergthal settlement (a daughter colony of Chortitz) in the Mariupol district of the province of Ekaterinoslav in the Ukraine. He was the oldest of the six children of Gerhard (1800-58) and Agatha Wiebe. On May 26, 1846, he was baptized. He married Elisabeth Dyck on June 12, 1847. Ten children were born to them. He became deacon in 1854, minister in 1861, and elder on March 29, 1866, which office he held until 1882.

Wiebe was a leader during the emigration of the entire Bergthal settlement to Manitoba in 1874-76 and played a significant role in negotiating permission for the emigration. He and his family came over in 1875, settling in the village of Chortitz in the East Reserve (q.v.) in Manitoba, where he lived until his death on May 5, 1900.

In his book Ursachen und Geschichte der Auswanderung der Mennoniten aus Russland nach Amerika (n.d.) Wiebe not only gives an account of the coming of the Bergthal group to Manitoba, but also presents the extremely conservative religious and cultural views of the Mennonites of his day. In minor details he was less conservative than his cousin Johann Wiebe (q.v.), elder of the Old Colony Mennonites (q.v.) of the West Reserve (q.v.), but basically the two men were of the same spirit. The traditional cultural patterns, such as the closed village community, the independent parochial village school, and the autonomy of the Mennonite communities, were as dear to him as to Johann Wiebe, although these disintegrated more rapidly among his followers than among the Old Colony Mennonites led by Johann Wiebe. His conservative attitude was noticeable when Johann K. Funk, who was more progressive, became leader of a group which favored among other things better education. This minority group is known to this day as the Bergthal Mennonite Church (q.v.), while the larger following of Gerhard Wiebe is known as the Chortitz and Sommerfeld Mennonite Church (q.v.). Gerhard Wiebe took a course between the extremely conservative Old Colony Mennonites, led by Johann Wiebe, and the more progressive Bergthal Mennonites.

T.E.F., C.K.

Wiebe, Henry Dietrich (1889-1949), educator, evangelist, pastor, and a leading worker of the Mennonite Brethren Church, the son of Dietrich and Elizabeth Heidebrecht Wiebe, was born at Hillsboro, Kan., Dec. 12, 1889. He was educated at the Hillsboro Academy, Tabor College, Teacher's College at Weatherford, Okla., and the University of Oklahoma, earning the degrees B.A., M.A., and Th.B., and later having the honorary degree of D.D. conferred upon him. During his student days Wiebe was converted and joined the M.B. Church. He married Gertrude Klaassen at Turnhill, Sask., Aug. 7, 1919. They had three sons and one daughter.

Wiebe taught the Hope Valley School near Hillsboro, Kan., 1914-18, served as principal and instructor at the M.B. Bible Academy, Corn, Okla., 1919-36, and as instructor of Bible and German at Tabor College, 1937-39. The M.B. Church ordained Wiebe to the ministry in 1917. Until 1936 he was a traveling evangelist much of the time and conducted many evangelistic meetings in all the district conferences of the M.B. Church.

The ministry of Wiebe included services as assistant pastor of the M.B. Church, Corn, Okla., minister of several community churches in southern Oklahoma, and pastorates at the M.B. churches at Shafter, Rosedale, and Lodi, Cal. In the Southern District Conference he served as moderator and as secretary of its Home Mission Committee. He was a member of the Board of Directors of Tabor College 1933-36. In the Pacific District Conference he was moderator 1940-42 and secretary of its Home Mission Board 1942-49, and for some time chairman of the Educational Board for Pacific Bible Institute. In the General Conference of the M.B. Church he filled the post of moderator in 1945-48. Wiebe died at his home in Reedley, Cal., July 10, 1949. J.H.L.

Wiebe, Jakob (d. 1880), an educator and elder, brother of Philipp Wiebe (q.v.), was a teacher of the Halbstadt Zentralschule of Molotschna, Russia, and became the first elder of the Karassan Mennonite Church (q.v.) when the church was organized in 1862. Little is known about his life and work, with the exception of a letter which he wrote to Johann Wiebe (q.v.) of Alexandertal concerning the non-resistance and migration of the Mennonites to America (dated Feb. 27, 1876). He rejected the reasons given for the migration, claiming that Russia was giving full guarantees to those who wanted to maintain the doctrine of nonresistance and that it was the duty of Mennonites to stay in Russia and make a positive contribution. "We are supposed to be the salt of the earth and Russia is a part of this earth where the salt is needed as much as anywhere else." He charged that although the original motive for the migration to America was religious, the reasons now were the relatives, luring mountains of gold, curiosity, and the fear that the sons would have to serve in some form; many were going to America who had absolutely no concept of non-resistance or true Christianity. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 511-13, 599, 709.) C.K.

Wiebe, Jakob Abram (1836-1921), a cofounder of the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church, was born Aug. 6, 1836, in Margenau, South Russia, the oldest of the eight children of Jacob and Anna Wiebe, who were Mennonite immigrants from Prussia. Through private study he acquired a practical education. In his early youth he was employed as driver for the Oberschulze and thus came in contact with the leading persons of the settlement and learned to draw conclusions and make his own decisions. This was the beginning of the reforms he later instituted.

Wiebe was baptized on Pentecost of 1856 and became a member of the Lichtenau Mennonite Church at Petershagen. On April 11, 1857, he married Justina Friesen (d. 1916) from Halbstadt, and bought a small farm with an oil press in Orloff. In 1861 he moved to the Crimea, a new Mennonite settlement, and founded a home in the village of Annenfeld. Serious disappointments and even failures met them; but with courage, economy, and hard work they overcame them. In 1864 both joined the Kleine Gemeinde, the most conservative Mennonite group. On Dec. 4, 1867, he was elected minister of this church and on Easter Day of 1869 he was ordained elder. But since even in this group he was unable to carry out the reforms he considered fundamental to Christian living, he with twelve others withdrew from the Kleine Gemeinde on Sept. 21, 1869, and organized the "Krimmer Mennoniten-Brüdergemeinde" (Crimean Mennonite Brethren Church), baptizing by immersion, kneeling and dipping forward. Their aim was to live a fuller, more consecrated Christian life. A change in the Russian military law persuaded them to emigrate to America, and this group, about 40 families, found a new home in Marion County, Kan., under Jacob A. Wiebe's leadership, arriving there on Aug. 17, 1874. They settled in a village which they named "Gnadenau," and which became one of the first rural districts of European Mennonites in Kansas.

In spiritual difficulties Wiebe proved a dependable leader. He had acquired the art of setting broken bones and sprains; this was a special boon in a country where doctors were scarce. Both the new church and the village prospered and in a few years a church was built as a home center while groups were organized in the neighboring counties and states. On Sept. 10, 1900, he ordained his younger brother Heinrich Wiebe as elder in his place and retired for reasons of health, having served a total of 34 years. He died June 23, 1921, at Hillsboro, and is buried in the Gnadenau cemetery. His character was deeply religious. He was confident of the correctness of his organizing the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church; he was a Mennonite to the innermost part of his heart. He was not a Calvinist, nor a millennialist; he was thoroughly saturated with principles of Menno Simons, even to the extreme. His private and family life was ideal and he had many friends. His death marked the passing of a departing age and the opening of a new era for the K.M.B. Church. J.Z.W.

P. A. Wiebe, Kurze Biographie des Bruders Jakob A. Wiebe, seine Jugend, seine Bekehrung, & wie die Krimmer Mennoniten Brüdergemeinde gegründet wurde (n.p., 1924).

Wiebe, Jakob Abram (1853-1907), an elder of the Kronsweide Mennonite Church near Chortitza, South Russia, was born Aug. 14, 1853, at Einlage, Chortitza Mennonite settlement, the oldest of the six children of Abram Heinrich and Margarete Epp Wiebe. In 1877 he married Elizabeth Janzen. Three of his twelve children are still living. One of his sons was a teacher in the Nikolai Zentralschule at Yazykovo (q.v.), and another was a Mennonite minister. He received his education at the Zentralschule and Teacher's Seminary at Chortitza, and then taught school for 28 years. He was ordained minister of the Kronsweide Mennonite Church in 1881, and elder in 1902. He lived in Kronsweide 1875-80, Bergmannsthal 1880-1905, and Einlage 1905-7. J. A. Wiebe died Jan. 5, 1907, at Einlage, in the Chortitza settlement. (A biographical sketch in Mennonitisches Jahrbuch, Berdyansk, 1908.) H.J.W.

Wiebe, Johann (1766-1823), the second elder of the Mennonite church in the Chortitza settlement in South Russia, had been chosen as coelder in 1791 to serve with Gerhard Penner (q.v.) during the first year of the settlement, but had declined because he felt himself too young (he was only twenty-five years of age) and too inexperienced. But soon after, when Penner died, he accepted the office, the church having given him an assistant elder in David Epp (b. 1748). He was sent to Prussia to get some help in 1794 and brought Cornelius Warquentin (q.v.) and Cornelius Regier (q.v.) along to set the church life in the Chortitza settlement in order. Warkentin confirmed both Wiebe and Epp in their office in 1794 and succeeded in establishing peace in the congregation. Epp died in 1802. He was succeeded by the following elders who served as assistants to Wiebe: Bernhard Bergen, chosen 1806, d. 1809, and Jakob Dyck, chosen 1812, d. 1823. In 1805 Wiebe made a trip to the Molotschna to settle some difficulties, where he ordained Jakob Enns (q.v.) of Tiegenhagen elder. He died March 31, 1823. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 74, 107, 135, 699.) B.J.S., C.K.

Wiebe, Johann (1837-1906), an elder of the Fürstenland Mennonite Church (q.v.), Russia, and promoter of the Mennonite migration to America. He was born March 23, 1837, in the Fürstenland settlement and married Judith Wall on Dec. 4, 1856. He was ordained minister in 1865 and elder 1870. He left Russia in 1875 with 1,100 Mennonites, some of them preceding and some following him, to settle in the West Reserve (q.v.), Man.; they were followed by Mennonites coming from the Chortitza (q.v.) and Bergthal (q.v.) settlements under the leadership of his cousin, Elder Gerhard Wiebe (q.v.), who settled in the East Reserve (q.v.). Soon some Mennonites of the East Reserve crossed the Red River and joined those on the West Reserve, introducing some new patterns of culture and economic and religious life to which Johann Wiebe objected more than any of his coministers.

Before the migration of the Mennonites to Manitoba some progressive communities, including Fürstenland, had introduced the use of the Choralbuch (q.v.) to improve the singing. Bergthal (q.v.) had not done so. In Manitoba Johann Wiebe returned to the traditional singing, discarding the Choralbuch, which is typical of the Old Colony Mennonites to this day, while Gerhard Wiebe, the elder of the Bergthal group, introduced the Choralbuch in Manitoba and thus broke away from the traditional singing.

On Oct. 5, 1880, a "Brüderschaft" (q.v.) called by Elder Johann Wiebe of the Reinland or Old Colony Mennonite Church decided that those who were willing to adhere to the traditional principles and practices of the church should renew their membership. Those who refused were not considered members. This was the official parting of the ways between the Old Colony Mennonites under the leadership of Johann Wiebe and the Bergthal Mennonites under the leadership of Johann K. Funk. When Johann Wiebe died he was succeeded as elder by Johann Friesen, under whom a large number of the Old Colony Mennonites of Manitoba and Saskatchewan migrated to Mexico (q.v.) in 1922-26.

Johann Wiebe possibly did more than anyone else to develop and maintain the consistently conservative attitude which characterizes the Old Colony Mennonites today. He died in the village of Rosengart, Man., on Feb. 21, 1906. During his service he preached 1,544 times and baptized 2,228 persons. He wrote a short account of the emigration of his congregation from Russia to Canada, Unsere Reise von Russland nach Amerika aufgezeichnet, published in Blumenthal, Hague, Sask.

(n.d.) (10 pp.). (See Old Colony Mennonites, Bergthal Mennonite Church, and Manitoba.) C.K.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 700; G. Wiebe, Ursachen und Geschichte der Anwanderung der Mennoniten aus Russland nach Amerika (n.p., n.d.).

Wiebe, Johann, of the Alexandertal Mennonite Church (q.v.), Samara, Russia, was ordained minister in 1873 and elder 1874. In 1876 he corresponded with Jakob Wiebe (q.v.), elder of the Karassan Mennonite Church (q.v.), Crimea, regarding nonresistance, alternative service, and the migration to America. Jakob Wiebe was strongly opposed to the latter and likely influenced Johann Wiebe. After the Mennonite Brethren Church had been transplanted to Alexandertal, Wiebe aimed to introduce some of its practices in his congregation. In 1897 he joined the local Mariental M.B. Church (q.v.) and became the elder of this small group. He was still serving in 1910. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 480, 719 f.) C.K.

Wiebe, Peter A. (1847-1926), a Krimmer Mennonite Brethren minister and elder, was born at Margenau, South Russia, Nov. 27, 1847, the sixth son of Jacob Wiebe and Anna Wiens Wiebe, and the brother of Jacob A. Wiebe, K.M.B. founder. He married Sarah Voth on March 20, 1870, to which union were born eleven children. Immigrating to Kansas in the fall of 1874, they settled at Springfield, near Lehigh, in 1875. They were baptized April 21, 1878, and joined the Gnadenau K.M.B. Church near Hillsboro, Kan. He was elected deacon in 1884, minister in 1891, and elder in 1912. He was a pioneer in Sunday-school work in his church; he served as board member and chairman of the Home for the Friendless, as chairman of the Bethesda Hospital board, as board member of the Salem Home and Hospital, and as executive board member of the K.M.B. Conference and as a member of various conference committees. From 1892 to 1909 he engaged in evangelistic work in Nebraska, South Dakota, California, and Canada, and was deeply interested in home and foreign missionary work. He was a successful farmer; in 1904 he was awarded a Gold Medal by the St. Louis World Fair for Turkey Red wheat raised on his farm.

Peter A. Wiebe was the author of numerous articles on nonresistance. His autobiography was published in 1921 in the Genealogy Record of the Groening and Wiebe Families. In 1924 he wrote A Brief Biography of Jacob A. Wiebe and the Organization of the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church, and in 1925 The Way to Eternal Life.

Wiebe died June 26, 1926, at Hillsboro and is interred at the Springfield cemetery. His biography was published in 1955 as a booklet, My Parents.

D.V.W.

Wiebe, Philipp (d. 1870), chairman of the Agricultural Association (q.v.) of the Molotschna Mennonite settlement, made a significant contribution as a successor of Johann Cornies (q.v.). With this office he inherited the supervision of the agricultural or economic and the cultural or educational aspects of the settlement, including the many religious problems of the time. When Cornies died in 1848, Wiebe continued to promote a higher level of education, regular attendance at school, higher salaries for teachers, better school buildings, and regular teachers' conferences. The school age was determined to be from six to fourteen, and teachers' conferences became obligatory in 1850. Because of ill health, he had to resign as chairman of the Agricultural Association. In 1869 he became the first chairman of the "Molotschnaer Mennonitischer Schulrat" (q.v.). In 1870 he died.

Wiebe, as a son-in-law of Johann Cornies, inherited some of his large estates, Yushanlee and a part of Tashchenak. He acquired an estate north of the Sea of Azov from a certain Kampenhausen. He had to cope with the general problems of land distribution to the landless (q.v.) and the founding of new groups such as the Mennonite Brethren and the Templers (q.v.). His son, Johann Philipp Wiebe, born Oct. 14, 1849, continued in the footsteps of his father and grandfather; he married the sister of Bernhard Warkentin (q.v.) in 1871 and became instrumental in the transplanting of hard winter wheat from his estates to the prairies of Kansas. C.K.

H. Götz, Die Molotschnaer Ansiedlung (Steinbach, 1950) 101; Friesen, Brüderschaft, 644 f.; Nikolai Regehr, Johann Philipp Wiebe (Steinbach, 1952) 42 ff.; Franz Isaac, Die Molotschnaer Mennoniten (Halbstadt, 1908) 33-35, 145 ff.

Wied, Herman von (1477-1552), was the Catholic Archbishop and Elector of Cologne, Germany, in 1532-46. By his favorable inclination toward the Reformation he differed from other Catholic bishops, opposed the general practice of the Catholic church and the policy of Emperor Charles V (q.v.), and refused to suppress the Lutherans in his bishopric. In general he rejected capital punishment for heretics. In 1542 he called Martin Bucer (q.v.) to his court to reform the bishopric. Because of his tolerance it was possible for Menno Simons to live undisturbed in the bishopric of Cologne from July 1544 until 1546, when von Wied was dismissed. Menno gives him a good testimonial. His brother Friedrich von Wied was about the same time the bishop of Münster (q.v.). (Menno Simons, Opera, 235a; Writings, 635.) vöZ.

Wieder, F. C., librarian of the Dutch Royal Library at The Hague, is the author of De Schrijftuurlijke Liedekens (The Hague, 1900), which gives a thorough account of 16th-century Dutch hymnbooks, including all Mennonite hymnals. vöZ.

Wiedertäufer: see Wederdo(o)pers and Anabaptist.

Wiedertäufer Ordnung (Anabaptist Regulation), issued Feb. 27, 1695, by the cantonal government of Bern, Switzerland, after previous regulations had failed to eliminate the Swiss Brethren. The government was determined "with God's aid and support to uproot this weed from our lands." The Ordnung decreed that Swiss Brethren who returned after being banished should be forged to chains in Bern. For any preacher delivered to the authorities a reward of 100 talers was offered. A fine of 50 pounds was imposed upon any who employed a servant or rented any land to anyone who did not have a certificate from his home community showing that he was an honorable and obedient citizen. Since the women were not included in the required oath of loyalty, an annual inspection should be made in the homes and a written account kept of all the members of each family, "whether they attend the sermons, children's instruction and instruction of the old, and also whether they attend the holy sacraments fittingly and zealously, and have their children baptized at the right time or not at all. . . . But the very aged feeble women, if temporary admonition and warning do not take effect, shall be taken hither to our island to the place prepared, and kept in eternal prison at their own expense, and not released until they promise obedience. . . . We will have the imprisonment so arranged that nobody can speak to them or free them."

The embittered government continued its persecution beyond life itself. The regulation stipulated: since these people hesitated to attend church with the other subjects and deliberately separated themselves, "we will have them excluded from the church and ordain herewith: That no men or women in this land dying in this error and obstinacy shall be buried in a cemetery or other usual burial place." In Kurzenei near Wasen there is a hidden place called the "Täuferloch," where the Anabaptists met and buried their dead in the period of persecution.

The ordinance was to be read from all the pulpits on Sunday, March 10. On March 28, 1695, all officials received a supplementary order to send in an exact list of those who absented themselves from the Easter communion service. S.G.

The library of the university and city of Bern, Alte Drucke, No. 139: State archives of Bern, Mandatenbuch 10, pp. 130, 141, 144, 164; see also "Mandates"; ML IV.

Wiehler (Wieler, Willer), a family name found among the Mennonites of Danzig and Prussia. It appeared in Orlofffeld (1601), Elbing, Tiegengagen, Ladekopp, Rosenort, Heubuden, Königsberg, and Danzig (1718). Before World War II there were 120 representatives of the name in West Prussia. The name spread to Russia and North and South America. Johann Wieler (q.v.) and Gerhard Wieler (q.v.) were among the founders of the Mennonite Brethren Church in Russia; Johann J. Wieler was a teacher of the Halbstadt Zentralschule; Johann J. Wieler, of Winnipeg and Saskatoon, was a special representative of the Department of Colonization and Agriculture of the Canadian National Railways and helped many Mennonite and other immigrants after both world wars. C.K.

Reimer, Familiennamen, 120; H. H. Schroeder, Russlanddeutsche Friesen (Döllstadt-Langensalza, 1936) 99; Franz Crous, "Mennonitische Familien in Zahlen," Gesch.-Bl. (August 1940) 41.

Wieler, Gerhard, an early lay leader in the Mennonite Brethren Church in Russia, an older brother of Johann Wieler (q.v.), was born in Choritzza, South Russia, a son of J. Wieler. He and his brother had the best formal training of the group and mastered the Russian language as well as German (Friesen, 236). He was active in St. Petersburg for some time, seeking to obtain recognition of the newly founded M.B. Church. For a while he was a teacher in Liebenau, Molotschna, but lost his position in 1861 because of his views. Because he baptized some native Russians he was imprisoned. After his release he returned to the Einlage M.B. Church, promoting extreme views. He and others promoted the expression of joy in the newly found faith and peace by means of shouting, jumping, and the use of various musical instruments. He was opposed to the use of pictures and the printed devotional aids in use at that time by the Mennonites, written by Hofacker, Arndt, and others. Benjamin Bekker (q.v.) of the Molotschna settlement supported these views for a while. Wieler and Bekker as "apostles" used the ban arbitrarily, excommunicating even Wieler's father and brother. Gradually, as the more disciplined and saner element gained the upper hand, Wieler's and Bekker's influence waned. In 1867 Gerhard Wieler is supposed to have returned to the Mennonite Church of Chortitza and later gone to North America, where he became a member of the United Brethren in Christ. Unfortunately all reports about him have come from his opponents and he has left no records to justify his actions. C.K.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 209, 233, 236, 245 f., 267 f., 280, 315, 320, 332, 337, 344, 349 f., 355, 360 f., 368, 371, 375, 378.

Wieler, Johann (1839-89), a Mennonite Brethren evangelist, was born Nov. 22, 1839, in Chortitza, South Russia, the son of a teacher, Johann Wieler. He pursued a vigorous course of studies, thus qualifying himself as a teacher, and was particularly interested in the Russian language. He taught in the secondary school in Halbstadt. As a young man he was converted and joined the M.B. Church; as a minister he showed particular gifts for evangelistic work. He was deeply interested in evangelizing the Russians and even proposed to the M.B. Conference that it engage in missionary activities in this field in spite of the fact that such work was strictly prohibited by the Russian government. When the M.B. Conference rejected his proposal, he launched out on his own. This course brought him under suspicion with government officials, and when he baptized a Russian woman he was forced to flee, and remained in seclusion for some time. He finally emigrated to Germany, where he joined the Baptists. His family followed. He was, however, soon ordered to leave Germany and thus came to Roumania, where he ministered in a Russian Baptist Church in the town of Tultcha for approximately two years. When a new church building was under construction, he fell from a ladder and thus received fatal injuries; he died in 1889 at the age of 50. J.J.T.

Waldemar Gutsche, Westliche Quellen des russischen Stundismus. Anfänger der evangelischen Bewegung in Russland (Kassel, 1956); A. H. Unruh, Die Geschichte der Mennoniten-Brudergemeinde 1860-1954 (Hillsboro, 1954).

Wieling, Sjoerd Ebeles, b. 1772 at Drachten, d. 1835 at Zaandam, a Dutch Mennonite pastor, was educated at the Amsterdam Seminary and served the congregations of Oldeboorn (Nieuwe Huis) 1805-8, Midwolda-Beerta 1808-22, and Zaandam-Oost 1822-35. He was a curator of the Amsterdam Seminary 1825-35. On April 4, 1819, he preached the dedicatory sermon in the new Mensingeweer (q.v.) meetinghouse, which as Inwijding was published (Groningen, 1819). Another publication of his is a sermon Opwekking (Zaandam, 1825), preached at Zaandam after the disastrous flood of February 1825.

His brother Foppe Ebeles Wieling, d. 1871, a lay preacher, served the small congregation at Huizinge 1815-28 and the one at Surhuisterveen 1828-57. (N.N.B.Wb. X, 1202 f.) vdZ.

Wielmacker, John, an Anabaptist martyr: see Jan Pietersz.

Wiens (Wienss, Wientz, Winantz, Wynes), a family name likely of Dutch origin found among the Mennonites of Danzig and Prussia as early as 1568. The name occurred in Tiegenhagen, Ladekopp, Rosenort, Fürstenwerder, Heubuden, and Danzig (1607). Before World War II the name ranked third among the Mennonites of Prussia, having 355 representatives. Peter Wiens was director of the Halbstadt School of Commerce in Russia; Kornelius A. Wiens was teacher of the Halbstadt Zentralschule and suffered under Soviet persecution; P. G. Wiens was a missionary in India; Jacob W. Wiens was the elder of the Ebenfeld Mennonite Church (GCM) in Saskatchewan; F. B. Wiens (GCM) was an educator in Russia and his son Jacob B. Wiens is the elder of the First United Mennonite (GCM) Church of Vancouver. C.K.

Reimer, Familiennamen, 120; H. H. Schroeder, Russlanddeutsche Friesen (Döllstadt-Langensalza, 1936) 99; Franz Crous, "Mennonitische Familien in Zahlen," Gesch.-Bl. (August 1940) 41.

Wiens, Cornelius Abraham, an elder of the Kuban Mennonite Brethren Church (q.v.), a teacher, was ordained minister in 1895. In 1905 he was ordained elder by David Schellenberg. C.K.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 457 ff.; D. H. Epp, Adressbuchein (Berdyansk, 1913) 11.

Wiens, Franz (1810-53), an elder in the Chortitza Mennonite Church in South Russia, a preacher from 1843, coelder with Jakob Dyck from 1851, died Nov. 16, 1853. Dyck survived him by one year. B.J.S.

Wiens, Franz J. (1880-1942), an evangelist and foreign missionary of the Mennonite Brethren Church, son of Jacob and Maria (Friesen) Wiens, was born on a farm near Henderson, Nebr., on June 30, 1880. Converted at an early age, he joined the Henderson M.B. Church through baptism. Feeling a call to foreign mission work, Wiens studied at the following schools: the German Department School of the M.B. Church at McPherson, Kan.; McPherson College at McPherson, Kan.; York (Neb.) College; and the German Baptist Theological Seminary, Rochester, N.Y., where he was graduated in 1906. He later received the A.B. degree from Tabor College, Hillsboro, Kan.

In 1902 he married Agnes Harder. To them five children were born. In 1906-9 Wiens was employed as evangelist by the M.B. Conference. In 1910 he was ordained as a missionary and left for China, stopping in Russia for several months, where he conducted remarkable revival meetings in Mennonite circles. Upon arrival in South China in 1911 he spent some time at Swatow studying the Chinese language. The Wienses then proceeded about 200 miles inland and opened a mission among the Hakkas at Shanghang, Fukien Province. They erected the required buildings, made extensive tours into the field, opened a school for children, established a Bible school for training indigenous workers, and began a hospital. Several Chinese churches were established in the surrounding territory.

In 1919 the M.B. General Conference took over the support and supervision of this mission, and sent new missionaries. The work expanded remarkably in spite of civil war and revolutions. At times the missionaries were in great danger and on one occasion had to flee to the coast. The mission station was destroyed during their absence, but the work continued. Mrs. Wiens died in China in 1935. Some time later Wiens married Agnes Koop. In the summer of 1940 they returned to America, making their home at Reedley, Cal. Wiens wrote many reports for his church paper, the Zionsbote. His two longer publications are Pionierarbeit unter den Hakkas in Süd-China and Fifteen Years Among the Hakkas of South China. He died in Reedley, on Sept. 28, 1942, and was buried in the local cemetery. J.H.L.

Wiens, Heinrich, was elected minister of the Ohrloff Mennonite Church, Molotschna, South Russia, in 1825 and became elder of the Margenau-Landskrone church (q.v.) in 1842. He was deprived of his office in 1846 and expelled from the country because of differences he had with Johann Cornies (q.v.) and the Fürsorgekomitee (q.v.). His case was similar to that of Jakob Warkentin (q.v.). Both cases are illustrations of the problems that can confront a Mennonite community when its civil and religious authorities feel that one is interfering with the duties of the other. This case has been dealt with at length by P. M. Friesen, Franz Isaac, and others. A unique side line is that Wiens became the martyr hero for the conservative Mennonites, who published his account in Manitoba, whence it was taken to Mexico and there is cherished as an item of classic martyr literature.

After Wiens's exile had been announced he wrote a farewell sermon which was read to the congregation. He went to Prussia in 1847 and later returned to Russia where he lived as private citizen unmolested, preaching only on special occasions such as funerals. C.K.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 76; Ein Abschied und Bericht wie es in der Molotschnerkolonie in d. früh. Jahre zugegangen ist, und wie die Vorgesetzten den ehr. Aeltesten Heinrich Wiens von Gnadenheim aus dem Lande verwiesen haben. Seine Rückkehr nebst Beschreibung der ganzen Reise (Manitoba, 1903).

Wiens, Jakob B., b. Oct. 1870, Crimea, Russia; d. May 22, 1939, Saskatoon, Sask. He received his education at Rückenau and the Zentralschule of Halbstadt and was a teacher at Tigerweide, Molotschna Mennonite settlement, South Russia. He taught for twenty years. On May 23, 1893, he married Helena Wiens; in 1901 he was elected minister; and in 1911 he succeeded Abram Görs as elder of Orloff-Neukirch Mennonite Church. In 1924 he left Russia and arrived at Waterloo, Ont., on Aug. 16, proceeded to Herschel, Sask., and there founded the Ebenfeld Mennonite Church (GCM). He served also in the surrounding communities of Luseland, Superb, and Kindersley-Glydden, which were subsidiaries of the Ebenfeld church. C.K.

J. G. Rempel, Fünfzig Jahre Konferenzbestrebungen 1902-1952 I (Steinbach, n.d.) 198.

Wiens, Kornelius Abraham, a teacher, graduated from the Ohrloff (q.v.) Zentralschule and the Halbstadt Normal School and was for a number of years an elementary teacher in the Molotschna settlement, Russia. He attended the Theological Seminary (Predigerschule) at Basel and taught Bible and German at the Halbstadt Mädchenschule. In 1907 he became teacher of the Halbstadt Zentralschule where he was also elected minister of the Halbstadt Mennonite Church. He is likely the coauthor of Biblische Geschichten für mennonitische Elementarschulen (Halbstadt, 1902), prepared by K. Unruh, W. Neufeld, and K. Wiens. He received a medal from the Russian government in recognition of his educational achievements. C.K.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 604, 626; H. Görs, Die Molotschnaer Ansiedlung (Steinbach, 1951) 165.

Wiens, Peter Johann, a teacher, educated at the Gnadenfeld Zentralschule (Molotschna, Russia) and the universities of Kharkov and Dorpat, where he studied mathematics. After this he taught at the Ohrloff Zentralschule for three years. In 1909 he became the director of the Halbstadt Kommerzschnule (q.v.). (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 595, 628.) C.K.

Wieringen: see Hippolytushoef.

Wieringermeer, a Dutch polder reclaimed in 1936 in the former Zuiderzee (now IJssel Lake). At first the pastor of Hippolytushoef (q.v.) was in charge of the Mennonites living on this polder, who organized into an independent congregation on Oct. 18, 1942, served by the pastor of Twisk (q.v.). In 1958 the baptized membership numbered 52. vZ.

Wieringerwaard, an old polder reclaimed in 1610 in the Dutch province of North Holland; the Mennonites living here did not form a congregation but belonged to the Barsingerhorn (q.v.) Waterlander congregation. They, however, had a meetinghouse of their own in the hamlet of Kreil, which was renovated in 1859 and used until 1923. Wieringerwaard is sometimes inaccurately called Nieuwe Zijpe. (DB 1861, 156 f.) vZ.

Wiersema, a Mennonite family found in the Dutch province of Groningen since the 17th century. Luitjen Olferts (Wiersema, or Wiersum), d. 1784 at Eenrum, was a lay preacher of the Rasquert (Baflo) congregation 1757-84. Enno Wiersema (c1720-85), who was trained for the ministry by one of the ministers in the town of Groningen, served 1744-45 at Ouddorp and 1745-85 at Winterswijk, also taking charge of the Zutphen congregation, whose pulpit was mostly vacant. He was married in 1747 to Magtelt Waliën of Winterswijk. At present there are still a number of Wiersemas in the province of Groningen. vdZ.

Wiersma, common family name in Friesland. Mennonite families by this name furnished deacons in the congregations of Holwerd-Blija, Ternaard, Ytens, and Hindeloopen. vdZ.

Wiersum, an old Mennonite family in the Dutch province of Groningen, which is derived from the same ancestor as the Wiersema (q.v.) family. Until recent times the Wiersums were nearly all farmers, and often deacons of the Mennonite church. Eppe (Tonnisz) Wiersum (Uithuizen 1869-Rotterdam 1955) was city archivist of Rotterdam from 1904. He did not join the church, but was much interested in Mennonite history. In the Rotterdamsch Jaarboekje of 1910 he published a paper on Jan Bisschop (q.v.). He rendered a real service to the Rotterdam Mennonite congregation by arranging and describing its rich archives (printed catalogue). An address by Wiersum, "De Doopsgezinde Gemeente in het Rotterdam van omstreks 1775," was published in Na Hondertvijftig Jaar (Rotterdam, 1925). vdZ.

Wierum, a small village in the northeast of the Dutch province of Friesland, where Jacob Teunis, elder of the Jan-Jacobszgezinden (q.v.), baptized at least 34 persons in 1603-18, was probably the seat of a Jan-Jacobszgezinde congregation, concerning which there is, however, no further information. (Blaupt t. C., Friesland, 164.) vdZ.

Wiesenfeld, a common Mennonite village name. The first village by this name was Wiesenfeld established in 1880 near Pavlograd, Ukraine. From here the name was transplanted to Slavgorod (Barnaul), Siberia; Cuauhtemoc, Mexico; and Fernheim, Paraguay. (See Villages.) C.K.

Wiesenfeld Mennonite Brethren Church. The village of Wiesenfeld, about 10 miles from the railroad station of Zaitsevo, Pavlograd (q.v.) district of the province of Ekaterinoslav, South Russia, was founded by members of the Gnadenfeld M.B. Church in the Molotschna settlement, most of them from the Andreasfeld area, and the church became an affiliate of the Gnadenfeld church. When the Einlage M.B. Church became better established and more members arrived from this church, the congregation here affiliated itself with Einlage. The first minister of this group was Peter Friesen, a blacksmith and bonesetter. Later Jacob D. Reimer and Cornelius Reimer served as ministers. The congregation had at one time 107 members. Because of a misunderstanding the church was closed for some time during World War I, but the right of public worship was later reinstated. In 1919 during the Revolution the entire village was destroyed by Machno bands and the church ceased to exist. Its last minister was Cornelius Reimer, the father of Jacob Reimer of Sardis, B.C. P.H.B.

Wife of Jan (Hans) Collen, an Anabaptist martyr, executed at Antwerp, Belgium, in 1559, exact date unknown, probably in May of that year. (Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 470; XIV, 26 f., No. 290.) vdZ.

Wijbrandi: see Wybrandi.

Wijbrands: see Wybrands.

Wijbrands(z), Reinier: see Wybma, R. W.

Wijnalda: see Wynalda.

Wijnands (Wynands, Wynants, Wynanz), a family name formerly rather common in the Netherlands. Mennonite branches, some of which could not be traced back to a common ancestor, formerly lived at Haarlem, Rotterdam, Utrecht, Harlingen, and other places. A Wynands Mennonite family living at Hamburg, Germany, from the 17th century was of Dutch descent. At Haarlem some Wijnands were deacons in the 17th-19th centuries, in Rotterdam in the 19th century. There have also been some Mennonite ministers by this name. Jan Wynants, b. c1596, was a preacher(?) of the Haarlem Flemish congregation in the early 17th century. Willem Wynands (q.v., 1630-58) was a preacher at Hamburg-Altona.

Abraham Wynands, b. Dec. 1703, at Altona, d. there Aug. 29, 1790, was a preacher from 1727, and an elder c1750 of the Hamburg-Altona congregation. He had been trained for the ministry by Abraham Verduin (q.v.), pastor of Koog aan de Zaan. Gerrit Karsdorp (q.v.) published a funeral sermon on his death, Stand- en Gedagtenis-Rede over Abr. Wynands (Altona, 1790).

Another Abraham Wijnands, of Harlingen in Friesland, was trained for the ministry 1767-72 at the Amsterdam Lamist seminary. He served as pastor at Middelburg 1773-77 and Utrecht 1777-83, in which year he retired. His farewell sermon, Leerreden, waarin de Godsdienst wordt aangeprezen, was published at Haarlem, 1785.

Wijnand Peters Wijnands (Winands, Wynantz), d. 1777 at Crefeld, Germany, was the last unsalaried preacher of the Crefeld (q.v.) Mennonite church, serving 1729-73, in which year he retired. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 1584-86; II, 2, Nos. 78, 80; Naamlijst 1791, 62 f.; DB 1892, 75; N.N.B.Wb. III, 1503; B. K. Roosen, Geschiede der Mennoniten-Gemeinde zu Hamburg und Altona I (Hamburg, 1886) 29, 44 f.; II (ibid. 1887) 11 f., 16, 32, 48, 49, 52 f.; Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis II, 648 f.; Bender, Two Centuries, 13.

Wijngaard (Wyngaert), Govaert Tobiasz van den, a son of Elder Tobias van den Wijngaard (see below), was a preacher of the Lamist (q.v.) Mennonite congregation at Amsterdam 1654-70. Unlike his father, he was an adherent of Galenus (q.v.) Abrahamsz. He published ten sermons, added to LVIII Stichtelycke Predicatiën (Amsterdam, 1660), a volume of sermons by Willem Wynands (q.v.). His son Tobias van den Wijngaard was a deacon of the Amsterdam Lamist congregation 1707-12. vdZ.

Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis II, 649; H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamsz (Haarlem, 1954) 35, 106.

Wijngaard (Wyngaert), Tobias Govertsen van den, b. 1587 at Amsterdam, d. there in 1669, was from 1617 a preacher and soon after an elder of the Amsterdam Flemish Mennonite congregation. In this church he was an influential leader. Outside his home church he also had great authority. He often preached in other congregations as far as Hamburg, Germany. In 1659 van den Wijngaard ordained Bastiaen van Weenigem (q.v.) at Rotterdam. At first van den Wijngaard was a man of broad views. He wholeheartedly co-operated with his fellow ministers in 1626 in drawing up the Olijftack (q.v.) confession with the preceding Brief tot Vreed-Bereydinge (letter to prepare for the union of the Dutch Mennonites). In 1632 he was active in bringing about the merger of the Flemish Mennonites with the Old Flemish on the basis of the Dordrecht (q.v.) confession, and he sincerely rejoiced over the merger of his own congregation with the High German-Frisian congregation in 1639. But he gradually grew more conservative, and from 1663 he was the leader of the opposition to Galenus (q.v.) Abrahamsz, who was a minister of the same congregation, and insisted on separation from the Galenists. He withdrew from the Lamist church in June 1664 with Samuel Apostool and some 500 members to found the Amsterdam Zonist (q.v.) congregation, of which he served as elder until 1667, when he retired after having served for fifty years. At an advanced age he also took an active part in organizing the conservative Mennonites into the Verbondt van Eenigheydt (q.v.).

Van den Wijngaard published Vrede-Presentatie . . . aen Galenus Abrahamsz (1663); Compromis tusschen D. Galenus Abrahamsz nevens sijne medestanders en Tobias Govertsz en sijne medestanders (Amsterdam, 1665), and probably also a letter to the congregations in Friesland, printed at Amsterdam in 1664. The original of this letter is found in the Amsterdam Mennonite archives. vdZ.

H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamsz (Haarlem, 1954); Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis III, 237-49 (with portrait); Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 566, 598, 609; II, Nos. 1232-34, 1270-72, 1387; DB 1881, 38; 1896, 46 f., 48; 1900, 20, 26, 29, 31, 36.

Wijns, a village in the Dutch province of Friesland, where Leenaert (q.v.) Bouwens baptized 21 persons in 1568-82. Since nothing is known concerning a Mennonite congregation at Wijns, it is assumed that the newly baptized joined a neighboring church. vdZ.

Wijnssem (Wynssem) van, a patrician family at Deventer, Dutch province of Overijssel, some of whose members joined the early Anabaptist movement. Miss Lubbe van Wijnssem lived at Münster (q.v.) as early as 1533 and again in 1534 with Hylle, the widow of Lubbert van Renssen, who was the mother-in-law of her brother Jacob. Jacob van Wijnssem, a burgomaster of Deventer, also took the side of the Münsterite Anabaptists. He and his brother Johan were baptized in Münster by Jan van Leyden (q.v.) in February 1534. Their parents, Jan (Johan) van Wijnssem and Beatrix, were also baptized and received into the Anabaptist congregation in their home at Deventer. It was intolerable that high officials like Jacob van Wijnssem should be revolutionary Anabaptists with many followers at Deventer, and when it was reported that the Anabaptists intended to seize the town, a number of them were arrested in January 1535, including Johan van Wijnssem, who was beheaded at Deventer on Feb. 6, 1535. About the fate of Lubbe van Wijnssem is no further information. Jan (Johan) van Wijnssem and his wife were pardoned because of their age and only banished from the town. Jacob van Wijnssem escaped arrest by flight. Later on, having renounced Anabaptism, he returned to Deventer and served as burgomaster again in 1539. (DB 1919, 2-8, 12, 14; Mellink, Wederdopers.)

vdZ.

Wijtses, Atse: see Zijpp, van der.

Wildcat (Ken.) Mennonite Mission (MC), Wildcat, established in 1949, is sponsored by the Pike Mennonite Church (q.v.), Elida, Ohio. In 1957 it had 35 members, with Merlin Good serving as pastor. M.G.

Wilde, W., a Dutch Roman Catholic, published two papers, "De Geloofsvervolgung der 16de eeuw" and "Merkwaardige cijfers betreffende de geloofsvervolgung," in Studiën, 1877 and 1894. In these papers he accused T. J. van Braght of partiality and inexactness in his Martyrs' Mirror. Wilde was opposed by Samuel Cramer (q.v.) in Doopsgezinde Bijdragen 1899, 70 ff. Thereupon Wilde published Zonderlinge Critiek (Amsterdam, 1900), and Cramer replied in De Zondagsbode and in Doopsgezinde Bijdragen 1900, 191-210. vdZ.

Wildenbruch, Ernst von (1845-1909), a German dramatist, author of Der Menonit, in which the Mennonites play an extremely unfavorable role on account of lack of patriotism. It is a caricature with propagandist intentions. In 1882 it was repeatedly presented on the German stage, and was considered a great success for the author.

The executive committee of the Vereiningung (q.v.) wrote a letter to Wildenbruch in May 1888, explaining the offending import of the drama. Wildenbruch's reply referred to the account by Bishop Eylert (q.v.) on Frederick William III, from which he had taken the material. He admitted that his picture might seem unjust, but thought that he was justified in the light of the moral effect of the play and his freedom as a poet. On May 26, 1888, the Mennonite congregation of Emden presented a petition to the theater in Berlin to prevent the presentation of the play there. The petition was answered negatively. Also the editor of the Menonitische Blätter wrote a protest to the author on May 29, 1888. On Aug. 16, 1888, the drama was presented in Berlin. The Curatorium of the Vereiningung had a protest composed by Pastor Weydmann and H. G. Mannhardt sent to all the Berlin newspapers. It was accepted by all the papers. At the outbreak of World War I the play was to be used to rouse public enthusiasm; but upon objection by the Mennonites, including the Conference of South

German Mennonites, it was removed from the program. NEFF.

Elizabeth H. Bender, "Ernst von Wildenbruch's Drama Der Menonit," MQR XVIII (1944) 22-35; ML IV.

Wildervank, a village in the Dutch province of Groningen, seat of a Mennonite congregation united with that of Veendam (q.v.). It is not certain whether there was an independent congregation in Wildervank in the 17th century. vdZ.

Wildwood Mennonite Church (MC), located at Curtis, Mich., began in 1939 as a mission under the Indiana-Michigan board until 1956, when it became an independent congregation, with a summer Bible school conducted by Chester Osborne. Clarence Troyer, a minister, came in the spring of 1940. The Beulah School was purchased in 1945 and converted into a meetinghouse. From this congregation the work at Naubinway and Brimley was started. Clarence Troyer was ordained bishop in 1948; in 1952 Lloyd Miller was ordained as assistant pastor of the congregation. They were still serving in 1959, when the membership was 32. W.I.T.

Will, Georg Andreae, a church historian of Nürnberg, Germany, who published in 1770 a history of the Anabaptist movement in Franconia titled, Beiträge zur Fränkischen Kirchen-Historie in einer Geschichte der Wiedertäufer, welche um die Zeit der gesegneten Kirchenreinigung Frankenland und besonders die Stadt Nürnberg beunruhigt haben (Nürnberg, 1770). In 1773 a stereotyped edition appeared with the title Beiträge zur Geschichte des Anabaptismus in Deutschland. The book is, as the title of the first edition indicates, written entirely in the spirit of the old Lutheran historiography and sees in the Anabaptist movement only "disorder" and "false doctrine." Will, however, deals for the most part with Thomas Müntzer, whom the Anabaptists had rejected. He makes the interesting concession that there had been cases in Franconia where innocent persons had been taken for Anabaptists and been punished with loss of life (106). (ML IV.) HEGE.

Willeboort Cornelisz, an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded on Oct. 26, 1564, at Middelburg, the capital of the Dutch province of Zeeland. Willeboort, who was a native of Oostkapelle on the Zeeland island of Walcheren (q.v.), was arrested with his wife, Maeyken (q.v.) Pieters, in the night of Jan. 19, 1561, and imprisoned at Middelburg for three years and nine months. He was tried by the Catholic bishop of Middelburg and tortured several times. Remaining steadfast, he was sentenced to death, but the execution was delayed again and again until it finally took place secretly within the Gravensteen castle for fear of a popular uprising. Maeyken, who gave birth to a child in prison on Sept. 17, 1561, escaped with a number of other prisoners.

From prison Willeboort wrote a letter to his wife, which was first published in the Great Martyrs' book of 1615, and was also included in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror. The date of Willeboort's death as given by van Braght (Sept. 14, 1564, repeated in ML) is incorrect. vdZ.

Offer, 463 note 1, 469; Mart. Mir. D 305, E 677; K. R. Pekelharing, "Geschiedenis der Hervorming in Zeeland," in Archief Zeeuwsch Genootschap VI (1866) 44-47; ML I, 372.

Willeboorts, a former Dutch Mennonite family, at first at Vlissingen in Zeeland, later particularly at Amsterdam. This family may have descended from the martyr Willeboort (q.v.) Cornelisz. Oillaert Willeboort(s) was the elder of the Vlissingen Mennonite congregation c1628-after 65. In 1632 he signed the Dordrecht (q.v.) Confession in the name of the Vlissingen congregation. In 1665 he sided with the Galenist (q.v.) party against Tobias Govertsz (van den Wijngaard, q.v.) and the Zonists. In Amsterdam, some of the family were deacons of the Lamist congregation. Daniel and Jacob Willeboorts moved to Königsberg, East Prussia, in 1752 and joined the Mennonite Church. In Amsterdam this family died out in the 18th century. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 1270-72; DB 1875, 35; church records of Amsterdam.) vdZ.

Willem, the husband of Aecht (q.v.) Melis, an Anabaptist martyr, arrested at Krommenieërdijk in Waterland, Dutch province of North Holland, was executed, probably in 1534 (1542, as in the Martyrs' Mirror, is wrong), with nine others. (Mart. Mir. D 62, E 464 f.; DB 1917, 170.) vdZ.

Willem van Ackere (Guillaume de Camp), an Anabaptist martyr, a native of Kortrijk in Flanders, baptized by Gillis (q.v.) van Aken, was burned at the stake at Merelbeke near Gent, Belgium, on July 11, 1551. (Verheyden, Gent, 15 f., No. 29.) vdZ.

Willem Aelbrechts, an Anabaptist martyr, a cabinet-maker of Utrecht, was sentenced to death by the sword at Delft, Holland, on Jan. 7, 1539. Ten others, all like Willem adherents of David (q.v.) Joris, were executed there at the same time. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 479.) vdZ.

Willem Aertsz (Willem de Hoedemaker), a Dutch Anabaptist martyr, b. at Driel in Gelderland, a young man living at Ieper in Flanders, was captured at Zwevegem and burned at the stake on the market place of Kortrijk, Belgium, on Nov. 8, 1567. His property was confiscated. Willem, who had been a member of the church since 1563, was a son or brother of Hendrik (q.v.) Aertsen and Janneken (q.v.) Cabiljaus, both of whom died as martyrs. (Mart. Mir. D 358, E 715; Verheyden, Courtrai-Bruxelles, 37, No. 19; ML I, 86.) vdZ.

Willem de Cle(e)rck (Guillame van Poperinghe, also called Jan, and in the Martyrs' Mirror Willem van Poperinge), an Anabaptist martyr, executed on March 30, 1569, at Antwerp, Belgium. Before the judges he declared that he was born at Meenen in Flanders and lived at Dambrugge. He had been married to Maeyken (q.v.) Christiaens "before the congregation" eight years previously at Nijpkerke (Nieppe); they had four children, who had not been baptized into the Catholic Church, "because baptism is the prerogative of adults." He himself had been (re)baptized in 1557 at Meenen by Joachim (q.v.) Vermeeren. Willem was arrested during a meeting of the Antwerp congregation in the house of Jan (q.v.) Poote. His wife suffered martyrdom on April 4, 1569. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 415, E 766; Antw. Arch.-Blad XII, 348, 369, 399, 439; XIV, 64 f., No. 716; ML III, 383.

Willem de Cleermaker (Willem Enckus or Enchus), an Anabaptist martyr, executed Oct. 5, 1560, at Antwerp, Belgium, by being drowned secretly within the Steen castle. Van Braght's information that he was burned at the stake on the market place early in the morning is incorrect. Van Braght gives only the year 1560, not the exact date. Willem was a native of Berg in the district of Cologne, Germany. He died after a frank and valiant confession of faith, and is commemorated in the hymn "Een nieuwe liedt" (a new song), No. 10 of the Lietboecxken. vdZ.

Offer, 544-47; Mart. Mir. D 275, E 645; Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 114, 121; XIV, 30 f., No. 332; Wolkan, Lieder, 62, 71.

Willem Cornelisz, of Hazerswoude, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at The Hague, Holland, on April 15, 1534. Willem had been among the Anabaptists who sailed from Amsterdam for Münster (q.v.) in March 1534. He is identical with the anonymous martyr listed in the Martyrs' Mirror as having been executed in 1532. (Mart. Mir. D 34, E 441; DB 1917, 121, No. 124, 171; Mellink, Wederdopers, 190.) vdZ.

Willem de Cuyper (Willem de Propheet), an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded on March 26, 1534, at The Hague, Holland (not at Haarlem, as is sometimes stated). Willem was a native of Heusden in the Dutch province of North Brabant. He was particularly active in Brabant and at Amsterdam. On Jan. 5, 1534, he arrived at Münster (q.v.), Westphalia, as an apostle of Jan (q.v.) Matthijsz of Haarlem. Soon after, he was back in Amsterdam, where he and others ran through the streets on March 22 with a naked sword to announce the wrath of God to the city, on which occasion he and his companions were arrested. Willem de Cuyper, whom Vos and Mellink list as a thoroughly revolutionary Anabaptist, was rather, as has been explained by Kühler, a true and radical disciple of Melchior Hofmann (q.v.), whose chiliastic views were easily and involuntarily adapted to revolutionary ideas. Willem de Cuyper was a dangerous and influential leader, not because of revolutionary ideas, but because of his prophecies.

Willem was married by Jan (q.v.) Volkertsz Trypmaker in 1531 to Margriete (q.v.) Willems uyt Hitlant, who after the death of her husband continued his Anabaptist activities and was executed by hanging on July 10, 1535. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 24, 27, 745; DB 1917, 100 f., 103, 111, No. 19, 151 f.; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 73, 75, 105 f.; Mellink, Wederdopers.

Willem van (den) Daele, an Anabaptist martyr: see Guillaume van Dale.

Willem Dirks: see Willem Zeylmaker.

Willem Dirksz Bijstervelt (Willem Cuper) and his wife Aecht Matthijsdochter were sentenced to death on March 16, 1535, by the Court of Holland. Aecht recanted and was pardoned on June 12, 1535, but Willem was probably executed. Particulars are lacking. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 745.) vdZ.

Willem Droochscheerder (Willem van Thyne), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on Jan. 30, 1557. The sentence was executed in a particularly cruel way, the victim being burned alive without having been strangled before as was usual. Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror does not mention the exact date of execution. Willem, who was a native of Nere (Neeritter) near Roermond in the present Dutch province of Limburg, wrote a letter from prison to his brother N. and his sister N. In this letter he thankfully writes that prison and torture did not vanquish his faith: "They (the persecutors) cannot harm a hair without the will of our Father; the more we are oppressed, the more we are comforted." In prison he also wrote the song "Christen broeders, weest nu al verblijt" (Christian brethren, now all rejoice). Both the letter and the hymn are found in Offer des Heeren, the letter also in the Martyrs' Mirror. Willem is commemorated in the hymn "Aenhoort God, hemelsche Vader," No. 16 of the Lietboecxken. vdZ.

Offer, 443-47, 564, No. 12; Mart. Mir. D 184 f., E 568 f.; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 433, 437; XIV, 22 f., No. 238; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 255; Wolkan, Lieder, 68; ML I, 478.

Willem de(n) Duy(c)k, an Anabaptist martyr, executed in 1565 (exact date unknown) at Gent, Belgium. Particulars are lacking. He is commemorated in the hymn "Als men schreef duyest vijfhondert jaer, ende twee en tesestich mede," found in the Lietboecxken. (Offer, 652, No. 21; Mart. Mir. D. 324, E 686; Verheyden, Gent, 31, No. 105; ML I, 497.) vdZ.

Willem Eynoutsz, of Barsingerhorn, an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded on Dec. 20, 1539, at Leiden, Holland, together with Claes Claesz of Schiedam. Particulars are lacking. (Mellink, Wederdopers, 204.) vdZ.

Willem Glaesmaker, an Anabaptist martyr, of Deventer, Holland, executed there Feb. 6, 1535. He was a Münsterite (q.v.) Anabaptist; a few weeks before his arrest (Jan. 28, 1535) Hendrik Cramer had delivered to his house at Deventer a number of copies of Rothmann's revolutionary booklet Van der Wrake (q.v.). (DB 1919, 7 f.; Mellink, Wederdopers.) vdZ.

Willem van Haverbeke (Guillaume van Hamerbeke), an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake on Nov. 20, 1561, at Kortrijk, Belgium, together with Absolon (q.v.) de Zanger. Willem, who was born at Gullegheem, a weaver by trade, lived at Meenen, Flanders. His property was confiscated. He is said to have been a preacher; in his home were found a number of heretical books and letters by Anabaptist leaders. (Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror states wrongly that he was executed in 1558.) (Mart. Mir. D 201, E 582; Verheyden, Courtrai-Bruxelles, 35, No. 13.)

vDZ.

Willem Hoedemaker (hatmaker), an Anabaptist martyr, was arrested during a meeting near Doornik (q.v.), Belgium. He was first brought to Doornik, thereupon to Bergen (Mons), where he was tried, and finally burned at the stake at Obignies near Doornik in 1558 (exact date unknown) with five other brethren, all of whom remained steadfast. (Mart. Mir. D 203, E 584.)
vDZ.

Willem Huyberts (Hubrechts), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on Feb. 21, 1573, at Antwerp, Belgium, together with Lynken Ghyselleers and Lysken Pennaerts. Willem, apparently a young man, was not yet a member of the church; during his trial he confessed that he was not yet (re)baptized, but was eager to receive baptism. The authorities, assisted by the clergy, sought fanatically "to convert him," but in vain. Willem remained steadfast. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 106, 107, 174; XIV, 90 f., No. 1013.)
vDZ.

Willem Huygen (Hugesz), an Anabaptist martyr who participated in the riot of Poeldijk (q.v.), Holland, was beheaded at The Hague on March 14, 1536. He was an adherent of the revolutionary wing of Anabaptism.
vDZ.

E. van Bergen, "De Wederdoopers in het Westland," in Bijdragen voor de Gesch. van het bisdom Haarlem XXVIII (1903) 275 ff.

Willem Jansen, a Mennonite elder at Emden, East Friesland, Germany, whom K. Vos considers to have been the secretary of the disputation held at Emden in 1578 between some Flemish Mennonite leaders and a number of Calvinist theologians. If this surmise is correct, Willem Jansen and not Carel van Gent (Ghendt), under the pseudonym of I.H.V.P.N., is the author of Beginsel (q.v.) en Voortganck der Geschillen. (Vos, Menno Simons, 306 f.; ML IV.)
vDZ.

Willem Jansz (Janssen), also called "Spaansche Willem van Doornickendam," an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Amsterdam, on March 12, 1569, together with Jan (q.v.) Quirijnsz and Cornelis (q.v.) Jansz. Willem was burned alive, without having been previously strangled as was usual.

The story of Willem's brotherly love, his loyalty, and his frankness is very striking; having heard that his coreligionist and friend Pieter (q.v.) Pietersz Beckjen was to die for his faith, Willem, who lived in Waterland, probably at Durgerdam, hastened to Amsterdam to comfort him. Standing near the place of execution he loudly called to Pieter: "Fight valiantly, my dear brother." Immediately afterwards he was arrested, put in prison, and tried on Feb. 26 and 28, and March 9, 1569. During these trials he confessed that he had been (re)baptized about eight years before. He also admitted that he had sometimes preached "in the manner of the Mennonites." During the torture he did not betray his brethren, refusing to name them. He gave some information on the dissensions which had arisen among the Mennonites, a question which was only rarely raised in the trials of the martyrs. Willem informed the inquisitors that he had been banned by the party of Dirk (q.v.) Philipsz, i.e., the Flemish branch, because he had sided with the Frisians.

Because of his heresy, his frankness, and his unwillingness to be converted by the Catholic clergymen, he was sentenced to death. The sentence is published in full by van Braght in the Martyrs' Mirror. His property was confiscated. (Mart. Mir. D 490-92, E missing; Grosheide, Bijdrage, 180 f.; DB 1899, 128; ML I, 493.)
vDZ.

Willem Jansz, of Utrecht, Netherlands, a cloth shearer or cloth merchant, in early 1562 sold for six pennies a copy of the martyr book Offer (q.v.) des Heeren (first ed. 1562) to his fellow citizen Willem Willemz. Willem Jansz was a Mennonite; he and his wife Maria regularly attended the secret meetings of the small group of Mennonites at Utrecht. When a meeting was surprised by the officials in the spring of 1562, Willem Jansz was not present. Nothing more is heard about him. (DB 1903, 10, 12, 19, 35, 40, 42.)
vDZ.

Willem van Keppel: see Keppel, Wilhelm von.

Willem de Kistemaker (Wilhelm Kistenmacher), an Anabaptist martyr, executed in 1551 at Cleve in the Rhineland, Germany, together with Wendel Ravens. Van Braght gives the information that Willem had left his native country, probably Holland, and was living at Weess(?) near Cleve. He is said to have written some letters from prison, concerning which there is, however, no further information. (Mart. Mir. D 131, E 525; ML II, 501.)
vDZ.

Willem Koussenmacher, an Anabaptist martyr of Antwerp, was executed in 1535 at Wesel. At his cross-examination he said, "What one cannot grasp from Scripture is human work." The one who baptized him directed him to yield himself entirely to God.

Albrecht Wolters, Reformationsgeschichte der Stadt Wesel (Bonn, 1868); Rembert, Wiedertäufer, 400.

Willem van Leuven(e), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on Feb. 17, 1553, at the Vrijdagmarkt at Gent, Belgium. (Van Braght gives the date as 1554.) Willem, who was a shoemaker or a cobbler, was an outstanding member in the Mennonite congregation of Gent. His wife, Levina (q.v.) Ghyselins, suffered martyrdom at Gent, Feb. 14, 1554. Their son Frans (q.v.) van Leuvene was executed at Gent in 1573. Willem van Leuven was the grandfather of Jan Doom, who in the early 17th century was a preacher of the Flemish Mennonite congregation at Haarlem, Holland. (Mart. Mir. D 160, E 549 f.; Verheyden, Gent, 18, No. 36; DB 1899, 67; ML II, 643.)
vDZ.

Willem Matthijsz (in Offer and Martyrs' Mirror simply called Willem), an Anabaptist martyr, sentenced to death by strangling and then burning at the stake. He was sentenced on Aug. 21, 1552, and the execution took place at Leiden, Holland, that very day or soon after. Three women, Maritgen, Willemken Willem Claesdochter, of IJsselstein, an Anabaptist martyr, drowned on July 21, 1544, at Utrecht, Netherlands. She is charged with belonging to "reprobate sects." Some years previously she had been arrested because of Anabaptist activity, but then after recanting was set free. She was probably an adherent of revolutionary Anabaptism, whose last adherents were executed in 1545. (Mellink, Wederdopers, 240, 410.) vDZ.

Willems: see Willems.

Willems(z), Jan, an elder and leader of the Frisian Mennonites: see Jan Willemsz.

Willemsz, Jan, b. May 9, 1583, at Cologne, Germany, d. 1660 at De Rijp in North Holland, Netherlands, a physician and in 1610-60 a Mennonite minister, at first a preacher, soon an elder of the Waterlander Mennonite congregation at De Rijp. He was educated for the Catholic priesthood, but he ran away from school and became a soldier. On a Sunday morning at Haarlem, Holland, he accidentally arrived in the Waterlander meetinghouse and was converted; he wanted to be a member of the church. The Haarlem Waterlander congregation bought off his military obligations and thereupon he was baptized upon his confession of faith. His marriage to a well-to-do lady of De Rijp enabled him to study medicine. After finishing his study he settled at De Rijp to practice medicine; soon after this he was chosen as a preacher of the congregation. His long service seems to have been blessed, though it is said that he was somewhat stubborn and quarreled with other leaders, including his colleague Pieter Pietersz (q.v.). Willemz seems to have sympathized with Nittert Obbes (q.v.) in the latter's conflict with the Waterlander leader Hans de Ries (q.v.); a booklet by Jan Willemsz, Raegh-Stock voor Nittert Obbes Reaghbesem, in which Willemsz defended Obbes against de Ries, exists only as a résumé by Jan Theunisz (q.v.). Of special interest is Willemsz' Grondich Ondersoeck, in which he attacked the practice of ordaining deacons with the laying on of hands. vDZ.

Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis II, 651, 683 (with portrait); N.N.B.Wb. I, 1578; DB 1917, 30-32; Kühler, Geschiedenis II, 170 ff.; Yearbook Amstelodamum XXV (1928) 98, 118.

Willemszen, Louwerens (Lourens Willems, L. W. van Alckmaer), a deacon of the Rotterdam Old Flemish congregation, was vigorously opposed to the conciliatory Olyftack (q.v.) confession (1626) inasmuch as this confession was intended to unite several branches of Dutch Mennonites, and also to the merger of the Flemish and Old Flemish branches in 1632. Willemszen and a few other conservatives tried, but in vain, to retain the Rotterdam Old Flemish meetinghouse for their small group, which did not share in the merger. During these quarrels Willemszen published some booklets: Een korte onderscheydelycke vertooninghe aan onze Medeghenoten des Gheloofs (Rotterdam, 1629), Aarons Roede Vertoon . . . aan onze Medeghenooten des Gheloofs (Amsterdam, 1630, 3d ed. Rotterdam, 1633), Ezelinnen Zoon (Rotterdam, 1633), and Kahebeen, of Ezels Kinnebakken (Rotterdam, 1636). vDZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, Nos. 424-26, 428, 431, 434; K. Vos, Geschiedenis der Doopsgez. Gemeente te Rotterdam (1907), repr., II, 45; Kühler, Geschiedenis II, 194 f.; M. Schagen, Naamlijst der Doopsgezinde Schrijver (Amsterdam, 1745) 4 f.

Willenbach, a large farm estate near Jagstfeld, which gave its name to a Mennonite congregation c1780-1810, which later became the Heilbronn (q.v.) congregation, Württemberg, Germany. vDZ.

Willer (Willher), Barbeli and Hans, Anabaptist martyrs; Barbeli (Barbara) Willher, who may have been the same person as "Barbli with the wooden leg" a native of Hasli, was drowned at Bern, Switzerland, in late 1537 or early 1538, and Hans Willer was executed there in August 1538. vDZ.

D. L. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottsdale, 1953) 22, 23.

William I of Orange (1533-84) was born at Dillenburg in Hesse-Nassau, Germany, on April 11, 1533. He was assassinated on July 10, 1584, at Delft, Netherlands. In 1566, while serving Philipp II of Spain as governor of Antwerp, he still insisted on the execution of the Mennonites. Two years later William led the revolt (War of Liberation) of the Netherlands against Spain. Then being appointed stadholder of Holland and Zeeland, his views completely changed. He now tried to unite all forces in the war against Spain. He left the Catholic Church to become a Calvinist, and practiced tolerance even toward the Mennonites. Whereas some of his counselors (e.g., Marnix van St. Aldegonde, q.v.) insisted on the persecution of the Mennonites, William defended them. On April 20, 1572, he wrote a letter to his governor in North Holland ordering that nobody should be hindered in preaching the Word of God. On July 15, of that year, in the meeting of the Dutch States-General, he proposed religious freedom. The States, however (particularly in 1583), resolved that in the United Netherlands only the Reformed Church should be allowed to meet publicly, all others being simply tolerated. In 1577, and again in 1578, 1580, and 1582, he defended the Mennonites of Middelburg, capital of Zeeland, against the local authorities, releasing them from swearing oaths and bearing arms, which privileges soon became valid throughout the Netherlands. It seems somewhat contrary to this policy of toleration that in 1581 William issued a mandate in accord with the views of the States-General, ordering that no other religion but the Reformed be granted the public exercise of its faith. But this mandate was meant to break the influence and power of the Catholic Church, whose members often were pro-Spanish, though it was later often used against the Mennonites.

The Mennonites on their part were grateful to William for his protection and the granted privileges. As early as July 29, 1572, two Waterlander leaders (see Bogaert, P. W. and Cortenbosch, D. J.) brought to the Prince of Orange 1060 guilders in the name of the Dutch Mennonites, to be used for the welfare of the country. NEFF, vDZ.

A. A. van Schelven, Willem van Oranje (Haarlem, 1933); K. Vos, Oranje en de Doopsgezinden (Amsterdam, n.d.-1911) 5-11; DJ 1930, 115-41; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 409, 421 f., 426, 428 f., 431; Kühler, Geschiedenis I; DB 1873, 3-11; 1875, 99; 1882, 7; 1883, 19; 1895, 5; 1896, 156; 1908, 42, 45 f.; N. Japikse, "Die Oranier, Statthalter und Könige in den Niederlanden," in Archiv für Ref.-Gesch., 1941; A. L. E. Verheyden, "Mennisme in Vlaanderen" (manuscript); ML III, 307.

William III of Orange (1650-1702), from 1672 stadholder of the Netherlands except Friesland, and by his marriage to Mary Stuart in 1689 also king of England, a haughty, reticent man, energetic politician, and capable general, paladin of Protestantism, often defended the Mennonites in the Netherlands and elsewhere against oppression. On May 15, 1673, he issued a mandate by which the Mennonites in North Holland were exempted from military service. On Nov. 11, 1688, he suspended the suit against the Mennonite preacher Foecke Floris (q.v.), who was charged with Socinianism. On Aug. 11, 1694, and again on July 14, 1697, he wrote a letter to John William, Elector of the Palatinate (q.v.), in favor of the Mennonites who were suppressed in his territory and particularly in the Duchy of Jülich (q.v.). vDZ.

J. K. Oudendijk, Willem III (1953); Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 454, 456, 1749, 1755; DB 1887, 71 ff.; 1895, 5 f.; ML III, 308.

Williams County (Ohio) Mennonite Church (MC), also known as Hoffers (now extinct), located northwest of West Unity, Ohio, was founded in 1842-43 by settlers from Canada and from Lebanon and Lancaster counties in Pennsylvania. Located in the "Black Swamp" area of northwestern Ohio, the county offered cheap land for easterners who had become bankrupt during the financial panic of Martin Van Buren's administration. Daniel Lehman, Peter Borkholder, and Isaac Hoffer, a preacher and later a bishop, were the first settlers. Others who followed a little later were Joseph Borkholder, Jacob Eberly, Samuel and Solomon Lehman, Jacob Delp, Menno Naragang (?), John Detweiler, Abraham Metzler, Moses Koch, John Dill, Martin Myers, William Rhodes, Levi H. Eberly, and a Kilmer family who had moved from Crawford County, Ohio. Ministers ordained from the congregation were Levi H. Eberly, Martin Myers, and Joseph Borkholder. For the first few decades the congregation gave promise of growth and built a small meetinghouse on the northeast corner of Hoffer's farm. After the bishop's death in 1880 the congregation declined. His successor, Abraham Lehman, following the lead of Jacob Wisler (q.v.) of Indiana, prohibited Sunday school and other young people's religious activities. Some members moved to Elkhart County, Ind., or united with the local Church of the Brethren or other denominations in the neighborhood. The small well-kept cemetery plot back of the barn on the late Bishop Hoffer's farm provides the last resting place for the older members of the congregation. J.S.U.

John Umble, "Extinct Ohio Mennonite Churches," MQR XVIII (1944) 36-48.

Williams, Jan (1533-88), married Aagt Pieters in 1589, the father of 4 sons and 5 daughters. In 1557 after the separation of the Waterlanders he was chosen elder by the stricter party and ordained by Dirk Philips. He lived in Hoorn, where he and Lubbert Gerrits (after 1559) were influential leaders. He was one of the arbitrators of the dissension in Franeker in 1567, which led to the division between the Frisians and the Flemish. As a member of the Frisian group he continually strove for peace, one result of his efforts being the agreement of Humster in 1574. He was the progenitor of the Sleutel family. (G. J. de Hoop Scheffer, "Het geslacht Sleutel," in DB 1861, 50-65.) vDZ.

Williamson Mennonite Church (MC), located one mile west of Williamson in Franklin County, Pa., a member of the Washington County, Md., and Franklin County, Pa., Conference, had a joint ministerial body with the Marion congregation until March 23, 1948, when Mahlon Eshleman was ordained exclusively for this congregation (Williamson). Previous to 1869, when the meetinghouse was built, the members worshiped jointly with what is now the Marion congregation, the meetinghouse then being located at Brown's Mill. By 1924 the membership had dwindled to 5, but by 1954 had risen to 65. In 1957 the minister was Mahlon D. Eshleman, and the membership was 49. C.S.

Williamsville (N.Y.) Reformed Mennonite Church, in Erie County near Buffalo, was founded about 1833 by John Herr (q.v.), the first leader of the Reformed Mennonites. In 1957 the membership was 34. H.S.B.

Willink, a widely ramified Dutch Mennonite family which took its name from the farm "Het Willink" near Winterswijk in the Dutch province of Gelderland, where they were living in the 16th century; but originally this family probably stemmed from Westphalia, Germany, where it was found in the towns of Vreden, Bocholt, and Burgsteinfurt until the 17th century. In the 16th and 17th centuries there were both a Mennonite and a Reformed branch.

Jan Willink, b. c1561, married in 1591 to Judith Busschers (both probably Mennonites), lived at Groenlo in Gelderland. They died in 1636 of the plague. Soon afterward the Willinks, who were textile manufacturers, were members of the Winterswijk (q.v.) Mennonite congregation, where many of them have been deacons; Berend Willink was an untrained preacher of this church 1693-1700. In the 17th and 18th centuries some Willinks lived at Deventer, where Ananias Willink was a lay preacher c1670, and in Enschedé and other Dutch towns. A branch of this family is found at Amsterdam from c1650, engaged as linen merchants and later as bankers. Another branch is found in Hamburg, Germany, from 1734; Lucas Willink was a deacon of the Mennonite congregation here in the early 19th century. Later this Hamburg branch joined the Lutherans. In Amsterdam the Willinks were mostly members and often deacons of the Lamist (q.v.) congregation; the first of these deacons was the merchant Gerrit Willink (1618-79), serving from 1656. Jan Willink was a lay preacher in this church 1675-d. 1725. A few Willinks at Amsterdam were members of the Zonist (q.v.) congregation.

Jan Ananiasz Willink (Amsterdam, 1751-1827), a deacon of the Lamist and later of the United congregation, was a cofounder of the A.D.S. and a trustee 1811-27. His cousins Willem Willink (1750-1841) and Jan Willink (1778-1827) were trustees of the A.D.S., in 1811-18 and 1819-27. Ananias Willink Jansz (Amsterdam, 1778-1863), director of the Dutch State Bank, was treasurer of the A.D.S. and curator of its seminary 1827-47.

Jan Jansz Willink (1676-1722), a wine merchant of Amsterdam and deacon of the Lamist church, was an active member and secretary of the Dutch Mennonite Committee for Foreign Needs. In December 1710 he and Cornelis Beets contacted François Fagel (q.v.) and the Dutch States-General in behalf of the oppressed Swiss Mennonites. He was also a poet, highly esteemed during his lifetime, now forgotten, who published a number of volumes of poetry, e.g., Bloemkrans van christelijke liefde- en zeededichten (Amsterdam, 1714, repr. ibid. 1723), Lusthof van christelijke dank- en beedezangen (2 vv., Amsterdam, 1714, repr. n.d.-1720, 1726), and Christelijke Gebeden (Amsterdam, 1718, many reprints). Anthony François Willink (Amsterdam, 1825-92), also a trustee of the A.D.S., was for many years the president of the Dutch Mennonite Mission Association. (See also Tjeenk Willink.)

At present there are only a few Mennonite Willinks in Holland. vdZ.

F. Willink, Stamboek der Willingen . . . (Amsterdam, 1721); P. Beets, Stamboek der Willingen (Deventer, 1767); Ned. Patriciaat XXVIII (1942) 349-64; ibid. XXXVI (1950) 368-78; F. C. Fleischer, De Doopsgezinde Gemeente te Winterswijk (Winterswijk, 1911) 7, 8, 20, 21, 29, 30 et passim; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1294, 1327; DJ 1850, 143; DB 1893, 107; 1897, 41 f.; 1909, 139, 144; 1912, 111 f.; 1919, 65; B. C. Roosen, Gesch. der Mennoniten-Gemeinde zu Hamburg und Altona II (Hamburg, 1887) 81, 85; N.N.B.Wb., 1463-65.

Willms (Willems, Willm, Willmsen, Wilms, Willemsen, Wilhelm), a family name among the Mennonites of Prussian background derived from the Dutch Christian name Willem (William), found in the church records of Danzig (1690), Tiegenghagen, Ladekopp, Rosenort, Fürstenwerder, Heubuden, Elbing, Montau-Gruppe, Schönsee, Tragheimerweide, and Kazun. From Danzig and Prussia the name spread to Russia and North and South America. The name is also found in the Netherlands but is not common among Mennonites. In 1723 Albert Willems from Holland, with Alle Derks, visited the Prussian Mennonites. Among the Mennonites in Russia bearing the name were Peter Willms of Halbstadt, Molotschna, the owner of a starch factory, and Heinrich Willms of Halbstadt, Molotschna, the owner of three large flour mills with an annual turnover of $500,000. H. J. Willms was in the administration of Concordia Hospital, Winnipeg; Gerhard H. Willms is manager of the Herald Publishing Co. of Newton, Kan. C.K.

Reimer, Familiennamen, 120; H. H. Schröder, Russlanddeutsche Friesen (Döllstadt, 1936) 99.

Willow Creek, a Hutterite Bruderhof of the Darius-leut (q.v.) branch, near Stettler, in Alberta. The population in 1950 was 89, with Jacob S. Stahl as head preacher. vdZ.

Willow Creek Mennonite Church (GCM): see San Marcos.

Willow Springs Mennonite Church (MC), located 4 miles south of Tiskilwa, Bureau Co., Ill., a member of the Illinois Conference, was organized in 1836 as an Amish Mennonite congregation, the settlers having come mostly from Bavaria, Germany, plus a few from Butler County, Ohio. The Bavarians had first settled in 1835 in the Hennepin and Granville neighborhood in Putnam County. After meeting in homes for 35 years the congregation built its first meetinghouse in 1873. This was destroyed by lightning in 1896, but was immediately rebuilt, and later enlarged several times.

Three subsidiary groups have been formed from Willow Springs: Ohio Station in the north central part of the county 1840-1915, which never developed into a congregation; Sheffield in the western part of the county 1943-50; and the Tiskilwa Mennonite Church (GCM; q.v.), which was formed in 1911 when a group withdrew to join the Central Illinois Conference (q.v.).

The first minister in the Hennepin community was Jacob Burkey of Hesse, Germany, who never lived in the Tiskilwa neighborhood. The Willow Springs congregation suffered for many years from inadequate and even absentee ministerial leadership and was not established on a sound basis until 1868, when Joseph Burkey, a minister at Tremont, Ill., moved in and was ordained bishop a year later. His successor was C. A. Hartzler, a minister from Garden City, Mo., who came in 1913 and was ordained bishop a year later. C. W. Long was pastor in 1957, with a membership of 142. H.S.B.

H. F. Weber, Centennial History of the Mennonites of Illinois (Goshen, 1931) 222-36.

Willow Street Mennonite Church: see Brick Mennonite Church.

Willowdale Christian Fellowship, 10 Burke Street (Willowdale), Toronto, Ont., was organized in August 1957. Its members are Mennonite Brethren who come to the city to study or work. A center was dedicated in January 1958. Henry Voth was the minister for the 18 members. J.H.H.

Wilmington (Del.) Mennonite Church (CAM) meets at 10th and Harrison streets. This mission station was established in 1948 and by 1957 had 22 members, with Amos Bontrager serving as pastor. M.G.

Wilmut (Ont.) Reformed Mennonite Church: see Hostetlers Meetinghouse.

Wilmsen, Johann: see Jan Willems(z).

Wilson Bend Mennonite Church: see Providence Mennonite Church.

Wilson Siding, a Hutterite Bruderhof of the Darius-leut (q.v.) branch, at Lethbridge, in Alberta. The population in 1950 was 140, with John M. Wurz as head preacher.

Wimmer (Winter), Wolfgang, an Anabaptist martyr of Steyr, Austria, a tailor of Nistelbach and an Anabaptist preacher, who was burned to death with his wife Martha on Oct. 27, 1527, in a group of 37 Anabaptists (including Eucharius Binder, q.v.) who were locked in a house which was then burned down. (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 27.)

Winchester (Va.) Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, was in existence about 1870-1900. Following the Civil War a number of farms in the vicinity of Winchester, Kernstown, and Stephens City in Frederick County, Va., were purchased by Mennonites who came here from Lancaster County, Pa., Maryland, and the upper (southern) part of the Shenandoah Valley, attracted by cheap land. At the height of the movement there were four Mennonite preaching appointments. (One of these was the Kernstown-q.v.-congregation.) Two sessions of the Virginia Conference were held here before 1900. The most important leader of the church in this area was Christley Brunk, from near Broadway, Va.

The congregation entered a period of decline in the 1890's. Successful leadership was not perpetuated. The young people did not become members of the church. A number of Mennonites joined other denominations, while others moved away. The Kernstown meetinghouse was sold in 1907.

H.A.B.

Wind, de, a former Dutch Mennonite family, now extinct. The idea, found in older books, that this family stemmed from Germany is wrong. About 1566 two brothers, Pieter and Jan de Wind, fled because of persecution from Flanders, Belgium, to Vlissingen (q.v.) in the Dutch province of Zeeland. Jan joined the Reformed Church. (1) Pieter became a Mennonite, and his descendants gave the Mennonite church in the Netherlands meritorious service. (2) Paulus de Wind, a weaver, son of (1) Pieter, moved from Vlissingen to Middelburg. (3) Gerard de Wind, a son of (2) Paulus, was a cloth shearer. (4) Paulus de Wind (1655-1728), a son of (3) Gerard, married to Jacomyntje Frans, was a cheese and butter merchant at Vlissingen and an elder of the Vlissingen congregation 1691-1704, then moved to Zwolle, where he died. After this, most of the de Winds were practicing physicians in Middelburg (q.v.), where nearly all served the church as deacons. (5) Gerard de Wind (q.v.) was a son of (4) Paulus. His sons were (6) Jan van Beekhoven de Wind (Middelburg c1710-Haarlem?), physician and preacher at Gouda 1734-37 and of the Haarlem Peuzelaarsteeg congregation 1737-c70, (7) Paulus de Wind (1714-71) (Nos. (7) to (11) were born and died at Middelburg and practiced medicine there unless otherwise noted), (7) Paulus de Wind, married to Berdina Tak and later to Cornelia Dobbelaers, and (8) Gerard de Wind (1730-1800), married to Suzanna van Hoorn, professor of anatomy at Middelburg. A son of (7) Paulus was (9) Samuel de Wind (1742-1803), married to Cornelia Dobbelaer, known for his beneficence, as was his son (10) Paulus de Wind (1767-97), married to his cousin Elizabeth de Wind. Another son of (9) Samuel was (11) Boudewijn Dobbelaer de Wind (1775-1818), married to Petronella Tak, a pillar of the church and a very popular man in his home town. (12) Samuel de Wind (1793-1856), married to his cousin Cornelia Dobbelaer, a son of (10) Paulus, was a well-known lawyer in Middelburg. He published also a number of studies on the history of Vlissingen and was very active in the church. His son (13) Samuel Dobbelaer de Wind (1817-89) was a physician at Middelburg. With him the family died out in the male line. In the 18th century a branch of this family, now also extinct, was found at Amsterdam. vdZ.

F. Nagtiglas, Levensberichten van Zeeuwen II (Middelburg, 1893) 974-84; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 985, 1790, 1792, 1877, 2236; N.N.B.Wb. IV, 1466; V, 1138-40; DB 1868, 92, 93, 95; 1875, 35.

Wind, Gerard (Gerardus) de, b. 1685 at Vlissingen, d. 1752 at Middelburg, married to Elisabeth Beekhoven. He was trained for the ministry by Adriaan van Eeghem (q.v.) at Middelburg and by Galenus (q.v.) Abrahamsz and the Remonstrant seminary at Amsterdam. He also studied medicine in Utrecht. Returning to Middelburg, where he practiced medicine, he became also a preacher of the Middelburg Mennonite congregation in 1705, serving until his death. He published Lijkreden over het Afsterven van A. van Eeghem (Vlissingen, 1709), Johannes Kiens redenen des geloofs onderzocht (Middelburg, 1711), Verhandeling over de bijzondere genade Gods (Amsterdam, 1725), and Verhandeling van Gods algemeene genade (Amsterdam, 1728). He also edited the theological writings of van Eeghem: De Christelijke Godgeleerdheid van A.v.E. (Vlissingen, 1710). De Wind was attacked by G. van Hemert (q.v.), his Reformed colleague at Middelburg, in G. de Wind uit zijne verhandeling van Gods algemeene Genade ontmaskert (Middelburg, 1730). vdZ.

Blaupot t. C., Holland II, 131 f.; N.N.B.Wb. V, 1138 f.; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1806, 2020.

Windesheim, a village in the Dutch province of Overijssel, where a monastery was founded in 1385, which was the center of the Windesheim monastic order issuing from the Brethren (q.v.) of the Common Life movement. This monastic order stressed knowledge of the Bible and reading of the Bible in the vernacular and cultivated evangelical piety. According to Kühler, it prepared the soil for Sacramentism (q.v.) and Anabaptism. vdZ.

J. G. R. Acquoy, Het Klooster van Windesheim (3 vv., Utrecht, 1875-80); Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 28.

Winding Mill (Pa.) Reformed Mennonite Church, near Mechanicsburg, Cumberland Co., Pa., was organized in 1870. In 1948 it had eight members. By 1957 it had been combined with the Middlesex Reformed Mennonite Church near Carlisle, Pa.

H.S.B.

Wine Spring Schoolhouse, Peru, Pendleton Co., W. Va., is located in South Fork (Branch of the Potomac) country several miles north of Sweedlin Valley. The Mennonites (MC) began preaching here c1920. It was an extension of the work from the Sweedlin Valley by the Northern District council. At the present time the pastor of the Pleasant Grove church in Sweedlin Valley is responsible for the services here. Wine Spring is listed as Peru in the Mennonite Yearbook. H.A.B.

Winkel, a small village in the Dutch province of North Holland, about four miles from Barsingerhorn (q.v.), was in 1533-34 a center of Anabaptist activity, nearly the whole population being Anabaptist. Anabaptism was not rooted out here in the campaign of Reinier Brunt in early 1534; in 1540-41 mention is made of Anabaptism in Winkel, and still in 1558 Mennonite meetings were held here. After this Mennonites are not mentioned. L. Nannings Smit, Waechlink Dirks, Maerten Cornelisz, and Adriaen Pietersz, all of Winkel, died as martyrs, Smit in 1540, the other three in 1558. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 234, 240, 390-92.) vdZ.

Winkelman, a Dutch Mennonite family stemming from Mennonites from Flanders, Belgium. Pieter Janse Wyncelman (Winkelman) was from 1625 a deacon of the Flemish congregation at Rotterdam; there were also Winkelmans at Vlissingen, where some of them were deacons in the 19th and 20th centuries. One of them, Henrik Pierre Winkelman (Vlissingen, 1813-78), an apothecary and for many years the chairman of the local congregation, published a paper on the history of the Vlissingen congregation in Doopsgezinde Bijdragen of 1875. B. J. Winkelman was moderator of the Mennonite Kring (circle), later congregation, of Eindhoven (q.v.) 1928-42. vdZ.

Winkler, a town (pop. 2,500) in southern Manitoba, 80 miles southwest of Winnipeg, 12 miles north of the United States boundary, in an area where grains, fruits, sugar beets, sunflowers, corn, and canning crops are grown, was founded in 1892. It is the business, educational, and religious center for a 6,000 Mennonite population in the rural municipalities of Stanley and Rhineland, which were settled village-style in 1875. It has an M.B. Bible school, organized in 1925, with 4 teachers and 80 students; a public high school, largely Mennonite in teachers and student body, with 9 teachers and 225 students; and four Mennonite churches: Berghthal, Mennonite Brethren, Rudnerweide, and Sommerfeld, with a total membership of over 1,000. The Winkler M.B. Church (q.v.), organized in Burwalde in 1886, was the first M.B. church in Canada. P.E.B.

Frank Brown, "Winkler, Manitoba," Menn. Life XI (July 1956).

Winkler Bible School, located in Winkler, Man., was founded in the fall of 1925 by A. H. Unruh. It was patterned after Tchongrav (q.v.) in South Russia, and was organized by three former teachers of that school. Unruh was the first of them to emigrate, followed by G. J. Reimer in 1926 and by J. G. Wiens. The school was erected for the purpose of teaching the Bible, especially to young people, to prepare them for missionary work as well as pastoral service. Its name is Peniel (Gen. 32:30), and its motto is, "I will not let thee go, except thou bless me" (v. 26). The school has had 22 teachers in 34 years, and has operated in three-, four-, and five-year courses. H.H.R.

Winkler, Konrad, an Anabaptist martyr of Wasserberg in the canton of Zürich, is the fourth martyr of the Zürich Swiss Brethren group. At a cross-examination in June 1525 he asserted that he had not baptized and promised to be obedient, but was nevertheless fined because he had contradicted the preacher in his sermon. Later Winkler appeared in the Zürich lowlands as an Anabaptist preacher. In Basel he also sought to promote the Anabaptist cause, but was arrested and placed in stocks with Treyer (q.v.). On Jan. 20, 1530, he was condemned to death at Zürich as "a real leader and mobster of this affair," who had for several months preached for large crowds and baptized many men and women. He was drowned in the Limmat bound as Felix Manz (q.v.) had been. His property was confiscated. S.G.

Emil Egli, Die Züricher Wiedertäufer zur Reformationszeit (Zürich, 1878) 89; TA Zürich, 332 f., where Winkler's importance is indicated by the length of the verdict; ML IV.

Winkler Mennonite Brethren Church at Winkler, Man., the oldest M.B. Church in Canada, began as the result of home mission effort of the Conference of the M.B. Church. In 1883 the Conference sent Heinrich Voth and David Dyck as evangelists to Manitoba. On May 30, 1886, the first baptismal service was held, when six members were received into church membership.

Gerhard Wiebe, an immigrant from Russia, organized the group into a congregation of 16 members. In 1889 the first church building was erected 6 miles northwest of Winkler, in the village of Burwalde. In 1895 David Dyck, a minister from Colorado, became leader of this church, which at that time numbered 84 members. Affiliated stations were opened at Kronsart and Grossweide, which developed into new churches. Since 1898 there have been quarterly meetings in which all three congregations participated. In 1898 the church building was moved from Burwalde to just outside Winkler. Shortly after, a new one was erected on the same site; it was enlarged twice. In 1947 the building and lot were sold, and a new building was erected in Winkler, 60 x 102 ft., seating capacity 1,000.

In 1895 John Warkentin was ordained as minister and in 1906 he became the presiding minister of the church, a position he held 25 years. In 1898 the Conference of the M.B. Church was held at Winkler. This was the first time that it convened in Canada.

In 1906 P. H. Neufeld was ordained to the ministry. In 1931 H. S. Voth became leader and pastor of the church, followed by G. D. Pries. In 1959 the leader was J. H. Quiring, with a membership of 374. H.H.R.

Winkler Prins, Anthony, b. Jan. 31, 1817, at Voorst, Netherlands, d. Jan. 4, 1908, at Voorburg, studied theology at the University of Utrecht and the Amsterdam Mennonite seminary and was a pastor at Tjalleberd 1841-50 and Veendam 1850-82, retiring in this year. He published a volume of sermons, Leerredenen (Heerenveen, 1851), and his farewell sermon, Afscheidsrede, from Veendam (Wildervank, 1882). But more than a theologian, Winkler Prins was a literary man; during his student years in Amsterdam, he—with H. C. Dronrijp Uges, D. Harting, P. Leendertz, and J. G. de Hoop Scheffer—was a cofounder of the literary club N.E.K. (q.v.), and in 1842-44 he published the periodical Braga, in which he and his friends sharply criticized the low level of contemporary Dutch literature. From 1838 Prins published articles in many Dutch literary periodicals and newspapers. He also published poems. The complete, long list of his writings is found in the Levensbericht (obituary) of the Dutch Association for Literature, of which he was a member. His chief publication is the Dutch illustrated encyclopedia (Winkler Prins Encyclopedie) in 16 vv. (Amsterdam, 1869-82; 6th revised edition at Amsterdam 1947-55), for which he did painstaking work.

Winkler Prins was a versatile man. Particularly during his Veendam period he was "the intellectual pioneer" of this area, successfully promoting better schools in Veendam, the improvement of agricultural methods, and many other public interests. In 1864 he was chosen as a member of the Second Chamber of Parliament, but declined.

Anthony Winkler, Prins was the son of (M.D.) Jacob Prins and Johanna van Marle Winkler. In 1847 he was married to H. R. Klijnsma. H. A. Luns-hof wrote a biographical novel on the life of Winkler Prins, entitled Leven zonder demon (Amsterdam, 1950). vdZ.

J. Dyserinck, Levensbericht van A. Winkler Prins (Leiden, 1909); N.N.B.Wb. V, 538-40; DB 1864, 170; 1908, 207; DJ 1909, 21-33 (with portrait).

Winnebago (Wis.) State Hospital was the location of Civilian Public Service Unit No. 122, which was operated by the Mennonite Central Committee from November 1943 to February 1946. The unit of 15 men worked as attendants in this 500-bed hospital, which treated acute psychiatric patients. M.G.

Melvin Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, 1949) 240-44.

Winnipeg, the capital (pop. 243,287) of the province of Manitoba, incorporated in 1873 with a population of 1,869, is situated at the confluence of the Red and Assiniboine rivers, 40 miles south of Lake Winnipeg, and 60 miles north of the United States border, almost midway between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. The metropolitan area of Greater Winnipeg has a population of 354,069 out of a provincial total of 776,541. The total Mennonite population of Manitoba, including Hutterites, was 44,667 in 1957, the majority of whom are descendants of the immigrants from Russia of 1874-80, although a considerable number are from the immigrations of 1922-25 and 1948-53. The Mennonite population of Greater Winnipeg was over 7,000 in 1957, constituting the largest Mennonite city population in the world.

Mennonite church work in Winnipeg began in 1907 when the Winkler M.B. Church began a mission there. The second work was a G.C.M. mission begun in 1921. Other missions have been established by the older Manitoba groups in later years as follows: E.M.B. in 1949, Chortitz in 1952, Evangelical (Kleine Gemeinde) in 1954, and the Church of God in Christ Mennonites (discontinued). The first three missions have developed into regular congregations for Mennonites, while the latter two serve as unorganized Mennonite fellowship groups; the missions have as a whole not won many non-Mennonites, and would have remained small had it not been for the immigration from Russia beginning in 1922. This latter movement was intended to go to the farming territory of southern Manitoba, but only a part of the immigrants have remained on the land. Large numbers, lacking capital, moved to the city to secure work. The later immigration after World War II (1948 ff.) went largely directly to the city. Of the present Winnipeg Mennonite population of over 7,000, at least 90 per cent is composed of immigrants since 1922.

In 1957 Greater Winnipeg had 4,000 baptized Mennonites distributed as follows: G.C.M.—2,215 in 4 congregations (First or Schoenwiese founded in 1926, 1,291; Sargent Avenue in 1928, 323; Bethel in 1938, 379; Bergthal Winnipeg Mission in 1950, 222); M.B.—1,521 in 4 congregations (Elmwood, formerly North End founded in 1913, new building in 1954, 460; North Kildonan in 1928, 499; South End in 1936, 521; Gospel Light, 41); E.M.B.—71 in one congregation, the Christian Fellowship Chapel (founded in 1949), plus a mission; and four missions (a total of 180 members) as follows: Chortitz (1952, 43), Evangelical (Kleine Gemeinde 1954, 50), C.G.C. (15), and Rudnerweide. The G.C.M. group also operates the St. Vital Mission in North Winnipeg, begun as a Sunday school in 1947.

The Mennonite Brethren and General Conference Mennonites have both developed educational institutions in Winnipeg. The M.B. have the M.B. Bible College (est. 1944 on the north side at 77 Kelvin St.) and the near-by M.B. Collegiate Institute (1945). The G.C.M. have the Canadian Mennonite Bible College (est. 1947) on the far south side in Tuxedo at 600 University Boulevard East, and Mennonite Educational Institute (1958). Other charitable institutions (all GCM) include Concordia Hospital (est. 1929), an 80-bed institution, Bethania Home for the Aged and Infirm with 84 beds (est. 1946 on 108 acres 11 miles north of Winnipeg), Ebenezer Girls' Home (est. 1926). The Christian Press, an M.B. publishing agency, publisher of the Mennonitische Rundschau, with a bookstore, was established by Herman Neufeld in 1923, and taken over in 1945 by a board which is partly conference controlled.

Mennonites also own and operate many private business institutions, a few of which follow. The Konrad Conservatory of Music, operating under this name since 1950, employs 17 teachers and has about 300 students in instrumental and vocal music and music theory, of whom about 65 are Mennonites. C. A. DeFehr and Sons, Ltd. (est. 1925), with a branch of equal size in Edmonton, Alberta, is a wholesale distributor for larger appliances, small implements, heating units, and fuel, with about 2,000 dealers. Monarch Machinery Co., Ltd. (est. by J. J. Klassen in 1935) has a turnover of over $1,000,000, and engages over 100 employees in the manufacture of pumps and farm equipment. John Martens & Co., Ltd. (est. in 1947), a wholesale sporting goods company, has 11 employees and a turnover of about $500,000. C. Huebert Lumber Co., Ltd., reached a peak turnover of about $900,000, but since 1952 the owner has gone over into the fiberboard manufacturing business. D. Ja.

G. Lohrenz, "The Mennonites in Winnipeg," Menn. Life VI (1951) 16-25; J. H. Enns, "Winnipeg, Manitoba," Menn. Life XI (July 1956).

Winnipeg City Mission of the Mennonite Brethren Church had its beginning when John Warkentin of Winkler, Man., presented a report to the Canadian M.B. Conference about the Mennonite Brethren and Baptists residing in Winnipeg who had no church affiliation. In 1913 the Conference stationed W. J. Bestvater as its first city missionary in Winnipeg. A small church building was purchased, but as the work grew, larger meeting places were provided. After Bestvater, the following served as missionaries: E. H. Nickel 1921-25; C. N. Hiebert 1925-41, and William Falk 1941-. The work has reached every section of the city. The Mary-Martha Home (q.v.) is also a branch of this mission. G.D.H.

Winnipeg (Man.) E.M.B. Church, called Christian Fellowship Chapel, was started in 1943. In 1957 it had 76 members, with John Eveland as pastor. Its meetinghouse was built in 1945. H.S.B.

Winnipeg (Man.) German Bible School was conducted in the basement of the North End Mennonite Brethren Church (now called Elmwood M.B. Church) 1931-44. It was an evening school conducted for Mennonites working in the city. No academic subjects were taught. The student body, mostly girls, varied from 12 to 30. The chief teachers were A. B. Peters and F. C. Thiessen. F.C.P.

Winnipeg South End Mennonite Brethren Church, Winnipeg, Man., was organized in 1936 with 90 members, under the leadership of P. Kornelsen, to serve members living in the south part of the city. The present meetinghouse was purchased from another denomination. In 1958 the congregation had 554 members, with J. P. Neufeld as leader and minister. A former minister was H. H. Janzen, widely known in American and European Mennonite circles. H.H.R.

Winnobbergen, (Sint), a village in West Flanders, Belgium, where there was some Anabaptist activity c1565. Jan (q.v.) Portier preached here for a large number of Anabaptists and once administered baptism. Of a congregation in this village, however, nothing is known. Wouter Wyckelssone, an otherwise unknown Mennonite, was arrested here in May 1591. (Verheyden, "Mennisme in Vlaanderen," ms.) vDZ.

Winschoten: see Midwolda, also Winschoten in Supplement.

Winston Mennonite Church (MC), Roseburg, Ore., established in 1955, had 18 members in 1957, with Roy E. Hostetler as pastor. M.G.

Winsum, a village in the Dutch province of Groningen. Leenaert (q.v.) Bouwens baptized 7 persons here in 1554-56. At this time or soon after a Mennonite congregation may have been founded, which later belonged to the Flemish branch. For further particulars see Obergum, a twin town of Winsum. The congregation was sometimes called Winsum and sometimes Obergum. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 1841, 1843.) vDZ.

Winter, Diebold, an Anabaptist preacher of Wissembourg in Alsace, an outstanding participant in the disputation of Pfeddersheim (q.v.) in 1557 and at Frankenthal (q.v.) 14 years later. He is apparently identical with Elder Theobald, who argued with Farwendel (q.v.) on the question of original sin.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 226; A. Brons, Ursprung, Entwicklung und Schicksale der . . . Mennoniten (Emden, 1912) 180; Chr. Hege, Die Täufer in der Kurpfalz (Frankfurt, 1908) III; ML IV.

Winter, Hendrik de (Amsterdam, 1717-after 1782), artist and art dealer, made the etchings of baptism, communion, and footwashing found in Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis I (Amsterdam, 1743). vDZ.

Thieme-Becker, Allg. Lexikon für bildenden Künstler XXXVI (1947) 76.

Winter, Valentin, leader (Vorsteher) of the Hutterian Brethren, chosen to the office on Feb. 22, 1622, at Pausram, d. Nov. 29, 1631, having led the brotherhood with skill and faithfulness for ten years. He is the author of the song, "Von Gottes Lieb und Fürsorg viel." (Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 601 f.; Wolkan, Lieder, 242; ML IV.)

Winter, Vitus Anton, pastor of the St. Jacobs church and professor in the Ludwigs Maximilian University at Landshut, Bavaria, Germany, author of Geschichte der bairischen Wiedertäufer im 16. Jahrhundert (Munich, 1809). This book attempts a treatment of Bavarian Anabaptist history on the basis of the sources, but actually offers little. Of value is only some information on Anabaptist leaders like Augustin Würzelburger and Georg Wagner and on the terrible persecution and suppression of the Anabaptist movement by the Bavarian dukes. The documents given at the end of the book are also valuable. (ML IV.) NEFF.

Winter, Wolfgang: see Wimmer, Wolfgang.

Winter Bible Schools, formerly called "short term" or "special term Bible schools," are organized adult education programs of two to six weeks' duration held on the campus of church high schools or colleges, or in local congregations at the meetinghouse, and relatively unique to the Mennonite Church (MC) in North America. The schools usually have no educational requirements for admission, and credits are not usually transferable, although sometimes credit is given by church high schools. These schools flourished largely in 1920-40, at a time when the Mennonite population was still predominantly rural, and when many young people did not go to high school or college. At the peak, in 1939, the combined attendance was about 2,000. Since then attendance has declined greatly.

The first Winter Bible School was held at Elkhart Institute (later Goshen College) in 1900 for a 4-weeks' term. It soon became a 6-weeks' school, held in January-February, and was not finally discontinued until 1954. The second school was the Ontario Mennonite Bible School (q.v.), established in 1907 at the First Mennonite Church in Kitchener, Ont., and still in operation. In 1929 the term was lengthened to 12 weeks, and in 1951 an additional 5-months' course was established under a separate board but in the same quarters, called the Ontario Mennonite Bible Institute (q.v.). The third school, established at Hesston College, Hesston, Kan., in 1909, and the fourth, established at Eastern Mennonite College, Harrisonburg, Va., in 1917 (preliminary terms in 1915 at Alexandria, Va., and in 1916 at Harrisonburg) are still operating. The Johnstown (Pa.) Bible School operated 1922-56, and the Canton (Ohio) Bible School 1913-55 (with omissions). The Alberta-Saskatchewan school at Carstairs, Alberta, begun in 1935, is still operating.

In conference districts in which the constituency is scattered, migratory winter Bible schools were developed which held sessions at various places in the conference district, either from year to year or within the same year. Four conference districts developed such migratory winter Bible schools—Dakota-Montana, now North Central; Pacific Coast; Ontario Amish Mennonite; and Alberta-Saskatchewan.

Many local congregations began to sponsor winter Bible schools. These were usually not held longer than 2 or 3 weeks. Attempts at this type of school were made as early as 1914, but it was not until 1930 that these schools became successful. The Amish Mennonite Church near Allensville, Pa., conducted a 3-week school, Feb. 2-20, 1914, under the name of Big Valley Bible School. The next session was held in 1924. Another session was in 1927. The work was revived in 1933 and continued without interruption to 1948. Similar schools were conducted in 1930-36 in the churches around Kalona and Wayland, Iowa. Winter Bible schools have been held at various times since 1930 at the Central church near Archbold, Ohio; Bowne church, Clarksville, Mich.; Midland church, Midland, Mich.; Leo church, Leo, Ind.; Creston church, Creston, Mont.; Maple Grove Amish Mennonite church near Atglen, Pa.; Howard-Miami church, Kokomo, Ind.; Fairview church, Fairview, Mich.; Zion church, Hubbard, Ore.; Berea church, Montgomery, Ind.; Shore church near Shippshewana, Ind., and others.

In 1939 winter Bible schools were begun in the Lancaster Conference District in Eastern Pennsylvania. An evening version of the winter Bible school became quite successful in the Franconia Conference District; although it originated in Franconia as early as 1932, it did not begin to reach its greatest strength until 1940-41, when the evening winter Bible school classes in seven Franconia churches had a combined enrollment of over 1,000.

Most of the 6-weeks' winter Bible schools added special courses for ministers, and a number established a Ministers' Week. In 1940 the Winter Bible School Council was established under the General Educational Council of the Mennonite Board of Education to aid in strengthening and promoting the winter Bible school work.

Without doubt the winter Bible schools have been of great value in Bible teaching and spiritual edification and inspiration; in a sense they took over the function which the congregational Bible conferences had earlier filled. In the 1950's it was becoming clear that their day was past in many parts of the church, although they were still filling a need in some areas.

P.M.L., H.S.B.

Clarence Fretz, "A History of Winter Bible Schools in the Mennonite Church," MQR XVI (1942) 51-81, and 178-95; P. M. Lederach, "A History of Religious Education in the Mennonite Church" (unpublished doctoral dissertation, Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary, 1949).

Winterfeld, Karl von (1784-1852), a jurist who distinguished himself by several works on church music, including Zur Geschichte heiliger Tonkunst, a series of articles published in two volumes (Leipzig, 1850-52). In the second volume he devotes a very interesting chapter to the hymns of the Anabaptists in the 16th century, analyzing with complete objectivity a hymnbook of 1570 which came into his hands in the Royal Library in Munich, titled, Ein schon Gesangbüchlein geistlicher Lieder (see Hymnology). Historically this work has been superseded by Rudolf Wolkan's Lieder der Wiedertäufer (Berlin, 1903). It nevertheless is to Winterfeld's credit that he pointed out the uniqueness and significance of Anabaptist songs 50 years earlier than Wolkan. (ML IV.) NEFF.

Winterswijk, a town in the Dutch province of Gelderland (pop. c23,000 with c120 Mennonites), seat of a Mennonite congregation, concerning whose origin there is no exact information. F. C. Fleischer suggests that Mennonites living at Winterswijk and surroundings because of persecution crossed the border to adjacent Westphalia, Germany, as early as 1543, and settled in Bocholt (q.v.) and other Westphalian towns until they were expelled by a mandate of the bishop of Münster c1610. Then some Mennonites, including the Waliën (q.v.) and Willink (q.v.) families, settled in Winterswijk. A note in the old Winterswijk church book says that Mennonite meetings started in 1611 in the home of Hindrick Waliën at Winterswijk. At least in 1638 there was a Mennonite congregation here, whose membership until the middle of the 19th century was very small, seldom surpassing 30 members. This congregation in the 17th and 18th centuries was called Waterlander, which means simply that it was rather liberal. Whether there was also a second (Flemish?) church at Winterswijk is questionable. A meetinghouse, still in use, was built in 1711 after meetings had been held for a century in the Waliën home.

Mennonite families found at Winterswijk in the 18th century were ten Broeke, ten Cate, Coenders, Coster, Dekkers, Eppenhof(f), Hoedemaker, Hofkes, Nieuwenhuys, Waliën (Walyen), Wenkelaar, and Willink, soon after also van Lochem and Paschen. Nearly all these families died out or moved elsewhere in the 19th century or earlier, only the Paschen and Willink families being found here until recent times. Most members of the Winterswijk congregation, nearly all engaged in business and manufacturing, particularly textiles, iron, and brickyards, were well-to-do in the 18th century. In 1733 and 1736 they contributed 150 and 95 guilders for relief of the Prussian Mennonites.

At first the congregation was served by a preacher chosen from the membership. Harmen Eppenhof, the last of these untrained and unsalaried ministers, served until d.1693. From 1700 the church was served by preachers who received some salary and had some training for the ministry, but had no university or seminary education. The first pastor of Winterswijk trained at the Amsterdam seminary was Pieter van Delden, serving 1786-1800. He was succeeded by A. R. Fink, a former Lutheran pastor, 1802-34, G. H. van Velsen Coster 1836-65, A. Snellen 1867-74, S. Lulofs 1875-77, P. E. Lugt 1878-1908, F. C. Fleischer 1909-24, C. C. de Maar 1925-40, and Miss J. M. Eelman 1942-55. Since 1956 the congregation has been served by the pastor of Zutphen (q.v.). The baptized membership, numbering 24 in 1746, was c40 in 1800, 13 in 1847, 19 in 1861, 45 in 1900, 63 in 1926, 76 in 1940, and 150 in 1958. The members live at Winterswijk and surrounding towns.

Until 1786 the deacons, sometimes called directors, always two, were chosen from the married men. After 1786 unmarried men were also eligible. From 1825 until c1920 there was usually only one deacon, who served for many years. Church activities now (1958) are a ladies' circle and a Sunday school for children.

vdZ.

F. C. Fleischer, De Doopsgezinde gemeente te Winterswijk (n.p., 1911); Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos 2344-46; Naamlijst 1804, 69; DB 1909, 172; Blaupot t. C., Holland II, 49, 205, 233.

Winton Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, located just east of Winton, Cal., had its beginning in 1911, when the first 12 members assembled in a barn for worship services. The first church building was erected in 1912. It was replaced by larger buildings in 1917, 1926, and 1945. The present building has a seating capacity of 800. The ministers in 1957 were Edward Jantz, John Wiens, D. H. Dyck, John Esau, and A. T. Koehn; the membership was 290.

N.K.

Winton Mennonite Brethren Church, located at Winton, Cal., was organized in 1922 under the leadership of J. M. Enns. The membership in 1957 was 51, with Menno A. Shellenberg as pastor. In 1958 the church moved to Atwater.

M.A.S.

Winton Mennonite Church (MC): see Sharon Mennonite Church.

Wipf, an old Hutterite family, probably of Swiss origin. We do not know when the Wipfs joined the brotherhood and how they happened to settle in Alwinz (q.v.), Transylvania. Perhaps they went there with the first settlers in 1621. In any case in 1694 one Michael Wipf was made Vorsteher (bishop) in Alwinz, though he was not particularly successful. The Wipfs of today are probably not descended from this man but from another Wipf, whose widow Annele together with her five children belonged to the few surviving "old Hutterites" in Transylvania prior to the coming of the Carinthians in 1756. She is expressly named by Johannes Waldner, the author of the Klein-Geschichtsbuch.

She and the children then went to Russia with the rest of the group. A Jakob Wipf was "the teacher" c1853. At that time a group of Hutterites led by Peter Hofer (see Hofer) and Jakob Wipf separated from the Hutterthal colony to start a new settlement, Johannesruh, named after Johann Cornies (q.v.). Jakob Wipf must have been a very alert and intelligent leader; he had attended the Mennonite Zentralschule at Halbstadt, Molotschna, and received a teacher's license. In 1864, when this group experimented for a few years with the re-establishment of communal living, it became known as the "Lehrerleut" (q.v.), since Wipf was a teacher and was generally known as Jakob Lehrer. In 1874 the great exodus from Russia began, but at first only the Dariusleut (q.v.) and the Schmiedeleut (q.v.) went to America, settling in South Dakota. In 1875-76 two Brethren from the Bon Homme colony, S.D., went back to Russia to encourage the Lehrerleut, led by Jakob Wipf and Peter Hofer, to come to America and to re-establish there their former community of goods. This they did. In 1877 Wipf, Hofer, and 13 other families migrated and established a colony at Old Elmspring, near Alexandria, S.D., (later near Parkston), thus establishing the third Hutterite Bruderhof in America. Jakob Wipf was its Vorsteher until his death in 1896. A number of Wipfs, however, broke away from this communal living and settled in and around Freeman, S.D., becoming known as the "Prairie Leut." They joined other Mennonite groups. (Zieglschmid, Klein-Geschichtsbuch, 228, 257.)

R.F.

Wirdum, a hamlet in East Friesland, Germany. Leenaert (q.v.) Bouwens baptized three persons here in 1551-54 and 28 in 1563-65. It is not known that there was a congregation at Wirdum; they may have joined the congregation soon after called Emsigerland (q.v.).

Wirdum, a village six miles south of Leeuwarden in the Dutch province of Friesland, where Leenaert (q.v.) Bouwens baptized at least 365 persons in 1551-82. There was, however, no Mennonite congregation at Wirdum. The converts probably joined the church of Leeuwarden (q.v.) or some other neighboring congregation.

vdZ.

Wisconsin, a midwestern state north of Illinois, has an area of 56,154 sq. mi. and in 1956 had a population of 3,764,000. It is the leading dairy state, ranking first in the nation in the production of milk and cheese and second in butter. The first Mennonites in the state were several Amish families who moved into Sawyer County (q.v.), in the northwestern part of the state, in 1909, the Bontreger family in the following year, and later 15 other families, settling near Exeland. The congregation, now extinct, was last listed in the 1927 Mennonite Yearbook. A second O.O.A. settlement in near-by Rusk County was listed in the Yearbook 1922-34, under the addresses of Glen Flora and Ingram. A third O.O.A. settlement was listed for the first time in 1934 at Medford, Taylor Co., a town about 35 miles southeast of Glen Flora. William M. Miller, an Amish bishop from Haven, Kan., was living here by 1925, and Joseph Y. Lehman, a minister, by 1930 or earlier. In 1950 the membership of this group had reached 94, and the settlement was divided into two districts, the North Side and the South Side, very likely in 1951. The South Side spills over into Clark County and has Curtiss for its address.

The Mennonite Church (MC) has three organized and two unorganized congregations in Wisconsin. Mission activity began in the area southeast of Exeland (q.v.) in 1929, but a congregation was not organized until 1954. The membership in 1957 was 24. The largest of the five congregations is Sheldon (q.v.) in Rusk County. Mission activity was started in the area in 1932 and a church organized in 1936. Its 1957 membership was 73. South Lawrence (q.v.) at Glen Flora was started in 1946 and in 1957 had a membership of 26. The two unorganized congregations are at Loyal and Hayward, both in northwestern Wisconsin. The total Amish and Mennonite membership for Wisconsin in 1958 was approximately 225.

During the years of Civilian Public Service Mennonite young men served in dairy units in the southern half of Wisconsin. By the summer of 1943 Dodge, Fond du Lac, Green, Dane, and Outagamie counties had 20 assignees each. Other Mennonite CO's served in the Southern Wisconsin Colony and Training School for the feeble-minded, at Union Grove (q.v.), and in the Winnebago (q.v.) State Hospital, a psychiatric hospital. M.G.

Wisler (Whisler, Whistler), a Mennonite family, found in the Emmental, Switzerland. Some emigrated to the Palatinate, Germany, where Heinrich Wissler was a preacher of the Erpolzheim-Friedelsheim congregation 1762-c90, and Johann Wissler (Wiesler) preacher of the Ruchheim congregation from 1775, elder 1790-after 1802. From Switzerland or the Palatinate the family came to America, now occurring most frequently in the Deep Run area of Bucks County, Pa., in Mahoning-Columbiana counties of eastern Ohio, and in Elkhart County, Ind. For Mennonite history the most significant branch of the family goes back to Christian Wisler (d. 1830), who did service in the Revolutionary War and married Susan Holdeman (1774-1838) of Bucks County. They were probably affiliated with the Deep Run Mennonite Church after marriage. Christian and Susan were the parents of eleven children. About 1820 the family removed to Columbiana County, Ohio, settling in the portion that became Mahoning County in 1846. Susan is buried in the Midway cemetery. Three of the children moved to Elkhart County: John Wisler (1800-90), Jacob Wisler, who was ordained preacher at the Oberholtzer church (now Midway) in 1833, and bishop at the Yellow Creek church in Elkhart County in 1851; and Susanna Wisler (b. 1813), who married Henry Yoder. Bishop Jacob Wisler (q.v.) founded the Old Order Mennonite Church in Indiana and Ohio in 1872. Contrary to the beliefs of the family in Elkhart County, there seems to be no close connection between this family and that of the Quaker artist, James Whistler (1834-1903), who was born in Massachusetts, the son of Major George Washington Whistler. One of Bishop Jacob Wisler's sons, John H., changed his name to Whisler; he was the father of Jonas L. Whisler (b. 1872), proprietor of Whisler Brand Meat Products, Goshen, Ind. J.C.W.

Wisler, Jacob (1808-89), founder of the Old Order Mennonites (q.v.), was born in Bucks County, Pa., on Oct. 31, 1808, the eighth child of Christian Wisler and Susan Holdeman. He moved with his parents to Columbiana County, Ohio, about 1820. There on Nov. 19, 1827, he married Mary Hoover (1808-60). To this union were born at least seven children, including David (1830-1902), a deacon. In 1833 Jacob was ordained to the ministry in the Midway Mennonite (MC) Church (q.v.) near North Lima, Ohio, almost certainly by Bishop Jacob Nold. In 1848 he and his family moved to Elkhart County, Ind., and settled on a farm one mile north of the present Yellow Creek church (q.v.) and two and three-fourths miles west. His second wife was Catherine Knopp; this union was childless. In 1851 Abraham Rohrer, a bishop of Medina County, Ohio, who had ordained Martin Hoover (d. 1850 at the age of 89) bishop just before he came to Elkhart County in 1845, came to Yellow Creek and ordained Wisler as his successor. Wisler's conservative attitudes caused Joseph Rohrer, a fellow minister, to leave the Mennonite Church and unite with the Evangelical Church. Wisler also had difficulty with Joseph Holdeman, a deacon of the near-by Holdeman (q.v.) congregation. Much more serious were his differences with Daniel Brenneman (q.v.), a preacher of Fairfield County, Ohio, who settled in Elkhart County in 1864. Vain efforts were made annually in 1867-71 to effect permanent peace among the ministers of western Elkhart County (considered as one bishop district west of Goshen), but Wisler was unwilling to accept the Sunday school and similar new institutions and practices. Following a decision against Wisler by an outside committee of six bishops to suspend his bishop office, John F. Funk (q.v.), on behalf of the majority of the ministers, on Jan. 6, 1872, announced that Wisler and his followers were no longer members of the church. Thereupon Wisler led a schism, establishing a continuing Yellow Creek congregation which came to be called the Old Order Mennonite Church. He was followed by similarly minded "old order" groups near Wadsworth, Orrville, and North Lima, Ohio. Wisler died on May 1, 1889, and was buried in the old Mennonite cemetery across the road from the Wisler Yellow Creek (frame) meetinghouse. Christian Shaum, Wisler's assistant bishop, and Martin A. Hoover preached at his funeral service.

A number of efforts toward healing the Wisler schism were made in 1872-89, but Wisler always felt that he and his group were a happy fellowship, much closer to the old Mennonite practices and attitudes than were the "Funk" Mennonites (MC), and that therefore there was no reason to attempt a reunion. If the more progressive group wished to return to the old ways and drop the Sunday school, they could join the congregation in which he had been a preacher since 1848 and a bishop since 1851.

J.C.W.

Wisler Mennonites in Ontario. In 1917 the ultra-conservative element of Old Order Mennonites (q.v.) in Ontario (q.v.), located in Woolwich and Wellesley townships, Waterloo County, separated from the main body under the leadership of Deacon David W. Martin. They have practiced very exacting conservative methods. From a small number of families at first the group has grown to a membership of 116, in 1954, with three churches—Wellesley near Wallenstein, Martins near Hawkesville, and Conestoga near St. Jacobs. The group is not affiliated with any conference. At first they chose Daniel M. Brubacher as bishop. In 1920 a schism on the question of the ban gave rise to the Brubacher group and the Martin group. In 1921 Enoch Horst was chosen bishop of the Martin group. In 1924 Horst left the Martin group and has stood alone. In 1925 David W. Martin became bishop of the Martin group. The Brubacher group has practically lost out. In 1957 the ministers were Manasseh M. Frey, Martin B. Frey, and Elam Martin. J.C.F.

L. J. Burkholder, Brief History of Mennonites in Ontario (Toronto, 1935) 200, 208-9.

Wislerites: see Old Order Mennonites.

Wismar Resolutions, called in Dutch Besluit tot Wismar, also Besprek van Wismar, were the result of a conference of Mennonite elders held in 1554 at Wismar in Mecklenburg, Germany. Present were (according to Vos) Menno (q.v.) Simons, who was then living in Wismar, Dirk (q.v.) Philips, Leenaert (q.v.) Bouwens, Gillis van Aken (q.v.), Herman (q.v.) van Tiel, Hans Busschaert (q.v.), and Hoyte (q.v.) Rienckx. The Besluit tot Wismar contains nine articles. The first five articles deal with shunning or avoidance (ban). Article 6 deals with the question of young believers needing the approbation of their elders for getting married. Article 7, which is not quite clear, deals with the right of believers to invoke the aid of a worldly court. Article 8 treats the subject of bearing arms; this article also is not very clear but it seems that the elders at Wismar did not profess absolute nonresistance. Article 9 states that only a person who is ordained by a congregation or an elder may teach and admonish, i.e., function as a preacher in a congregation.

The Besluit tot Wismar was printed several times. It appears at the end of Menno's Een liefelijke vermaninghe van dat schouwen der valscher broederen (Harlingen, likely 1576), in the Successio Anabaptistica of 1603 (reprinted BRN VII, 51-53), and in Grouwelen der Hooft-ketteren (Leiden, 1623). It is also found in Blaupot t. C., Groningen I, 252-54, and Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 123-27. The first three articles were printed in Het Brilleken (Haarlem, 1630). vdZ.

Wissel, van der, a Dutch Mennonite family at least from the 17th century found in the Lamist (q.v.) church at Amsterdam, from the 18th century at Vlissingen, Zierikzee and other congregations, in the first generations all businessmen, from the 19th century also physicians. Two members of this family went into the ministry. Anthonie van der Wissel (b.1862 at Amsterdam, d.1951 at Bilthoven) studied theology at the Amsterdam university and Mennonite seminary and was a Mennonite pastor of Tjalleberd 1889-90 and Drachten-Ureterp 1890-1903. From 1903 until 1925 he served as pastor of a group of liberal Reformed at Leiden.

His son Felix van der Wissel, b. 1892 at Amsterdam, studied theology at the Amsterdam university and the Mennonite seminary, was afterwards a teacher in primary schools and served as a pastor at Aardenburg 1927-32, Kampen 1932-37, and Leeuwarden 1937-57. He was the chairman of the Dutch Mennonite Peace Group (Doopsgezinde—q.v.—Vredesgroep) 1947-56. He published Verlossing (Assen, 1936), Evangelie en Oorlog, three sermons (Leeuwarden, 1945), Perspectief, seven sermons (Leeuwarden, 1956), Indogmatische Geloofsbeschouwingen (Lochem, 1958), and a number of papers in Nieuw Theologisch Tijdschrift, Algemeen Doopsgezind Weekblad, and Stemmen uit de Doopsgezinde Broederschap. vdZ.

Wis(s)mer, a Mennonite family of German descent in America. The first of them to emigrate to America was Jacob Wismer (1684-1787), who moved to Carolina in 1710, where he nearly lost his life in an Indian raid. Shortly after 1720 he settled as the first Mennonite in Bucks County, Pa., living in what is now Bedminster Township, where he died at the age of 102. There have been a large number of Wismer leaders of the church: Wenger lists for the Franconia (q.v.) Conference one bishop: Abraham Wismer (1797-1877), ordained preacher at Skippack 1838, bishop in 1852; three preachers: Abraham Wismer (1746-1823) at Deep Run, Henry K. Wismer (1823-1910) in the Skippack church, and Enos Wismer (1868-1951), of Deep Run; and two deacons: Abraham Wismer (1791-1859) of Plumstead Township, who also left some historical papers, and Benjamin Wismer (1856-1934) of the Skippack congregation. After 1800 some Wismers moved from the Franconia region to Waterloo in Ontario, among them Daniel Wismer (1820-1909), a bishop in the Waterloo congregation (MC) and in Marion County, Kan. Henry and Christian Wismer joined the Brethren (q.v.) in Christ (River Brethren), the latter c1860. vdZ.

A. J. Fretz, A Brief History of Jacob Wismer and a Complete Genealogical Family Register (Elkhart, 1893) 294 et passim; Daniel Kauffman, Menn. Cyclopedic Dictionary, 397 f.

Wiszowaty, Andreas (1608-78), a Unitarian theologian, great-grandson of Fausto Sozzini (q.v.), studied in Leiden, Holland, in 1631, served the Unitarian church in Poland until he was expelled in 1658, traveled in Hungary, lived at Mannheim, Germany, 1663-66, and from then until his death in Amsterdam. He is said to have published 62 writings, some of which influenced the Dutch Mennonites. Wiszowaty also co-operated in the revision of the Rakow (q.v.) catechism.

In the early 18th century a Wiszowaty family, four sisters, probably great-granddaughters of Andreas, were baptized into the Amsterdam Zonist (q.v.) congregation, in 1713, 1716(?), 1718, and 1721. vdZ.

W. J. Kühler, Het Socinianisme in Nederland (Leiden, 1912) 229 f., 236 ff.; church records of Amsterdam.

Wit, de, a common Dutch Mennonite family name, with a number of unrelated branches. A Mennonite de Wit family is found at Wieringen, where Jan Jansz de Wit was a lay preacher in the Frisian congregation 1736-40(?) and his brother Simon Jansz de Wit 1736-43; in 1743 he resigned, serving from then until his death in 1784 as a deacon. Many of their descendants were deacons at Wieringen until recent times. Willem de Wit, concerning whom there is no information except that he was a man of great ability and eloquence, was a preacher of the Waterlander congregation at Haarlem c1660. G. de Wit was a preacher at Utrecht 1714-29. In Alkmaar a de Wit family is mentioned from 1682. Jan Jansz de Wit was a minister of the Alkmaar Frisian congregation 1715-d.29. Some de Wits also served here as deacons, among whom was Jan de Wit Dzn, 1898-1927. Jan Cornelisz de Wit (de Witte) was an untrained preacher at Oostgrafdijk at least 1714-16, at Texel 1716-18, and Vlissingen 1718-c26. In Enkhuizen, den Helder, Zaandam, and Hoorn there were also deacons by the name of de Wit. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 1612, 1625-28; DB 1863, 138; 1875, 35; 1891, 9, 10, 47, 49, 57 ff.; 1910, 119; (J. de Lange Cjzn), Beknopte Geschiedenis der Doopsgez. gemeente te Alkmaar (n.p., n.d.-1927) 39, 70, 91, 157, 160, 161, 163; (H. B. Berghuys), Geschiedenis der Doopsgez. gemeente te Utrecht (n.p., n.d.-1926) 47; Blaupot t. C., Holland I, 38; De Zondagsbode XL (1926-27) No. 3.

Witmarsum, a village in the Dutch province of Friesland, the birthplace of Menno Simons. (q.v.). Menno was a Catholic pastor here from 1531 until he withdrew from the Catholic Church, probably on Jan. 30, 1536. According to a local tradition, Menno lived at Witmarsum for some time after his withdrawal, preaching the Gospel to his adherents in a house outside the town. This tradition is, however, probably in error, for the Court of Friesland and the Stadholder were very alert for heresy: as early as 1527, before Menno was in Witmarsum, a search for heretical books was made in the parsonage. And in the fall of 1536, when Menno secretly visited Witmarsum, the Stadholder of Friesland immediately had his hosts arrested. Thus it must be assumed that after leaving the Catholic Church Menno left Witmarsum at once.

Whether Menno left a Mennonite congregation at Witmarsum or not is an open question. At any rate, there was such a congregation here by 1560. Lee-naert (q.v.) Bouwens baptized five (possibly eight) persons at Witmarsum in 1557-61 and another five in 1563-65. Concerning the early history of the congregation there is only one bit of information. It was more or less united (complete union not before 1823) with the neighboring Pingjum (q.v.) congregation, and in the 17th century Pingjum seems to have been the more important part of the union. In the 17th and 18th centuries the church was called Waterlander and Flemish, but this obviously does not mean that it was formed by a Waterlander and a Flemish congregation, but simply that it held the progressive Lamist (q.v.) views of the united Flemish-Waterlander church of Amsterdam. In 1695 Witmarsum joined the newly founded Sociëteit (conference) of Friesland; at this time it numbered about 25 baptized members. Membership figures of the 18th century are not available; in 1828 there were less than 20 members; from then the figures are always those of Pingjum and Witmarsum together: 54 in 1861, 80 in 1900, 48 in 1958.

Until 1877 services at Witmarsum were held in a very simple meetinghouse called the Menno Simons House, because according to the (incorrect) tradition Menno lived or preached here. This meetinghouse was remodeled in 1828 (engraving of this old meetinghouse by Dirk Sluyter c1828). The last service was held here on Dec. 9, 1877, and the next Sunday a new church in town was dedicated, which is still in use. It was equipped with an organ in 1881 and thoroughly renovated in 1887.

Until 1794 the congregation was served by untrained and unsalaried ministers, chosen from the membership, and later by untrained ministers from abroad who received some salary. The first minister educated at the Amsterdam Theological Seminary to serve the Witmarsum-Pingjum congregations was C. Corver 1859-63, followed by S. G. Binnerts 1863-70, J. Sepp 1871-73, P. Feenstra Jr. 1873-81, B. Haga 1882-88, P. A. Vis 1889-91, P. Ens 1899-1903, H. Westra 1904-7, J. E. van Brakel 1908-14, A. A. Sepp 1914-18, Alb. Vis 1919-22, P. J. Smidts 1923-27, W. F. Golterman 1933-36, H. P. Tulner 1936-39, A. H. van Drooge 1940-46, and Miss S. E. Doyer 1946-57. Since 1933 the pastor also served the Makkum congregation (the pastors Golterman and van Drooge lived at Makkum, Tulner and Doyer at Witmarsum). Since 1957 the Makkum, Witmarsum, and Pingjum congregations are served together by the pastor of Bolsward (q.v.).

Church activities are a ladies' circle and youth group "Menniste Bouwers." On the site of the old meetinghouse a monument was erected to Menno Simons, dedicated on Sept. 11, 1879, by P. Cool, retired pastor of Harlingen. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 2; II, No. 2347; II, 2, No. 651; K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 52, 230; Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 56, 89, 188, 205, 245, 254, 306; Naamlijst 1829, 46; DB 1878, 132; 1880, 164; 1888, 148; 1916, 81 ff.; P. Cool and P. Feenstra Jr., Gedenkschrift van het Menno-Simons-Monument (Zwolle, 1879).

Witmarsum, the central one of the three (the other two Gnadenthal and Waldheim) civil districts (villages) into which the Krauel (q.v.) Mennonite Colony in the state of Santa Catarina, Brazil (q.v.), founded in February 1930, was divided. Witmarsum can be considered the capital of the Krauel Colony since it was the seat of the co-operative store (Cooperacion Agricola Witmarsum), the Zentralschule (each village had an elementary school), the hospital (est. 1935, new building 1937), the creamery, and the starch factory; there was, however, no central seat of government. Each village had its own Schulze, while the Oberschulze or mayor of the entire settlement continued to live on his own farm in his home village. David Nikkel, the Oberschulze during most of the Krauel Colony history, did not live in Witmarsum. The two churches in the Krauel Colony, the Witmarsum Mennonite Church and Witmarsum Mennonite Brethren Church, first worshipped in the school buildings. In 1948 the M.B. meetinghouse was built in Witmarsum; of the two Mennonite meetinghouses, the main one was built in Witmarsum in 1950.

The economic enterprises in Witmarsum consisted of two milk assembly and separating plants, a slaughterhouse and equipment, a large starch factory, two sawmills, a feed and flour mill, an electric generating plant, the colony co-operative store and all equipment. There were in addition a number of individually owned services, such as saddlers, shoemakers, blacksmiths, woodworking shops, and a small leather goods factory.

Witmarsum originally had 70 of the 150 Krauel families. By 1934, the high point in Krauel population, Witmarsum had 341 of the 846 in the entire colony. There was little concentration of Krauel population, since families occupied farm tracts of 40-100 acres scattered along a 12-mile stretch of the 1½ to 2 mile wide Rio Alto Krauel Valley. When the Krauel Colony was dissolved in 1952, Witmarsum also disappeared as a Mennonite settlement. Other settlers moved in, but it is not known whether the name was retained. H.S.B., H.L.B.

Witmarsum, The, the Bluffton College student news publication, continued from The College Record (April 1902-June 1913), first issue October, 1913. It has varied in size, format, and periodicity from 6 x 8 in. to 13 x 19 in. and in 1958 to 10¼ x 13½, from 16 to 4 pages (1958), and from biweekly to bimonthly (in 1958 weekly). D.L.G.

Witmarsum Theological Seminary Bulletin was the organ of the seminary, issued quarterly, 6 x 9 in., variable in length, first issue March 1922, last issue apparently March 1931 (Vol. X, No. 1). The March issue was the annual (or biennial) catalog. For some years the May issue was in the form of a student annual, called Witmarsum Spirit. The Bulletin of the Mennonite Biblical Seminary in Chicago (first issue October 1945) was intended as a successor to the Witmarsum Bulletin, but was erroneously numbered Volume IX. H.S.B.

Witmarsum Theological Seminary was located at Bluffton, Ohio, 1921-31. It had its beginning in the fall of 1914 as a department of Bluffton College and was known as Mennonite Seminary, but to better serve its constituency it was made an independent institution, and on July 6, 1921, it was reorganized under its own charter, board of trustees, faculty and administrative management, taking the name Witmarsum Theological Seminary.

The board of trustees of the Seminary was made up of two representatives each from six different Mennonite branches in the United States and two representatives of the alumni of the Seminary. This was designed to make the Seminary a unifying agency among the Mennonites in America. The faculty was also made up of men from different branches. The Seminary had students from all these six branches. The groups intended to be represented were the following: G.C.M., M.B., M.C., E.M., M.B.C., and Central Conference. Actually the support was limited largely to the G.C.M. and Central Conference groups.

The faculty consisted of four full-time professors:

J. E. Hartzler, President; Paul Whitmer, Dean; Jacob Quiring, Old Testament; J. A. Huffman, New Testament. The part-time men were N. E. Byers, S. M. Musselman, and others. The part-time professors were either pastors of churches or teachers in Bluffton College. The work of the Seminary was divided into two schools. The Graduate Seminary, open to men and women who had completed the regular college course with the A.B. or equivalent degree, offered a 3-year B.D. course. The second school was the Theological College which required high-school graduation for admission and offered a 4-year Th.B. course. Students came mostly from Bethel and Bluffton colleges, with a few from Goshen and Tabor.

In the Graduate Seminary the work was arranged under nine departments: Old Testament, New Testament, Church History, Systematic Theology, Philosophy of Religion and Religious Education, Homiletics and Practical Theology, History of Religions and Missions, Public Speaking, and Church Music. The Biblical departments had each the services of a full-time professor. In the Theological College the work was a combination of collegiate and theological courses. The Seminary graduated a total of 26 men and 3 women in its 11-year history. The total number of degrees granted from the beginning of the Mennonite Seminary in 1914 was 56, mostly B.D. Some M.A. degrees were granted by Bluffton College for work done in the Seminary. A two-year lower level English Bible course was offered for a time, but enjoyed only a small attendance.

The Seminary had a small endowment of $25,000, but the main support came from five conferences, each of which assumed the support of one chair.

With the coming of the movement for standard theological seminaries and the resulting mergers and affiliations of seminaries to qualify for that rating, Witmarsum Seminary became conscious of the need for changes in its setup. Letters were addressed to a number of well-established seminaries inquiring what opportunity there might be for an affiliation with them. The responses from all the seminaries contacted were generous and eager to enter such a relationship. This was a difficult decision to make. Location, type of teaching, cultural and social differences in these seminaries varied widely. On these points the seminary family differed. No agreement seemed possible; consequently the Witmarsum organization disintegrated and the Seminary closed in May 1931. After 14 years the Seminary reopened in Chicago under a new name and organization but with the help of $11,000 in liquid assets and the library and equipment of Witmarsum Seminary. P.E.W.

J. E. Hartzler, Education Among the Mennonites of America (Danvers, Ill., 1935) 174-79.

Witmer (Widmer, Whitmer), a Mennonite family name found among the Swiss Brethren since 1531. Some bearers fled to the Palatinate c1670 and to France (see Widmer, Hans, and Widmer, Christian). Among the immigrants of 1717 to Lancaster County, Pa., were Benjamin Witmer and his son Abraham, who four years later bought 265 acres from the London Company. Benjamin's son John had a family of seven children, and his son Benjamin inherited his uncle Abraham's lands; another Abraham built the Bridgeport Bridge at the end of East King Street, Lancaster, in 1798. Included in the Mennonite ministry were the two Abraham Witmers of the Manor, Samuel B. Witmer (1767-1819) of Weaverland, David Witmer (1800-76) of Mellingers congregation, David Witmer of York County, Esaias Witmer (1856-1937) of the Metzler congregation, and Mahlon Witmer, bishop of the New Holland congregation. A branch of the family settled in Columbiana County, Ohio, where I. B. Witmer was long minister (MC) at Leetonia, and from which place Paul E. Whitmer came, who was a teacher and dean at Goshen College, later teacher and dean at Witmarsum Theological Seminary, and G.C.M. minister near Bluffton, Ohio. A branch in Ontario furnished ministers (MC) J. Wesley Witmer at Hespeler, Leslie H. Witmer at Baden, and Robert Witmer, a missionary in Paris, France. I.D.L.

Paul Peachey, Die soziale Herkunft der Schweizer Täufer (Karlsruhe, 1954); D. L. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottsdale, 1953).

Witness of the Word: see Zeugnis der Schrift.

Witte, Jan de, author of Vrede-schrift daer inne gehandelt wort van de voornaamste verschillen in de Leere en verstanden onder de Doopsghesinde Gemeenten . . . (Amsterdam, 1638). This writing, dealing with the differences between several branches of the Dutch Mennonites, was published by "a friend of the truth," apparently after the death of de Witte. De Witte also wrote Sommige Spreucken oft Redenen wt der H. Schrift, Fonteynewijs by een vergadert . . . (Amsterdam, 1605). Concerning de Witte nothing is known except that he belonged to the Waterlander (q.v.) branch. (Kühler, Geschiedenis II, 3 f., 33 f., 39, 76.) vdZ.

Wittenoom, C., a Dutch Mennonite, published In't rym de twee Sentbrieven Pauli, geschreeven aan die van Rome en d'eerste Sentbrief aan die van Corinthen . . . (Amsterdam, 1692). He also composed a number of hymns. vdZ.

Wittgenstein, now a county (pop. 29,264) in the province of North Rhine-Westphalia, in the 18th and 19th centuries a principality ruled by the counts of Sayn-Wittgenstein. For the small Amish Mennonite congregation here, see Waldeck.

Witveen, a hamlet in the Dutch province of Friesland, the seat of a Mennonite congregation now called Rottevalle (q.v.). The congregation at Witveen was probably founded c1620, when the peat fens (Dutch, veen) in this area were broken up. The first peat diggers were mostly Mennonites; at first meetings were held in a peat digger's hut, but in 1671 a plain meetinghouse was erected, which was considerably remodeled and enlarged in 1712. This church had some windows painted with Bible texts and the names of members of the congregation, presumably those who had financed this church. In 1714 Witveen joined the Mennonite conference of Friesland (FDS). It then numbered about 60 baptized members, 108 in 1751, and 120 in 1760. At this time some of the members lived at neighboring Rottevalle, and the congregation, at first also called Witveen and Oostermeer, was then mostly called Witveen and Rottevalle, or even Rottevalle and Witveen. More and more Rottevalle became the center of the congregation, particularly after a meetinghouse was built here c1770. In 1810 only a small part of the membership lived at Witveen, and in 1830 the Witveen church was put out of use. For further history of the congregation see Rottevalle. (DB 1872, 33 ff.; Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 189, note 9; DJ 1840, 22.) vdZ.

W.M.S.A.: see Women's Missionary and Service Auxiliary.

Woerden, a town in the Dutch province of South Holland, formerly the seat of a Waterlander Mennonite congregation. There is no information on the origin of this church and only a few accounts on its history. In 1647 it was represented at the Waterlander delegates' meeting at Amsterdam by the deacon Louris Diricxsz. It disappeared between 1700 and 1730. (Blaupot t. C., Holland I, 332; II, 43; DB 1907, 78.) vdZ.

Wohl (Uohl), Wolf, was a Mennonite preacher in Moravia (q.v.), who after a visit of Jan Gerrits (q.v.) van Emden accompanied him to Danzig and became a preacher of the Danzig congregation, of which Krijn Vermeulen (van der Meulen, q.v.) was at this time also a preacher. Vermeulen and Wohl disputed on the doctrine of Incarnation, Vermeulen defending the views of Menno Simons and Dirk Philips, and Wohl rejecting them. Further particulars are lacking. (BRN VII, 190 f.) vdZ.

Wohlgemuth, Daniel (1876—), a son of Johannes Wohlgemuth of Albsheim a.d. Pfirim and Katharina Krehbiel of Weierhof, was born at Albsheim April 17, 1876, but reared by his uncle Johannes Krehbiel of Weierhof, studied art at Frankfurt and Strasbourg, and finally at the Art Academy in Munich under Franz von Stuck. His travels in Italy, Palestine, and Russia contributed to his development. His artistic work was done chiefly in his native Rhenish Hesse and the Palatinate (for a time living at Weierhof, later at Gundersheim near Worms), but also for a time in Munich and Berlin. His chief medium is black and white drawing, including charcoal (often lithographs) but also water colors and oils. His themes are largely landscapes, often of his native land, with a fine series on Palestine. He has also done many portraits, including an excellent one of Albert Schweitzer. His works are found in all the leading German galleries, such as Munich, Stuttgart, Karlsruhe, Mannheim, Frankfurt, Dresden, Berlin, Homburg, and Leipzig. He has received acclaim by leading art critics. C.K.

Martha Händiges, "Palästinaabilder eines mennonitischen Malers," Menn. Jugendwarte (Ludwigshafen, Germany) 1921, No. 4, 18-23; 1923. C. Krahn, "Daniel Wohlgemuth—An Artist of Bible Lands," Menn. Life IX (1954) 4-6; Friedrich M. Illert, Daniel Wohlgemuth: An seinem 80. Geburtstag (Worms, 1956).

Wola Wodzinska Mennonite Church: see Vola Wodzinska Mennonite Church.

Woldampt, a district in the Dutch province of Groningen; the Mennonite congregation in this region in the 17th and 18th centuries was sometimes called Woldampt. This obviously meant Midwolda (q.v.). (See also Oldampt.) vdZ.

Wolf Creek, a Hutterite Bruderhof, located on the James River, Hutchinson Co., S.D., some 40 miles northeast of the first Bruderhof at Bon Homme, was founded in the spring of 1875 by preachers George Hofer and Darius Walter, who were both chosen and confirmed in Russia. Preacher Michael Stahl, who was also chosen in Russia, was confirmed by Peter Wedel, the elder in Alexanderwhol in 1865, and died in the Tschetter commune (South Dakota) in 1900. Elias Walter, Sr. (q.v.) was chosen preacher here in 1889. This was the mother Bruderhof of the Dariusleut (q.v.), one of the three Hutterite kinship groups in America, named after Darius Walter. The group arrived in South Dakota Aug. 10, 1874, and settled first at Silver Lake where they wintered until they could occupy the 5,400-acre tract at Wolf Creek which they had purchased the previous summer. In 1930 the Bruderhof was sold and the Brethren founded the Wolf Creek Bruderhof in Alberta, which in 1950 numbered 76 souls, with 35 baptized members. D.D.

Wolf Point (Mont.) Gospel Fellowship Mennonite Brethren Church is located 23 miles north and 13 miles west of Wolf Point. The congregation was organized in 1956. In 1957 it had 37 members, with Karl Dick as pastor. K.D.

Wolf(f), de, a former Mennonite family of Amsterdam, Holland, found there c1595-c1840. They were members of the Flemish congregation and from 1664 sided with the Lamists (q.v.). Some de Wolffs were deacons of this church. The de Wolffs originally were Mennonites from Antwerp, Belgium, who in the 1580's fled to Cologne, Germany, and soon after moved to Amsterdam. Maeyken de Wolf (1586-1635) was married to the Dutch poet Joost van den Vondel (q.v.); her brother Hans de Wolf (d. before 1625) was married to Joost's sister Clementia van den Vondel. In Amsterdam the de Wolffs were businessmen, particularly silk merchants. Among them were Hans de Wolff (1614-c70), married first to Cornelia Block and in 1643 to Agnes Block (he left a considerable legacy to the Lamist congregation for the founding of an orphanage), and Pieter de Wolff (1646-91), married to Clementia van der Vecht, a very wealthy silk merchant with great interest in the church. A side branch of this family lived at Haarlem in the 17th and 18th centuries, which was, however, more conservative than the Amsterdam de Wolffs. Olivier de Wolff, from 1653 a trustee of the Haarlem Flemish Mennonite orphanage, also a deacon, represented the Haarlem Flemish congregation at the conservative conference (see Leidsche Synode) held at Leiden 1660. vdZ.

J. F. M. Sterck, Het Leven van Joost van den Vondel (Haarlem, 1926) 4, 12, 127 et passim; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 553; DB 1863, 23; church records of Amsterdam.

Wolf(f), Hans, a weaver of Beufeld near Strasbourg (q.v.), a fanatical Anabaptist, who preached and baptized at Strasbourg in early 1526. He prophesied that the world would be destroyed on the stroke of twelve in 1533. Capito (q.v.) tried to change his views, but in vain. Thereupon Wolf, who sharply attacked the Reformed pastors of Strasbourg, was arrested and banished on July 30, 1526. vdZ.

Abr. Hulshof, Geschiedenis van de Doopsgezinden te Straatsburg (Amsterdam, 1905) 11-17, 116.

Wolfgang of Mos: see Mos, Wolfgang von.

Wolfganzen, a village in Alsace, located about one mile northwest of Neuf-Brisach and 8 miles southeast of Colmar; in 1909-23 it was the seat of the Mennonite congregation which had earlier been called by various names (including Colmar and Muntzenheim, q.v.) and which furnished the members for the two modern congregations of Colmar (q.v.), formed 1920-22, and Neuf-Brisach (q.v.), formed about the same time. The congregation met in an unoccupied school in the village until World War I, when the building was taken over for military purposes and the village made the town hall available. The elder was Benjamin Peterschmitt, who served 1891-1932, continuing at Neuf-Brisach after the congregation was formed. The membership of Wolfganzen was some 130. (See Colmar.) H.S.B.

Wölfl of Götzenberg (a hill near Nider-Vintel in the district of Bruneck belonging to the jurisdiction of Schöneck), Austria, an Anabaptist martyr, was executed in 1533 with six fellow believers (see Alseider for names and details) in the Guifidaun castle in the Adige Valley, Tirol. HEGE.

Zieglschmid, Chronik; Mart. Mir. D 36, E 444 (where he is called Wolfert); ML IV.

Wolfsheim, a village some 6 miles from Alzey, Rhinisch Hesse, Germany, was the seat of a Mennonite congregation c1660-1800, the members of which very likely emigrated from Switzerland. In the Mennonite census lists of the Karlsruhe archives the name Wolfsheim occurs in the 1660's with the Mennonite families of Wendell Holl, Thomas Holl, Thomas Rohr, and Stephen von Niederdahlheim. In 1680 the names are Peter Damm, Thomas Rohr, Johannes Schuhmacher, Abraham Holl, Wendel Holl, Rupprecht Rohr, Thillmann Kolb, and Heinrich (last name not legible). In 1685 Tillman Kolb appears with a wife and 7 children, among them 5 sons. Four sons and a daughter emigrated to Germantown, Pa., in 1707. The lists of 1738-73 name Matthias Weber, Johannes Weber, Peter Böhmer, Hermann Janson, Wendel Janson, and Johannes Kaegy.

On Aug. 11, 1661, the elector gave orders that the Mennonites should not hold any religious meetings in Wolfsheim on penalty of a 50 reichstaler fine because the church inspector of Odernheim reported that they were meeting in groups of 200 and holding their religious services in great crowds and were seeking to mislead others, Reformed Christians, to their hypocrisy. Thereupon Wendel Holl "together with his fellow servants" presented a petition to the elector with the comment that they had never increased their number in the country and had been conducting their meetings very quietly; some Mennonites who had been expelled from the Bernese country had been accepted in the Palatinate; he closed with the petition that "the few Mennonites that meet at Wolfsheim, Germersheim, Spiesheim, and Aspisheim, should graciously be allowed to hold our meetings in all quietness." It was decided by the electoral government on Oct. 23, 1661, that as often as they met, the office at Alzey should take a tax from every person, old or young.

On July 13, 1661, Wendel Holl at Wolfsheim and Peter Damm at Weinsheim presented a petition to the office at Alzey that two Mennonites who wanted to settle and buy a ruined estate and pay cash for it might be excused from the tax mentioned above. This petition was refused. Ernest Müller reports (212) that in 1732 there were 18 families in the Wolfsheim congregation; the preachers were Gott-hilf Holl and Johannes Schmitt, with Peter Berg as deacon. Toward the end of the 18th century the congregation was dissolved. The remaining members joined the Uffhofen (q.v.) congregation.

Wilhelm Niepoth's recent research has shown that some of the Palatine Mennonites stem, not from Switzerland, but from the district of Löwenberg in the Siebengebirge not far from Bad Godesberg. Three of these families settled in Wolfsheim c1655-80: Thomas Rohr from Niederdollendorf, a Shumacher family, and a Stephen from Niederdollendorf. NEFF, H.S.B.

Müller, Berner Täufer; W. Niepoth, "Migrations and Change of the Mennonite Schumacher Family," MQR XXXII (1959); ML IV.

Wolkan, Rudolf (1860-1927), Professor of German Literature at the University of Vienna, a cofounder with Beck (q.v.) and Loserth (q.v.) of the Austrian school of Anabaptist historiography around the turn of the 20th century. Wolkan did a great deal to secure a fairer treatment for Anabaptism in academic circles and greatly advanced research in this field. In 1903, as an instructor he published (in Berlin) his epoch-making Lieder der Wiedertäufer, a basic and as yet unsurpassed study in which for the first time the chaotic mass of Anabaptist hymns received a systematic organization and friendly interpretation. Wolkan was the first to differentiate clearly between three distinct groups of Anabaptists: the Swiss Brethren, the Dutch and North German Mennonites, and the Hutterites. Of particular value was Wolkan's research concerning the origin of the Ausbund (q.v.). His oldest copy was of 1583, but he knew that an earlier one had existed. He studied the Passau records of the Munich "Reichsarchiv" and discovered there the trial records of 1535 which threw light on the background of the oldest section of this famous hymnal. He also utilized for the first time the Protocoll of the Frankenthal Colloquy in order to clarify the doctrinal position of the groups involved. His book came to America, where John Horsch (q.v.) gladly welcomed it. Through Horsch, Wolkan learned for the first time that the Hutterian Brethren were still in existence in South Dakota (neither Beck nor Loserth had any knowledge of this kind), and soon a lively correspondence between Wolkan and Elias Walter (q.v.), a bishop of the Brethren in America, ensued. In 1908 Wolkan published a brief article in the Oesterreichische Rundschau ("Oesterreichische Wiedertäufer in Amerika"), informing the scholarly world of the modern Hutterites. The fruit of further studies and correspondence with Canadian Hutterites was another book, Die Huterer, published in Vienna 1918 under very difficult conditions. It contains not only a brief history of the Hutterites and a description of their form of life, both past and present, but also a brief and highly interesting Hutterite tract concerning community living written by Ulrich Stadler c1536, and found by Wolkan in an original Hutterite codex at the library of the University of Vienna (Viennese codex). This tract (in Wolkan's book pp. 153-60) was published once more by Lydia Müller (Glaubenszeugnisse I, 222-27). Elias Walter, glad to have come into contact with a real scholar and friend of the Anabaptists, suggested that Wolkan undertake the gigantic task of the first publication of the Hutterite "greater" chronicle, a book thought lost by all earlier scholars, but well preserved by the Brethren in Canada. Walter meticulously copied this huge codex and sent this copy to Vienna. Wolkan then began to edit the work, mainly by adding significant excerpts from other Hutterite sources in footnotes. In 1923 this Geschicht-Buch der Hutterischen Brüder came out as a volume of nearly 700 pages, a tremendous gain for all future research and indispensable to every scholar. (When the stock was sold out, the Hutterites in Canada asked Professor Zieglschmid, q.v., to produce another edition of the same book, which in 1943 in part replaced the older, modernized edition by Wolkan.) Wolkan accomplished this work with great personal sympathy for the Brethren, championing their recognition in the German scholarly world.

A last personal note should be added by the writer of this article. It was in 1923 that Wolkan suggested to him (then a student at the University of Vienna) that he undertake a dissertation on the hitherto overlooked epistles of the Hutterites, thus starting him on the road to continued Anabaptist research. Wolkan made available to him not only the Viennese codex but also other codices from Bratislava and Esztergom as well, and guided this work by his kind counsel. Through Wolkan the writer came into contact not only with Christian Neff and the Menno-nitisches Lexikon, but also with John Horsch and Elias Walter in America. Finally he also encouraged a research trip to Slovakia, to visit and study the remnants of former Bruderhofs (Habaner). Wolkan himself contributed to the first volume of the Men-nonitisches Lexikon and would have continued to do so had he not passed away unexpectedly in 1927, aged 67. R.F.

Wolleb, Johann Jacob, pietistic Reformed minister in Thenniken, canton of Basel, Switzerland, during the first half of the 18th century. He was the author of the remarkable book, Gespräch zwischen einem Pietisten und einem Wiedertäufer (Basel, 1722). In his later years he became an enthusiastic follower of Count Zinzendorf (q.v.), who visited him in 1740. The Gespräch was written apparently in a missionary spirit, with the hope of winning the Anabaptists (of the Jura area) to the new trend of Pietism (q.v.). For details see Gespräch. R.F.

R. Friedmann, Mennonite Piety Through the Centuries (Goshen, 1949) 40; P. Wernle, Geschichte des Schweizer Protestantismus im 18. Jahrhundert I (Tübingen, 1923); Jöcher, Gelehrten Lexicon (1756).

Wollmann, Jakob, an elder of the Hutterian Brethren, was chosen in 1724 as successor of Matthias Helm and confirmed by him as the chief leader of the Hutterite congregations in Hungary at the age of only 31. Under his leadership the brotherhood was exposed to great oppressions by the renewed effort to Catholicize them. The elders and preachers yielded under government compulsion in 1733 to having their children baptized by Catholic priests, although the children were later usually baptized once more by their own elders. Wollmann died in 1734, and was succeeded by Georg Frank. (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; ML IV.) HEGE.

Wolvega, a town in the Dutch province of Friesland, where a Mennonite congregation was founded in 1861. A hall was bought and adapted into a meetinghouse (remodeled in 1875) and furnished with a pipe organ in 1901. The baptized membership then numbered 36; this number was 92 in 1900, 90 in 1926, and 107 in 1958. At first services were conducted and catechetical instruction given by pastors of neighboring congregations. The first resident pastor of Wolvega was J. S. S. Ballot, serving 1863-66, followed by C. J. Bakker 1866-68, S. Wartena Jr. 1868-73, J. Hoekstra 1874-79, A. Blaauw Kz 1881-82, G. ten Cate 1883-91, M. Uiterdijk 1892-94, F. van der Ploeg 1894-98, M. van der Vegte Jr. 1899-1913, W. Banga 1914-30, vacant 1930-33, the pastor of Heerenveen (q.v.) 1933-42, vacant 1942-47, Miss C. Boerlage 1947-57. In 1957 the pastoral responsibility was given to Miss T. G. Siccama, who, living at Wolvega, at the same time serves the Tjalleberd (q.v.) congregation.

Church activities are a ladies' circle, two Mennonite Bouwers clubs, and a Sunday school for children. (DB 1862, 142 f.; 1864, 168; 1902, 247.)

vpZ.

Women in Church Vocations (WCV), an organization of the General Conference Mennonite Church replacing the former deaconess (q.v.) program. However, it seeks to foster this spirit in a broader, fresher, and more adaptable form for our day. In the early 1950's, a study and re-evaluation of this deaconess movement, authorized by the Conference and by the deaconesses themselves, resulted in the conclusion that, like other church groups, the General Conference would need to find a new form or pattern of service for the women in church vocations.

Eight representative young women met with a special committee of the Board of Christian Service in St. Louis in July 1956 and, after a study of other denominational deaconess programs, formulated recommendations which were adopted by the Conference in 1956. The new program offers avenues for recruiting young women, helping provide adequate spiritual and specialized training, assisting with counseling and placement, and continuing to provide opportunities for further inspiration and fellowship. Each enrolled member shall have been led to devote herself to Christlike service within the framework of the church. She shall possess emotional and physical health, have a wholesome personality, be under 36 years of age when accepted, and be desirous of growing spiritually and in her chosen vocation. She will be considered an active member as long as she is giving full-time service to the church, whether married or not.

Initially it was urged that each member earn her A.B. degree and then complete a year of training at Mennonite Biblical Seminary in order to equip her for spiritually effective service, a five-year program in possible addition to specialized and technical preparation such as nurse's training. Some revision of this requirement is now in process. Early in 1957 Marion Keeney was asked by the Committee on Women in Church Vocations to serve as promotional secretary. In September 1957, six young women were enrolled in the program—four of them at the Seminary for their year of study, and one each at Bethel and Bluffton completing the B.A. degree. This program is related to the Conference through the Board of Christian Service. Scholarship aid is provided by the Board, by the Women's Missionary Association, and by the colleges, all of which organizations are represented on the Committee of Women in Church Vocations. E.C.G.

Elmer Ediger, "Women and Church Vocational Service," The Mennonite, 1956, June 27 and December 4; Marion Keeney, "Women in Church Vocations," The Mennonite, 1958, June 3 and June 10; Doreen Harms, "New Avenues of Service for Women," Menn. Life XII (January 1957).

Women, Status of: Anabaptism. In the early Anabaptist movement women played an important role. The Anabaptist emphasis upon voluntary membership, adult baptism, and personal commitment inevitably opened up new perspectives for women. The court records in the Swiss-South German areas as well as in Holland show that they could and did give vigorous and intelligent independent testimonies of their own to their faith, and shared martyrdom unflinchingly with the men, although the number of male martyrs reported generally outnumbered the women two to one; the women were often given milder penalties than the men. "Brothers and Sisters" are often mentioned together in the Hutterite Chronicle. The Anabaptist basic position elevated marriage to a more spiritual relationship (see Marriage) than in the Catholic and Protestant culture of the time. At times the Hutterite men spoke of their wives as "married sister." But no women are known to have been chosen as preachers or deacons. Later, after the creative period of Anabaptism was past, the settled communities and congregations reverted more to the typical patriarchal attitude of European culture.

A few noblewomen were prominent in South German and Tirolean-Austrian Anabaptism, such as Helene von Freyberg (q.v.) of Münichau, Tirol, Walpurga Marschalkin von Pappenheim (q.v.) of Kalden, Bavaria, and Agnes von Waldenhofen of Trautmannsdorf, Tirol. H.S.B.

Netherlands. Women played an important role in early Dutch Anabaptism and Mennonitism. Although among the martyrs women were outnumbered by men (in Amsterdam, for example, 106 male and 33 female Anabaptists were executed), there were many women who suffered martyrdom for their faith. Some women are said to have taught in Anabaptist meetings, for example, Aeffgen (q.v.) Lystynck; the martyr Elisabeth (q.v.) Dirks is even called a "leeraresse" (preacher). Only a few women among the early Dutch Anabaptists composed hymns; Soetken (q.v.) Gerrits of Rotterdam, and Vrou Gerrets (q.v.) of Medemblik published hymnals. Soon after persecution was ended, c1570, women are named as deaconesses (q.v.), and from the early 17th century also as trustees of orphanages and old people's homes.

In the 17th-19th centuries women had no voting power and were not eligible as members of the church boards. In some congregations women have voted in the choosing of a pastor since c1865. Soon after this a number of congregations granted suffrage to women members also in other cases (DB 1879, 117 f.). In 1900, in 113 congregations the women had full suffrage, in 30 only in the case of calling a pastor, and in 12 no suffrage at all (DB 1900). At present in nearly all the congregations women have complete right of voting and in nearly all they are now eligible as members of the church boards. Such women trustees were first found in 1905 at Middelburg, and about the same time at Dordrecht and Leiden. At present all but a few congregations have women trustees. The office of deaconess (q.v.) developed among the Dutch Anabaptists.

Women have been pastors of Dutch Mennonite congregations since 1911. At present (1959), of a total of 109 pastors 25 are women. Ladies' circles, now usual in all Dutch congregations, and organized in the central Federatie van Zusterkringen (q.v.) since 1949, date from about 1910. voZ.

* * *

Prussian-Russian Background. The status of women among the Mennonites of this background does not differ greatly from that of other Mennonite groups under similar conditions nor from that of other Protestant groups, depending to a large extent on the sociological and cultural development of the particular group and ancient traditions and particularly the interpretation of Biblical references to women.

However, once the Mennonites had settled in isolated areas of Prussia and Russia they seemed to fall back into the patterns of tradition and environment. The wife was busy rearing the large family and fulfilling her obligations on the farm. In business transactions and in church and community the responsibility rested entirely on the husband. The congregational meetings were typically referred to as "Bruderschaft," implying that the brethren alone attended such meetings and voted. In general, development proceeded along the following steps: At first, church matters were primarily disposed of by the elder, ministers, and deacons; later responsibility was extended to include all male members; then (under the influence of the 19th-century emancipation movement) further extended to include the women. This stage had not been developed among the Mennonites of Prussia and Russia, and came later in America. Pietism (q.v.), which reached most Mennonite settlements during the 19th century, also had its effect. The emphasis on spontaneous conversion and antipathy toward tradition broke barriers and promoted equality in general, and also between the sexes. Paul's admonition, "Let the women be silent in the churches" (I Cor. 14:34), was interpreted to mean only that women should not preach. With the introduction of Bible study, prayer meeting, Sunday school, and mission societies, a wide field was opened for Mennonite women. Now they could express their views in Bible studies, they participated audibly in prayer meetings, they taught Sunday-school classes, discussed missionary affairs in sewing circles and many other organizations, and as mission workers engaged in direct evangelism and teaching.

With the teaching of Sunday-school classes and active participation in the affairs of the church the "Bruderschaft" meetings were gradually "invaded" by the women. If the women were teaching Sunday-school classes, they could perhaps also participate in the election of Sunday-school teachers. If they were actively engaged in mission work, could they not also vote in matters pertaining to missions? If they were active in most of the phases of church work, should they not also express their views publicly and by voting? Gradually this change took place in the early 20th century, particularly in the Mennonite churches of the prairie states and provinces under prevalent democratic influences. Most of the modern constitutions of the General Conference, Mennonite Brethren, Evangelical Mennonite Brethren, Krimmer Mennonite Brethren, and other groups made provision for this change. In many of the churches women filled church offices. There still seems to be some hesitation about installing women as deacons, although this was an ancient tradition in the Mennonite churches of the Netherlands.

In Canada this development has not been as rapid as in the United States, even among the more progressive G.C.M. and M.B. churches. Among the more conservative groups, such as the Sommerfeld and Old Colony Mennonites, the old pattern has been preserved; officially and outwardly women have no vote in the affairs of the church and community life.

The great change that has taken place among most Mennonites is due partly to the change in their socio-economic structure. With a move from the farm to the city many Mennonite women find work outside their homes. Among the first vocations chosen by Mennonite women were teaching, nursing, and office work. The quite general acceptance of secondary and college education also has promoted equalization. Mennonites, however, do not elect women as ministers, as has been the practice of the Dutch Mennonites for half a century.

Women's stepping out of their homes into public life has brought many changes. The former nonconformity patterns adhered to by conservative groups have been given up to a large extent. While the men adjusted themselves to their environment in styles, they often expected the women to maintain the older traditions. This total development again has had an influence on the Mennonite family (q.v.) and the number of children in the family.

The traditional seating arrangement in the church, with the women on one side and the men on the other, is simply the old Protestant pattern preserved most consistently in conservative rural settings, and disappears as greater equality and participation by the women in the affairs of the church and community takes place.

The number of Mennonite women's organizations is growing steadily. Most common are the mission circles, societies, or associations (q.v.). Well known are the Mennonite deaconesses (q.v.), who have done a great work in connection with hospitals in Russia and America. However, this vocation no longer attracts the young women of today and is probably on the way out. One of the most recent G.C.M. organizations is Women in Church Vocations (q.v.). C.K.

Leonhard Froese, "Das pädagogische Kultursystem der mennonistischen Siedlungsgruppe in Russland" (unpublished doctoral dissertation at Göttingen, 1949); Eva Geiger Harshbarger, "The Status of Mennonite Women in Kansas in Their Church and Home Relationships" (M.Sc. thesis, Kansas State College, 1945).

* * *

Swiss-South German Background. The status of women in the Swiss-South German Mennonite churches in Europe and America after the Anabaptist era has remained relatively stable and conservative throughout until modern times. In general the patriarchal type of family life has prevailed, with women in a respected, responsible position in the home, but "silent" in church life in participation both in public address and in ecclesiastical government and church work. However, where Mennonite families occupied larger farm estates, whether as renters or owners, the wives occupied an important place as chateaines or managers of the extensive households with numerous servants, a position as different from that of an ordinary peasant farmer's wife as the position of the Mennonite estate manager differed from the ordinary peasant or small farmer. In the past half century and more the daughters in such families usually received wide experience in household management both in apprenticeships and in formal schooling before marriage. In Europe women did not enjoy (and have not enjoyed to date) the privilege of voting in church congregational meetings except in the election of ministers, nor do they hold any sort of office, certainly not as ministers. The deaconess work was introduced in South Germany (Badischer Verband, q.v., in 1904).

In North America, churches of Swiss-South German background have followed two courses in modern times. The very conservative groups have maintained the patriarchal type of family life with a corresponding place for women. In the progressive bodies (MC, EMC, GCM Swiss) since 1900 women have gradually moved into full participation in all aspects of church life and service, except in the ministry and in office-holding in general congregational life. However, voting for candidates for the ministry and for regular offices in the congregation has always been open to women in these groups, even though they have not always exercised their privileges. Women's work in the form of sewing circles (q.v.) and missionary organizations (see W.M.S.A.) arose in the M.C. congregations c1910, and is now in a flourishing state. The service of women as missionaries and Sunday-school teachers, in which they were often asked to speak at regular or special congregational or general meetings, broke down the prohibition of women speaking from the pulpit (laymen had also been denied this right), although in many of the more conservative areas, especially in Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, neither women nor laymen are as yet permitted to speak from behind the pulpit.

The custom of seating the women separately from the men in the meetinghouse, whether in the center (with the men seated around the outside) or on one side, is deeply ingrained and remains unchanged in the conservative congregations. In other areas it is being displaced by family seating. H.S.B.

Women's Missionary and Service Auxiliary is an auxiliary organization of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (MC), Elkhart, Ind. It grew out of the sewing circle (q.v.) and women's missionary organizations which developed during the first half of the 20th century in the M.C. congregations in the United States and Canada. As early as 1895 Mennonite women in eastern Pennsylvania were sewing garments for the poor. As a result of the work of Mary A. Mellinger in Lancaster County, Pa., the Paradise Sewing Circle was organized in 1897. The Associated Sewing Circles (q.v.) was organized in Lancaster County in 1911. As early as 1900 a Sisters' Sewing Circle was organized in the Science Ridge Mennonite Church, Sterling, Ill. During that decade other circles were organized in Illinois, Pennsylvania, Indiana, Ontario, Minnesota, Ohio, and Ontario. As early as 1911 Mennonite (MC) women, under the leadership of Clara Eby Steiner (1873-1929) of Columbus Grove, Ohio, began to promote a general society of sewing circles. With the formation of a general organization, Mary Burkhard became its president, serving 1916-23. She was followed by Mary Ann Cressman 1923-30, Lina Z. Ressler 1930-37, Cora Buzzard 1937-44, Ruth B. Miller 1944-50, and Minnie Graber 1950-. Clara Eby Steiner became the first secretary of the organization, serving 1916-26, during which time she wrote many letters to promote sewing circles. A third pioneer was Ruth A. Yoder, who served as treasurer of the organization 1916-29. Mary Ann Cressman, Crissie Y. Shank, Mary Ann Gerig, and Stella S. Kreider were additional members of the general committee in the 1920's. In 1917 the women's organization became church-wide, when general officers and branch secretaries to cover the entire church were elected, and in 1924 its permanent constitution was adopted. In her second annual newsletter, secretary Clara Eby Steiner reported that for the year ending March 31, 1919, thirteen branch secretaries had reported total receipts of $13,763.58. In addition they had reported 11,957 garments made and at the same time the Friends reported 27,189 garments given to them for war relief by Mennonite women. By March 1920, the organization had 13 branches, 124 circles, and 2,262 members.

Beginning in 1922 the organization operated under the name Mennonite Women's Missionary Society. Because of a lack of good co-ordination between this society and the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities, in 1928 the Board accepted a report providing for a "Woman's Mission Committee" to operate under the Mission Board. In its printed constitution of 1933 the name adopted for the committee was "The General Sewing Circle Committee of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities." Misunderstandings arose during this time of the transition of the women's society from an independent status to one of dependency on the Mission Board, and consequently for a time the membership in the new organization was less than half of what it had been in the former society. Eventually membership in the new organization surpassed the highest membership obtained by the old and is now widely accepted. The WMSA meets annually in connection with the annual meeting of the Mission Board.

In 1947 the committee was again reorganized, its name was changed to Women's Missionary Sewing Circle Organization, and from that time it was regarded as an "auxiliary of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities." In January 1954 its first full-time secretary was appointed. With the rapid growth of the organization and the extension of its activities into areas beyond sewing, the name was changed to Women's Missionary and Service Auxiliary in its 1955 annual meeting. President Minnie Graber reported, "We strive toward the vision of concerting the efforts of every Mennonite woman and girl to the total program of the Mennonite Church so that wherever the church is found, in city or country, at home or abroad, in charitable or educational institutions, in community efforts, in relief to the ends of the world, there we may be found enhancing the attractiveness of the Gospel and giving expression to the love of Jesus."

The 1958 secretary's report listed 826 auxiliaries or local units, of which 236 were girls' auxiliaries, with a total membership of 15,690. Cash receipts during the year totaled over $175,000 and other contributions amounted to a value of more than $121,000. More than 71,000 garments were received besides large amounts of bedding and linens, baby garments, Christmas bundles, and other material aid gifts. Between the local groups and the general organization were the district organizations through which the national officers worked. Emphasis was given to women's fellowship meetings, in which mission and home interests were discussed and prayers offered for the work of the church. A literature secretary is responsible for producing the Daily Prayer Guide (q.v., 1951-), of which 12,000 copies were printed for 1958, and the WMSA Monthly (begun in 1930 as Missionary Sewing Circle Letters, q.v.), which had a circulation of 11,800. A suggested reading list (twelve books) in flyer form was printed and distributed in 1957. The general committee had begun work on A Handbook for the use of its local and district officers. The executive secretary carries out the assignments of the general committee, prepares the Program Guide for the use of the local auxiliaries, prepares publicity, and informs the auxiliaries of the mission needs of the church. A secretary of home and special interests promotes prayer fellowships, homemakers' organizations, and mission study groups. The secretary of girls' activities promotes girls' missionary and service auxiliaries, supplies materials for a page on "With Our Girls" in the Monthly, and serves as assistant Junior Activities Secretary on the Commission for Christian Education. M.G.

Women's Missionary and Service Monthly is an eight-page magazine, 6 x 9 in., published by the Women's Missionary and Service Auxiliary of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (MC) to promote interest in missions and relief. It is printed by the Mennonite Publishing House, Scottsdale, Pa., and has a circulation of approximately 12,000. Mrs. Fred Gingerich is the editor. As in the first copy, published in 1919, the magazine reports work done, gives information of work to be done, tells of places where money and personnel are needed, and offers spiritual messages witnessing to God's faithfulness and love. L.S.S.

Women's Missionary Association of the General Conference Mennonite Church, an auxiliary to the G.C.M. Church, meets in a delegated session once every three years, at the time of the General Conference. It was organized in 1917 at Reedley, Cal. Before that, women's meetings and inspirational missionary programs sponsored by women had been held at General Conference sessions. The first recorded business meeting was held at Berne, Ind., on Oct. 16, 1902, with Sister Hillegonda van der Smisen as president and Sara Sprunger as secretary. Between conference sessions the work of the Association is carried on by the Executive Council, which is composed of president, first and second vice-presidents, secretary, chairmen of Literature Committee, Committee of Advisers, and Committee of Young Mission Workers. Each member of the Council serves for six years, except the chairman of the Literature Committee, whose members serve nine years each. The treasurer for the Women's Missionary Association and the editor of the monthly periodical, Missionary News and Notes, are appointed by the Executive Council. Unser Missionsblatt is the Canadian sister publication provided in the German language. The current annual budget totals $70,288.

The purpose of the organization, as stated in the first constitution, adopted at Hutchinson, Kan., Aug. 23, 1929, is to glorify God and serve the Conference and its missionary representatives (1) in the support of home and foreign missions; (2) in the spread of mission interests; (3) in the promotion of co-operation between mission societies and missions; and (4) in the production and dissemination of missionary literature.

Those who have served as president are Sister Hillegonda van der Smisen, Mrs. S. S. Haury, Mrs. J. E. Kaufman, Mrs. A. M. Lohrentz, Mrs. D. P. Ewert, and Mrs. Olin A. Krehbiel. Others who served in varied capacities for many years are Mrs. P. R. Schroeder, Mrs. R. A. Goerz, Mrs. Frieda Regier Entz, and Mrs. W. C. Voth. E.C.L.

Wood County (Ohio) Mennonite Church (MC), founded 1835-45, became extinct 1882-85 when several groups of families left for Elkhart County, Ind., and ten families moved to Alanson, Mich., leaving only six members. The last minister had moved to Wayne County, Ohio, in 1884. The meetinghouse built of hewn logs and ceiled with poplar boards before 1856 was razed in 1885, and in 1910 Lewis P. Risser and George Milner, "trustees of the Mennonite Cemetery Association," deeded the cemetery plot on the northeast banks of the South Branch of the Portage River to "the trustees of Perry township." Some of the early settlers were from the Franconia district in southeastern Pennsylvania. Names of members included Tyson, Landis, Pletcher, Risser, Legron (Lechrone), Bachman, Brandt, and Boyer. Ministers of the congregation were Jacob Kaempfer, Henry Pletcher, and Jacob Tyson. Jacob Kaempfer preached only in German; his wife, a member of the Winebrennerians (Church of God), never attended services with him. Henry Pletcher could preach in both English and German, preferred English, favored Sunday school, and was silenced as too "liberal," before he and his friends moved to Indiana and united with the Yellow Creek (q.v.) congregation. His successor, Jacob Tyson, sided with the Wisler (q.v.) faction. The congregation never had a resident bishop, but was served by Bishop John M. Brenneman until his retirement and then by Peter Imhoff, bishop of the Wisler congregations in Ashland and western Wayne counties. Unsatisfactory health conditions in the "Black Swamp" area may have been a determining factor in the removal of a large part of the congregation to Michigan. Typhoid and malaria took a heavy toll. The church was near Jersey City. J.S.U.

John Umble, "Extinct Mennonite Churches in Ohio," MQR XVIII (1944) 89-116.

Wood River Mennonite Church (MC), located in Wood River, Hall Co., Neb., a member of the Iowa-Nebraska Conference, had its beginning in 1904-5 when a group of Mennonites from Milford, Neb., about 100 miles east of Wood River, settled in this neighborhood. Among the group were the John B. Jantzi, David D. Stutzman, Peter Zehr, Mose Zehr, and Ruel Riley families. In the fall of 1905 they organized a Sunday school and soon afterward a congregation. Their first meeting place was in a rented building located 1½ miles east and 5 miles north of Wood River. In the fall and winter of 1908-9 a plot of land was obtained 4½ miles north and 1 mile west of Wood River, on which a frame building, with seating capacity of about 200, was erected.

Joseph E. Zimmerman was ordained the first minister in 1906. The present ministers are William R. Eicher bishop and Alvin Gascho minister. The membership was 49 in 1958. A.G.A.

Woodburn (Ind.) Evangelical Mennonite Church was organized in 1893. Its meetinghouse was constructed in 1896. Among the early ministers who served the church were Andrew Gerig, J. K. Gerig, E. J. Oyer, Harold Froker, and Emanuel M. Rocke. In 1957 the congregation had 154 members, with Alvin G. Becker serving as pastor. E.M.R.

Woodcrest, one of eleven communities operated by and comprising the Society of Brothers (q.v.), is located near the junction of New York State Highways 32 and 213, three miles west of Rifton, about 70 miles north of New York City. It was established early in the summer of 1954 on a woodland tract of 96 acres with about a dozen buildings available for use, to which have been added three apartment dwellings, a nursery, and a Center House to replace the Carriage House which burned in 1957. Other buildings serve as schoolhouse, a shop, sewing room, laundry, or other maintenance functions. The household, including resident guests and children, comprises about 230, of whom 70 are full members; about half of the household are children. Living expenses are met from the sale of quality, educational toys made of wood, sales being primarily to schools and churches. B.B.

Woodford County, Ill. The first body of Amish Mennonite settlers in Woodford County came as immigrants from Alsace in 1831 and settled in Worth Township along the Black Partridge Creek northwest of the present town of Metamora. In 1833 Christian Engle, a bishop ordained in Europe, organized this body of believers into a congregation. The members met in homes until 1854, when a brick meetinghouse was constructed, called the Partridge Church. Most of the settlers later moved to the prairies east of Metamora and formed the Metamora congregation. The Partridge Church was the first German church west of Ohio and the second of any denomination in Woodford County; it was for years the church home for all Mennonite immigrants, although they may have settled at some distance. In 1834 a settlement was made near Congerville, known as the Mackinaw Settlement. This later developed into three congregations: Roanoke, Goodfield in Woodford County, and North Danvers in McLean County. Goodfield later merged with the Tremont congregation to form the Morton Mennonite Church.

At present there are two Mennonite (MC) congregations in Woodford County—Metamora and Roanoke, with a total membership of 722. The General Conference has a congregation at Congerville with 117 members. Many other Woodford County residents are members of the Calvary Mennonite Church (GCM) at Washington. An independent Conservative Amish Mennonite congregation is located in Linn Township, about five miles northwest of Roanoke. This group had its origin in the "Sleeping Preacher" (q.v.) movement in the early part of the century. In 1958 it had 172 members.

There are approximately 1,500 Mennonites living in Woodford County today, about 7 per cent of the total population. In addition there is approximately the same number of the Apostolic Christian (q.v.) faith sometimes called the "New Amish," who have much in common with the Mennonites in their origin and doctrine. The Mennonite Home for the Aged at Eureka is operated by the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (MC) through a local board.

T.R.S.

Woodlake (Cal.) Mennonite Settlement (GCM) and Church, now extinct, was established in the eastern part of the San Joaquin Valley of central California. Before World War I numerous Mennonites became stockholders of the Woodlake Citrus Development Company, some of whom never moved to Woodlake. The virgin land of the Woodlake area was gradually transformed into orange groves. Some of the families who founded the town of Woodlake came from Reedley and Upland. The spiritual needs were taken care of by visiting ministers from Mennonite communities in California.

In 1915 H. A. Bachmann came to Woodlake and on June 13, 1915, the First Mennonite Church was organized with 18 members who met in the local school. In 1916-18 F. J. Isaac served as minister, followed in 1918-19 by J. J. Engbrecht. After this the Reedley Mennonite Church provided for occasional services. In 1926 some young people were baptized. The last meeting of the congregation was held on Jan. 20, 1929, attended by three families. In 1953 there were only three families living at Woodlake who had once belonged to the Mennonite Church of that place.

C.K.

Woodland Mennonite Mission (MC) was opened in a small community of fourteen homes located 2 miles west of Milroy, Mifflin Co., Pa., in the summer of 1940 by John L. Mast, senior bishop of the Locust Grove Conservative Mennonite Church, in the township schoolhouse. On Aug. 25, 1951, the schoolhouse was purchased by the church and remodeled for use as a church. In 1957 there were six members, with Ivan Yoder as pastor.

J.P.Y.

Woodland Mennonite Church (GCM), located in Warroad, Roseau Co., Minn., a member of the Northern District, was organized on March 3, 1939, with 30 charter members, by families who had arrived a few years before. The meetinghouse was built in 1950, with a seating capacity of 150. The members are mostly descendants of the 1874 ff. immigration from Russia. The pastor is Arthur F. Ortman, who organized the church. The membership is now 86.

A.F.O.

Woodland Mennonite Church (MC), located at 1837 Woodland Ave., Wichita, Kan., now extinct, started as Mennonite Gospel Mission in a rented building at 1202 South Pattie Ave., April 17, 1921. Vernon Shellenberger was the first superintendent, with Paul Erb as nonresident minister and T. M. Erb as bishop. In 1924 a new building was erected on Woodland Avenue in the northwestern part of the city. The mission character of the work had to make room for a church home for Mennonite families living in the city, and for an increasing number of working girls. Resident pastors were Henry J. King 1924-27, Leroy Thayer 1927-36, I. Mark Ross 1940-45, Glen Whitaker 1948-51, Edward Kauffman 1951-52. The last service was held Sept. 28, 1952, and the property was sold soon after. Mission work by the Mennonite Church (MC) is now carried on in a section called Eureka Gardens (q.v.), and at a Negro church at 10th and Piatt erected in 1959.

E.Bu.

Woodland Tabernacle is a Mennonite (MC) rural mission church 4 miles north of Orkney Springs, near Jerome, Shenandoah Co., Va., under the Virginia Conference. An inexpensive building was erected here in 1944 to care for the work that was formerly carried on at the Lindamood schoolhouse. The membership here is the outgrowth and remnant of the Powder Spring (q.v.) congregation, which was located several miles south of this place. The membership in 1958 was 22, with James E. Gross in charge.

T.S.

Woodlawn Mennonite Church (GCM), Chicago, Ill., located at 1143 East 46th Street, was organized as a congregation in 1951. It grew out of a Sunday school which had been operated several years before that by the staff and students of the Mennonite Biblical Seminary. J. N. Smucker came as the first pastor in 1952. It is a member of the Central District Conference. It is an interracial church in an area of growing Negro population. In 1959 it had 51 members, with Delton W. Franz as its pastor and Vincent G. Harding the associate pastor.

M.G.

Woodridge Mennonite Church (MC), Washington, D.C., is a member of the Allegheny Conference. In 1957 it had 40 members, with John R. Martin as pastor. The congregation was organized in 1952 as "Georgetown," with 23 members, but changed its name to Woodridge the next year. Nevin Miller served as pastor from the beginning to 1956, at first commuting from Harrisonburg, Va., where he was a teacher. The congregation worshipped in a rented church building in the city of Washington, D.C., until its own meetinghouse was built in 1959 at Hyattsville, Md., just outside the District of Columbia to the northeast.

M.G.

Woodrow Mennonite Brethren Church, located 6 miles north of Woodrow, Sask., formerly known as Hoffnungsfeld, a member of the Herbert District Conference, was organized in 1910 under the leadership of George Reimche. The initial membership of 28 increased to 75 by 1957. George Reimche was succeeded by John Ollenberger, Ludwig Seibel, John Ollenberger again, E. J. Lautermilch, and Samuel Sutter, the leader in 1957.

J.I.R.

Woodson County (Kan.) Mennonite Brethren Church, now extinct, was founded in 1876 by a number of M.B. families who emigrated from the Chortitza settlement in Russia to America. In the fall of 1878 Bernard Pauls and David Dick were elected as ministers; they were ordained in 1881. Soon both moved away, and the church elected Cornelius Nickel and Peter Nickel as ministers. In 1888 the congregation had 52 members. Most of these, however, moved away in 1892, and the church was discontinued.

M.A.K.

Woodville Conservative Mennonite Church, located at Woodville, Jefferson Co., N.Y., a member of the Conservative Mennonite Conference, organized in May 1947 with 22 members under the leadership of Lloyd Boshart. The membership in 1957 was 66, all of whom are rural people. The meetinghouse is a rural school building which was purchased in April 1948. The bishop is Andrew Gingerich. A.Gi.

Woolwich Mennonites: see Old Order Mennonites in Ontario.

Wooster Mennonite Church (MC), formerly known as the Wooster Mennonite Mission, located in the city of Wooster, Wayne Co., Ohio, is a member of the Ohio and Eastern Conference. It was started by the Salem Mennonite Church of Wayne County as a mission with Rudy Stauffer as pastor, and was organized in November 1944 under the Ohio Mennonite Mission Board, with eight charter members. The congregation worshiped in a house on Gasche Street until 1951, became an independent congregation, and built a new brick church in 1954 with a seating capacity of 300. The 144 members (1959) represent ten denominational backgrounds, a mixed character of urban and rural. Paul Brunner is pastor. D.W.M.

Wopkens, Thomas (b. 1700 at Leeuwarden, d. 1775 at Harlingen), was trained for the ministry at the Remonstrant (q.v.) seminary at Amsterdam. He served in the Amsterdam Lamist congregation 1726-29 and at Harlingen 1729-46. Wopkens was a man of great knowledge and learning; he published a critical edition in Latin of the works of Cicero, entitled Lectionum Tulliarum . . . Libri tres (Amsterdam, 1730) and Dutch translations of some Latin works on theology. He was a man of liberal views and co-operated closely with his Harlingen copastor Johannes Stinstra (q.v.). His poor health forced him to resign at a rather early age. vDZ.

Chr. Sepp, Johannes Stinstra en zijn tijd (Amsterdam, 1865-66) I, 210 f.; II, 141, 147; Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 237; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 669; DJ 1840, 113.

Worcester Mennonite Church (MC), known also in the past as Methacton, is located in Worcester Township near Fairview, Montgomery Co., Pa., and is a member of the Franconia Conference. The date of organization is uncertain. According to Joseph Heebner, a historian of Worcester, the church was started by the Henry Rittenhouse family (grandson of William Rittenhouse) and it is presumed that the first meetinghouse was built a few years after eight trustees in 1739 acquired a burial ground for a union cemetery. Five of these trustees were Mennonites: Henry Rittenhouse, Christopher Zimmerman, Conrad Stem, Peter Keyser, and Peter Custard. It is known that the meetinghouse was there by 1771. In 1873 the third and present meetinghouse was erected. It has never been a large congregation. There were about 50 members in 1890. Sunday school with an attendance of 125 was started in 1898 but by 1920 it was discontinued and the congregation dwindled. Extreme reluctance to adopt progressive methods and the long continuance of the "circuit system" of ministerial leadership are some reasons given for the decline in interest. In 1943 there was one communicant member and the Franconia Mission Board made Worcester a mission station. An annex was added to the church building in 1948 to provide space for Sunday school and for summer Bible school, in which the enrollment had reached several hundred. On Jan. 22, 1950, Paul R. Clemens was ordained minister and Worcester again became an organized congregation, with 80 members in 1958.

P.R.C.

Beulah Clemens, "History of Worcester Church," Mission News (Franconia) May-June, 1958, p. 2.

Word of Testimony was a quarterly publication of the China Mennonite Mission Society (MB), 7¼ x 10 in., at Tsaohsien, Shantung, China, first issue probably 1929. During the latter period of its publication it was edited by Loyal H. Bartel. It had 4-12 pages and presented reports and articles by the M.B. missionaries in the Shantung area. J.F.S.

Words of Cheer, a Mennonite (MC) periodical for children, ages 9-11, was first published in April 1876, at Orrville, Ohio, by Dr. Henry A. Mumaw, editor and founder. It appeared as an 8-page monthly and was intended to reach boys and girls for reading at home. In 1878 the paper was sold to the Mennonite Publishing Company at Elkhart, Ind., and was edited by Joseph Summers. In August 1892 Abram B. Kolb was appointed as editor. Other editors were as follows: D. H. Bender 1904-8, A. D. Martin 1908-9, H. Frank Reist 1909-12, J. A. Ressler 1912-36, Ellrose D. Zook 1936-49, Elizabeth A. Showalter 1949- . In 1908 the paper was sold to the Mennonite Publishing House, Scottsdale, Pa., the first issue of the new owner appearing April 26, 1908. In 1892 the format was enlarged but the pages were reduced from eight to four. The paper contains stories, articles, poems, puzzles, and children's letters. It is illustrated and occasionally appears in two colors. Beginning in 1951 the paper was enlarged to 8 pages and reduced in size to 8 x 10¼ in. Its circulation in 1958 was 26,750. E.D.Z.

Worker's Exchange, the periodical of the Pacific District of the General Conference Mennonite Church, was begun by Emma Ruth in 1930 in her capacity as field secretary of the conference. Since then the Worker's Exchange was usually published every month with the exception of July, August, and sometimes September. Its format and method of printing have varied. Editors have been Emma Ruth, Reedley, Cal., 1930-43; Mrs. E. J. Muller, Lind, Wash., 1943-46; Henry B. Dirks, Los Angeles, Cal., 1946-48; Willard Wiebe, Lind, Wash., 1948-50; Clyde H. Dirks, Portland, Ore., 1950-53; and George A. Fast, Milwaukie, Ore., 1953- . The place of publication has always been the home of the editor.

J.F.S.

Workum, a town in the Dutch province of Friesland (1953 pop. 4,080, with 190 Mennonites), with a Mennonite congregation. The year of the origin of this congregation is unknown, but Anabaptists were found here at an early date. The martyr Claesken (q.v.) Gaedochter was baptized "near Workum in the fields" in 1549. Both she and her husband Hendrik (q.v.) Eeuwes were executed at Leeuwarden in 1559. Leenaert (q.v.) Bouwens baptized 23 persons at Workum in 1551-54, one in 1557, and 25 in 1563-65. In 1574 Hendrik (q.v.) Pruyt died at the hands of Spanish soldiers. At this time or shortly after, the Mennonites must have been rather numerous at Workum and soon they were leading in trade and shipping, then an important means of livelihood in this town. In 1578 when the town was liberated from the Spanish yoke, a Mennonite, Hemme (q.v.) Haucx (b. 1511), became a burgomaster of Workum, and three other Mennonites were in the town council; they were exempted from the oath. But as early as 1600 Calvinism became predominant at Workum, which was somewhat intolerant toward Mennonitism. In 1605 the Reformed pastor Johannes Bilt (q.v.) sharply attacked the Mennonites, and in 1608 the remodeling of the meetinghouse was forbidden. But soon relations between the magistrates and the Mennonites seem to have improved; no further trouble occurred.

There is some unclear information that there were three congregations at Workum c1580, one High German, one Frisian, and one Waterlander, but only of the Waterlander church is there anything definitely known. This congregation, which in 1647 was represented at the Waterlander conference at Amsterdam, was divided by a schism, probably before 1600. A more conservative part of the congregation separated from the main, rather progressive body. This conservative group may have assumed the name of Frisian or High German. Each group had a meetinghouse; the progressives met at de Keet, a former salt works located on the site of the present meetinghouse, whereas the conservatives met in a private home, not far from de Keet. It is not known when and how this division ended, but the conservative group had disappeared at least by 1620. The preacher of the Keet congregation was a certain Eenke from about 1580; his son Rippert Eenkes (q.v.) was a preacher from c1600 and soon after an elder, serving until after 1627. He was an influential Waterlander leader, who conducted services in a number of congregations as far away as Amsterdam, Haarlem, and Emden, and even in Danzig in Prussia. But in his home church his advanced ideas evoked much opposition and in 1618 he was suspended on a charge of misconduct, which was used to eliminate the powerful elder, beloved by many but undesirable for more. Many conferences were held to restore peace; in the meantime it became clear that the charge was false. Finally the Waterlander leader Hans de Ries (q.v.), who visited Workum more than once, succeeded in 1620 in settling the dissensions. After the death of Eenkes the congregation continued until 1738 to choose their ministers from their own members. Usually there were three or four preachers, whereas baptism and communion services were led by elders from elsewhere.

In 1695 the Workum congregation was one of the founders of the Mennonite conference of Friesland (FDS). The ties with the Waterlanders in North Holland, which had been very strong in the early 17th century, were loosened. Workum was always a loyal and even leading member in the FDS, except in 1817, when it withdrew for a few months because it was dissatisfied with the subsidy policy of the conference, Workum also played an important role in the Zuiderklasse (q.v.).

A new meetinghouse, spacious and well-built, was erected in 1695. This meetinghouse is still in use; in 1956-57 it was renovated, and rededicated April 11, 1957. The cost of the 1695 church had been about 5,100 Dutch guilders. Many members of the church were well-to-do businessmen in shipping, shipbuilding, lumbering, or lime-burning. The wealthiest citizens of Workum in the 17th and early 18th centuries, members of the Hinlopen, Roos, Molenaar, and de Hoop families, were Mennonites. These families all died out or had left Workum by the 19th century. In the 18th century the prosperity of the town declined, particularly because of the decline of Baltic Sea shipping. At the same time the prosperity and the membership of the Workum Mennonite congregation declined. The baptized membership, which is estimated at more than 400 c1650, stood at 417 in 1692, 434 in 1703, 399 in 1715, and 325 in 1748, but from then there was a catastrophic decay: about 230 in 1762, c190 in 1791, 74 in 1838, 70 in 1861; from then there was some increase: 97 in 1900, 114 in 1926, 112 in 1940, followed by a slight decrease in the last years. In 1958 the membership numbered 89.

In 1738 the first salaried minister, coming from outside, was Jan Cornelis Dam, who served at Workum 1738-82. He was followed by Sybren Hofstra 1782-1811, J. van Douwen 1811-25, S. J. van der Goot 1826, who was the first pastor of Workum educated at the Amsterdam Mennonite seminary, Jacob Oosterbaan 1827-39, J. H. Akkeringa 1839-73, J. Westerman Holstijn 1874-83, S. Wartena Jr. 1884-86, four years of vacancy, T. H. Siemelink 1890-1908, H. Westra 1908-11, J. Kooiman 1911-14, I. Hulshoff 1914-35, J. P. H. Grootes 1935-39, D. Richards 1940-44, G. de Groot 1944-48, R. Hofman 1950-54, and Miss M. J. van Hamel from 1954. Since 1942 the pastors of Workum have also been in charge of the small congregation of Koudum (q.v.).

At the close of the 18th century peace was greatly disturbed in the Workum church by differing political views. Whereas the deacon Ruurd Wopkes sided with the Orangists (political party favoring the Prince of Orange and the established political order), many members, e.g., the merchant Jan Douwes de Hoop and particularly the pastor Sybren Hofstra, were Patriots (q.v.); abandoning the principle of nonbearing of arms, they together with the non-Mennonite citizens organized a voluntary militia in 1785, and in 1787 tried (but in vain) to take possession of the city government. Thereupon Jan de Hoop's home was plundered and pastor Hofstra was suspended from his office 1787-95 by the city magistrates. In 1797 peace, both political and congregational, was restored. By the Napoleonic occupation and the financial measures of Napoleon the Mennonite congregation of Workum, formerly rather well-to-do, was greatly impoverished. The considerable legacy willed to the church by Simen Durk Hinlopen in 1795 was nearly all claimed as a compulsory state loan; in 1811 there were no funds to pay the pastor's salary. The financial situation was improved after 1815 by the generous gifts of its treasurer, J. J. Stelwagen, and a regular subsidy from the A.D.S. from 1818.

Church activities in 1959 are: ladies' circle, youth group 18-25, and a Sunday school for children. vñZ.

T. H. Siemelink, "Geschiedenis van de Doopsgezinde gemeente te Workum," in DB 1899, 1903, and 1905; idem, Toespraak to commemorate the second centennial of the meetinghouse (n.p., n.d.-1895); Inw. Arch. Amst. I, No. 663; II, Nos. 2348-51; II, 2, Nos. 652-71; Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 89, 157, 169, 187, 188, 246, 248, 252, 306; DB 1861, 144; 1873, 83, 90-103; 1888, 116; 1895, 179.

World Conference: see Mennonite World Conference.

World Mennonite Membership Distribution. Beginning as a Reformation movement in Switzerland (1525) and Holland (1530), Anabaptism spread from the first center immediately into South and Middle Germany and Austria, Tirol, and Moravia (1525-28), and from the second to Flanders, the Lower Rhine area, and Northwest Germany (1530-50), and on to West and East Prussia, Danzig, and the Vistula Delta in Poland (1540-60). No information is available on the early membership totals, but there is sufficient evidence to believe that there were at least 5,000 martyrs in the first generation, 1525-55. The Hutterite population reached at least 15-20,000 by 1555 in Moravia.

By 1700 the distribution of baptized members was probably as follows: Holland 80,000, Switzerland 500, Palatinate 500, Northwest Germany with Holstein 1,000, West Prussia and associated areas 7,500, Hungary and Slovakia 500, making a total of 90,000 in Europe, plus a small handful of 25 in the newly established Germantown settlement in Pennsylvania.

By 1850 world membership had declined by one fourth, due exclusively to the formidable decline in Holland. The distribution can be calculated roughly as follows: Holland 25,000, Switzerland 500, France 500, South Germany 1,000, Northwest Germany 1,500, West Prussia etc. 7,500, South Russia 10,000, Eastern United States 20,000, Ontario 1,500; total 67,500.

Fifty years later, by 1900, with the strong expansion in Russia to 40,000, in the United States (now including the Midwest) to 50,000, and in Canada (now including Manitoba) to 25,000, while the rest of Europe remained largely static, the total more than doubled, reaching 150,000. By this time the North American continent had become the home of half of world Mennonitism.

By 1959 Mennonitism had expanded by migration into the Latin American countries of Mexico, Paraguay, Brazil, Uruguay, Argentina, and Honduras (total 25,000 members). By missionary outreach it expanded into three continents: beginning in 1851 to Asia (Java), in 1899 to India, in 1905 to China, and in 1949 to Japan (Formosa and Viet-Nam later); in 1910 to Africa (Belgian Congo, 1934 to East Africa, Tanganyika), and in 1917 to South America (Argentina, 1945 to Colombia). In 1958 the total membership in these younger churches was 65,000, distributed by continents as follows: Africa 28,000, Asia 36,000, and South America 1,000. Meanwhile Mennonitism had been wiped out in West Prussia in 1945, and decimated in Russia 1917-30 and 1940-55, but had grown substantially again in Holland, and very substantially in North America by immigration from Russia (1922-30, 1947-50), as well as by natural growth. The total world membership had again more than doubled in the base countries, in 1958 reaching 325,000, and together with the young churches in Asia and Africa had approached 400,000, of which total half was in the United States-Canada block.

The following world membership distribution in 1958 by continents and countries is taken from the Mennonite Yearbook and Directory for 1959 and represents the best available information, based largely on official reports except as indicated by *, which is an estimate.

Europe		95,764
Russia	40,000*
Holland	39,000
Germany	12,078
France	2,700
Switzerland	1,900
Sicily	90
Luxembourg	50
Belgium	24
Austria	12

		95,764
North America		220,272
United States	159,445
Canada	52,987
Mexico	7,348
Honduras	50
Puerto Rico	365
Jamaica	64
Cuba	13

		219,771
Asia		36,013
India	28,086
China	4,000*
Java	3,343
Japan	494
Formosa	90

		36,013
Africa		27,809
Belgian Congo	26,000
Tanganyika	1,632
Ethiopia	150
Ghana	27

		27,809
South America		10,639
Paraguay	6,189
Uruguay	1,768
Brazil	1,632
Argentina	738
Colombia	300
Bolivia	12

		10,639
Total world Mennonite membership		390,497
Including children in the total population		520,000*
Hutterian Brethren population
Canada	8,590
United States	2,940

Total		11,530

For a review of the history of world Mennonitism by larger areas see Asia, Africa, Canada, Europe, Germany, Netherlands, Russia, South America, United States.

The distribution of world Mennonite membership by ethnic groups descending from the original (1) Swiss-South German and (2) Dutch-North German sources is estimated as follows by continents:

World Mennonite Distribution by Historic Ethnic Groups

(Rounded figures)

	Dutch- North German	Swiss- South German
Europe
Russia	40,000
Holland	39,000
Germany	9,500	2,500
France		2,700
Switzerland		1,900
	88,500	7,100
North America
United States	33,800	126,000
Canada	43,000	10,000
Mexico	6,800
	83,600	136,000
South America
Paraguay	6,200
Uruguay	1,750
Brazil	1,600
Argentina	150
	9,700
Grand Total	181,800	143,100
Mennonite Yearbook and Directory 1959 (Scottsdale, Pa.)
H.S.B.

Worldliness, a term not unique to Mennonites, but very common among them, used to designate attitudes, tendencies, and behavior influenced by the "world," thought of as the evil system of life and conduct opposed to Christ. "World" is used frequently in this sense in the New Testament. Paul (Gal. 1:4) described Christ's saving work as a deliverance "from this present evil world." Jesus said (John 17:16) that His disciples "are not of the world, even as I am not of the world," whence comes the expression, "in the world but not of the world." James (1:27) defines pure religion as including "to keep . . . [oneself] unspotted from the world." John (1 John 5:19) speaks of the "whole world . . . [lying] in wickedness" and promises Christians that they will overcome the world. The two most common passages used in regard to worldliness are Rom. 12:2, "Be not conformed to this world," and 1 John 2:15, "Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him." A major difficulty has been that of identifying precisely what "world" is, and therefore what "worldliness" is. The temptation, not always avoided, has been to emphasize aspects of culture as worldly because easily identified, while overlooking the deeper aspects of worldliness such as materialism. Nevertheless the problem of worldliness has been and remains a major concern for all earnest Christians who endeavor to follow their Lord closely in true discipleship, and requires all the resources of grace and insight to master it. (See Nonconformity.)

H.S.B.

Wormer, a village in the Dutch province of North Holland on the Zaan River (1953 pop. 5400, with 120 Mennonites), the seat of a Mennonite congregation. Early Anabaptism, found here from 1533, was somewhat revolutionary; in March 1534 there were some 30 inhabitants of Wormer among the Anabaptists who sailed from Amsterdam en route to Münster (q.v.) in Westphalia. Pieter (q.v.) Pietersz, of Wormer, who was among them, was executed in 1534. Anabaptists of Wormer in December 1534 tore the sacrament from the hands of the Catholic priest Duncanus (q.v.) (see Dirck van Wormer). In early 1535, during a raid in the Waterland district of North Holland, only a few persons were apprehended at Wormer, the others having fled until autumn. A bit of information dated March 4, 1535, seems to indicate that a house at Wormer in which the Anabaptists had held meetings was destroyed. In 1536 Frans (q.v.) Dirksz Quintijn (Frans van Wormer), who had promulgated a plan to seize the city of Alkmaar, was executed there. In 1543 a new raid was made in the villages of Wormer and neighboring Jisp, without success however; all the Anabaptists had fled. Cecilia (q.v.) Jheronimusdochter, a native of Wormer, died as a martyr in 1549.

Soon after this there was a congregation at Wormer, which in the 1550's joined the Waterlanders. To the Waterlander conferences of 1581 and 1647, both held at Amsterdam, the Wormer congregation sent a representative. Like most Waterlander congregations in North Holland, that of Wormer was in the 17th century rather conservative, strictly maintaining the confession of de Ries (q.v.) and opposed to Collegiant (q.v.) views. About 1674 both the congregations of Wormer and Jisp (q.v.) joined the Zonist (q.v.) Sociëteit. By this time Wormer and Jisp seem to have partly united (complete union not before 1834). They were led by very conservative ministers like Pieter Jans Stapper (q.v.) and some members of the Mol (q.v.) family. In 1698 Jacob Pieters Banning, a more liberal preacher at Wormer, was dismissed by a council of Zonist leaders, including Herman Schijn, E. A. van Dooregeest, and D. S. Moeriaen.

The town of Wormer in the second half of the 16th century became very prosperous, its inhabitants being engaged in herring fishing and in the 17th century also in whaling and industries connected with fishery: shipbuilding, baking ship biscuit, etc. In 1673, 800 guilders were collected in the Mennonite congregation as a contribution to the expenses of war. But in the early 18th century a great economic decline began, which cast its shadow on the Mennonite congregation. Though exact figures of membership are not available, there was a considerable decrease about 1720, the membership dropping to about one third of that of 100 years earlier. The amounts collected for the Mennonites of Poland and Prussia in 1727 and 1733 were therefore rather small: 60 and 75 guilders, respectively.

Until 1831 the congregation of Wormer-Jisp was served by lay preachers, usually chosen from its own membership; one of them was Klaas Yp, who served 1743-d.95, more than half a century. In 1831 the congregation called its first minister trained at the Amsterdam Mennonite seminary—C. Cardinaal, who served here until 1834. He was followed by G. L. Bavink, serving 1834-36, W. A. van Kampen 1836-41, P. van der Goot 1842-43, G. Vissering 1843-69, E. M. Mulder 1869-71, A. G. van Gilse 1871-72, A. Mulder 1873-74, W. I. Leendertz 1875-78, J. G. Boekenooen 1881-84, and W. P. J. van Haarst 1884-1921. After the departure of van Haarst the pulpit was vacant for nearly two years. Since Feb. 11, 1923, the pastor of neighboring Krommenie (q.v.) has also been serving at Wormer-Jisp.

The baptized membership of the congregation numbered 58 in 1847, 62 in 1861, 96 in 1900, 123 in 1926, and 80 in 1958 (about 50 living in Wormer). The old meetinghouse, a frame building of c1755, was replaced by a brick church in 1851. Church activities are a ladies' circle, a circle of young members, and a Sunday school for children. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 10, 62b, 83, 85c, 98, 131, 137, 159, 159a, 253, 357, 896, 904; II, Nos. 2352-56; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 87, 92, 366; Blaupot t. C., Holland I, 45, 251, 348; idem II, 204, 234; DJ 1837, 17 f.; 1850, 22-24; DB 1861, 164; 1872, 57; 1877, 80; 1898, 78-106; 1909, 18; 1917, 173.

Wormerveer, an industrial town in the Dutch province of North Holland on the Zaan River (pop. c12,000, with c500 Mennonites), the seat of a Mennonite congregation, concerning the origin of which there is no information. At the end of the 16th century there were at Wormerveer two Mennonite congregations, a Waterlander, generally called Wormerveer op't Noord, and a Frisian, usually called Wormerveer op't Zuid.

1. Concerning the early history of the North congregation (op't Noord) there is only sparse information. It was represented at the Waterlander conference at Amsterdam in 1647. It was a member of the Waterlander (Rijper, q.v.) Sociëteit and joined the Zonist (q.v.) conference c1674. At this time a severe dispute arose in this church between a more conservative part which stressed the confession of faith and opposing Collegiantism (q.v.), and a more progressive part which favored Collegiant views and practices. This dispute lasted from c1669 for more than ten years; even the intervention of the Court of Holland in 1674 and 1678 did not clear away the dissensions. Finally Galenus (q.v.) Abrahamsz in 1681 succeeded in restoring peace. The booklet De Quynende Kercke der Waterlandse Doopsgesinde tot Wormer-veer (Amsterdam, 1677), though somewhat partial, relates the background of this conflict. After the quarrel was settled, the North congregation, or at least its ministers, remained rather conservative; this was the hotbed of new dissensions in the following three decades. At first the membership must have been very numerous; in 1675 it still numbered 300. But gradually a number of more progressive members joined the Wormerveer Frisian church.

The North congregation was served by lay preachers, at first chosen from the membership, later called from outside, the last of whom were Albert Vrijer, serving 1770-98, and Klaas Schermer 1800-49. The first salaried minister educated at the Amsterdam seminary to serve here was J. W. Straatman, serving 1849-50, followed by G. ten Cate 1851-58, A. J. Bijl 1861-62, J. H. van der Veen 1863-66, and G. Kool 1866-99. In 1899, the pulpit being vacant, it was resolved to merge with the Wormerveer South (op't Zuid) congregation, then also vacant. On Sunday, Aug. 22, 1899, the last service was held in the meetinghouse of the North congregation. At this time the membership was 56 (78 in 1847, 70 in 1861). Previous attempts at unification of the two congregations in 1725, 1789, and 1863 had failed.

2. The South congregation (op't Zuid; Frisian), a member of the Frisian Conference of North Holland, was in the 17th century much smaller in membership than the Waterlander congregation. In the late 16th and the early 17th centuries it was more conservative than the North church. The ban was maintained more strictly, outside marriages were unknown, and its members were opposed to serving in public offices; for example, in 1626 Pieter Jansen was fined for refusing to accept the office of sheriff; in 1628 two other brethren of the church refused to be members of the town council. But in course of time the congregation, which consisted largely of rather well-to-do businessmen, and which was led by capable ministers and deacons, grew more progressive and more liberal than the North church, though no member of the South congregation held a public office before 1796. Whereas in the Waterlander congregation only a few members participated in the Collegiant (q.v.) meetings, many outstanding members of the South church were ardent Collegiants, including the preacher Dirck Jacobs Kipper (1655-1734) and particularly Jan Gerritsz Schenk (d. 1760), who from 1726 often performed baptism at the Collegiant center at Rijnsburg (q.v.), and made a bequest of 40,000 guilders to the Collegiants. He also had the large masonry baptismal tub at Rijnsburg made at his expense. The gift of 2,305 guilders collected in 1673 for the national needs during wartime bears testimony to the importance of the congregation and the wealth of its members, who in 1727, 1733, and 1736 contributed 184 guilders, 337 guilders, and 1,650 guilders to the needs of the Prussian Mennonites.

Until 1764 the congregation was served by unsalaried and untrained preachers, including some capable and influential men like Dirck Gerritsz (1565-1626), founder of the paper industry on the Zaan, his son Jacob Dirks (q.v., 1615-89), and his grandson Dirk Jacobsz Kipper (1655-1734), cheese merchants, Pieter Jansz (q.v.) van den Busch (d.1698), and Gerrit Blaauw, serving 1726-80. The first salaried minister was Bernardus Doornbosch (q.v.), serving 1764-80; he was a beloved preacher, but his moral conduct was not above reproach and so he was dismissed. He was followed by Arent van Groenou 1780-91, Leendert Klein, who was the first pastor in this congregation trained at the Amsterdam seminary, serving at Wormerveer 1791-1826, followed by Jan Gerrit Boekenooen 1827-63, Simon Gorter 1863-70, Jer. de Vries 1870-72, I. J. le Cosquino de Bussy 1872-78, I. H. Boeke 1878-84, P. K.

Bijl 1886-88, H. van Cleeff 1889-96, and B. P. Plan-tinga 1897-98.

The membership of the South congregation was 167 in 1761, 229 in 1794, 193 in 1847, 223 in 1861, and 360 in 1898.

3. The (united) Mennonite congregation of Wormerveer started in September 1899 with 460 baptized members. The membership numbered 475 in 1933, 355 in 1958. Pastors were A. K. Kuiper 1899-1901, H. Britzel 1902-38, P. van der Meulen 1938-47, and P. J. Smidts since 1947. The present meeting-house is that of the former South congregation, built in 1831 (organ of 1855). The Wormerveer congregation is the only Dutch congregation which published a weekly paper: Ons Doopsgezind Krantje appeared from Sept. 6, 1913, until World War II. Church activities are a church choir, ladies' circle, youth group 18-25, youth group Elfregi, Sunday school for children. From Sept. 1, 1934, until 1947 the pastor of Wormerveer was also in charge of the congregation of Knollendam (q.v.).

The Mennonites have played an important part in the life and economic growth of the town. In the 16th century Wormerveer was but a small hamlet. In 1613 the population numbered only about 450 souls, in 1638 about 800, and only a small percentage of them were not Mennonites. At present Wormerveer has a considerable industry (oil, soap, oats, flour, rice, cocoa, paper, dyes, chlorine; ship-building). In most of these industries the Mennonites until recent times were leading. Many old families which were formerly found among the Wormerveer Mennonites, such as Blaauw, Schenk, Laan, Prins, Keen, Vas, Ris, Boekenooen, Koekebakker, van Gelder, Groot, Lely, and Volger, have died out or left the town. Of the old Mennonite families at present only Aten, Dekker, and Vis are found among the members of Wormerveer. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 447, 900-5; II, Nos. 2357 f., 2359; II, 2, No. 672; Blaupot t. C., Holland I, 212, 251, 271, 348; II, 194, 197, 201, 204, 232; J. C. van Slee, De Rijnsburger Collegianten (The Hague, 1896) 196-200; DJ 1837, 18; DB 1861, 164 f.; 1882, 114; 1883, 72; 1899, 213; 1901, 15; 1918, 146; De Zondagsbode XLIV (1930-31) No. 52.

Worms, a town on the Rhine in the Palatinate, Germany (pop. 56,500 in 1953), was in 1527 a center of Anabaptist activity. In January 1527 both Hans Denk (q.v.) and Ludwig Haetzer (q.v.) came to Worms, where they completed and published their translation of the Old Testament Prophets (see Worms Prophets). There was probably no Anabaptist congregation in this town before 1527. The rise of the Worms Anabaptist movement may have been the result of the work of Melchior Rinck (q.v.), Haetzer, and particularly Denk, though Fellmann is of the opinion that Denk was not especially active here, leading a retired life. In any case it is clear that Denk deeply influenced Jacob Kautz (q.v.), one of the Reformed preachers at Worms, who even before the coming of Denk and Haetzer opposed infant baptism. Kautz was won over for the Anabaptist principles; among his converts was his co-preacher Hilarius (q.v.), who in turn converted many others. The clergy and the city government at this time lived in a kind of vacuum between Catholicism and Reformation and did not seriously counteract Anabaptist activity.

On June 9, 1527, Kautz attached seven Anabaptist theses on the door of the Dominican Church, inviting to a public debate on June 13. Whereas Hege held that these theses differed from the views of Denk, Goeters states that Denk was the very father of Kautz's theses. The disputation was not held in the way Kautz wished, because the Reformed (Lutheran) pastors, either for the safety of their church or for political reasons, were not inclined to participate. The result was that on June 13 Kautz and other preachers gave a free testimony and broad explanation of their Anabaptist views to a large attendance. Thereupon both the Lutheran pastors and the Catholics tried to stop the movement. The Catholics denounced the theses to the Palatine Elector, saying that Kautz's ideas concerning baptism and communion were a horror for all true Christians. The Lutheran preachers of Worms, Ulrich Preu and Johann Freiherr, replied to Kautz's theses with "seven articles," which had been promulgated by the press. In July 1 the city council of Worms resolved to banish Kautz and Hilarius from the town. The next day the Reformed preachers of Strasbourg, who had anxiously followed developments at Worms, published Getrewe Warnung der Prediger des Evangelij zu Strassburg über die Artickel, so Jakob Kautz, Prediger zu Wormbs, kürzlich hat lassen ausgehen. About the same time Denk and Haetzer also left the city. Rinck had already been banished. After the Anabaptist leaders had been removed from the stage, Anabaptism in Worms soon declined, though a congregation still seems to have existed for a short while. vdZ.

Chr. Hege, Die Täufer in der Kurpfalz (Frankfurt, 1908) 34 ff.; TA Baden-Pfalz, No. 129; J. F. Gerhard Goeters, Ludwig Hätzler (Gütersloh, 1957) 97-99, 104-9; W. Fellmann, Hans Denck, Schriften, 2. Teil (Gütersloh, 1956) 13 f.

Worms Prophets, a translation of the Old Testament Prophets by Ludwig Haetzer with some assistance from Hans Denk, named after the city of Worms in which the first two editions appeared. The exact title of the first edition is Alle Propheten nach Hebräischer sprach verteutscht (Worms, Peter Schöffner, 1527). A total of 12 separate editions appeared 1527-31, as follows: (1) and (2) at Worms April 13, 1527, in octavo and folio; (3) Augsburg June 1527 in folio; (4) Worms Sept. 7, 1527, in octavo; (5) Augsburg Dec. 14, 1527, in octavo; (6) Hagenau (Alsace) Feb. 12, 1528, in folio; (7) Augsburg Feb. 24, 1528, in folio; (8) Augsburg March 7, 1528, in folio; (9) Worms June 19, 1528, in octavo; (10, 11, and 12) Augsburg June 25, 1528, May 19, 1528, and Nov. 4, 1528, all in octavo. A part of the translation appeared in three editions of the complete Bible published at Strasbourg 1529/30, 1530/32, and 1535/36, although only a few copies of the last edition used the Worms translation, most using Luther's text. Two concordances cite the Worms translation—(1) Leonhard Brunner's (Worms, 1529), and (2) one published by Köpfl at Strasbourg in 1530. Denk's own commentary on Micah of 1532 also uses it.

The Worms translation of the Prophets was the first Protestant translation of this part of the Bible, and as such served a real need and was in great demand; particularly since it was a fairly good translation directly from the Hebrew. Luther had a copy by May 4, 1527, Franz Kolb in Bern one by May 5. It was certainly on the market for the Frankfurt spring book fair in 1527. By early May the city council of Nürnberg had forbidden its sale in the city. The ultimate reaction of both Lutheran and Zwinglian leaders was negative, not because of poor literary quality or accuracy (Luther recognized its good points), but because its authors came from "the Anabaptist sect," who were guilty of certain heresies, and also because they cited some Jewish authorities in their translation. Goeters believes that both Luther and Leo Jud felt pressed to proceed with their translations because of the popularity of the Worms translation. In 1529 the Zürich translation appeared (Froschauer edition). The same Worms printer (Peter Schöffer) who had printed the Haetzer-Denk Prophets adopted the Zürich translation at once for his 1529 full Bible. With the appearance of Luther's full Bible in 1532 the Worms translation was completely overshadowed and disappeared. According to Baring some 80 copies of the various editions have survived, largely in European libraries, to testify to its early popularity.

Recent research, especially that of Goeters, has corrected some long-standing misconceptions about the Worms translation. (1) The prime author was Haetzer, with Denk as a useful assistant but not as a prime author. (2) The claim of Christian Hege (ML I, 408) that Luther and the Zürich translators depended heavily upon the work of Haetzer and Denk, and the claim of Ludwig Keller that the two other translations are based on the Worms translation, are much exaggerated, although both profited from it. Goeters' judgment is sound: "Next to the Bible text itself, the Worms Prophets were the most important literary material for the Lutheran and Zürich translations." (3) There is evidence that the Worms translation of Habakkuk is dependent upon Luther's 1526 translation of the same book.

In the light of Goeters' demonstration that Haetzer was only a fringe figure in the Anabaptist movement, and that in Strasbourg in December 1526 he vigorously repudiated Anabaptist views and connections just when he was beginning the translation, the "Anabaptist" character of the Worms translation might need to be questioned. On the other hand, Denk was clearly an Anabaptist at this time, and Haetzer was definitely under his influence during their joint work on the translation while they were together in Worms February-July 1527, after which their paths separated, never to cross again. H.S.B.

G. Baring, "Die Wormser Propheten," in Beilage zum dritten Bericht des deutschen Bibelarchivs (Hamburg, 1933) and in Archiv für Reformationsgeschichte XXXI (1934) 23-41; E. Stähelin, Das theologische Lebenswerk Johannes Oekolampads (Leipzig, 1939); Chr. Hege, Die Täufer in der Kurpfalz (Frankfurt, 1908); E. Teufel, in Theologische Rundschau XV (1943) 58-62; Ernst Crous, "Zu den Bibelübersetzungen von Hätzer und Denk," in Beiträge zur Geschichte der Mennoniten (Weierhof, 1938) 72-83; G. Baring, Hans Denck Schriften I. Teil: Bibliographie (Gütersloh, 1955); J. F. G. Goeters, Ludwig Hätzer (Gütersloh, 1957), esp. "Die Wormser Ueber-setzung der Propheten," 99-104; G. Haake, "Studien über die Wormser Uebersetzung der Propheten," Menn. Bl., 1898, 27-29; W. Fellmann, "Fünf alte Wormser Täuferdrucke," Gesch.-Bl., 1937, 25-31; F. W. E. Roth, Die Mainzer Buchdruckerfamilie Schöffer während des 16. Jahrhunderts (Leipzig, 1892) 133 ff.; idem, Die Buchdruckereien zu Worms a. Rhein im XVI. Jahrhundert (Worms, 1892) 18 ff.; Ludwig Keller, Ein Apostel der Wiedertäufer (Leipzig, 1882) 210-14; ML IV.

Worship, Public. Anabaptist. In contrast to the general Reformation doctrine that the church comes to expression when the Word is preached and the sacraments properly observed, the Anabaptists believed that the "true church is raised up" where "faith, spirit, and power" result in "repentance and change of life" and obedience to the truth. Hence the Anabaptists placed little emphasis in formal public worship or ceremonies, and rejected all liturgy. Persecution, which made meetings difficult and often dangerous, gave added support to this basic attitude. The Anabaptists did not come from a week of irreligious, worldly living and expect a beautiful building and attractive liturgy to draw them to God. They insisted that the Christian walks with God constantly in holy obedience and expected their daily life to come naturally to a climax in the fellowship of the gathered community of disciples, where a major concern was to seek the will of God from His Word and to help one another to higher levels of discipleship.

In such worship a common searching of life was involved, and discipline naturally resulted, often carried through as a supplement to the regular worship. The fact that several ministers served the group in Bible reading, admonition, and prayer, and that services were not held in large church buildings but in homes or barns, in forest retreats, or even caves, in addition to the understanding that every member was a responsible adult who had chosen to follow Christ and shared fully in the life of the brotherhood, added to the intense sense of participation by all. Hence, Anabaptist congregations were not "audiences" in attendance upon a worship service furnished by a clergyman in a building belonging to the state and used for nothing else, but a genuine brotherhood sharing in Bible study, prayer, and mutual admonition. The high authority of the Bible of course placed it in the very center of the service, and the reading and exposition of it, or admonition from it, was the most important element. In a sense life was more important than worship.

One of the results of this attitude was that Anabaptists steadfastly refused to attend the worship of the state church, even though as a consequence they were often punished and imprisoned. In fact, one of the ways that Anabaptists were detected was by non-attendance at the public preaching and communion services. The court records contain many cases of attempted compulsory attendance and penalties. Bullinger's Der Widertoufferen Ursprung (1560) contains as an appendix a reprint of an Anabaptist "booklet" giving the reasons why they did not attend "church."

There is no evidence of any Anabaptist meeting-house built in the 16th century, except the one in Elbing-Ellerwald in West Prussia, built in 1590. However, before 1600 buildings such as warehouses

